Breath of Spring.

[Song from the German of Eichendorf.]

O'er the garden, hear the voices!
Birds of passage on their flight!
Spring is coming, earth rejoices,
Grass is springing all the night.

Shouting now, and now nigh weeping,
Feel I that it cannot be!
Wonders of the Past come creeping
With the moonlight in to me.

And the moon, the stars, they tell it,
Dreamy forests lisp the sign,
Nightingales in sweet notes swell it:
"She is thine, is only thine!" J. S. D

The Poet's Work.

To set this age to Music—the great work
Before the Poet now—I do believe
When it is fully sung, its great complaint,
Its hope, its yearning, told to earth and heaven,
Our troubled age shall pass, as doth a day
That leaves the west all crimson with the promise
Of the diviner morrow, which even then
Is hurrying up the world's great side with light.
Father! if I should live to see that morn,
Let me go upward, like a lark, to sing
One song in the dawning!

The Philister's Reminiscence.

(FROM ONE OF BROWN'S PRIVATE NOTE BOOKS.)

A right pleasant week of this delicious September weather have I spent here in old Frankfort on the Main. I have renewed my acquaintance with all the interesting places mentioned in "Hyperion," and have gaped, stared, approved and disapproved, in all due regard to red-covered Murray—equal to any London cockney of the first water. I have heard Roger in La Dame Blanche—he singing in French and the others in German—a pleasing and effective arrangement—but what a singer and actor he! And yesterday afternoon the "Caecilia Verein" gave Handel's "Messiah." A fine chorus that, and the solos good; but Handel's music never produces its full effect upon me, as performed in Germany, either owing to its translated text, or to the fact that they have not the traditions, or, what seems more probable, that the great composer had caught a certain English spirit, which his continental performers cannot feel, and consequently cannot express.

After the concert I rambled for an hour in the beautiful public grounds, which now occupy the site of the ancient fortifications of the old imperial city, and then returned to "mine inn," to take "mine ease." In the public room, sitting at a table by the window, I sipped my "schoppen" of Mosel, as lazy and comfortable and careless and easy as the finest old Philister of them all. Why not? Must I keep up my American hurry and fidget and worry and fuss, and not be contented without making myself as miserable in a quiet German inn, as in our national caravansaries? Gott bewahr! By and by comes in a tall, stout, rosy-faced old gentleman, who glances round the room, nods to two or three individuals, and then with a pleasant Guten Abend! takes a chair at my table, and calls for his "Schoppen Wein." Before taking his pinch, he passes me his snuff-box. Of course I return his politeness by taking a pinch myself and sneeze some six times in consequence. And then we chat as if we were old acquaintances.

Some time I must write a eulogy upon Philister life in these quiet little German inns, with their jolly old habitués playing dominoes and "sixty-six," smoking their long pipes, and sipping their wine—but not now.

Now comes in a little, black-eyed, nervous old fellow, whom the jolly old landlord receives as an honored guest, and who, after disposing of his thin overcoat, and giving his order for a cutlet and a Schoppen Frodheimer, comes up and shakes hands with my stout gentleman.

"Good evening, Herr Bok," says the little man.

"Good evening, Herr Rechnungsrath," returns the other. "So you have come down from Melheim to hear the oratorio."

"Always, when they sing Handel—my lol, you know."

"Ah, a heavenly performance!" says Herr Bok.

"Very good, very good, but the contralto nger wanted feeling. I shall never hear her feeling in that part again!" and the little man drank off his glass, sighed, nodded his head like a porcelain mandarin, and pursed his lips as who should say "there is nothing more to be said about it"—then suddenly turned to me; "Engländer, mein Herr?"

"O, Sir," said I. "French perhaps?"

"O, Sir." "Not a Russian?" No, Sir, an American.

"So-o-o-o-o! Long here?"

"Germany, some time." "You find our language rather difficult—not so?" "Yes, rather," then again to Herr Bok, as if no supposition as I were in existence—"No, I shall never hear true feeling in that part again! never! never! never!"

The cutlet came, and the little man devoted himself for the next half hour to his supper, chatting in the mean time upon all sorts of topics, changing them in the most abrupt manner, and keeping me in a constant query, whether the little man was all right in the attic.

The waiter cleared the table, brought another Schoppen, the little man lighted his pipe, smoked in silence a few minutes, and then addressed me again:

"No, I shall never hear that part with real feeling again! Shall I tell you the story, Herr Amerikaner?"

"It will give me great pleasure, Mein Herr," said I.

"You have heard of Thibaut?"

"Thibaut, the great civil law professor, over here at Heidelberg? Yes."

"Perhaps you may have heard of his work on 'the Purity of the Tone-Art?'"

"Yes, I have it, and Nægeli's replies to it, also."

"Nægeli me no Nægeli's," said he, "Thibaut's book, that is a book! It set us all to singing the 'Messiah.' Ach, du lieber Gott! I was a young man then, and had studied with him and sung in the chorus in his house. When the book came out I was already in Melheim, and it made such a sensation that we formed a singing union for the study of Handel's music, and took up the 'Messiah.' There was the choir of the Cathedral, and the 'Men's Vocal Union,' and the best boy altos of the Gymnasium and all the best amateur singers of the town. We had a hundred voices, good. In time it was thoroughly rehearsed and we prepared to sing it in public. We had a good soprano, a good tenor, and as to the bass solos, I took them myself—in those days I could sing a little myself. Nicht wahr, Herr Bok?"

Herr Bok nodded a very strong affirmative.

The little man hummed a few bars of "Why do the nations" and then, shaking his head with such a comical expression of sorrow that I could hardly keep my countenance, continued:

"But where to find a contralto for those soul-touching solos? Where to find a voice full, deep, and overflowing with pathos and sympathy, that could discourse adequately of the sorrows of the Son of Man! I went to Heidelberg. I wrote to Frankfort, but in vain. I was in despair. I saw no way but to give those numbers to one of our boys, which would have secured a technically correct performance, but one as cold and unsympathetic as correct. The directors of the Society were very well satisfied with this arrangement, but it grated harshly upon my feelings. But there was no help for it.

"Well, we engaged a director and an orchestra and appointed the day of performance, some four weeks later.

"Mean time legal business called me to a domain upon the Neckar, a day's journey from Melheim, and detained me there several days. The first night I dreamed that the day of performance had come, and that all went well, the boy contralto and all, until at the close of the chorus, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' the conductor looked about in vain for the boy who was to sing the next air. I could see myself standing at the head of the basses, in an excitement increasing every moment, and spreading through the chorus and orchestra, and extending to the audience below. Then the fantastic confusion of a dreadful dream followed, of which I remember nothing distinctly, and then I found myself unaccountably standing in the open air. I was upon Calvary weeping, as a female form, in a nun's dress, pointed to a cross and sang in accents of superhuman sorrow: 'He was despised and rejected of men!' As I awoke it seemed to me that I heard a faint echo of these tones dying away upon the midnight air.

"The next night the dream in substance returned, but I awoke with the first note of the nun, and heard distinctly through the open casement the voice I had so vainly sought — full, mellow, touching — chanting an evening hymn to the Virgin. As midnight struck the voice ceased.

"The next day I could hardly attend to my business. The voice haunted me. I scanned the faces of my hostess and her two grown-up daughters; two young women upon a visit from Frankfort; the governess of the younger children. Neither of them could be the singer. I talked about the family, but could hear of no member whom I had not seen. At table I turned the conversation upon music and in the evening we had a family concert. All took part. Poh! mere dilettantism — and yet good enough. I could have enjoyed it under ordinary circumstances. That voice was not there.

"That evening I sat at my window, and waited for the evening hymn. Five minutes to twelve — and I heard it sweetly swelling, soft and clear. I leaned out of the window, but could by no effort decide whence it came. It seemed to float downward to me, as from the heavens, pure, divine, holy. Was it of earth? I grew superstitious.

"The next day at table I made the proposed performance of the 'Messiah' the topic of conversation, and my host and his family, who had read Thibaut's work, decided at once to visit Melheim upon the occasion. I had thus an opportunity to speak of our difficulty in regard to the alto solos, and keeping the unknown songstress of the night in view, I described the person we needed. I did not speak of what I had heard directly, but saw no evidence that my description had called up any associations in the mind of any one present. It was very mysterious. The family was Roman Catholic in faith, and the priest of the village dined with them this day. I found him an affable, agreeable man, a lover of music and particularly interested in that of the church.

"Towards evening I walked with him to a height, whence we had a glorious view of the Neckar valley. In the course of our conversation I related to him my dream, and how I had been wrought upon by the voice.

"Did you only dream this?" asked he.

"The next night and the next it was no dream," said I.

"We walked on some time in silence.

"But about this Oratorio — under whose auspices? the object of it and so forth," said he, at length.

"It is to be given in the cathedral, under the patronage of the Bishop and reverend clergy, and the proceeds are to go to the convent of Marienwalde," I replied.

"Here is the best point of view for this part of the valley," said he, changing the conversation.

"When we parted upon our return, as he bade me good-night, he said: 'And you think that voice such as you need?'

"Indeed I do — I never heard the like!"

"That night I heard no evening hymn.

"Upon reaching Melheim three days later, I found a letter from my priest, containing a request that I should send him a copy of the 'Messiah, if one could be obtained, with the remark: 'Es ist vielleicht doch Rath zu schaffen' — there may possibly, after all, be a way. I sent him one by the next post.

Music and Musical Taste in Havana.

LETTER FROM SIGNOR TAGLIAFICO TO A FRIEND IN CUBA.

(Translated for the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin from the Courrier des Etats-Unis).

HAVANA, FEB. 25.—My dear V.:—We have often conversed during the present season of the Havana Italian Opera, and you have seemed to attach some value to my observations, rather, I fancy, from the recollection of the days when we were chums at the college of Henry IV., than on account of my personal importance in this theatre. Allow me in leaving here, to give you my impressions with the candor of which you know that I am possessed.

I have, during my stay in your fine country, written a dozen letters that I desire for publication. I will send you what I have written from Paris or from London. In the mean time, I will give you a summary, as brief as possible, of all in those letters that touches the question of Art.

You have often smilingly asked me: What do you think of our Italian theatre? My dear V., you know Mrs. Glass's receipt for a potted hare: "The indispensable things first a theatre."

"But," say you, "the great Taccon theatre?" Well, the Taccon theatre is immense building, which might do admirably for a ballet or a fairy spectacle, but never, never for hearing singing, and especially Italian singing. Built in violation of all the best known rules of acoustics, without any regard for draughts of air, (I appeal for this to the musicians of the orchestra, whose cigar smoke darkened the foot-lights and choked the singers, during rehearsals); open to every wind, to every noise, to every smell; not far from a railroad whose American engines, with a most unmelodious screaming, add new effects to Verdi's harmonies; finally, covered with a kind of zinc roof, which, on rainy days, makes cymbals entirely useless in the orchestra, the great Taccon theatre has not even a retiring room (for the singers that would be a luxury!) which, communicating with the orchestra, would allow the musicians to tune their instruments at the beginning and between the acts of the opera.

You call this a theatre for Italian opera? I do not speak of the stage—that sanctum inpenetrabile of every theatre that respects itself, to which, in Paris and St. Petersburg, no one is admitted except by a permit of the Minister. Here the stage is a mere tobacco-shop. Smoking is prohibited in the lobbies of the theatre; but behind the scenes one may smoke in the coulisses in the very faces of the singers, who may have taken, during the day, every precaution to keep their voices clear and their lips fresh; so that Lucrezia, or the Favorite of King Alphonso, or the niece of the very noble Don Ruiz Gomez de Silva, have to sweep up, with their velvet or satin robes, the saliva of Messieurs the subscribers. The chorister smokes, the machinist smokes, the soldier on guard smokes, dressers, sweepers, servants, black and white—all smoke. Is there any need of all this, to remind us poor artists that our art, our ambition, our glory, everything, is only smoke? We know it well enough, without having to pay so dear for it.

An Italian theatre requires, moreover, an orchestra and a chorus. I know your opinion, and the press has been unanimous in regard to the orchestra and chorus of this season. I have, therefore, no hesitation in testifying to their worthlessness. But by what right can you demand at Havana an orchestra and a chorus? Have you ever done anything to procure them? You do not pretend that Maretzek, or any other director, should bring you from Europe or the United States, twenty-four choristers, and as many first-class musicians for the orchestra, which are necessary to put your theatre on a level with other establishments of the kind? We have often laughed, I assure you, when your journals have anathematized the first performance of La Favorita, on account of the general effect and the scenic appointments. Do you know that, to produce this work in Paris, six months of rehearsals were required, with the orchestra and chorus of the Grand Opera? Do you know, that in London, for two months, our chorus have been rehearsing every day the works that we are to produce next summer? You say the mise en scene is deplorable. And whose fault is it? Did not Maretzek have to pay $550 for the right of not having in Norma a view of the Rue de la Paix, with the Vendome column in the background, and in Maria di Rohan a Pompadour chamber and ornaments, in Ernani a portrait nailed to the wall, so that the bandit was obliged to hide himself in the ante-chamber—in a word, pitiable appointments and disgustingly dirty!

When, Havanese, you shall have established by a private subscription—which is the easiest thing in the world with your pecuniary resources—a conservatory of Music, where you can train vocal and instrumental performers; a Philharmonic Society, such as are found now-a-days in the small cities of Italy, France, England, and Germany; a Society which will promote a taste for music in all classes; when you shall bring out at your monthly concerts and in a grand annual festival, the productions of the great masters; when, in a word, you shall know, otherwise than by name, the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Handel, Cherubini, Spohr, Mendelssohn, &c., &c., then you will have a right to be hard to please, and to demand of foreign managers, to whom you furnish resources found in your own country, a perfect performance; then, but then only, you will have the right to call your country a musical country. Why, you have not even a quartet soirée in Havana! You have not a single house where people meet for music, or where artists are received! You know, my dear V., how much the art of music at home owes to the salons of your countrywoman, the Countess Merlin, to the Rochefoucaults, the Cazés, the Orfilas, the Cremieux, the Girardins, and others, among whom the greatest artists of all kinds were the peers of the greatest names of France.

To return to the theatre. You have a queer word in your island, which shocked me a good deal at first. It is the word trabajar (to work), applied to the profession of a singer. "When do you work?" people would ask me. "Do you work in La Sonnambula?" "How well Mad. Gazzaniga worked last evening in La Traviata!" This word, I soon learned, was perfectly appropriate to those who sang at the Tacon Theatre.

You are right. The art of singing, here, is not the most ideal, the most perfect expression of the feelings of the soul. It is work, work for the throat, the lungs, the arms, the legs, the whole muscular system. There is only one way to sing at the Tacon Theatre, it is to scream. Cantar es gridar! And this will explain the success of every singer who, consenting to sacrifice his artistic convictions, seeks to produce effects, for example, by that eternal holding of the dominant, on which he seems to hang with his whole strength, to fall afterwards, with all his weight, on the tonic. Every where else this is a mark of bad taste; but in Havana it excites frenzies of applause, especially if the thing is accompanied by a blow of the fist in the air, or by several rapid slaps with the open hand on the chest; (probably a sign of mea culpa!) This is sublime, according to Havana taste.

(Conclusion next week.)

Learning to Sing—Jenny Lind's Letter.

Yielding to the suggestion of our "Diary," in his remarks, a few weeks since, on voices and on going abroad to cultivate them, we reprint the following letter of Mme. Goldschmidt from an old volume of our Journal. It was written in fuller explanation of a note of advice accompanying her donation of a thousand dollars to the fund for sending Miss Adelaide Phillips abroad to study under Garcia and other masters.

"If I might be permitted to offer a suggestion in regard to Miss —, it would be a recommendation to her not to go to Italy, as she has been advised by some friends to do. My humble opinion is, that the recently adopted method of Italian singing is not the most natural and healthy. The proof thereof is, that we see only a few singers in our days that know how to preserve their voice, having once been in Italy and there acquired the habit of forcing more sound out of their lungs than nature intended they should.

"I never went to Italy myself for that very reason. After having heard all the modern Italian singers, I was well convinced that my voice never would have been able to preserve its natural elasticity and its character of high soprano, had I undertaken to adopt the same forced style of singing as is now-a-days almost unavoidable in Italy by the frequent performances of Signor Verdi's operas. . . . His music is the most dangerous for all singing artists, and will continue so to be until the artists themselves will better understand their own interests, as well as that of the beauty of the art of singing, and refuse to sacrifice themselves to a composer, who by no means understands the exquisite beauty of the real Italian singing, that cannot be surpassed by any other nation."

"Miss — will find both in London and in Paris masters fully qualified to instruct her in all that is deemed requisite; and in the former city now lives the most distinguished singing master, Mr. Emanuel Garcia, who is in my opinion eminently qualified to understand and to develop her voice and talent.

"A year's residence in London or Paris will enable her to judge of the progress which she has made, and also the propriety of afterwards spending six months or one year in Germany, the land of real music, in which the true artist only can acquire the genuine stamp of Art. Germany offers perhaps less excellence for the singer, as a singer; for the German language is very hard to pronounce and often changes the character of the sound; for instance: the quality of tone in singing out the Italian word, Dolore, and the identical German word, Schmerz, will be found quite different in its result, and infinitely in favor of the former. But—to wish to become a good artist, with a good artistical conscience, and not know Germany and its musical masters, would indeed be as great a loss for the artist, as it would to the public, before whom he ought to wish to give a right impression.

"I know what Germany is to an artist, and, with all my veneration for the true Italian singing school, I really believe that, unless I had taken the German music as the ground-work, my whole knowledge of Italian singing would never have satisfied me, and my musical faculties would have been undeveloped and unfruitful.

"What I therefore wish most earnestly to impress upon Miss —'s mind is, that she would try to combine Italian song and German music, the one being as necessary as the other;—that she would try to avoid false pathos, as the same law exists, to its fullest extent, in Art as in life;—that she be true to herself, try to find out the beauty of truth, as well in the simplest song as in the most difficult aria;—and the great secret will be her's,—the most powerful protector against envy and malice will be on her side."

"A HYMN OF PRAISE."

Written for the London Sacred Harmonic Society,
BY G. A. MACFARREN.

[The four-hundredth anniversary of the invention of Printing was celebrated throughout Germany; but in Leipzig especially, the great book market, it was regarded as an occasion of peculiarly local interest, and solemnized, accordingly, by the inauguration of a statue of Gutenberg, to whom this most important invention to the world is due, and by a grand Musical Festival. Mendelssohn was at this time in the full zenith of his great popularity in Leipzig, fulfilling his office of director of the Gewandhaus concerts, and exercising a more extensive and beneficial influence upon his art than, perhaps, any one man, by his personal exertions, has done in the whole progress of its history. Upon him devolved the conduct and the entire arrangement of the Festival; and further, what was of still greater value, since it has given a perpetual interest to this occasion, to write some original compositions appropriate to the celebration. These consisted of some choral pieces, which were performed in the open air at the ceremony of uncovering the statue,—and of the Hymn of Praise (Lobgesang), one of the noblest of his works, which was produced at St. Thomas' Church on the 25th of June, 1840,—a day in which the universal interest is even enhanced by its association with this immortal masterpiece.

The design of this work is quite individual; one is apt, indeed, to associate it with the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, but, from a most important distinction between the two, erroneously,—the distinction that Beethoven adds voices to the instrumental resources of the orchestra in the final movement of a work constructed otherwise upon the usual model of his grand instrumental compositions; while in the Hymn of Praise the vocal movements are the larger proportion of the composition, and, however connected in unity of purpose and closeness of succession, each, as regards its ideas and their development, complete in itself, and independent of the rest. It entirely fulfils its definition, being equally a Symphony and a Cantata, and the purpose of this combination of the grand forms of instrumental and vocal composition is shown in the manner in which the two divisions of the work reflect and so enforce the sentiment of each other.]

I. THE SYMPHONY.—The most important form of musical construction is embodied in the first movement of a grand instrumental composition,—grand, from the character of the ideas and the extent of their development,—whether this be for an orchestra, or for one or more solo instruments. * * * *

The movement,—a distinctly self-complete portion of a work,—is divided into a first part and a second part. This division is sometimes defined by a perfect cadence, and even by a momentary silence; sometimes it is only marked by the course of the modulations and the conduct of the ideas. The first part simply announces the ideas; the second part comprises their development through such varieties of artistic elaborations as the imagination and skill of the writer may yield, and character of the composition exact,—the recapitulation of their original simple announcement,—and a Coda, which is a summing up of the whole, to enforce the chief ideas upon our recollection. The first part comprises two principal subjects, each of which, however, is frequently composed of several complete melodic phrases; the second subject is distinguished from the first by the train of ideas of which it consists, being first introduced in a different key from the first subject. In movements in a major key, this is generally the key most nearly related to that in which the movement begins and ends, namely, the fifth of the original key; in movements in a minor key, the second subject is introduced in some closely relative key, the selection of which is more various than in movements in a major key. Save this one important modulation which distinguishes the second from the first subject, there is little change of key in the first part. In the second part, on the contrary, where the working of these subjects takes place, the modulations are more frequent, much more extraneous, and much more sudden; and the several phrases, instead of being presented in their original completeness and simplicity, are broken into fragments and complicated with every available variety of contrapuntal and harmonic treatment. In the recapitulation of the first part which succeeds to this course of development, the composer, for the first time, returns to the original key of the movement with the resumption of the first subject. The matter of the first part is, generally, here much condensed, and the second subject presented in the original key of the movement, in which the whole concludes. Thus, to illustrate the whole by a familiar analogy, this form is like that of a discourse, which first demonstrates the simple qualities of the subjects of which it treats, then shows us the different effects that may be produced by their various combination and separation, and finally, having proved the extent of their resources, lays them again before us in their elemental simplicity.

(1.) Maestoso con Moto. Allegro.—The brief introductory Maestoso is preludial to the principal design which is embodied in the Allegro, and, although the important idea herein presented forms a prominent feature in the chief movement, the plan I have described is complete in this, independently of what precedes it.

The noble theme with which the work opens must always be regarded in connection with the words to which it is subsequently set, and, thus considered, we feel that in being employed as the initial phrase, it forms, as it were, a motto that proclaims at once the artistic and the poetical purpose of the composition:

All that hath life and breath, praise ye the Lord!

The very grand, imposing, and quite individual effect of this dignified opening, announces the earnestness and joyous enthusiasm that characterizes the composition. The responses between the brass instruments in unison and the rest of the orchestra in harmony, upon the successive phrases of this introductory theme, and the combination of their power in majestic force at its conclusion, maintain the grandeur of the commencement throughout the short opening movement.

The Allegro breaks out of its imposing prelude with this passionately joyous subject:

I shall not attempt to define the glowing emotions this rapturous movement embodies, which would be to presume upon my own speculations, and to divest the music of that vagueness which is almost the greatest of its wonderful charms. Let me only submit that my individual impression of the composer's possible purpose is, a feeling of overflowing happiness stimulated by the act of offering homage to the Great Principle of creation, the Author of nature and of the power to admire—if not to comprehend his works; the universal summons to "All that have life and breath" reëchoes round and round the eternal vaults of space, and now it wakens that loving sympathy for others' sufferings which is the worthiest offering at the shrine of mercy; now, prompts a wondering delight at all the goodness and the greatness of which we are the constant witnesses and the partakers. The theme of the Introduction reëns as a second section of the first or tonic Subject, when it is decorated by the addition of a florid counterpoint (or independent melody), of semiquavers, which, being successively played above and below the Subject, displays as much artistic skill in the composer as it produces brilliant and exciting effect. The almost singular length of this gorgeous movement, which is overflowing with ideas as it is grand in proportions, justifies a transient digression from the key of F, the fifth of the original tonic, to give peculiar effect to the first entry of the second Subject:

since, in a composition of this rare magnitude, broader contrasts are required, and therefore wider latitude in respect of modulation is admissible, than in movements in which the same form is condensed within concenter limits. The value of this transient digression is enhanced by the beautiful effect of the return to the key of F for the repetition of the same idea, equal to that of the modulation into A flat for its first introduction. Another prominent feature of the second Subject rises upon the close of this:

and the series of passages that grow out of it completes the First Part.

The commencement of the Second Part will be recognized by another recurrence of the initial phrase, which now assumes a somewhat different character, from the important difference of its contrapuntal treatment. Here, then, begins the elaboration of the ideas presented in the First Part, but the imagination of the composer is so paramount throughout as to disguise all appearance of labor in the spontaneous effect of impulsive production. The theme subsequently assigned to the chorus, with which the work opens, is a prominent feature throughout this eminently interesting portion of the composition, always surprising and equally delighting us by the novel and unexpected manner of its introduction. It is again and again relieved by the lovely melody with which the second Subject begins, with its truly loving expression; and this breaks upon us, in one situation, particularly, with a beauty of effect that has scarcely a parallel,—I mean where the gradual dying away of the orchestra in responsive iterations of a fragment of the initial phrase, leaves only the clarinet sustaining some truly pathetic notes in the lowest part of its compass, and its exquisite pathos, the single mournful expression throughout the movement, dissolves in the smiling geniality of the heavenly strain thus felicitously introduced.

The recapitulation of the First Part is introduced with electrifying effect by the fourfold repetition of a somewhat rare and very powerful harmony, to which a long crescendo has been the irresistibly exciting climax. The now familiar ideas are then brought before us with such variety of treatment, as imparts to them, even yet, a new interest; and the Coda, which commences like the Second Part, reinforces with ever-growing fervor the summons to universal nature to join in the song of praise. This forms a grand and very gradual climax, which leads up to the resumption of the majestic tempo of the Introduction, when the initial phrase is again given in its unisonous simplicity; and so the movement concludes, as it opens, with the noble dignity of its chief theme yet enhanced by the opposition of its original broad simplicity to the effect of the complicate elaborations of which it has been made the Subject.

It is not quite peculiar to Mendelssohn to connect the movements of a grand instrumental work, but he has done so to a greater extent than Beethoven, the only composer that preceded him in this exception from the general practice; and we have in the present work an admirable example of his obvious design to increase the effect of unity in the several divisions of a composition, and so to aggrandize the character of the whole. The few notes in the style of recitative, for the clarinet, form an ostensible link between the first and principal movement, and the one which succeeds it, leading us, by gentle gradation, from the feeling of devout gladness which marks the former, to the expression of worldly thoughts of worldly passion which distinguish that which is to come. The unity of feeling which pervades the entire work is the less definite but more important chain of connection between its several portions, and of this it will be to treat as occasion may prompt.

(2.) Allegretto agitato.—This movement is, more or less, analogous with the Scherzo and Trio of the majority of instrumental works,—a class of composition in which Mendelssohn preëminently excelled, and to which he has given more variety and more importance both of form and of expression than any other master. It is characterized by a loftier sentiment and a more serious earnestness than, perhaps, in any other example of the same description of movement; but, while it is distinguished by these individualities, it is, by many general essentials, still identified with its class.

What we may regard as the Scherzo (I use the term, purely in its technical meaning, for the sake of assisting those who are familiar with it as a musical definition to comprehend the structure of the present movement,—the Scherzo is an epitome of the form which is embodied in proportions of almost unequalled grandeur in the foregoing Allegro. It is one continuous stream of song, divided, in alternate phrases, between a combination of string and one of wind instruments: the exquisite dialogue consists at first of complete rhythmical periods for each, but its responses are brought closer together as the movement proceeds. Unbroken as is the flow of this passionate melody, its several ideas are sufficiently distinct for us to signalize the principal features in the plan, as, for example, the chief Subject will be recognized by this opening phrase:

and the second subject, however it may seem to grow out of the other, is a distinct train of thought, beginning—

The First Part (according to the general practice, from which the first movement of the present work is an exception) is repeated,—an arrangement that serves to impress the ideas upon our attention, and thus enables us the better to trace their development in the elaborations of the Second Part.

What is analogous with the Trio in the usual distribution of an instrumental work,—an episodic portion of the movement which forms an alternative with the Scherzo,—consists of a Choral or Hymn-tune for a complete choir of wind-instruments, with interludes between its several strains composed of fragments of what I must still distinguish as the Scherzo, for the rest of the orchestra. This Choral commences the same as one of the innumerable collection harmonized by Bach, "Du walt Gott Vater und Gott Sohn,"—a hymn of Thanksgiving to the Trinity,—but varies from that after the first strain; whether it be another tradition of the same tune, or the composition of Mendelssohn designedly or accidentally founded upon it, I am unable to ascertain; the contrapuntists who have chosen any of these primitive melodies of the Lutheran Church as themes for elaboration, have always exercised such apparent discretion as to the rhythmical arrangement, even as to the intervals, and as to the employment of the whole or only a portion of the Choral, that, according to such precedent, the former of my suppositions may be correct. It commences thus:

and the interludes, according to the frequent practice in Lutheran Churches, are introduced at each double bar. The phrase so prominent throughout the first movement, which is subsequently set to the words, "All that have life and breath, sing to the Lord," is introduced in several of the strains as an inner part of the harmony.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 3, 1858.

Our New Arrangement.

To-day our JOURNAL, on its seventh birthday, greets its readers in a new dress, having outgrown the old. We are emancipated from the cares of business and clerkship. Under the auspices of our new publishers, who assume those cares, we are now free to give our undivided thought to our own proper and congenial work of simply editing a musical paper. We offer you henceforth both hands full, no longer needing one hand to hold up the other. We give sixteen pages, the old eight pages forming now an unbroken whole of reading matter, with a chance now and then to overflow into the extra advertising sheet, which enfolds the reading columns and serves to waft them, as the seed-down the seed, to many places where their thoughts may lodge and possibly take root.

We also bring you, and intend to bring you every week, four pages of good music. That we are in earnest when we say good music, judge by the specimen herewith presented. Of this we speak more fully in another place.

These additions we are enabled to make by shifting the business responsibilities of the JOURNAL from our own upon the broader shoulders of our new publishers. To this consummation we have long looked forward. For six years we have sustained this JOURNAL, without any business agency, with small capital and smaller compensation, simply in the hope, that one day, when it should have earned for itself a character and developed from itself the all-essential and intrinsic element of success,—when it should have proved itself worthy to live, by at least a certain tough tenacity of life,—that then the other element, the "business man," would come to meet it and conduct it into larger fields of usefulness. If this union shall fulfil its promise, it will place us in the position we have always sought: 1) to make a much better paper; 2) to circulate it far more widely.

The new arrangement gives us room for more variety of matter; gives us time (free from the cares which hitherto have often forced us to make shift to fill our columns in the easiest way)—time to prepare the matter much more thoroughly and serve it up in forms more sure to catch and interest varieties of readers,—time to be short, (in which desirable feature, however, to-day's number is a failure, simply for the want of time, in hurrying out of the old house into the new). We hope it will give us leisure to think and study, and do more justice to important topics, hitherto too often of necessity evaded or postponed;—leisure to lay hold of and secure a few of our own darling editorial ideals, the ghosts of which unrealized have too long haunted and unnerved us. Could we satisfy ourselves, we should not fear but we would satisfy our readers! Above all, or we are much mistaken, it will give us, with new means, new independence. We shall be freer than ever—if that were possible—to utter our own thought. On this point it is perhaps fit that we should dwell a moment. We need not re-state the objects for which this journal was established, farther than to say, that: recognizing Art, particularly Music, as a most important element in the national and social life of a free people,—as “a true conservative element, in which Liberty and Order are both fully typed and made beautifully perfect in each other;” and recognizing the fact, that Music has become so much a feature in the earnest life and culture of advanced American society, entering into many of our schemes of education, and descending in some form, often too trivial and vulgar, into all amusements,—seeing this, we felt moved, according to the humble measure of our abilities, to try to supply an organ of true criticism and a weekly bulletin of news and progress in this most popular and influential, but least thoughtfully considered, of the Fine Arts. The execution of our design may have been feeble, as it has certainly been fragmentary and cramped for want of time and means. The half of our programme still has stood as but a sign of what we wished and meant to do, in—happier circumstances. Our strength lay meanwhile in our love and reverence for Truth as the first principle of Beauty, in our sincere and independent utterance, from a single sense of loyalty to Art, coupled only with a fervent wish to make Art better understood and loved. Many short-comings therefore have been pardoned to the true aspiration, and our work has never lacked at least the encouragement of sympathies which every one must value. Now then, we have not held on to this treasure six years, waiting for a publisher to give it currency, only to drop it in the dust the moment we have found him. Six years ago, in the first number of this paper, in announcing our purposes, we said:

The tone of our criticisms will, we hope, be found impartial, independent, catholic, conciliatory; aloof from personal cliques and feuds; cordial to all good things, but not too eager to chime in with any powerful private interest of publisher, professor, concert giver, manager, &c. This paper would make itself the “Organ” of no school or class, but simply an organ of what we have called the musical movement in this country; of the growing love of deep and genuine music. It will insist much on the claims of “Classical” music, and point out its beauties and its meanings—not with a pedantic partiality, but because the enduring needs so often to be held up in contrast with the ephemeral. But it will also aim to recognize what good there is in styles more simple, popular, or modern; will give him who is Italian in his tastes an equal hearing with him who is German; and will print the articles of those opposed to the partialities or the opinions of the editor, provided they be written briefly, in good temper and to the point.

All this we now re-affirm, and, to avoid any misapprehension, with especial emphasis upon the words Italicized. This Journal, in its editorial and critical columns, is not to be the organ of any, even its own Publishers’ mere private interests. We are happy to say that our publishers have too much public spirit and too far-sighted and intelligent a notion of their business interests, not to coincide with us in this view of our mutual relation. They publish music, good, bad, and indifferent, suited to all tastes and capacities, as all publishers must, and in vast quantities, making the larger sales of what is cheap and popular pay for the costlier issues of what is artistically best and classical. As is the demand, such must be the supply: is but the law of all trade. In the proper columns of the paper they will advertise these wares, setting forth the claims of each kind severally in their own way. We are not bound to praise whatever they announce, nor to withhold recognition of such good things as may come from other houses. Small good would our connection do our publishers’ announcements, should we forfeit our own independent title to respect for candor and right judgment. Poorly should we serve them, labelled as their bond slave. Their interest prompts them to couple the announcements of their vast music business with a respectable and high-toned Journal, fit to be looked to as some authority in Art. Our interest, and the interest of our readers and of Art, consults itself in the fact that wherever these announcements of new music go, our JOURNAL shall go with them, reaching hosts of readers inaccessible before.

With the music-seller the first consideration of course, is quantity; with the critic and true friend of Art, it is quality. The former labors to supply the widest possible demand; the latter to educate that demand up to some degree of fineness and intelligence. The seller would as gladly sell a thousand copies of Beethoven’s Sonatas, or of Bach’s Fugues, as he would the same number of the most popular and clap-trap variations; Mendelssohn and Chopin, Strakosch and Wallace, it is the same to him; he will as cheerfully send forth thousand upon thousand of the songs of Mozart, Schubert, Franz, Rossini, if you want them, as he will Anvil Choruses or Negro Melodies. It is the business of the critic, and it shall still be of this journal, to stimulate more frequent calls for music of the better class, to educate the taste of purchasers,—not forgetting, however, that many kinds of music are most useful in their way, to many, after they have grown hacknied and insignificant to more experienced tastes. Fortunately our publishers, and others too, have on their lists multitudes of works and pieces, which every friend of Music would rejoice to have supplant the miserable trash by which the art is now represented, to the exclusion of good models, in towns and seminaries throughout the land. Mere popularity or fashion is what oftentimes determines purchasers; and the journalist can safely grant the popularity of what his own taste cannot recommend. We shall announce and spread before you all kinds, that are decent; but shall give you honest counsel as to what we think you would do best to buy and study.

On other points of editorial policy and purpose we have left ourselves no room to speak. We can but let the paper speak for itself from week to week, only suggesting that a single number must not be taken for a specimen of all that we intend to do, and that the present number has been made up with much haste and in advance of date, amid the distraction of settling a thousand details of the new arrangement.

FOUR PAGES OF MUSIC. — Our Journal is enriched by the addition of four pages in each number of good music, — good in a true artistic sense. We shall not publish trash, but music worthy to be preserved and studied. It may not be confined to any one style or character; we may give sometimes vocal, sometimes piano music; sometimes a part-song by Mendelssohn, for instance; or a choice song, duet, quartet, or chorus from an opera; perhaps the choruses of “William Tell,” welcome alike to German and Italian tastes. Sometimes perhaps a Chorale or two by old Sebastian Bach, as models of true church harmony. It is hardly well to commit ourselves at once to any one kind; we must learn by experience. At all events the musical reader will receive in the course of the year over two hundred pages of really valuable music. These pages may be detached from the paper and preserved; and each piece will be pagged separately.

To-day we make a good beginning. Our selection is of the sterling kind, a composition which will probably be new to nearly all our readers. We take into view the multitude of choral societies and clubs, which have sprung up in so many of our cities and large towns. Many of these require for social practice or for public performance, pieces of less formidable length than oratorios. Of these there are rich stores, unpublished and almost unknown here. There are Cantatas, Psalms by Mendelssohn and others, admirably adapted to the purpose. And how desirable that these societies should spend their hours upon the study of good music, instead of wasting them upon the pretentious crudities of every country singing master turned composer! We have selected for our first piece, a beautiful Hymn by Mendelssohn, for a chorus of mixed voices with Soprano solo. It will occupy twenty pages, and be completed in five numbers. It is not difficult, save in a passage or two. It requires, to be sure, a sweet, sympathetic soprano to do justice to the song part: but is not one such voice the pride of almost every musical society or circle? The opening solo: “Hear my prayer,” is beautiful. With the change to a more animated movement, there are choral responses in unison. Afterwards the chorus parts divide into more contrapuntal and complex harmony; and finally another solo, one of the loveliest melodies of Mendelssohn, to the words: “O for the wings of a dove,” accompanied by chorus pianissimo with exquisite effect.

From my Diary. (New Series, No. 1.)

March 27. As a certain “oracular presence” spoken of by “Malacconcio” in DWIGHT’S JOURNAL of to-day, will not soon shine upon the audience of the Plymouth church in Brooklyn, I will endeavor to maximize certain principles, which seem to me to lie at the foundation of church music, and which would be the basis of any opinion that might be formed of the good or ill success of the experiment in the said church.

1. The best is hardly too good for the Deity, — whether in religion or art.

2. Art is, or should be, the handmaid of religion; this principle is recognized in the poetry (hymnology), in the abominable architectural experiments, in the attempts at fresco painting, &c., which we find in the meeting-houses of all denominations.

3. Music is of all arts that which appeals most strongly and universally to the feelings. Go into a cathedral abroad, where painting, sculpture, architecture, and music all address themselves to the hearts of prince and peasant alike, and see the effect of the Kyrie Eleison upon the multitude!

4. Music has a two-fold object in the service of the church; to attain which it should be on the one part of the highest artistic excellence possible, on the other of the simplest character. The one object is to excite and deepen emotion; the other to be the medium for giving vent to it.

5. Hence, as the church pays high salaries for a man of high culture to occupy the pulpit, so it should not be sparing of inducements to suitable persons to engage in cultivating the musical talent, which it has at command within itself, — it being the duty, the religious duty of all to whom God has given a talent for music to employ it in his service. Every church embracing a hundred families ought to have a choir of 40 to 50 voices, and employ a musician — a lover of sacred music and not a mere piano-forte teacher — to instruct and lead it.

6. Hence, too, (to attain the second object), there should be a selection of simple melodies, good music for the congregation to sing. These melodies must be slow, and of dignified and grand movement — as these alone are possible where the number of singers is large. This is proved by the experience, not of church congregations, but the more valuable experience of choral societies and operatic choruses.

7. "If meat maketh my brother to offend, I will eat no more meat." If I enter a church and hear semi-negro melodies sung as described by "Malacconco," the tendency within me is to "swear a prayer or two" — like the soldier in Romeo and Juliet — and as this is my infirmity, not my fault, I feel that the church had better dispense with that kind of "meat." How I have suffered in some places of worship!

8. If a really grand organ — not one with all kinds of fancy stops by any means — is played by an organist and not by a pianist; and if a choir of two or three dozen voices — trained as they would be if engaged to sing at a shilling concert, and not as if they had only to sing praises to the Most High, which is generally not thought to require much skill — sing two or three devotional anthems, and the congregation unite and sing old "York," or "Barby," or some such solid grand tune, which moves of itself like a tide — then I find an approach to what I call true music for the church. For this end I labor.

Concerts.

ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB. The concerts of our German Männerchor have left some of the pleasantest impressions of the winter. They seemed too quickly over, and the announcement of another, a Sacred Concert, for last Sunday evening, was hailed by many with great pleasure. The Lowell Institute hall proved just the place for an "Orpheus" concert, light, cheerful, commodious and excellent for sound. The audience was but moderately large, owing in part perhaps to the fact that many persons who are much interested in the "Orpheus," have other engagements upon Sunday-evenings. Could not the concert be repeated on some other evening? It was every way worthy of it; the programme very choice and rare, the singing excellent, and Mr. DRESEL's piano accompaniments perfect, always rightly suggestive, meeting the intentions of the music, and never too prominent. As we run over our programme we find a pleasant reminder in every number.

1. Luther's Choral: Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott.

Nobly harmonized for male voices. Sung with pure intonation and fine blending of the thirty voices, the first verse strong, the second soft, and so on alternately, a full pause between, the effect was grand and solemn: — worth cords of our common psalmody!

2. Ave verum corpus. Mozart.

A rich, full, serene, and satisfying strain of harmony. Sung by voices so well blended, and with such well graduated force, it seemed like the spontaneous and perfect product of a religious moment. We can well believe Mozart's own account of his manner of composing, where he says his works came to him as wholes. It sounds still better as we have lately heard it by mixed voices.

3. Duet: Tibi omnes Angeli. By Giordani.

In the elaste style of Italian melody of the last century, and very pleasing. Beautifully sung by Miss DOANE and her teacher, the accomplished conductor of the Orpheus, Mr. KREISSMANN.

4. Ciaccona: For the Violin. By Bach.

Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, a grave and thoughtful looking young man, from New York, recently from Germany, who took the first violin prize at Brussels, proved himself a solid classical musician, by the selection of such a piece, and by his firm, pure, expressive rendering. The Ciaccona, or Chaconne, like most of the old musical forms, was a dance, an Italian dance in 3-4 measure. Here we have a quaint theme, logically pursued and treated at great length, the violin of itself playing several real parts, and exhibiting many of the modern feats, arpeggios, &c. of the instrument. It is no mere show piece, but has meaning and consistency. We found it more interesting than the concert fantasias of the Paganini school. How lovely the cantabile melody into which the movement melts towards the end! Mendelssohn's piano accompaniments are just enough — reverent and sparing.

5. Kyrie. By Hasslinger.

Beethoven's old friend and publisher, Tobias Hasslinger. A fine, impressive Kyrie for male voices.

6. Aria for Soprano: "My heart ever faithful," — with violoncello accompaniment, by Bach.

This was charming; — a wholesome, hearty, sunshiny gush of melody, like a brook running out of the woods in May. Can any thing be fresher than some of these old things by Bach? Miss Doane's bright voice and style just suited it, and Mr. JUNG-NICKEL played the 'cello part with great taste.

7. Prayer, by Weber.

Körner's "Prayer before Battle;" a solemn and inspiring part-song.

Part Second. 1. Psalm XXIII. "The Lord is my Shepherd." Schubert.

Exceedingly beautiful. Full of marvellously fine modulations, in the true vein of Schubert; and finely sung.

2. The Chapel (Das Kirchlein). Becker.

An ingenious part song, in which the low basses imitate the booming of a bell, answered in the fifth above by others, while the musing melody proceeds in the upper parts.

3. Recitative and Quintet, from 42d Psalm. Mendelssohn.

Another fine selection, only less interesting than the Schubert.

4. Elegy at a Graveyard, for violoncello. Lindner.

A somewhat sentimental melody, played very feelingly by Mr. Jungnickel, who drew his sweetest tones.

5. Part-Song: "This is the Lord's own day." Kreutzer.

6. Violin Sonata (composed in 1718). Tartini.

We must thank Mr. Eichberg for making us acquainted, by his masterly rendering, with two such fine old works. The Sonata of Tartini's time had not the modern Sonata structure (of the first movement). It is more like a Suite, or succession of well contrasted pieces. There was beauty and quaintness in this, and room for a plenty of execution. It is the identical "Devil's Sonata," of which the story runs, that the old master dreamed one night that Satan came into his room and played a wonderful trill, which he has here reproduced. But if this Sonata be "Satanic," what shall we say of the whole modern school?

7. Das Felsenkreutz. Kreutzer.

A part-song, the sounds whereof have faded out in our remembrance of too many good things.

Other Concerts during the week we have not been able to attend. There has been one by Miss ANN FAY, the brilliant singer, for the benefit of an invalid; one by the GERMAN TRIO, the programme of which consisted of three Violin Quartets, by Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn; and the Wednesday Afternoon Concert of the ORCHESTRAL UNION, of which the leading feature was Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

Musical Review.

ROBERT FRANZ. — The growing interest in the Songs of this gifted German, — a composer of genius, if we have one in our day, and a thorough bred musician — is one of the good signs about us. Introduced here one or two at a time in small concerts and in private circles a few years since, by one of our resident artists, who would deserve our gratitude if but for this alone, they won a very few very deep admirers. But their beauty has gone on conquering. They figure now quite often in the lists of new reprints. A half dozen of them were ventured, and found favor, some three years ago. During the past year a set of Six Songs for Mixed Voices — part-songs — were reprinted, with English and German words, by Ditson & Co. They were of the freshest productions of Franz. What could be finer for little Clubs, that love music of a refined character, to sing? Each is truly a song, setting free the heart melody of a little poem, but a song moving in four-part harmony fine enough for Bach. One is a happy, buoyant "May Song"; one a minor ballad, or people's song, a quaint, sad plea for pity in the cold, for love in isolation: Es ist ein Schnee gefallen. "At Parting" is equally sweet and tender. One sings of the mystical awakening of life in Spring. One sings some hearty verses by Martin Luther, whose pious heart takes a cheerful hint from the singing of the birds; and the sixth invites you to a "Morning Walk."

As to the Songs for single voice, each with its exquisite and rare piano accompaniment, Franz bids fair to rival Schubert in productiveness. Already we have Opus 30, and each opus contains at least six songs. And the wonder is, they are all good; each with a charming individuality, a genuine little poetic flower of melody. He always chooses verses that have poetry in them, and he always seizes the essence of the poem in his music. Twelve of these songs — twelve of the simplest and loveliest — have just been selected and published, with German and English words, by Russell & Richardson. As specimens of musical engraving, with their re-production of the graceful German vignette, we have had no nearer approach to European excellence. But the songs themselves will reward any pains to learn them, and can never lose their interest. We can only name their titles:

1. "On a thorn bush blooms a rosebud." 2. "Parting." 3. "The Woods." 4. "Evening." 5. "Summer." 6. "Spring of Love." 7. "Now the Shades are falling." 8. "O welcome, fair wood." 9. "The Churchyard." 10. "Forth from the depths of sadness." 11. "Hungarian Song." 12. "Mother, oh sing me to rest" (Mrs. Hemans).

NOVELLO'S PUBLICATIONS. — Messrs. Webb & Allen, successors in New York to J. A. Novello, send us beautiful and cheap octavo editions of ROSSINI's Stabat Mater, and of SPOHR's Oratorio: "The Last Judgment," uniform with Novello's other oratorios. The scarlet cloth, gilt binding is exceedingly tasteful. Of the musical contents there is no need to speak.

They send us also in the same form, blue and gold, and in large music type, "Eighty-One Part-Songs and Choruses, in progressive order for the cultivation of Part-singing, with Instructions, &c. by NAEGELI & FREIFER." Translated from the German by SABILLA NOVELLO. These songs are of a simple, popular character, yet not hacknied. The authors have done a great work in Germany for music among the masses.

METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE. One is more frightened than encouraged by the multitude of musical instruction books in these times. When we see the hosts of them that crowd the shelves and catalogues of our own publishers (Ditson & Co.) alone, not to speak of the others, we can only wonder what can be the need of a tenth part of them. But now and then there is a sterling book among them, a "Method" which is a method, which sums up all that needs be known, and marks out a course of practice philosophically sure to lead one in the right direction, by such steps that each step gives new power to take another. Such is a book of which we have before expressed our high appreciation: "MUELLER'S Method for the Piano-Forte, revised by JULIUS KNORR," translated from the German by G. A. SCHMITT. KNORR, who is perhaps the most sound and thorough of all method-writers, using Müller's work as a foundation, has in fact made it his own book, and enriched it with all that is needful for the mastery of the new resources of the instrument.

Musical Chit-Chat.

In the confusion of making up a first number, we have miscalculated our space, and are obliged to cut off several articles with the odious "to be continued," to omit many letters, and after all leave ourselves almost no room for items of news and smaller matters. Very reluctantly we must leave over a summary of the Dramatic Season, which has been prepared for us. We have quite a number of communications, too, upon the Brooklyn "Congregational Singing" controversy, which we shall examine at earliest leisure.

The Handel and Haydn Society have definitely announced their programme of four nights of Oratorio, with the aid of FORMES, Madame D'ANGRI, and Mr. PENNING, of the Ullman operatic troupe. To-night the feast commences with "Elijah," in which every one who heard Formes in the sublime part of the prophet some weeks since, will wish to hear him again. The choruses and orchestral accompaniments have been re-rehearsed and will go even better than before. To-morrow evening will come the "Messiah;" it will be worth while to hear Formes in the great bass songs, and D'Angri's rich contralto in: "He was despised." Next Saturday, April 10th, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given for the first time in Boston, followed by a miscellaneous selection, in which Formes will sing; and for the fourth night, "The Creation." Of our own singers, Mrs. LONG, Mrs. WENTWORTH, and Mrs. HARWOOD are to take prominent part. For the better appreciation of the "Hymn of Praise" we have commenced copying an interesting analysis upon another page, and hope to complete it next Saturday, in season for the performance. Formes is not to appear here in Opera, nor shall we have the company with which he has been connected. MARETZEK's troupe are expected at the Boston Theatre in a few weeks. . . . The ST. CECILIA CHORAL SOCIETY will give another concert at the Tremont Temple on the evening of Easter Monday, (April 5), Mr. J. FALKENSTEIN conductor. The programme contains Weber's "Jubilee" overture; Chorals by Bach and Mendelssohn; a Hymn by Mozart in praise of St. Cecilia; a tenor solo from "Elijah"; several part-songs by Mendelssohn, &c. Part second is made up of lighter varieties. . . . The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have their Annual Benefit Concert next Tuesday evening. It will be the last public opportunity of hearing them this season, and the lovers of the fine Chamber Music of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., must not miss it. Mrs. LONG will sing "Ah, perfido!"

For most that passes musically in New York one has only to consult one of Mr. Manager Ullman's operatic advertisements. From one this week we learn, that after "fulfilling the pleasing duty imposed on him by the charter of the institution" in bringing out an American opera (Fry's "Leonora"), the season at the Academy would positively close last Thursday night with the "Huguenots;" that Mme. LAGRANGE, after a brilliant career of three years in America, will now return to Europe; that Herr FORMES would make his last appearance in the "Messiah" last Tuesday night; that MUSARD's concerts will commence next Wednesday (for which are: "Wanted, thirty colored waiters, to wear livery dresses and pass round ice-creams, twenty young ladies of prepossessing appearance to pour tea and coffee, and twenty boys in fancy uniforms to sell the evening papers at the concerts Musard"!);—that THALBERG has returned from the South, and will give a Matinée this day (in the Academy) with Miss MILNER, Mr. COOPER, the violinist, and an orchestra. —PAUL JULIEN has been giving a farewell concert before leaving for Brazil. We hear that the Ninth Symphony is to be played as a first part in one of the Musard concerts!

The New Orleans Picayune, remarking upon the great glorification over the recent production of the "Huguenots" in New York, says:

"Now, so far from its being the truth that the 'Huguenots' has been 'twenty years crossing the Atlantic,' the fact is that this opera, produced by Meyerbeer, in Paris, in the year 1836, was brought out at the Theatre d'Orleans, the French opera house in this city, in 1839, with Calvé, Hemaann, Bailly and Curto in the four leading parts, and has been performed, on the boards of that theatre, as a stock piece every year since. Nor has it been only performed once in New York. In the year 1850, Salvi, Marini, Bosio and Steffanone appeared in it at the Astor Place Opera House; and in 1845, the French opera troupe from our Theatre d'Orleans, under the management of Mr. Davis, gave it, in handsome style, at the Park Theatre, in that city."

New Orleans, it seems, is the only American city in which opera may be called a fixed institution. The same writer says:

"During the last three months, there have been performed, and well performed, at our opera house, the following works: Rossini's 'Mose,' ('Mose in Egitto,') Meyerbeer's 'Prophete,' 'Huguenots,' 'Etoile du Nord,' and 'Robert le Diable'; Verdi's 'Jerusalem,' ('Lombardi,') 'Ernani,' and 'Trovatore'; Halévy's 'Juive,' ('Jewess,') 'Charles VI.,' and 'Reine de Chypre,' ('Queen of Cyprus'); Adolph Adam's 'Si j'étais roi,' and 'Chalet'; Grisar's 'Amours du Diable'; Donizetti's 'Favorite,' 'Lucia,' and 'Fille du Regiment'; Bellini's 'Norma' and 'Sonambula,' Auber's 'Crown Diamonds'; and others, making more than twenty grand and comic operas, and all of them first class, with the exception of one. What can the Philadelphia and New York Academies of Music show to compete with this programme?"

M. OULIBICHEFF, the celebrated Russian amateur and author of the Life and Works of Mozart, the History of Music before Mozart, (to which works the readers of this Journal in years past have been frequently indebted), and of a strangely unappreciative work on Beethoven, died on February 2d, at Nijni Novgorod, in Russia, where he for many years resided.

Haydn's "Seasons" has been brought out in New York by the Liedertafel. . . . Handel's "Messiah" was performed a week or two ago in Gorham, Me., under the direction of Mr. A. S. Edwards. "I know that my Redeemer" was sung "in a style that would gratify any audience" by Mrs. Edwards. The "Messiah" was performed also in Springfield, Mass. on Friday evening, March 19th. . . . Mrs. EMMA A. WENTWORTH, our sweet singer, is about to recreate herself during the summer months in Europe. We wish her joy.

Italian Opera finds it quite as hard to effect a permanent lodgement in Philadelphia as elsewhere, in spite of the great boasts and rejoicings over the opening of their Academy last year. "Our Opera," as the Philadelphians called the Gazzaniga and Brignoli troupe, now on its return to its fond home, meets with but moderate encouragement, and one of the newspapers there confirms the private reports that the operatic furor in Philadelphia proves to be but a "fashionable excitement" and a "sham." The bust of last year's favorite, Gazzaniga, adorns the foyer of the Academy, and La Favorita sings to anything but crowded houses. . . . Mile. VESTVALI, with her opera troupe, has been reaping laurels and dollars in Havana, and is expected soon in New Orleans. . . . While Mme. FREZZOLINI is concertizing in New Orleans, the Parisian journals are lamenting her death and giving biographical sketches of her. . . . Think of a tenor, 103 years old! That was the age of M. DARIUS, who died a few weeks since in Rouen. He sang the De Profundis at the funeral of Louis XV.

The London Musical World copies an article with the following heading: "A Yankee Athenian View of Thalberg, (from 'Harper's Boston Weekly')." What a careful man must that editor be! Copying from the "Journal of the Civilizers" and fastening the matter upon Boston shoulders! . . . Mr. SATTER, the pianist, seems resolved to make himself a hero, and such a man finds hero-worshippers. One of the papers says "he has composed three operas, five symphonies, six piano sonatas, two (piano!) quartets, three trios for piano, some string quartets (as many as Fry, we wonder?), and about one hundred solos for the piano." It may be added, he has also written his own life, reviewed his own works, and defined his own position in the "Music of the Future," and he is still a very young man. . . . BERLIOZ is said to be busy over a grand serious opera, the libretto of which, written by himself, is derived from the Iliad.

A NEW CHANT BOOK.—Messrs. Ditson & Co. have in press and nearly ready a Collection of Chants, selected chiefly from the choir books of the English Cathedrals. One of the leading features is the introduction of a new system of Chanting, whereby not only choirs, but Congregations, may readily learn to perform this part of the service.

Competent judges have pronounced this Collection to be by far the best that has ever been prepared, and the publisher is desirous that all organists and leaders of choirs should examine the work.

This work will also contain the Canticles of the English Prayer Book, so that it will be available in the Canadas and British Provinces in North America.

Musical Correspondence.

WILLIAM HENRY FRY'S "LEONORA."

NEW YORK, MARCH 30.—The event of last evening at the New York Academy of Music cannot fail to interest every American musician and amateur. It was the first great movement of encouragement to American Art ever made by an operatic manager. It is reasonable to hope that the attention which has always been denied to our native music, may be bestowed upon it from this time forward.

Leaving this consideration for the present, let us speak briefly, very briefly, of the performance, and of the work performed. "Leonora" is not a new opera. It was written in the early part of 1845, and was first produced at the Chestnut street Theatre, in Philadelphia, the composer's native city. The English version proved most successful. A few years after, Mr. Fry procured an Italian translation, in the hope of seeing it produced abroad, which hope was not realized, as foreign managers would not even look at it. It has remained in obscurity since the time of its original performance, known only to a few amateurs through the published piano-forte arrangement, which aroused no especial desire to become more intimately acquainted with it. In fact, the lack of melodic originality never failed at once to strike all who examined it. But its performance by artists of the highest talents, and the remarkable effects which the superior orchestral accompaniments reveal, show that it has been too hastily judged. "Leonora" cannot be pronounced a great work. It cannot rank with those of Weber, nor yet with those of Donizetti. And the undeniable resemblances between many of its passages and portions of Bellini's operas, make it impossible to say that it is superior to the lyrical dramas of that composer. On the other hand, it certainly rivals in interest any of Bellini's operas, and surpasses them all in wealth of instrumentation. Respecting the resemblances of melodic ideas, it must be admitted that they exist in profusion; but to charge the composer with intentional plagiarism would be unjustifiable. And there are not a few melodies, bright and bearing, for which Mr. Fry is nowhere indebted, except to his own invention, and which have a vitality and freshness delightful to hear. Compared with the three or four last operas of Verdi, "Leonora" is most agreeable and pleasant to the ear—on the whole, a work which may be enjoyed more than once, and which truly leaves a sunny, cheerful impression upon the artistic sense.

The representation last night was excellent, in view of the few and hurried rehearsals. Mr. ANSCHUTZ worked like a hero, enthusiastically and untiringly. The artists all played and sang with a will. The audience, unhappily, owing to the customary abstinence from public amusements which is observed during Passion Week, was meagre. Still the triumph was most positive. The composer was five times called to the front of the stage, and induced to utter a few words of acknowledgment. The success would have justified a number of repetitions, but only one was given. Should "Leonora" be produced in Boston, you will hear a work teeming with flowing and graceful, if not novel, melody, marked by great dramatic expression—one to be regarded with genuine satisfaction as the first of American lyrical dramas.

NEW YORK, MARCH 26. — We are overwhelmed with music just at present: — opera four times a week; ensembles of all kinds and at all times of the day, and a similar prospect in view for some time to come. Yesterday I had the honor of "assisting" (in the French sense) at two interesting occasions of the kind. In the one case, Painting lent a friendly hand to her sister-Muse. There stands in one of our quiet side-streets, a large handsome building which is divided into studios for artists, and also contains, if I am not mistaken, dwelling accommodations for such of these sons and daughters of genius as wish to reside there. The studios are expressly built for such — spacious and lofty, with the light falling from above. Two of these are inhabited by a couple of sister-artists, who issued invitations for yesterday afternoon to a private matinée to be given by Mr. SATTER at their rooms. It was a charming gathering, particularly so from its chief element consisting of ladies, the sterner sex being represented merely by an Art-loving Reverend Father, and sundry amateur and artist followers of the two Muses. Mr. Satter showed himself in a variety of styles. The concert opened with the Tamhüser Overture, of which his arrangement is even more astonishing than that of the "William Tell," which he gave us subsequently. Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" was also splendidly rendered; but in a more delicate, dreamy composition, which was not familiar to me, and which was more like what every other virtuoso plays, Mr. Satter's originality was lost for a while. In Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," too, he took too many liberties with time and the pianos and fortes. At the end, when only a few listeners remained, he acceded to their request for something by Chopin, by playing the second Ballade very finely. I learned on this occasion that Mr. Satter intends remaining in New York.

Last evening a Musical Soirée (of annual recurrence) was given by "the Congregation of Grace Church" for the benefit of Mrs. BODSTEIN, formerly Miss JULIA NORTHALL, who has for years been the Soprano of the Church. It was a strictly private affair, not having been advertised at all, and all the tickets (at $2) having been disposed of by private distribution. It was quite a satisfactory concert — highly so, indeed, in its vocal parts. Mrs. Bodstein, with her sweet, innocent face, looking not a whit older than she used to many years ago, sang as charmingly as ever, several pieces of various styles. They were an aria by E. Millet, a talented resident composer; an English Ballad by Belchamber; and an Easter Anthem, composed expressly for her by Torrente. Besides these, she sang, with Madame D'ANGRI, the duet from the Stabat Mater, very finely. The great contralto also appeared to best advantage in the Rondo from Cenerentola and Handel's "He was despised." The instrumental performers were Messrs. APPY and G. W. MORGAN, who played together a duet from Don Giovanni by Wolff and Viennemps, and each a solo. Having heard the duet this winter from Thalberg and Viennemps, I could not much enjoy an inferior rendering of it, nor were the solo particularly attractive.

To-night Mr. Satter gives his second concert; the "Huguenots" are also given for the last time, and apropos of that, I must give you the newest instance of Ullman's ingenuity. This performance is intended for FORMES' benefit; but as "artists generally sing or perform some extra piece at their benefit, and the length of the 'Huguenots' will not admit of this, 'Martha' is to be given as a Matinée Opera to-morrow, as a part of to-night's performance" and mark this — "every one who buys a ticket (with or without reserved seat) for to-night, will also receive one for the Matinée." Unheard of generosity! So to-morrow we are to have FORMES for the last time in opera and in one of his best parts.

ROME, FEB. 13. — I am much perturbed in spirit about my hobby. I fear VERDI has fallen into a state of premature dotage.

I base this fearful theory upon undeniable facts, and though I hope I am deceived, it is my duty as your correspondent to let you know the result of my observations, no matter how unfavorable they may be to my own cherished hobby. I know my duty and with Spartan resolution I fulfil it.

In the first place, it is very certain that Verdi's late operas have been little else than failures. His Simone Boccanegra, which he wrote for Venice, was produced in Rome a few weeks ago, but was an utter fiasco, though it is said he had in it completely altered his style, quite cut the acquaintance of brass, and that of the fifteen melodies of the opera, he wrote fifteen in the minor key. The manager soon withdrew this work and produced another — Verdi's very latest — an opera called Aroldo, composed for the present carnival season at Parma, and now dragging its slow length along in that city, as well as in Rome.

Immediately after having devoured St. Peters, and the Forum and the Coliseum, and the Temple of Antoninus, together with the arches of Titus and Septimus Severus, and not a few obelisks, I found time to glance at the musical prospects offered to me in Rome. There I saw a placard announcing Aroldo to be performed at the Teatro Apollo; of course I went to the Teatro Apollo. It is a fine large building, standing on the banks of the Tiber, almost opposite Hadrian's tomb, alias the Castle of St. Angelo, and within sight of St. Peters. On entering, the visitor finds himself in a large square vestibule, adorned with marble busts, and furnished with a rusticated fountain of real water. From this a wide staircase leads into an elliptical Foyer, where over the door we read the names of Carolus and Alexander Torlonia, the well-known Roman bankers, to whom this theatre belongs. It is only opened for operatic performances and only for some two or three months of the year. The interior of the house is spacious and that is about all that can be said of it, for it certainly is far from handsome. The prevailing hue is a Quakerish-drab, and as the building is lighted by only one attenuated chandelier, the effect during a performance is rather depressing than otherwise.

The opera was Aroldo, and I prepared myself for a treat; for the man that wrote Ernani, and my own namesake Trovatore, I thought could not but produce something good. The opera opened well. There is quite a lengthy overture, in which a sweet, delicate theme, performed by the cornet, is followed by a cabaletta; then there is a crescendo movement, the original subjects are repeated, and indeed the entire overture seems to be modelled after those of Rossini. In the first act, I remember but one thing that is striking — an andante air, for tenor — the same which is played by the cornet in the overture. In the second act is a curious rather than pleasing concerted piece, sung without accompaniment. In the third act a very weak imitation of the Miserere in the Trovatore, and the fourth act, a tolerable finale concerted piece. But with this pennyworth of bread there is a most intolerable deal of sack in the shape of unmelodious melodies, unmeaning concerted pieces, and dismal recitative. The first act is the best, and in addition to the tenor air above alluded to, contains a rather good duet for baritone and soprano; but the subsequent acts are very weak and the opera increases in heaviness as it draws near the close. This is something unusual for Verdi, who generally works his operas up to a suitable climax and preserves his best morceaux for the final act. The tenor part is by far most prominent, and the soprano has not a single air worth mentioning. The baritone has one good air, and the basso has none at all, good or bad. I do not give any account of this plot, for it is to me both a stumbling block and foolishness, especially in the scene where a tribe of Scottish warriors appear armed with huge Turkish yataghans; neither do I mention the names of the artists, for they were so mediocre as not to be worth mentioning. The audience was very cold indeed, and I was forced to confess that Aroldo from which I had anticipated so much, was a very poor affair, wholly unworthy of the author of Attila, Traviata, Trovatore or Rigoletto — and judging from the depreciatory opinions Dwight's Journal has expressed in regard to these (especially poor Rigoletto, on which it has poured out whole vials of condemnation and satire), its opinion of Aroldo will not be very exalted, when told that Rigoletto is to Aroldo what Don Giovanni is to Rigoletto! It seems as if Verdi had received an order to write an opera, and wrote one to order, but without putting his soul into the work; and when the heavy, spiritless affair was finished, he called it Aroldo, and sold it to the good folks of Parma, who have been most terribly taken in thereby.

Another evening I attended the Teatro Valle, a theatre somewhat smaller and handsomer than the Apollo. The opera was the Sonnambula, with Madame GASSIER as Amina. This lady is a favorite in England, both in opera and in Jullien's concerts. She has excellent execution and a powerful but not melodious voice. In person she is large, unwieldy and Alboni-like, with Italian features and dark eyes, would do admirably for a Lucrezia Borgia or Semiramide, but is wholly unfitted for the character of Amina. Otherwise, the opera was execrably performed. The chorus of about seven women and about a dozen men was forlorn, the basso so bad that the beautiful solo, Vi ravviso, was omitted; and the tenor, though much better, was not up to the mark. As is usual, the lovely duet, Son geloso del zeffiro, was omitted. This exquisite gem, one of the most beautiful moreaux in the opera, has been sung in America by Sontag and Pozzolini only. Even La Grange omits it, and this omission is the only thing that makes her Amina inferior to that of poor Sontag. But in Rome they sing another extract in Sonnambula that is invariably omitted in America; it is a very pretty little quartet in five flats, sung in the last act by the characters of Lisa, the Count, Teresa, and Elvino.

On the whole, operatic music at Rome — where the most successful opera ever known, the Trovatore, was first produced — is at a very low ebb. The singers, with the exceptions of Madame Gassier at the Valle, and Signor GOLDONI (who does not take part in Aroldo) at the Apollo, are all very mediocre. The choruses and scenery are at both theatres shocking. At the same time the prices of admission are very high for Italy, being at the former theatre 35 cents, and at the latter 50 cents to the parquette; there are no elevated and democratic accommodations for the "gods." These prices are, however, much higher now, it being Carnival time, than in the other months; in other seasons the admittance to the Valle is but 20 cents. Both theatres are nightly crowded, and though Madame Gassier draws forth applause, the audience are generally so cold, that it is fair to presume that the music in Rome during the present season is not what the Romans are accustomed to, and their coldness is attributable to reminiscences of other days.

Perhaps the only thing in which I am disappointed in Italy is in its music, and the musical cultivation of its inhabitants. It is true that even the smallest towns have opera-houses, but the style of performance is poor. Then, like many other people, I had expected that in Italy, music was in the domestic circle brought to almost professional perfection, and that every other young man was a Mario, and almost every young woman a Crisi. But I find myself much mistaken. As a general thing there appears to be no more real taste for music here than in the United States; certainly there are not half or a quarter as many piano fortes or hand organs in proportion to the population, if that is to be taken as any index.

VOL. XIII. No. 2.

[These two little pieces are from "Andromeda and other Poems," a new volume by CHARLES KINGSLEY, just published by Ticknor & Fields.]

I hear thy Voice, O Spring!

I hear thy voice, O Spring!
Its flute-like tones are floating through the air,
Winning my soul, with their wild ravishing,
From earth's heart weary care.

Divinely sweet thy song—
But yet methinks, as near the groves I pass,
Low sighs on viewless wings are borne along,
Tears gem the springing grass.

For where are they, the young,
The loved, the beautiful, who, when thy voice
A year ago along these valleys rung,
Did hear thee and rejoice!

Thou seek'st for them in vain—
No more they'll greet thee in thy joyous round;
Calmly they sleep beneath the murmuring main,
Or moulder in the ground.

Yet peace, my heart—be still!
Look upward to yon azure sky and know,
To heavenlier music now their bosoms thrill,
Where balmier breezes blow.

For them hath bloom'd a spring,
Whose flowers perennial deck a holier sod,
Whose music is the song that seraphs sing,
Whose light, the smile of God!

A Farewell.

My fairest child, I have no song to give you,
No lark could pipe to skies so dull and gray;
Yet ere we part, one lesson I can leave you
For every day.

Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them, all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast forever
One grand, sweet song.

The Philister's Reminiscence.

(FROM ONE OF BROWN'S PRIVATE NOTE BOOKS.)

[Concluded.]

"Our rehearsals went on, a boy as usual taking the alto solos. At one of them, a week before the performance, I caught a glimpse of my priest, as he was passing out of the hall, but was unable to find him afterward. A note next morning informed me that the singer would be present. Our conductor had much to say of the necessity of her appearance at least at the final rehearsal, and I wrote to the priest to that effect. 'Fear not,' was his answer; 'she needs no rehearsals, let your orchestra be firm, all will go rightly.'

"The time of the performance came. It was a delightful afternoon, and the huge church was filled. A temporary platform had been added to the organ gallery, where our forces were mustered. All was ready, except our promised solo singer. The committee of the Society was at its wits' end.

No one knew what to make of it. I was upon thorns. Five, ten, fifteen minutes passed. The conductor called the boy soloist to his side and took his place. He waved his baton, and the first performance of Handel's immortal Oratorio in that part of the land began. Overture, recitative, air, chorus and so on followed in order, and the vast audience felt them as a new revelation of the power and grandeur, the beauty and heavenly serenity of sacred music. In cities where the high mass is sung Sabbath after Sabbath by an adequate choir, the taste even of the peasant is insensibly cultivated to the extent of appreciating, even at first hearing, music which otherwise would be beyond his reach. But for an audience like that which filled the edifice now, in the habit of hearing the masses of Mozart, Haydn, and the other great composers, who have written for our church, the 'Messiah' was an æsthetic and intellectual treat of the highest order.

"We rose to sing the chorus, 'And he shall purify,' and still our expected singer had not appeared. But before we closed a form glided down the platform to the conductor's side. It was a young woman, at the most, nineteen years of age, tall and of exquisite proportions, a face not perfect in its features, but rendered inexpressibly beautiful—though very pale—by its rapt and holy expression, which spoke even more plainly than the dress and the small crucifix at her side of a life of devotion and religious contemplation. Her appearance seemed as unearthly to me as the tones of her voice had sounded at midnight upon the domain. A single timid glance around her and upon the conductor, and from that moment she seemed, though with us, not of us. The chorus closed, and silence—that awful silence of a multitude, which finds expression in Art only in the pianissimo of an immense choral force—ensued for a moment. Every eye in the vast audience, every eye in the choir, was fixed upon that statue-like figure, as the momentary stillness was broken by the soft introductory chord of the organ, and the divine promise: 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son!' was recited in tones so clear and distinct, though not loud, as to penetrate into every nook and corner, floating away among the arches and vaultings of the cathedral. Each tone spoke of confidence mounting up to the certainty of perfect faith—was pervaded by the very spirit of ancient prophecy. And what divine joy, what glorious triumph, in every tone of the air which followed: 'Oh, thou that tellest good tidings!'

"As she went on, a faint flush began to overspread her pale cheeks. The spirit of the music was mastering her. It was evident enough that this was all new to her, and wrought upon her, down to the very depths of her nature.

"She closed her air, took the seat provided for her, bowed her head, and hid her face. But when we rose to sing the chorus, 'For unto us,' that climax hardly equalled in all music, she rose suddenly, stepped to the ranks of the altos, and with streaming eye and quivering lip, gave vent to the emotion which was fast overcoming her, by joining in with her noble voice. From this moment she joined in all the choruses, with a firmness and decision which added infinitely to the success of our performance. It was wonderful. When and where had she acquired such musical knowledge as enabled her to sing thus without rehearsal,—a stranger among strangers? We never knew!

"There were at length a few minutes of intermission. She sat as in a dream. No one ventured to speak to her. She was as of another world; and for the time being her very existence was but in this mighty music.

"And now came the chorus so sad, so sorrowful: 'Behold the Lamb of God!' In this she sang not, but stood with her eyes fixed upon the great crucifix suspended near the grand altar. Her emotions were becoming so powerful, her excitement so intense, that I left my place at the head of the basses, and drew near, fearing, I knew hardly what, almost expecting to see her drop—or even vanish from our view—for my imagination was wrought up to a wondrous degree, and the excitement caused by this music almost overcame my common sense—and she began to seem to me a being not of earth.

"He was despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

"No, mein Herr, I cannot describe it! She felt the agony she described. She could but with the utmost difficulty command her voice. The tears rolled down her pale cheeks. Sobs almost choked the tones. Her emotion was infectious and spread through the choir and through the church. The air was given entire; the second part, which is usually omitted, as well as the first. Before its close tears were streaming from all eyes. She, herself, had acquired self-command as she went on, but the heart-piercing pathos of her voice lost not a jot or a tittle of its power. With the last note she gave way. We caught her as she sank back, and conveyed her to the room behind the organ. The priest was already there, and a couple of nuns, to whose care we resigned her. No, no, I shall never hear true feeling in that part again!"

Here the little man ceased, and swallowed rapidly two glasses of wine.

"But, Herr Rechnungsrath," said I, "what became of her?"

"Mein Herr," said he, "there was a mystery there. When we finished our performance, we found no one in the room back of the organ, nor has any one of us ever heard a single syllable in relation to her."

Music and Musical Taste in Havana.

LETTER FROM SIGNOR TAGLIAFICO TO A FRENCH FRIEND IN CUBA.

(Translated for the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin from the Courrier des Etats-Unis.)

"But," say you, "the great Marty company." When you say these words you produce in me all the effect of those old grumblers of the first Empire, who, when reading the reports from the Crimea, never failed to exclaim, "Ah, the Old Guard! Where is the grand army?" The artists of this great company have been our friends and comrades of the theatre, at London or St. Petersburg, before they dreamed of coming to Havana, where, it is true, they had their greatest success, but where also they terminated their career, with one exception, and (between ourselves), without getting rich, for their wardrobes, left in pledge in your hands, alone saved them from the Moro Castle, the Clichy of the Antilles.

"Ils ne chantent plus," as Mareel says in the Huguenots, and the exception I have made proves the rule in the Tacon Theatre. In fact, I have read all the papers of the time, and I have found that Mme. Bosio was daily accused of sparing her voice, of singing carelessly, of being cold, in a word, of not working as hard as her associates. Mme. Bosio is now the first cantatrice of Europe. She is, said lately one of your friends, the only one of the "great company" who understood the Tacon Theatre—the theatre still full of their voices. That does not surprise me, I answered; they left their voices here!

I would next speak to you of the press and the public, (this is hard for me, who owe them nothing but praise); of the public, whose judgment is always sovereign, if not infallible; of the press, whose duty it is first to express the impressions of the public, and then (and it is its most important mission) to enlighten it, to guide it, to instruct it, to teach it, to regulate its sympathies, so that Art may not fall into the hands of parties that cannot fail to arise in a country like yours, far removed from the great centres of light, progress, and civilization. I have certainly read all that has been written in the journals upon the Italian Opera, during the season, and I candidly declare there are not two lines from which an artist could derive benefit, or which could in the least degree assist the public in forming their opinion.

One paper, in the beginning, with a very slightly disguised opposition to Maretzek's undertaking, hazarded some technical musical words, confounding style with method, blaming one artist for altering, and another for transposing his airs, without troubling itself about the voices, the proprieties, nor even the traditions of the great operas of Europe. This, happily, did not last long; the critic soon found himself at the end of his vocabulary, and then began what we call the "proof before letters," the criticism before performance. Here is a specimen: "On such a day, such an opera will be given. Why does such an artist sing in it, and why not another? We should like to know, Mr. Manager, how many rehearsals you are going to have. Ah, ah, eight years ago we heard the same opera given by the great company. Take care, caramba! for we shall be there, we, the Cids of criticism, the Don Quixotes of the Feuilletton!"

But of rational appreciation there is none; of analysis of the good points of this artist or the defects of that one, none. No, I am mistaken. A certain Sergeant of my acquaintance was blamed for having, in L'Elisir d'Amore, kicked away a piece of bread which annoyed him on the stage, without regard for the public! But this poor Sergeant had tight pantaloons, and an accident might happen to him so easily. To go higher: Roneoni was to be the star of the season. What is the amount of the criticism on this artist? In Maria di Rohan, they have proved as clear as day that it is always imprudent for husbands to look through key-holes; also that in seizing a woman by the hair, there is danger of pulling off her head-dress. We have read all these things! In L'Elisir d'Amore he has been advised not to embrace the Notary, as he does when he has to say "T'abbraccio, e ti saluto, ufficiale d'amor." These are observations full of delicacy and propriety, when they relate to two of the grandest creations of that great artist, called Ronconi. Poor Ronconi! has he not been advised by a journal—I will spare it the shame of naming it—to engage himself in the comic troupe, to take the place of Ruiz, the clown and buffoon of the place? O glory! That the greatest dramatic genius of the time, the actor whose name is inscribed by London critics next after that of Rachel on the list of celebrities of the stage, should come to Havana, to be disposed of in this way! Habent sua fata, histriones!

I have told you that, under such circumstances, parties are inevitable, especially with an ignorant and foolish public. So we have had them this season here, where, instead of a public—"Villustrado publico," as the bills say—we have had two parties; where instead of an Italian troupe, we have had two prima donnas eclipsing all the rest; vehement, fanatical, insane parties, and prima donnas, much amazed, I am sure, at the excess of honor or of indignity offered them. One evening I asked one of these rude partisans the cause of this inexplicable worship of an idol who was certainly far from reckoning perfection among her divine attributes. He answered me, "I love Gog, because I hate Magog." "And you hate Magog?" "Because I love Gog!" I asked no more.

What idolatries have we not witnessed? You recollect, my dear V., the temple ringing with frantic hurrahs, the seats shaking under the blows of the knights of the chandelier (the claqueurs) the bouquets strewing the stage (they were swept away at each fall of the curtain to serve for further triumphs in succeeding acts); the crowns of artificial flowers, of gold or tinsel acorns, with which the goddess had to cover her heated brow; the doves—that emblem of peace ever since the flood—carrying in their claws the symbols of discord, the colors of the parties; and finally the sonnets, the caricatures, the journals, the papers, large and small, rough or satined, of every form, of every color—this was the ordinary ceremony.

But on the great days, the benefits, the ancient Saturnalia were revived in all their splendor. After having exhibited the goddess in a glory, surrounded by little loves, in a blaze of Bengal lights, amid a shower of scraps of gold paper, the adepts conducted her to her chariot, and the march of the ox Apis began. Nothing was wanting, neither the yelling of the crowd, nor the torches waving in the dark night, nor the boys hanging to the trees, the windows, everywhere, and crying, "Long live the Goddess! Death to her rival!" At last and above all, the inexpressible zizi-boumboum of two military bands, playing two different airs at the same time, (what airs! what music!) accompanied and completed this tropical masquerade.

"What!" they will exclaim in Europe, "all that for a scale well done, a note finely given, or a trill skillfully executed?" Well, well, voice, singing, talent had nothing to do with this matter. People had first to amuse themselves, to belong to a party, to pretend to be connoisseurs, and as, at the end of the account, the result was no small amount of golden ounces and Spanish quadruples, for the manager and the artists, everybody found the fun charming.

But pour l'amour de Dieu! my dear V., ask me no more what I think of your Italian Opera. Come and see Roneoni and me in London, next summer. We will show you the Royal Italian Opera; and you shall see for yourself, as we used to say at college, quod erat demonstrandum. Bring us some cigars! Yours, D. TAGLIAFICO.

ANALYSIS OF

Mendelssohn's Symphony-Cantata:

"A HYMN OF PRAISE."

(Concluded from last week.)

The resumption of the Scherzo presents, not, as is most frequently the custom, an entire repetition Da Capo of this portion of the movement, but only a recapitulation of its principal ideas, and these much modified in their effect by their varied arrangement and different opposition to each other.

It must, surely, have been the purpose to represent in this movement the influence of passion opposed by the promptings of religion,—the secret voice of conscience urging, almost imperceptibly, the often-repeated summons which is the chief theme of the entire work,—the earthly feelings contending to resist its admonition, but these, soothed by the benign effect of devotion, gently sink into the sleep of unconsciousness.

(3). Adagio religioso. The expression of this heavenly stream of melody is one of pure religious fervor, and even where its tranquil beauty is chequered by a transient agitation, we have, as is shown by the subsequent application of the same thought, but the rendering of an intenser excitement from the same feeling,—not an interruption of it.

The plan of the movement is much simpler than of either of the foregoing. The principal melody:

which is one of singular extent, and to which the peculiar richness of the orchestral distribution imparts a warmth of color all glowing with enthusiasm,—this melody is relieved by an Episode composed of broken, declamatory phrases, and so best suited technically to contrast the continuous cantabile of the chief Subject, and it is introduced and accompanied by a figure which I quote:

for the purpose of identifying it at its recurrence in another situation, and of justifying thus my speculation as to the expression of the whole passage. The chief melody is resumed with a varied and very novel orchestral treatment, and it is now prolonged into a Coda, the exquisite beauty of which is consonant with the character of the entire movement, impressing us with a sense of peace around, and content within, and devotion to the source from whence all comfort springs.

II. THE VOCAL PORTION.

(4). Chorus.—All men, all things, all that have life and breath, sing to the Lord. Hallelujah!

We now enter upon the vocal portion of the composition, which is connected with the equally important series of instrumental movements that introduce it, not only by the unity of feeling that pervades the whole, but by the further development in the course of it of some of the ideas that have been announced in the preludial portion of the work. This opening Chorus is incomplete in itself, commencing as it does in the key of the previous Adagio, from which, by a gradual course of modulation, it proceeds into that in which the work begins and concludes, in which the voices enter with a magnificent peal of harmony that seems to be the song of all nature united in one common acclamation. The figure that accompanies the Episode in the preceding Adagio is resumed at the commencement of this movement, and continues with prominent effect through the sustained harmony of the voices, and the expression of that passage is thus, I suppose, connected with the present idea. Presently all motion ceases, and the voices, quite unaccompanied, break forth into the theme with which the work opens, which has been anticipated in fragmentary responses by the most powerful instruments throughout the course of modulations that connects the Chorus with the Adagio, and of which the words now define the meaning, with an effect of imposing grandeur that music cannot surpass.

(5). Praise the Lord with lute and harp, in joyful song extol Him, and let all flesh magnify His might and His glory.

This Chorus is continuous of the preceding, but I distinguish it for the sake of better drawing attention to the new character that is here assumed, and of describing the technical structure of the present movement. This embodies a multitudinous joy, to the expression of which its fugal element greatly contributes; for this element, however dependent upon scholarship for its successful manifestation, and however, on this account, frequently employed as a mere display of technical facility, is in itself essentially dramatic, and embodies the idea of multitudinous excitement more efficiently than almost any other principle of musical development; in exemplification of which, I need not cite the derivative Chorus, "He trusted in God," in the Messiah, and several of the most effective choruses in Israel in Egypt. The form of passage with which the movement opens, and which accompanies the chief Subject throughout, was, obviously, suggested to the composer by the first phrase of the text, who reflects this suggestion upon the audience through the brilliancy of effect and gladness of spirit that is thus especially imparted to the whole movement.

I have spoken of the fugal element (namely, of the successive entry of the several parts with the same subject, and of the continual elaboration of this in their constant responses), as conspicuous in the composition of this movement, which is not, however, a strict fugue fulfilling all the exactions of scholastic canon; but if on this account less erudite, it is none the less effective. The principal Subject:

Praise the Lord with lute and harp, in joyful song extol Him!

And let all flesh magnify His might and His glory!

which is subsequently worked in combination with the former. A passage of remarkable prominence is where the tenor voices alone have the first three notes of the chief theme, to which the rest of the choir respond in full harmony; the broad simplicity of which, and the consequent power, are eminently appropriate to the grandeur of the sentiment. Bursting, as though with unrestrainable transport, through the tumult of these many-tongued rejoicings, the glorious summons with which the work opens is again proclaimed with magnificent solemnity, enforced by unisonous accompaniment of the voices with the brass instruments; and its expression, thus modified, seems to approve while it commands the universal act of homage; with this well-timed and eminently effective recurrence of the initial phrase, the Chorus is completed.

(6). Solo and Semi-Chorus.—Praise thou the Lord, O my spirit, and my inmost soul praise His great loving kindness.

Praise thou the Lord, O my spirit, and forget thou not all His benefits.

Still continuous of the foregoing movement, this exquisite piece of reposeful beauty presents, under a very different aspect, the same purpose—of acknowledging the omnipresent influence of the Fountain of Life. Opposed to the massive solidity of all that has preceded, the brightness of the effect of the single soprano voice (alternated with the responses of the female chorus, and supported by the peculiarly delicate pulsations of the accompaniment of iterated chords) has here an expression so intense, yet so tranquil—so fervid, yet so peaceful,—as may well be supposed the outpouring of a soul thrilling with the sense of grateful love—of love of which its own happy tranquillity is at once the cause and the consequence. Let me distinguish one incident of especial merit in this piece, and one that is particularly characteristic of Mendelssohn; this is the resumption, after a cadence in the fifth of the original key, of the opening theme: which is introduced with charming effect by a short sequence upon its first phrase with the choral voices, which the solo felicitously interrupts by repeating the phrase a third higher (which brings it into the original key), instead of a second higher, which has been the interval at which its successive anticipations have appeared in the sequence.

(7). Recitative.—Sing ye praise, all ye redeemed of the Lord, redeemed from the hand of the foe, from your distresses, from deep affliction; who sat in the shadow of death and darkness, all ye that cried in trouble unto the Lord, sing ye praise, give ye thanks, proclaim aloud His goodness.

Air.—He counteth all your sorrows in the time of need; He comforts the bereaved with His regard. Sing ye praise, give ye thanks, proclaim aloud His goodness.

Chorus.—All ye that cried unto the Lord in distress and deep affliction. He counteth all your sorrows in the time of need.

This series of three movements brings us back to the feeling rendered in the second of the instrumental portions of the work,—an identity the more conspicuous by the return here to the key of the Allegretto Agitato; but, though the feeling be identical, the sense of our temporal associations, which, while it endures, is paramount, there is this marked difference in the expression—that the instrumental movement embodies the workings of present passion; and the three vocal pieces, the sorrowing languor of the bruised heart, that still aches from memory of a grief of which the immediate action is past. This is presented in the pensive melancholy that touches our sympathy rather than stimulates our enthusiasm.

The first phrase of the Recitative:

Sing ye praise,

is important, as announcing the purport of these three pieces—"In the memory of your affliction sing praises"—and this is rendered in the accents of grief as poured from a sincere heart, in which to recollect is to feel anew. This phrase recurs immediately before the close of the Recitative, and again, near the end of the plaintive Air that succeeds; and there appears to me to be a deep meaning in its repeated recurrence, especially in a composition of Mendelssohn, who never trifled with his resources, and never wrote without a purpose.

The melodious smoothness and the expressive sadness of the Air make their own comment; and the same remark applies to the Chorus, which, in an entirely different train of ideas, but with completely the same expression, is a further development of the sentiment of the Solo. Mendelssohn has been eminently successful in this cantabile style of choral writing, in which he has been much imitated, but never surpassed; the employment of a prominent figure continuously throughout the accompaniment, as in the present case, is also one of his peculiarities: such general characteristics make this Chorus one of a class, its association with which cannot but enhance its effect by the charming recollections it awakens, while its individual merits will always make it interesting independently of every association.

(8). Duet and Chorus.—I waited for the Lord, He inclined unto me, He heard my complaint; O blessed are they that hope and trust in the Lord.

Let me not dilate by attempting to describe the charm of this exquisite piece. The lovely melody of the opening Solo is, after the short choral refrain, repeated by the second voice against a counter-melody of the first voice, that is twined about it with as much grace as ingenuity; after a repetition of the choral refrain, which is, according to the constant practice of Mendelssohn, enhanced in its effect by a striking variation of the harmony, the principal melody is assigned to the male voices of the chorus, and, with this rich, sonorous tone, it forms a groundwork upon which is constructed another series of counter-phrases for the two solo voices; in the Coda, a different combination is made of the solo voices with the chorus, and the final cadence is formed with singular beauty by the entry of the male voices of the chorus with the first phrase of the melody, which has been successively anticipated, in another part of the scale, by each of the solo voices.

(9). Air.—The sorrows of death had closed all around me, and hell's dark terrors had got hold upon me, with trouble and deep heaviness; but saith the Lord, "Come, arise from the dead, and awake thou that sleepest, I bring thee salvation."

The restless perturbations of a heart torn by affliction are strikingly embodied in the wild agitation of this impassioned Air; and the hopeful fervor of the second theme expresses the expectant faith in the Divine promise.

(10). Recitative.—We called through the darkness, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" The watchman only said, "Though the morning will come, the night will come also." Ask ye, inquire ye, if ye will, inquire ye, return again, ask, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?"

The wonderfully dramatic setting of this short, very important text, is one of the most remarkable instances the art presents of its power to enforce the significance of verbal expression, giving to this an intensity and a depth wholly beyond the scope of spoken language.

The thrilling phrase for the orchestra, rendered especially poignant by the peculiar instrumental combination employed to give it effect, represents a keen sense of anguish, the agony of which seems to wring the words of the enquiry from a spirit so broken as to be incapable of hope in a reply:

Watchman, will the night soon pass?

The repetition of this passage makes us feel still more intensely the longing for relief—the despair of its attainment so livingly embodied. The four words of description are very felicitously distinguished from the context in the setting; and the troublous anxiety of the Watchman's answer eminently realizes the different emotion of one who witnesses but may not solace another's woe, from that of one stricken with affliction who cannot be comforted. The transposition of the entire passage to a note higher wonderfully augments, if it change not its expression. A new pang seems to rend the heart—a new impulse of impatience to prompt an exclamation uttered from the very depth of despair; the Watchman's reply, by the modification of minor into major, and by the acceleration of the motion of the accompaniment, bears now the purport of an increased concern in the woe that there is an increased sense of inability to console. Another repetition of the passage, transposed yet to a note higher, represents the sufferer become reckless from the long protraction of a torment which, like dropping water, accumulates power by its continuance. This repetition is interrupted by a passage of still more exciting intensity; and, his power of suffering exhausted,—his heart at the point of breaking, the afflicted one seems to be utterly prostrated by his weight of woe.

(11). Solo and Chorus.—The night is departing, the day is approaching, therefore let us cast off the works of darkness, and let us gird on the armor of light. The day is approaching, the night is departing.

Now it is as though the profound darkness were rent, and a stream of Heaven's own radiance piercing the cleft, struck, electrically, life and faith into the withered heart, which was at once quickened with a new vitality by its genial warmth and brightness. Such is the effect of the soprano Solo that, quite unaccompanied, and in a key which is, however relative, totally unexpected, breaks in upon the unresolved dissonance with which the tenor ceases:

The night is de-part-ing, de-part-ing,

This announces the chief Subject of the very grand Chorus, that, with the utmost possible force of voices and instruments, and with equal power of ideas, repeats, as with the tongue of an universe, the glorious truth revealed from Heaven. The triumphant jubilation that characterizes this magnificent piece, penetrates the feelings of every listener, and fills a vast throng with such enthusiastic gladness as springs from the consciousness of patriotic success or the act of poetic creation.

A felicitous illustration of the text occurs where the words "Let us gird on the armor of light!" are first introduced; and this inspiring summons—is echoed from side to side of the orchestra, as if passed from rank to rank of a mighty host, unanimous in a noble cause, and waiting but the appointed signal to set free the ardor within them. A most spirited fugue that constitutes the important Episode which relieves the chief theme, is constructed upon the following subject:

All who hear it must exult in the grand expression of sincerity and reliance conveyed in the concluding passage, where the unaccompanied voices declaim with majestic breadth the opening words.

12. Choral.—Let all men praise the Lord,
In worship lowly bending,
On His most Holy Word,
Redeem'd from woe depending, &c.

"Nun danket Alle Gott," is one of the most generally familiar of the very many Hymn tunes of the Lutheran Church which were adopted into it by its founder, and, with the verses to which they are sung, that also date from the time of the Reformation, have been in constant use as a portion of the Service, from that period to the present. We in England have not the advantage of those among whom these Chorals are habitually familiar, to be able instantly to associate them, as we should our National Anthem, or the Hundredth Psalm, with the words with which they are always connected, and to recognize in them, accordingly, the illustration of some particular sentiment wherever they may be performed, either separately, or, as in the present instance, in the course of an extensive composition. The theme is, to us, new as the treatment with which it is presented to us, and we hear and we judge both together, finding in them what interest we may, apart from all associations beyond the present work. Mendelssohn followed the example of the great Bach, which was founded on still earlier precedent, of incorporating these venerable tunes, as themes for elaboration in his works; and we may well understand, if we cannot experience, the peculiar interest they must excite, and the peculiar ideas they must suggest, when heard in such situations by those who know them with a life-long intimacy. The preceding piece announces the glad tidings of the Redemption; the present embodies, in phrases so well known that all the hearers to whom the work was originally addressed might join in them, the acknowledgments of a grateful world.

The first stanza is harmonized in simple counterpoint for the four voices, without any accompaniment,—an effect so pure and so sympathetic, that it must always be the best possible rendering of a calm, devotional feeling. The second stanza is given as a Plain Song to all the voices in unison, and its broad simplicity supports the florid counterpoint of the orchestra, which here derives additional effect from the other stanza having been sung entirely without instruments. This latter method of treating the theme is especially ecclesiastical, it having been the ancient custom for the "Church Part," or Plain Song, to be sung by the body of the people, while the organ, or sometimes a select choir, accompanied them with such variety or complication of counterpoint as the skill or fancy of the composer prompted him to construct upon it.

13. Duet.—My song shall be alway Thy mercy, singing Thy praise, Thou only God; my tongue ever speak the goodness Thou hast done unto me.

I wander in night and foulest darkness, and mine enemies stand threatening around; yet called I upon the Name of the Lord, and He redeemed me with watchful goodness.

The charming fluency of the melody, and the soft richness of the instrumentation, give a character of repose to the first sentence of this Duet, that shows the words as springing from a soul at peace with all around,—a song of thankfulness poured forth in the calm spirit of contentment. The more troubled character assumed at the entry of the soprano voice on the words "I wander," indicates rather recollection of grief than present suffering, from which the confidence of the declaration, "Yet called I," when the two voices are first brought together, and the gentle sweetness of the succeeding passage, "And He redeemed me," bring us back to the sense of tranquil security which is the prominent expression of the piece. The resumption of the opening melody by the soprano voice, while the tenor has a counter-melody, is one of the chief effects in the Duet.

14. Chorus.—Ye nations, offer to the Lord glory and might.
Ye monarchs, offer to the Lord glory and might.
Thou heaven, offer to the Lord glory and might.
The whole earth, offer to the Lord glory and might.

The misery past, the Redemption accomplished, the general song of thanks and the personal feeling of gratitude openly and secretly offered at the Heavenly mercy-seat, the universe is called upon to glorify the Lord, from whom proceed alike the punishment and the pardon. This purpose is embodied with a dignity worthy of the theme; the grand declamatory Subject, of a class with some of the noblest of Handel's—is so accompanied at its announcement, that the voices, being quite independent of the orchestra, give clear and emphatic enunciation to the comprehensive summons, which thus reaches alike the outer sense and the inward feeling of multitudinous nations, thunder-voiced and irresistible. The several vocal parts enter successively with the same Subject, but each with a different division of the text, implying that the four great embassies, to the Nations, the Monarchs, the Heavens, and the Earth, spread themselves through the infinity of space, circulating their message from sphere to sphere, and filling the untamed realms with the one grand utterance of the one great feeling.

15. O give thanks to the Lord, praise Him all ye people, and ever praise His Holy Name.

Sing ye the Lord, and ever praise His Holy Name.

The imitative form of the preceding movement now ceases. An orchestral passage, in which an extraordinary and most astonishing effect of breadth is attained by the progression of the parts in long scales of measured notes by contrary motion, introduces the ponderously massive harmony of the voices with prodigious majesty; the universe has reverberated with the awful summons, the universe has obeyed, and all created powers join in the Hymn of Praise.

We have then a clever fugue upon this Subject, the aim of which appears to be, artistically, to give solidity to the composition by the exercise of the profoundest scholastic resources,—dramatically, to give the effect of multitude, and so of vastness, as an appropriate rendering of the text.

16. All that have life and breath, sing to the Lord.

Finally, the initial phrase—that which, as a motto, first announced in a grand epitome the entire design of the work—now announces the design to be fulfilled, and declares the heart-expanding solemnity of offering praise to be accomplished. The mind that could produce was all-competent to approve the greatness of this noble masterpiece, and this repetition of his chief idea seems like his setting his seal upon the work, which stamped it as worthy of the theme, worthy of the art, and worthy of the composer.

G. A. MACFARREN.

Beethoven's "Moon-light" Sonata—Liszt.

[We translate the following from the Voyage Musical en Allemagne et en Italie of HECTOR BERLIOZ, Paris, 1844.]

There is a work of Beethoven, known by the name of the Sonata in C Sharp minor, the Adagio of which is one of those poeasies which human language knows not how to designate. Its means of action are very simple; the left hand softly lays out large chords of a sad and solemn character, and of such length as to allow the vibrations of the piano gradually to die away upon each one; above this, the lower fingers of the right hand keep up an obstinate arpeggio accompaniment, of which the form never varies from the first measure to the last; while the other fingers render audible a sort of lamentation, the melodic efflorescence of this sombre harmony.

One day, some seven or eight years ago, Liszt, in executing this Adagio before a little circle of which I made one, took it into his head to alter and denaturalize it, after the manner usually adopted then to win the applause of the fashionable public: instead of holding out those long notes in the bass, instead of the severe uniformity of rhythm and of movement just alluded to, he introduced trills and tremolos, he hurried and retarded the measure, disturbing thus by passionate accents the calmness of this sadness, and making thunders groan in this cloudless sky, which should be only sombered by the sun's departure. . . . I must confess, I suffered cruelly, more even than I ever suffered hearing our unfortunate cantatrici embroider the grand monologue in Freyschütz; for to this torture was added the chagrin of seeing such an artist indulge in a trick that ordinarily belongs only to mediocrity. But what was to be done about it? Liszt was then like a child who, without complaining picks himself up from a fall which we pretend not to perceive, and who would cry were you to offer him your hand. He has risen up proudly: for several years past especially it is no longer he who pursues success, but success which is out of breath in following him; the rôles are exchanged. Let us return to our Sonata.

Recently one of those men of heart and soul, whom artists are so happy to encounter, had assembled a few friends; I was of the number. Liszt arrived in the evening, and, finding a discussion going on about the value of a piece of Weber's, to which the public, whether because it was poorly executed, or from some other reason, had in a recent concert given but a cold reception,—seated himself at the piano to answer in his manner to the antagonists of Weber. The argument appeared unanswerable, and all were obliged to confess that a work of genius had been misappreciated. Just as he had finished, the lamp which lighted the apartment appeared on the point of going out: one of the company went to revive it.

—Do no such thing, said I; if he will play the Adagio of Beethoven in C sharp minor, this twilight will not be amiss.

—With all my heart, said Liszt; but extinguish the light entirely, cover up the fire, let the darkness be complete.

Then, in the midst of those deep shades, after a moment for collecting our thoughts, the noble elegy, the same which he had formerly so strangely disfigured, rose in its sublime simplicity; not a note, not an accent were added to the notes and accents of the author. It was the shade of Beethoven, evoked by the virtuoso, whose grand voice we were hearing. Each of us shuddered in silence, and after the last chord we were silent still. . . . we wept.

"WHAT DOES IT MEAN?" is often asked of a fine piece of music without words. The truth is, the meaning of music lies bidden in those deeper and more mysterious regions of the human soul's every day experience, which it is as vain to ignore as it is impossible to render into the distinct tones of thought. Music is deeper than speech, and makes its appeal to that within us that is deeper than thoughts of the understanding. Music expresses that part of our best and deeper consciousness, which needs precisely such a fluid, sympathetic language as its tones alone afford. Music begins where words leave off; by it our inmost, spiritual natures commune with each other. Hence the loftiest poetry, the most inspired and subtle charm of conversation, in short that magical something that distinguishes the utterances of genius in its high hour, in whatsoever form, is an approximation to music and sets the finest chords to vibrating within us in something the same way. The effect of music could hardly be described more accurately than in the very terms in which the higher ranges of Coleridge's conversation are described by his nephew, in the preface to the "Table Talk." For example:

I have seen him at times when you could not incarnate him,—when he shook aside your petty questions or doubts, and burst with some impatience through the obstacles of common conversation. Then, escaped from the flesh, he would soar upwards into an atmosphere almost too rare to breathe, but which seemed proper to him, and there he would float at ease. Like enough, what Coleridge then said, his subtlest listener would not understand as a man understands a newspaper; but upon such a listener there would steal an influence, and an impression, and a sympathy; there would be a gradual attempering of his body and spirit, till his total being vibrated with one pulse alone, and thought became merged in contemplation;—

And so, his senses gradually wrapt
In a half sleep, he'd dream of better worlds,
And dreaming hear thee still, O singing lark,
That sangest like an angel in the clouds!

American Voices.—Musical Conventions.

MR. DWIGHT.—The "Diarist" has, in your last issue, touched upon a topic which has often recurred to my own mind, and without doubt to many others also. All who have based their judgment upon observation, instead of thoughtlessly adopting the popular notion, must long ago have been aware of the abundance of good voices with which our land is blessed. If, indeed, it be, that any lands are more favorable than others to the production of rare voices, ours must be among the number, for the really fine Mezzo Sopranos (voices), which are to be found in our towns and villages, would suffice to supply half the world with great singers, if they were accompanied by that gift of the spirit, which alone can make a true artist. Nor is this endowment entirely wanting among us. The experience of nearly every country Music Teacher will furnish at least one example of a rare voice combined with equally rare mental endowments. Very few, however, even of the most gifted, have ever reached a higher state of advancement than to sing the anthems (so called) inserted in the back part of psalm-tune books, which usually differ from the psalm-tunes only in containing more measures and in venturing a note or two higher in the treble parts.

As to the causes and means of cure of this great deficiency in the development of our musical resources the Diarist offers some suggestions, with which I must partly agree and partly differ. First, the cause: this I take to be, mainly, the poor character of the Sacred Music which obtains throughout the land. When it is considered that in almost every town or village in New England a "Singing School" gathers together each winter the musical people of the place, for the purpose of "Sol-Fa-ing" through the last psalm-tune book of the favorite "Professor," the great influence exerted by this class of music in vitiating the taste, and in deadening that susceptibility to the influence of really good music, which is natural to the community, will be apparent.

The Diarist, looking around for something to improve this state of things, fixes upon Musical Conventions as likely to help him. Having been connected with a great many of these affairs, in several different States and under the management of many different Professors, I can speak with some certainty concerning their objects and influence. They are, in fact, only gigantic Singing Schools, where the Professor gets paid for advertising his own books, and at which country people are educated up to the standard of such master-pieces as the Oratorios of "Absalom" and the "Captivity and Restoration," or the equally classical "Cantatas," with names apparently borrowed from the backs of cheap yellow-covered books.

Let it not be thought that I have mis-stated the object of the managers of these Conventions. I know of more than one instance, where the inhabitants of country towns have engaged two celebrated manufacturers of the psalm-tune nostrum, from different States, to hold a Convention together, and where each of the Doctors of Music brought his own pile of psalm-books, his own bundle of glee-books, and his own Oratorio or Cantata, and alternated with his rival in displaying their merits, while the gathered multitude of singers, who had spent time and money in the endeavor to satisfy the thirst of their natures for music, are forced to follow the rival Professors, in their contradictory precepts, exchanging each book for its rival as the Professors alternate in command.

Once, in a small town, the centre of a county, the calling of a similar Convention fell into the hands of persons who desired, as does the "Diarist," to make it conduce to the musical benefit of its members. They pursued the very plan proposed by the "Diarist"; they procured and practised for some time previous to the Convention, good classical music, and looked earnestly forward to the time when the preceptor should assist them to feel the greatness and give life to the beauties of those noble choruses from "Samson"; but the day arrived, and with the Professor came the Professor's books, and these occupied the van, the body, and the rear of the Convention's time, leaving poor Classics to come in as baggage.

Surely, Mr. Diarist, such Conventions will hardly aid the great work in which we are both engaged.

PHI.

ANSWER TO THE ABOVE.—Why did the people in that said country town engage "Professors"? Why did they not send for a Conductor? Send for a man like Zerrahn, or Eckhart, or Southard to direct the work they had in hand? Enough good conductors may be found.

The Oratorios.

The earnest efforts of the Handel and Haydn Society to give us four more Oratorio programmes, with the invaluable aid of Herr FORMES, and other artists associated with him in New York, have so far been rewarded by large, but not by any means overflowing audiences. The "Elijah," on Saturday evening, it was our misfortune personally to lose, illness preventing our attendance. But all accounts agree in representing that the great basso, suffering from a cold and the fatigue of recent labors, did not give the part of the prophet with the same spirit as on his former visit; that the choral performance, too, was in many parts less effectively inspired; but that some of the choruses and all of the quartets went better than ever here, and that Mme. D'ANGRI was much admired in the contralto (or mezzo soprano) songs, especially in the "Angel Trio," which, as sung this time by Mrs. LONG, Mrs. HARWOOD and herself, made even a finer impression than as sung before by boys.

The "Messiah," on Sunday evening, we did hear, and would not for much have missed it. FORMES, of course, was the great special attraction. He is one of those very few singers, who possess the higher qualities of the artist in so eminent a degree, who has so much of the soul and inspiration of the music in him, and who conveys it with so much truth of feeling, so much power of intellect, and such commanding force of voice and personal magnetism, that it detracts very little from him that he is open to various points of technical criticism in detail. In spite of the fact that his intonation is not always true (as is the case with many ponderous bass voices); in spite of what we must deem his worst fault, the tendency to too much portamento, and in spite of still remaining signs of hoarseness, he delivered the great bass solos of the "Messiah" that night with a power and grandeur of expression, which we have scarcely heard approached before. His mere mastery of the music, to speak of nothing more, his executive command of the Handelian passages, his power of phrasing, emphasis, and light and shade, were very perfect; and the grand voice, furnishing such large and palpable tone-substance, was all the shaping, plastic art could want. But then, too, there was the informing mind, the equal of which we have not had in any singer except Jenny Lind. There was the imaginative, vitalizing consciousness of what he sang, which colored and attuned each note as the sentiment, the spirit of the part required. How remarkable this in the great descriptive recitative and air: For, behold, darkness shall cover the earth; The people that walked in darkness, &c. Much is due to the composer; but, in the change from the sombre tone of darkness to the phrase: have seen a great light, how wonderfully his tones brightened! how vivid, lustrous was the enthusiasm of that passage! And there was a whole-souled energy about all such passages. Being truly imaginative with him, they could not be overdone. In his first recitative: Thus saith the Lord, he did "shake the heavens and the earth" with a power to make one tremble; the chaste and solemn beauty of: But who may abide, and the tremendous prestissimo of: For he is like a refiner's fire, were in admirable contrast; the latter more perfect than his rendering of the similar air in "Elijah." Why do the nations rage was executed to a charm, and wonderfully effective; there were strong calls for its repetition. The song of the "Last Trumpet," too, though we think it too mere a show-piece for so sublime an oratorio, we never heard so well given; in the first notes of the introductory recitative: Behold, I tell you a mystery! we had another exemplification of this singer's fine imaginative coloring of a note. We have now heard FORMES in "Elijah," the "Creation," and the "Messiah," and our impression is that in the bass songs of the last his grand voice and talent find the grandest scope.

Mr. PERRING's tenor sounded sweeter and purer than ever in his opening piece: Comfort ye, my people. His execution throughout was smooth, artistic, chaste, expressive,—allowing something of course for the commonplace cadenzas of all English singers. His voice is not robust, not great; but in such music we have rarely heard a more delightful artist. Thy rebuke, &c. were given with true and beautiful expression.

We cannot sympathize with all the admiration felt by some for Mme. D'ANGRI's large tones and dramatic style in the contralto airs of the "Messiah." The voice is large, and also rich; but to our ear not free from a certain something unrefined. Her execution, of the Rossini passages especially, is admirable; but here, in the pathetic, but chaste melody of: He was despised, there was a dramatic overdoing of the matter, a sobbing and gasping between the phrases, that seemed far more like cold stage common-places, than like real emotion. It was false art, in that it went on the principle of acting out the sorrows, which the song was only intended calmly to narrate. In O thou that tellest, her large tones lent peculiar effect.

Mrs. LONG was remarkably successful in the great song of faith: I know that my Redeemer liveth. In the angel announcements: There were shepherds, &c., the time was certainly too slow; the wings (in the violin figures) moved very languidly; otherwise we have never heard this singer to better advantage on the whole. The same of Mrs. WENTWORTH; in spite of that certain childishness of voice, which goes with its rare purity and sweetness, she conveys the beauty and the consolation of such strains as: He shall feed his flock, and But thou didst not leave, in a way that wins deep entrance to the feelings of all listeners. No one was more heartily applauded.

The effect of the choruses, and the ensemble generally, was of more than average excellence, though not the best we can remember. The contralto part was much too feebly represented, in respect of numbers, in proportion to the rest. The "Hallelujah," however, never impressed us more. Some of the choruses showed the very careful drill under which Mr. Conductor ZERRAHN has lately put his forces. But a noteworthy feature, to be counted to the advantage of this performance, was the introduction and effective rendering of certain very important pieces commonly omitted. Such were the exceedingly beautiful consecutive choruses: Surely he hath borne our grief, and And with his stripes; the highest poetic as well as contrapuntal charm is found in the latter. After these choruses, the real force and quaintness of: All we like sheep, is for the first time felt. Another praiseworthy restoration was that of the answering quartet and chorus sentences: For as by man came death, in Christ shall all be made alive, &c. The quartets were finely given by the four principal singers, and the choral antithesis on the last clause told superbly.

The Drama.

The present season will be remembered by managers throughout the country as the most disastrous ever known. The sudden exhaustion in the public funds came so unexpectedly that no provision could be made to lessen its effect upon the theatrical world. Ample and liberal arrangements for a season of unusual brilliancy had been made by certain managers in the three Northern cities. New plans were laid, new enterprises decided upon. The expected increase in expenses was to be met by a triple combination of leading theatres in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, according to which attractive novelties were to be presented alternately before the public of each city. Everything promised well, but before the season was fairly on its way, the financial pressure cast a shadow over all, especially darkening the prospects of those who live by the provision of public amusement. The entire winter was one of managerial discontent; whether in the rapidly reviving interest in gaieties there is in store for them a "glorious summer," is yet to be seen.

In Boston matters have been the same as elsewhere; neither better nor worse. The Boston Theatre has been the most afflicted of our places of popular resort — if, indeed, that can be called a place of popular resort which for so long appeared to be sedulously shunned by the public. The season opened at the appointed time, with a company certainly above the average. Various attractions were brought forward in rapid succession. Mr. Edwin Booth appeared in the second week. In the fifth Mr. Charles Mathews came, and added much to his own fame, but nothing to the fortunes of the theatre. Two months passed away, each successive week witnessing a steady depletion of the treasury. The beautiful ballet troupe was introduced in the tenth week. Then, indeed, the audiences began to increase, but not sufficiently to counter-balance the enormous expenses at that time. After the departure of the ballet troupe, a month of dreary desolation ensued. Miss Heron, in the eighteenth week, proved a considerable attraction, but it was reserved for the Ravels, in the twentieth week, to awaken an interest thus far unseen. For nine weeks they filled the theatre, yet, unfortunately, so great are the regular expenses of the establishment, the additional outlays required for their visit prevented even then any pecuniary advantage on the side where it was most needed. One advantage, however, was gained; — that of passing without positive loss through the most dangerous period of the year. After the Ravels, came Mr. Edwin Booth again, who succeeded in attracting for two weeks larger audiences, perhaps, than could have been secured by any other individual performer at that time. From our hasty summary we gladly step aside a moment to pluck a humble flower and throw it in the path of this young and brilliant tragedian. Of all the hosts of aspirants for histrionic fame who at this day tread the boards, he alone seems destined to attain a splendid eminence. Even now, when but just entered upon the tangled path of his profession, he justly claims a position so far above all other American actors, that only one or two can be named with him. In the personation of Shakespeare's characters, which most powerfully test an actor's abilities, Mr. Booth's genius carries him nobly through. The Shakespearian temple is not defiled, but adorned, when he enters it. Two more years of such rapid advancement in his art as he has shown during the past two, and he will surely stand in the front rank of living tragedians.

The present attraction at the theatre is the curious specimen of Mr. Bourcain's "contemporaneous drama," "Jessie Brown, or the Relief of Lucknow" a series of effectively constructed scenes selected from the events of the Indian war. The chief merit of this play is the admirable manner in which it is put upon the stage, the scenery and appointments far exceeding in magnificence anything ever before seen in this city. It has attracted large audiences at the Boston Theatre, which now bids fair at least to incur no loss for the remainder of the season.

The Boston Museum has sailed steadily through the financial tempest, not unscathed, indeed, but with perhaps less difficulty than any theatre in the North. There is a wonderfully firm and capable hand at the managerial helm. Mr. Kimball, it would seem, has found that philosopher's stone which ensures fixed fortune even in his dubious vocation. There are reasons, which appear on examination, for his unvarying success. At another time the examination shall be made.

The Howard Athenæum — it is singular, by the way, that two of our theatres should seek to conceal themselves under an assumed name — has been closed the winter long, with the exception of a ridiculous attempt at a season of a few weeks, of which the less said the better. It has recently opened with the brightest auspices, under the management of Mr. and Mrs. Barrow. As now conducted, the Howard deserves to prosper. The company is remarkably complete, and equal to almost any requirements, as has been shown. The plan adopted by Mr. Barrow, — a new one, and one which will probably carry success with it, — we must touch upon hereafter.

These are the only theatrical reminiscences of the season worth alluding to. There have been at the National Theatre some representations alike disgraceful to the stage and to the city which permits them. These have recently given place to a circus exhibition, and it is said that the control of the theatre has just been assumed by a gentleman who will endeavor to redeem its character. The task is a severe one, but is worth attempting.

CONCERTS. — Since our last there have been several concerts. Illness has prevented our attending any of them except the annual Benefit of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETT CLUB, which, we are sorry to say, had but thin audience, although both programme and performance were of a very high order. We hope to speak more at length of it next week. The others have been that of the ST. CECILIA SOCIETY, on Saturday evening; the Wednesday Afternoon Concert, at the Music Hall, of which the larger features were Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and the Tannhäuser Overture; and a private farewell entertainment given by Mrs. E. A. WENTWORTH, to some of her friends, at Chickering's, more especially in compliment to the members of the society worshipping at King's Chapel. This we were very sorry to lose. Mrs. Wentworth sails for Europe in the Vanderbilt, from New York, to-day.

Musical Chit-Chat.

This evening the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY give the third of their grand Oratorio performances. The first part will be miscellaneous, giving a chance to hear the glorious organ of Herr FORMES in three famous bass songs, to-wit: In diesen heiligen Hallen, from the Zauberflöte; Schubert's "Wanderer," and an air from Figaro. Mr. COOPER's admirable violinism also will be heard. For the second part we are to have, for the first time, Mendelssohn's sublime "Hymn of Praise," of which the first half is an orchestral Symphony in three noble movements, and the second half grand choruses and orchestra, with splendid solos for tenor and sopranos. The hearer should prepare himself by reading the analysis commenced in our last, and concluded in this week's paper. To-morrow evening, the "Creation" will be again performed, giving another opportunity to hear the famous low D of FORMES. Mrs. LONG, Mrs. HARWOOD and Mr. PERRING take the other parts. . . . The GERMANIA MILITARY BAND, whose new organization in the much desired form of a reed Band, of thirty instruments, we heralded with joy a few weeks since, announce a first Concert at the Music Hall for next Saturday evening. Let every one, who has grown weary of the age of brass, attend and lend his countenance to this good movement. . . . The eleventh and last but one of the Afternoon Concerts of the ORCHESTRAL UNION will take place next Wednesday.

We heard some rare music on the morning of Good Friday, at the house of a gentleman in this city, who provides a refined pleasure for himself and his friends by private quartet performances of classical music once a week the winter through. To this end he employs four of our best resident artists:

MESSRS. ECKHARDT, WULF FRIES, SCHULTZE and SUCK, who compose as perfect a quartet as we have listened to in Boston. On this occasion we had a Fugue by Mozart; a religious Andante out of one of Beethoven's latest Quartets ("in modo Lydico"), profoundly beautiful and solemn; He was despised, and Behold and see if there be any sorrow, from Handel's "Messiah," the air being most feelingly sung in the one by the viola, in the other by the 'cello; and finally the introduction, and all the seven Sonatas of that famous old work, Haydn's "Seven last words on the Cross." These were all slow, grave movements, but appropriate to the day, and for the most part very beautiful.

The London Musical World devotes three or four columns to us again — part complimentary, and part friendly warning against German critics; thereby hangs a — queue (in German, Zopf). We shall consider the matter at due length. . . . They have found out that the mother of LABLACHE was Irish. . . . What wonderful instruction books are written now-a-days for musical beginners! We opened one and found the "Anvil Chorus" arranged for flute solo!

The music-lovers in Salem, in Providence, in Worcester, &c., have enjoyed in turn the splendors of the FORMES constellation this week, in the interim between the Oratorios in Boston. . . . Last Tuesday evening the young ladies of the Mendelssohn Musical Institute, in Pittsfield, Mass., gave a Soirée, under the direction of their zealous principal, Mr. EDWARD B. OLIVER. In the programme we notice five Sonatas: (in E b, by Hummel; in D, by Beethoven; Op. 36, by Clementi; in C, by Kuhlau; and Fantasia and Sonata, by Mozart); a Song without Words, by Mendelssohn; a Fantasia ("Winter's Tale") by Oesten; Polonaise, by Weber; and Songs by Mendelssohn, Schubert, Aht, Kalliwoda, and Meyerbeer. Certainly an example worthy to be held up to all seminaries where music is professed! We hear that the performance reflected great credit on both teachers and pupils. . . . We read of our whilom tenor, Mr. ARTHURSON, as giving a third Soirée Musicale in Montreal, assisted by amateur pupils; the selections were "from the oldest masters."

The "MUSARD Monster Concerts" at the New York Academy of Music commence on Monday evening, to be continued every evening for one month. Ullman blows his biggest trumpets in the newspapers. They will be the "grandest, completest, most colossal" concerts ever known on this side the ocean. He has found his twenty liveried waiters, his "prepossessing" Naiads of exhaustless tea and coffee fountains, his twenty boys in fancy uniforms to sell the evening papers; he also invites you to the light of "twenty-five monster candelabras," to the downy ease of "one hundred sofas," and what not. Then the orchestra numbers one hundred and twenty instruments! including "60 first-rate violins, 30 contra basses and 'cellos, 9 trombones and 20 drums!" besides the usual wind and brass. Such is the outfit for one of Musard's "Monster Quadrilles." We are nothing if not monstrous in these days. There is to be a "Comic Cattle Show Quadrille" and an "Explosion of the Malakoff Quadrille." Musard brings with him famous solo-players from Paris; and THALBERG, D'ANGRI, &c., are to take part in the opening. To be sure, this is Musard filis, and not Musard the founder of this nice and quiet little classical style of concert that wears his name. The father laid down the bâton in '42, and since then the present Musard has reigned in Paris, and is the only Musard known to the Parisian of to-day; — all this has Mr. Ullman taken pains to prove at a whole column's length by documents in the newspapers, silencing malicious hints about the identity of his lion. They do say, however, that the real Musard concert hails from Bohemia; perhaps all our readers are not so well booked up in Geography as to be aware that Bohemia is in Paris. . . . Ullman has already sent up the signal balloon of his next grand ascent: He has engaged London LUMLEY with all his troupe, including PICCOLONINI, and the new tenor GIUGLINI, to come over here next autumn. . . . The "Hutchinson Family," re-organized, are giving more of their "hearty, homely," popular concerts in New York, at Mozart Hall. . . . Bach's triple Concerto is to be played at Messrs. Mason & Thomas's Matinée to-day by the three pianists, SCHARFENBERG, TIMM and WILLIAM MASON. . . . The "Haydn Quartet" is the name of a new Club for Chamber Music, formed in Brooklyn, under the lead of THEODORE HAGEN.

In Philadelphia, MARETZER's Opera troupe concluded their first subscription series on Monday and Wednesday nights, with L'Elisir d'Amore and Lucia, the principal parts being sustained by LAGRANGE, GASSIER, BRIGNOLI, GASPARI and ASSONI. The small audiences thus far have been ascribed in part to the want of novelty; but an immense subscription was anticipated for the new series of ten nights, which was to commence last evening, with I Puritani, the great baritone RONCONI at last appearing as Sir George Walton. "William Tell" is to be given on Monday: this we really envy the Philadelphians. The Prophète, "North Star," "Huguenots, &c., are expected to follow. Other members of the troupe are GAZZANIGA, ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, D'ANGRI, AMODIO, &c. Fitzgerald says: "the Brignoli of to-day is as superior to the Brignoli of 1855, as Formes is to the average of bassi." . . . Mr. SENTZ's orchestra, at their "Germania Rehearsals," have reached the point of giving a Symphony entire; they have played Mozart's "Jupiter," in C. . . . The "Harmonia Sacred Music Society" gave their thirtieth concert (second of the season) last Monday evening, assisted by Mr. FRAZER, the tenor. The programme was miscellaneous.

A Philadelphia paper gives us the information that "Mr. Ullman is negotiating for the Howard Atheneum, Boston, with a view of giving a series of Italian operas, with Lagrange, D'Angri, Formes, Gassier, &c." Yet these same artists are just now sailing under the Maretzek colors. There is a rumor, also, that the two high and mighty powers have joined hands and resolved to cut Boston altogether!

Master PAINE, a young pianist, has been gratifying the musical people of Portland, Me. with a series of concerts (to the end, we infer, of bridging the way to a higher Musical education in Europe.) The last time he was assisted by the Orchestral Union, under Mr. KOTZSCHMAR, by two bands, Miss JENNY TWITCHELL, the singer, and several instrumental solists.

From my Diary. (New Series, No. 2.)

April 6. — I met a gentleman on Sunday, who told me of the desire expressed by one of our best patrons of all good music, a gentleman of the highest culture, for something similar to the historical concerts of Dresden, Berlin, and London. It is not a new suggestion, as the volumes of Dwight's Journal will testify. I know of but one attempt to give a concert of this class in Boston, viz., that given by Mr. Cutler with the choir of the Church of the Advent, last year, and which was not so successful in a pecuniary point of view, as to invite its repetition. There is one way in which something might be effected, and the lovers of solid, old church music gratified — but is it practicable?

Let us draw a fancy sketch.

The Handel & Haydn Society, through its government, organizes an adequate orchestra and takes upon itself the risk of undertaking a series of concerts similar to those of the "Gewandhaus" in Leipzig, or of the "Sternsche Gesangverein," in Berlin. The public comes forward liberally and agrees to furnish means for a fair trial of the experiment — that is, so many tickets are subscribed for as will ensure the society against loss.

The Society agrees on its part to give a series of ten Symphony Concerts on alternate Saturday evenings, and a certain number of performances of Oratorios in the course of the season. At each of the Symphony Concerts a portion of the Society — so many as have the time and musical taste to induce them to join this extra choir — will perform cantatas and choral music of various styles and eras. Under some such arrangement there would be ample opportunity for the production of specimens of the works of Palestrina, Durante, Leo, Lasso, and their contemporaries. Extracts from the secular works of Handel, Bach, Gluck, and Hasse, could occasionally be given; indeed two or three performances might be modelled upon the London "Ancient Concerts" — for so many years a leading feature in the music of that city.

Smith — like X in Algebra — a name denoting an unknown individual, intends to leave two or three hundred thousands by-and-by in trust for the support of concerts and good music generally, as Lowell left funds for the lecturing institute. Until Smith does this, I fear we shall hear no Palestrina or Lotti music, unless the fancy sketch above becomes a reality.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 6. — Mr. SATTER has given two more concerts, for which the programmes were rather more mixed than was accordant with good taste. At the first, he played, alone, the Tannhäuser Overture, astonishing anew even those who had heard it before. His rendering of two or three of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" was not particularly satisfactory; the spirit was wanting, and the performance of the "Spring Song," with which he answered an encore, could bear no comparison with that of more than one other artist. Bach's "Triple Concerto" was marred in its effect by the preponderance of the pianos over the string-quartet; the pianos were again some of Steinway's noisy ones, and did not go well together. Messrs. GOLDNECK and PYCHOWSKI assisted Mr. Satter at these instruments, while MESSRS. MOLLENHAUER, NOLL, EISEL and BERGNER played the quartet accompaniment. Mr. Mollenhauer gave us two of his tricky and elaborate violin solos, of which one grows heartily tired by degrees; and Miss ANDEM, with her fine, clear, though cold voice, and indifferent manner, was the vocalist of the evening. The last number of the programme was a Grande paraphrase des Huguenots, played and composed by Mr. Satter, which abounded in difficulties, but was rather deficient in beauty. It called forth, nevertheless, a storm of applause and a vehement encore. To this Mr. Satter replied with — tell it not in Gath! — nothing more nor less than "Yankee Doodle"! An ingenious representation of it, to be sure, with a very natural imitation of the drum and fife, &c. — but "how are the mighty fallen"! Bach and "Yankee Doodle" in the same ranks! Mr. Satter's second concert was similar in quality.

Saturday before last the Academy was crowded to overflowing, and chiefly with ladies, in honor of the last operatic performance of CARL FORMES, who sang for the first and only time at a Matinée. The pretty little opera of "Martha" was performed, with the usual merits and defects, and the same cast as earlier in the winter, except that Mme. JOHANNSEN made the heroine, instead of Lagrange, and, though her voice is fresher, was inferior in her acting. MASON's Matinée, which took place at the same time presented a very attractive programme. A quartet (in D) by Mozart; Schumann's Andante and Variations for two pianos (in which Mr. TIMM assisted Mr. Mason); a Scherzo and Trio from a Quartet by Cherubini; and the Andante and Variations from Schubert's posthumous Quatour. The performance of these compositions was very fine; in fact, this quartet party are fast coming up to that of the Eisel, and if the latter often play as carelessly as they did in the Schumann Quartet at their last concert (which I forgot to mention), the former may soon be beyond them.

Monday and Wednesday night FRY's "Leonora" was given. By a glimpse which I caught of the Journal (my copy has not yet reached me,) I see that you have had a notice of it; not having read it through, I do not know how far it enters into details. I will say, therefore, what I have heard, that the opera is full of pleasing melodies, but also full of reminiscences; and that it is almost as impossible to execute as the Sabat Mater of the same composer. As a specimen, I was told that in one of the choruses the Sopranos have to commence on the high C!

On Thursday "the Huguenots" was given for the last time, and with that performance the opera closed, to make room for Mons. MUSARD and his concerts. This gentleman, by the by, is the innocent cause of a deal of trouble to poor Mr. Ullman. The advertisements in our daily papers will give you sufficient information on that score, however. There were two attractive concerts on Tuesday night, though it was not hard to choose between them. At the one PAUL

JULIEN made his farewell appearance. Owing to the counter attraction, he had but a slim audience; but, according to all accounts, those who heard him were delighted. The other was the performance of the "Messiah," at the Academy. This did not equal the one on Christmas night. FORMES, it is true, was equally good, and CARADORI even better, but the tenor was far inferior to Mr. Perring, and Mme. d'ANGRI rather risked the reputation she had acquired quired as a singer of sacred music. The choruses were below criticism. An enlivening scene occurred during the evening; the "trumpet aria" was vociferously encored — but Mr. ANSCHÜTZ attempted to proceed with the following chorus. But the audience were not to be cheated out of their pleasure, they drowned the orchestra completely with tumult. Mr. Anschütz, after several endeavors to go on, turned to the audience and said in an excited tone: "Gentlemen and ladies? it is nevere de custome to repeat de sacred maosic!" But the "gentlemen and ladies" did not care for the "costume," and noisily called for the trumpet aria. Mr. Anschütz listened a while, growing more and more wrathly, and finally flung down his baton and walked off the stage. At this there was some consternation, particularly as some of the solo singers and chorists followed. But the storm broke out anew, and raged with increased fury. Formes sat still, the while, laughing in his sleeve, and evidently enjoying the scene. At length a gentleman appeared: probably the president of the Harmonic Society, and addressed the audience in the politest terms, saying that they were always happy to repeat any number which pleased the audience, but that in this case, they must beg the indulgence of the latter, as the trumpet accompaniment to the aria in question was so difficult that it was impossible for the performer to go through it again. This speech was duly applauded, Mr. Anschütz re-appeared, resumed his baton, and the oratorio proceeded, I rejoice to say, without further interruption.

What say you to this specimen of the manners of our public? I must confess that I have been almost ashamed to give it you! Such demonstrations, too, so particularly inappropriate to the character of the music that was being performed! In Europe a very good rule exists, of not even allowing applause at oratorios — much less encores. People who come to hear sacred music are expected to behave quietly. I am very glad that Mr. Anschütz carried his point in this case. —t—

FLORENCE, ITALY, FEB., 1858. — In Florence, as I have observed in a previous letter, the great majority of the performing musicians are very young men and boys; and these chiefly make up the orchestras. The pay given is very trifling — only a few pauls a night — and the rehearsals are not paid for at all. The musicians forming the military bands are also young men, and very many of these performed on their respective wind instruments in the various orchestras during the evenings. The best musicians in the city, solo performers especially, are attached to the court; but the pay of even the most eminent does not amount to over eight dollars a month; for the rest, they eke out a subsistence by giving lessons and performing at private concerts, at the houses of the wealthy Florentines and strangers. The operatic singers also are paid very small salaries, but it is always the custom for the prima donna, and tenor, to have regularly signed contracts, professing to engage their services for the season at certain high rates. These serve a purpose similar to the "character" of an Irish servant girl, and are only used to exhibit to any manager wanting their service elsewhere, while in reality their salary is probably but one-half of that named in the contract.

Florence is particularly noted in the musical circles as being productive of performers of eminence on wind instruments. The best Florentine flutist has recently been appointed flutist to the Emperor of Russia. There is one PIMBONI here, who does wonders, nay miracles, upon the trombone, performing the most florid and difficult variations, and producing tones as delicate as those of the flute. On dit that Jullien has declared that should he engage Pimbani, his auditors would never want to listen to any one else. This Pimbani has a brother, PIMBONI number two, who is a Titan upon the clarinet. The best French horn is Signor PAOLI, who is attached to the Tuscan court, and is acknowledged on all sides to be the first maestro on his instrument in Italy. His Florentine friends assert that he is superior to VIVIER. From a personal acquaintance with Signor Paoli, I can attest his merits as a remarkable and expressive performer, and his Method for the Horn, published by Ricordi of Milan, proves that he knows how to write about his instrument as well as to play on it.

Though VERDI is the ascendant musical star here, as in all Italy, yet he does not entirely eclipse the old masters. The Florentine Philharmonic Society frequently produce the works of Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn; and the chamber quartets of classical writers are often performed at the private concerts frequently given here by prominent music-teachers and their pupils. The most successful piano-forte teacher here in Italian Florence, is Prof. KRAUSS, a German gentleman whose acquaintance I had the pleasure of making. He has been a resident of Florence eighteen years, during ten of which he has officiated as organist of the English church; but his instrument is a very inferior one, not at all calculated to exhibit the real ability of the performer.

Of church music in Florence little can be said. On the high festivals of the church, the services of operatic artists are obtained, but on ordinary occasions, the music is inferior. There are no eminent organists and no really good organs. Enter a Florentine church, and you will hear some rambling, florid performances, upon an organ with a sharp, cutting tone, but wholly devoid of that solemn grandeur, which we generally associate with this Milton of instruments, and which in the English cathedrals is found in its most glorious development. The organs in this city are (with the exception of that in the English church), destitute of swell-pedals, and no really beautiful effects can be produced. As to fugue-playing, it seems to be almost unknown.

TROVATOR.

ROME, MARCH 8. — Of course during Lent, all operatic performances are abandoned and Rome becomes as utterly unmusical a place as you need wish to see. There have been a few concerts given by the tenor GARDONI, the soprano GASSIER, and some others of the opera company. The price of tickets was $1.50, and the programme consisted of a few operatic selections. These concerts have been given at the residences of some of the Italian nobility, and to all intents and purposes may be considered as private soirées.

Indeed, I have been very much surprised to see how little real musical taste there seems to be in Rome — a hand organ is a rarity — there are but two or three music stores in the city — pianofortes are not in as many families as in an American city of the same size, and there is little to show me that I am in the land of music — the very home of Apollo. Sometimes I hear a few jolly young men in the evening roaring one or two staves of Trovatore or Norma, but as this is perhaps the only music they have ever heard, their performance exhibits no more real love for music than the untutored efforts of some New York or Boston rowdy, who staggers home, singing "Nelly Bly" or "Root, Hog, or die"!

Luckily people don't come to Rome to hear music. It is the eye rather than the ear that is to be gratified in the Imperial City; and where there are so many to see, one can endure very easily the absence of all orchestral or vocal harmonies.

Among my daily strolls amid the Art galleries of Rome, I very frequently include the gallery of busts of distinguished Italians in the Capitol. There, in some half a dozen rooms, are all the great men of modern Italy — for the old fogeys of classic times, there is a separate gallery.

Among these fine busts I particularly remember of musical men, Paesiello, with a grand, statesmanlike head — Cimarosa, common-place and pug-nosed — Zingarelli, with a head like Webster. Of artists, sculptors and architects, there are Fra Angelico, with a sweet, benign face, full of love and kindness — Fra Bartolomeo, much the same kind of features, but more dignified — Perugino, with smiling lips and long waving hair — Giotto, deep and reflective — Da Vinci and Benvenuto Cellini, looking singularly alike with their quaint caps and long beards — Andrea del Sarto, young, romantic and beautiful, such as might have been the sleeping Endymion — Rafael, looking as Rafael alone looks — Domenichino, who, instead of being the devout old man one would seem to expect after seeing such a work as his "Communion of St. Jerome," is young and graceful, looking like Charles the I. — Brunelleschi, old and ugly — Lorenzo Ghiberti, heavy and ponderous, not at all as if he could descend to minute and laborious detail, as manifested in his famous doors at the Florence Baptistery — Antonio Raimondo of Bologna, from whom Ary Scheffer seems to have taken the model for his heads of Christ in his Consolator and other pictures. Of writers there are Metastasio, with a hooked nose, looking more like an avaricious old miser than a poet — Alfieri, deep and determined — Dante, as Dante alone looks, he and Rafael being each a type of peculiar beauty — Goldoni, fat-faced and funny, the very ideal of a comedy writer. Perhaps, all things considered, the handsomest man of all was Pietro da Cortona, a painter of merit, if not of the first rank. Michael Angelo is old and wrinkled, but there is a Miltonic grandeur about his features. It is singular that amid this collection, so few musicians should be found.

Perhaps the most impressive time to see St. Peter's is near sunset, when the setting sun sends in his rays so that they quite illuminate the interior of that

"— wondrous dome

To which Diana's marvel was a cell."

During Lent the musical services held at Vespers on Friday and Sunday evenings are peculiarly attractive. These services take place in one of the side chapels, and a short time before the hour of commencing, you see fat, oily men of God, dressed in violet and white, and red and black, waddle slowly in and take their accustomed seats. The musicians are in a gallery, and of course they are the real attraction. The music performed, though florid and Italian, is not operatic. Paesiello, Zingarelli, Cherubini supply the repertoire rather than Bellini, Verdi or Rossini. The organ stands in a niche, behind the singers' gallery.

At these vespers I hear frequently the castrati, peculiar, I believe, to Rome. Their voice is that of a rich mezzo-soprano, but the effect would be better were the performers invisible, as it seems rather out of place to see a stalwart man performing the roulades and flourishes generally considered the exclusive property of a prima donna. They also make use of boys in this choir as in the English Cathedrals, and the lads sing like Cherubim and Seraphim. One in particular I remember, whose wild, quaint voice is heard with a startling effect amid the melancholy movements of a minor Miserere. He sings with exquisite taste, and I have heard him perform a solo — the Sabat Mater dolorosa — in a manner that has brought tears to the eyes of many of the listeners present.

It is beautiful to see how night gradually settles in St. Peter's, while the lights that are burning night and day around the altar seem to grow brighter, and Canova's kneeling statue of Pius VI., that occupies the most sacred spot in the church, seems like some ghost haunting the place it loved when an inhabitant of earth. The people strolling about St. Peter's seem smaller at this time than ever, and when the custodian warns them that the church is to be closed for the night, every one departs with a feeling of regret, unwilling to leave a spot, that, at all times glorious and attractive, is at this hour doubly enchanting.

Oftentimes, I am undecided whether to spend the vesper hour of Friday evenings at St. Peter's or at the Coliseum: for at each of these places, that only resemble each other in the circumstance of being both now devoted to the worship of the same God, the services on these occasions are deeply interesting. It is difficult to decide which is the most imposing, the rich harmonies of the Papal choir at St. Peter's or the simple chant of the multitude, as they leave the old Roman ruin, following the uplifted cross, and singing a simple and oft-reiterated strain, in which the words "Santa croce" are alone clearly distinguishable. Both of these scenes are peculiar to Rome.

A charming and amusing song or duet for the young, with a spirited vignette representing the kittens and their mother, in two tableaux. This song has been performed at children's concerts with great success.
- Willie and I. S. B. Ball. 30
A favorite Sunday School Song, with a pleasing illustration representing a boy and girl on their way to Sabbath School. The words and music are excellent. This song has been repeatedly sung at Sunday School Conventions, Monthly Concerts, &c. Quite easy.
- Marion Lee—Ballad. H. G. Thompson. 30
Every one has heard, and few but have admired the song of "Lilly Dale." This ballad is by the same author, and in the same sweet and pathetic vein.
- Lord God of Abraham—from Oratorio of Elijah. 25
One of the noble songs performed by Herr Formes in that Oratorio.
- The Hunter's Lament, and Spring is coming. 25
Two Songs composed by A. Koeppe.
Graceful compositions, and every way adapted for the parlor.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC FOR PIANO.

- Bunte Reihe—Mazurka, Minuet, Scherzo, and Dance. F. Liszt. 25
Somewhat difficult, but very desirable.
- La Campanella. Taubert. 50
- Rhapsodie. F. Spindler. 30
- March de la Reine. J. Ascher. 40
Not very difficult, but brilliant, showy and effective — a class of music not easy to find. No one will regret adding either of the above to their stock.
- Florentine Polka. Godfroid. 25
- Souvenir d'Affection. S. F. A. 25
- Six Cords of Wood Polka. C. Mayer, Jr. 25
- Laura Polka. C. Misner. 25
- Waverley Schottisch. C. Gustave Fitze. 25
- Starlight. " 25
- Sparrow Waltz. Louise A. Denton. 25
- Linnct. " 25
- Josephine Waltz. F. Langguth. 25
These pieces are easy, pleasing and of a popular class.
- Battle March of Priests in "Athalia," for eight hands on two pianos, arranged by A. Dorn. 60
One of a Series published for the convenience of Seminaries and Classes in Music.
- Home again—varied. Chas. Grobe. 50
- Dearest spot on earth to me is home—varied. " 50
Late arrangements of the ever successful and agreeable Grobe. The brilliancy and originality of the variations will make them as successful as his "Shells of Ocean," the popularity of which has never been excelled.

ECHO.

From the German of MATTHEISSON.

Forever thine! Though waste and mountain sever,
And stormy brine!
By zephyrs fanned, or deserts scorched, forever,
Forever thine!

Where marble halls, in gorgeous lustre gleaming,
By torch-light shine,
Where silvery moons in shepherd-vales are beaming,
Forever thine!

When, with inverted torch, kind Death releases
This heart of mine,
Then shall it sound till life's last throbbing ceases:
Forever thine! C. T. B.

Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

[The following maxims, or aphorisms, (which we translated from the German a few years since), embody the whole creed and practical philosophy of that true artist, and should engrave themselves upon the mind of every one who means to make himself an artist in the sphere of sound. The composer designed them as an appendix to the first edition of his piano-forte instruction book, called the Jugendalbum, or "Album for Youth."—J. S. D.]

I. The cultivation of Hearing is the most important matter. Take pains early to distinguish Tones and Keys by the ear. The bell, the window-pane, the cuckoo—ask yourself what tones they each give out.

II. You should sedulously practice Scales and other finger exercises. But there are many persons who imagine they have accomplished everything, when they have spent many hours each day for years in mere mechanical exercise. It is about as if one should busy himself daily with repeating the A-B-C as fast as possible and always faster and faster. Use your time better.

III. "Dumb piano-fortes," so called, or key-boards without sound, have been invented. Try them long enough to see that they are good for nothing. You cannot learn to speak from the dumb.

IV. Play in time! The playing of many virtuosos is like the gait of a drunkard. Make not such your models.

V. Learn betimes the fundamental laws of Harmony.

VI. Be not frightened by the words, Theory, Thorough-Bass, Counterpoint, &c.; they will meet you friendlily if you meet them so.

VII. Never dilly-dally about a piece of music, but attack it briskly, and never play it only half through!

VIII. Dragging and hurrying are equally great faults.

IX. When you are playing, never trouble yourself about who is listening.

X. Always play as if a master heard you.

XI. Strive to play easy pieces well and beautifully; it is better than to render harder pieces only indifferently well.

XII. Always insist on having your instrument purely tuned.

XIII. You must not only be able to play your little pieces with the fingers; you must hum them over without a piano. Sharpen your imagination so that you may fix in your mind not only the Melody of a composition, but also the Harmony belonging to it.

XIV. Accustom yourself, even though you have but little voice, to sing at sight without the aid of an instrument. The sharpness of your hearing will continually improve by that means. But if you are the possessor of a rich voice, lose not a moment's time, but cultivate it, and consider it the fairest gift which heaven has lent you.

XV. You must carry it so far that you can understand a piece of music upon paper.

XVI. If any one lays a composition before you for the first time, for you to play, first read it over.

XVII. Have you done your musical day's work, and do you feel exhausted? Then do not constrain yourself to further labor. Better rest, than work with no spirit, no freshness.

XVIII. Play nothing, as you grow older, which is merely fashionable. Time is precious. One must have a hundred human lives, if he would acquaint himself with all that is good.

XIX. In every period there have been bad compositions, and fools who have praised them.

XX. A player may cram his memory with finger-passages; they all in time grow commonplace and must be changed. Only where such facility serves higher ends, is it of any worth.

XXI. You must not circulate poor compositions; nor even listen to them, if you are not obliged to.

XXII. Try not to acquire facility in the so-called Bravura. Try in a composition to bring out the impression which the composer had in his mind; more than this attempt not; more than this is caricature.

XXIII. Consider it a monstrosity to alter, or to leave out anything, or to introduce any new-fangled ornaments in pieces by a good composer. That is the greatest outrage you can do to Art.

XXIV. In the selection of your pieces for study, ask advice of older players; that will save you much time.

XXV. You must gradually make acquaintance with all the more important works of all the important masters.

XXVI. Be not led astray by the brilliant popularity of the so-called great virtuosi. Think more of the applause of artists, than of that of the multitude.

XXVII. Every fashion grows unfashionable again; if you persist in it for years, you find yourself a ridiculous coxcomb in the eyes of everybody.

XXVIII. It is more injury than profit to you to play a great deal before company. Have a regard to other people; but never play anything which, in your inmost soul, you are ashamed of.

XXIX. Omit no opportunity, however, to play with others, in Duos, Trios, &c. It makes your playing fluent, spirited, and easy. Accompany a singer, when you can.

XXX. If all would play first violin, we could get no orchestra together. Respect each musician, therefore, in his place.

XXXI. Love your instrument, but do not have the vanity to think it the highest and only one. Consider that there are others quite as fine. Remember, too, that there are singers, that the highest manifestations in Music are through chorus and orchestra combined.

XXXII. As you progress, have more to do with scores, than with virtuosi.

XXXIII. Practise industriously the Fugues of good masters, above all those of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. Make the "Well-tempered Clavichord" your daily bread. Then you will surely be a thorough musician.

XXXIV. Seek among your associates, those who know more than you.

XXXV. For recreation from your musical studies, read the poets frequently. Walk also in the open air.

XXXVI. Much may be learned from singers, male and female; but do not believe in them for everything.

XXXVII. Behind the mountains there live people, too. Be modest; as yet you have discovered and thought nothing which others have not thought and discovered before you. And even if you have done so, regard it as a gift from above, which you have got to share with others.

XXXVIII. The study of the history of Music, supported by the actual hearing of the master compositions of the different epochs, is the shortest way to cure you of self-esteem and vanity.

XXXIX. A fine book on Music is THIBAUT Ueber Reinheit der Tonkunst, ("On Purity in Musical Art.") Read it often as you grow older.

XL. If you pass a church and hear the organ playing, go in and listen. If it happens that you have to occupy the organist's seat yourself, try your little fingers, and be amazed before this omnipotence of Music.

XLI. Improve every opportunity of practising upon the organ; there is no instrument which takes such speedy revenge upon the impure and the slovenly in composition, or in playing, as the organ.

XLII. Sing frequently in choruses, especially in the middle parts. This makes you musical.

XLIII. What is it to be musical? You are not so, if, with eyes fastened anxiously upon the notes, you play a piece through painfully to the end. You are not so, if, when some one turns over two pages at once, you stick and cannot go on. But you are musical, if, in a new piece, you anticipate pretty nearly what is coming, and in an old piece, know it by heart; in a word, if you have Music, not in your fingers only, but in your head and heart.

XLIV. But how does one become musical? Dear child, the main thing, a sharp ear and a quick power of comprehension, comes, as in all things, from above. But the talent may be improved and elevated. This you may do, not by shutting yourself up all day like a hermit, practising mechanical studies; but by live, many-sided musical intercourse; and especially by constant familiarity with orchestra and chorus.

XLV. Listen attentively to all Songs of the People; they are mines of most beautiful melodies, and open for you glimpses into the character of different nations.

XLVI. Exercise yourself early in reading music in the old clefs. Otherwise, many treasures of the past will be locked against you.

XLVII. Reflect early on the tone and character of different instruments; try to impress the peculiar coloring of each upon your ear.

XLVIII. Do not neglect to hear good Operas.

XLIX. Reverence the Old, but meet the New also with a warm heart. Cherish no prejudice against names unknown to you.

L. In judging of a composition, distinguish whether it belongs to the artistic category, or only aims at dilettantish entertainment. Stand up for those of the first sort; but do not worry yourself about the others.

LI. "Melody" is the watchword of the Dilettanti, and certainly there is no music without melody. But understand well what they mean by it; nothing passes for a melody with them, but one that is easily comprehended, or rhythmically pleasing. But there are other melodies of a different stamp; open a volume of Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven, and you see them in a thousand various styles. It is to be hoped that you will soon weary of the poverty and monotony of the modern Italian opera melodies.

(From the London Musical World, March 13).

Dr. Zopff's Characteristics of Mendelssohn.

Dr. Hermann Zopff (of Berlin) has made another contribution to DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC. This time our Boston contemporary is not favoured with "characteristics" of anybody except of Dr. Zopff himself. We have inserted the article in another column, where such of our readers as feel disposed to chop logic with so muddy an essayist may read the Zopffian defence of the Zopffian paradoxes. Dr. Zopff endeavors to substantiate his position not only in respect of Mendelssohn, but of Weber. As, however, we have not seen his "characteristics" of the last-named composer, nor the reply of one of Mr. Dwight's co-laborers, we have nothing to say to either; but what we have advanced on many occasions with regard to Mendelssohn we are inclined to maintain, notwithstanding Dr. Zopff and his fellow sophists in Berlin, Leipzig, Weimar, and Hanover.

Dr. Zopff seems to belong to a class now unhappily spread throughout the length and breadth of Germany (a symbol of the decline of Art in that once favored country)—the class of "aesthetic" reviewers. The profound reasoning of the Teutonic metaphysicians, while it has led shrewd men to think, has induced shallow men to aim at a show of reasoning. No subject, even the most simple, can now be discussed apart from a host of speculations altogether irrelevant. Let any candid inquirer, for example, read attentively the "Characteristics of Mendelssohn," published in DWIGHT'S JOURNAL, by Dr. Zopff, and try to reconcile the presumed shortcomings of that great musician with the reasons assigned for them. The candid inquirer will find insinuations that go to establish nothing, and personal anecdotes that might just as well have accounted for Shakespeare's dramas, Bacon's philosophy, or Mr. Albert Smith's Ascent of Mont Blanc, as for Mendelssohn's musical idiosyncrasy. Whether true or false, they are all equally worthless in the consideration of such a problem. His agreeable manners, attractive exterior, and remarkable accomplishments rendered Mendelssohn a favorite in society; and this is made the basis of some half dozen foolish conclusions, with respect to what his music might have been had he himself been otherwise. Just as well may we accept the not less intrinsically absurd, but infinitely more diverting arguments of Herr Wagner about Jews and Jewish music. Because Herr Wagner, when a musical idea comes to him (by some rare and happy chance), is at a loss what to do with it, those who are able to arrange their thoughts in order, and make them the germ of a symmetrical whole, are likened to Hebrews lending their money out to usury. But this definition of the "genial madman" has at least the merit of being humorous; while the arguments and deductions of Dr. Zopff and his tribe are just as commonplace as they are disingenuous.

It is arraigned as a weakness in Mendelssohn that, aware of his inferiority to the great masters, he leaned upon them for support and looked up to them as models, instead of asserting his own independence. The sophistry of this charge is glaring. Examined from any point of view it must fall to the ground. If Mendelssohn was inferior, and knew it, surely his acknowledgment of the fact and his consequent policy was rather a strength than a weakness. Hypocrisy and conceit, effrontery and shallow pretence, are vices, not virtues—otherwise the modern aesthetic criticism of musical Germany, instead of being contemptible, would deserve and command respect. But, in sober truth, Mendelssohn was conscious of no such inferiority. He wrote just as much from the heart as Beethoven himself, or any of the grandest musicians; and the proof lies in the striking individuality of all his compositions, from the pianoforte quartet in B minor to the fragments of his unfinished Christus. No musician was ever fuller of zeal or stronger of faith than Mendelssohn. No musician ever worked with greater enthusiasm, or took greater pains to perfect his conceptions. A more conscientious laborer in the field of Art, a more religious worshipper of its divinity, never lived. The attempt to paint Mendelssohn as a carpet-knight is so supremely ridiculous, that it can only be excused on the assumption of utter ignorance both of the man and the artist.

We have not at hand Dr. Zopff's Characteristics (transferred from the pages of Mr. Dwight to our own); and we do not think the trouble of looking out the numbers that contain them would be well bestowed. We have still some consciousness of the qualms experienced from their first perusal; and, as the burnt child dreads the fire, we have no intention of risking similar inconvenience. Some few of the mere facts, apart from "aesthetics," we retain. For instance—"because Beethoven wrote the Choral Symphony, Mendelssohn composed the Lobgesang." As well might it be said that, because Bach wrote The Passion, Handel composed The Messiah; or because Handel wrote The Messiah, Haydn composed The Creation; or because Mozart wrote Davidde Penitente, Beethoven composed the Mount of Olives. There is no more in common between the Choral Symphony and the Lobgesang than between the Jupiter and the C minor. Nothing can be more dissimilar in style and in execution than the two first-mentioned works. When Haydn had written his first symphony, did he contemplate that no one henceforth should compose a symphony after the model he had perfected?—and when Beethoven put the finishing touch to his stupendous "No. 9," did he for an instant imagine that from that time onward the chorus should never again be united with the orchestra in a grand symphonic composition? From this point of view, nevertheless, does Dr. Zopff regard the Lobgesang—one of the most wonderful of musical creations, and the more wonderful inasmuch as it does not contain one single phrase from end to end that bears the slightest resemblance to anything in the Ninth Symphony. In short, it is impossible to account for the mental aberration that could suggest to our critic the notion of comparing them. Again, if we remember rightly, it was laid to the charge of Mendelssohn that, in consequence of somebody's suggestion, he omitted clarionets from various compositions for the Church—as instruments of too soft and voluptuous a character for sacred music!

And of such-like rubbish consist the technical criticisms adduced to illustrate the general opinion which Dr. Zopff, with an aesthetic dullness truly national, attempts to establish in reference to Mendelssohn. The mere thought that the man who composed Elijah should be amenable to such a tribunal, is enough to create despair for music in the country of his birth. We are no friends to any restrictions on the expression of opinion; but we must say that if libels on the great dead were scrutinized with as jealous an eye by public opinion as libels on living despots by public governments, such men as Dr. Zopff would have a better chance of meeting their deserts. When, after all this splutter and froth, the writer, alluding to Mendelssohn's expression of grief and despondency in music, quotes a stupid criticism,* in which it is disadvantageously compared with that of Beethoven and Schumann, the cup of disgust is filled to overflow. Only the critic who could name Beethoven and

* On the violin concerto, which was stated to have been performed, with evident displeasure by Herr Joseph Joachim—a man so intellectually superior to Mendelssohn, and such a hater of the "conversazione style!"

Schumann (a vigorous giant and a pining school-boy) in a breath, would have been guilty of the nonsense that characterizes in almost every sentence the essays published in DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, under the title of "Characteristics of Mendelssohn." When, however, the same writer* (vide his last address to our confiding Yankee brother), appeals in support of his own opinions to the "collective verdict of our greatest critics—of a Marx, a Schumann, and a RELSTAB (!)"—we are less astonished at his madness. Who that has any knowledge of German musical literature, can be unaware of the narrow-mindedness of Herr Marx; of the jealousy which, in spite of a not unamiable nature, the impotent Schumann entertained for his puissant contemporary, whose mere presence at Leipzig tongue-tied the Jesuits; and of the utter incompetency of Herr Relstab to criticize an art with which his own criticisms prove him to be so superficially acquainted? Our sophist must have been in a sorry plight when he found himself impelled to invite the aid of such champions; and we are happy to leave him with the conviction that Mendelssohn will rank with Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, as one of the greatest of musicians, in spite of the shower of "Zopffs" at this time infesting "Vaterland," and playing (without being aware of it) the game of Dr. Liszt, Herr Richard Wagner, and the musical Sepoys.

P.S.—We may express our regret, in a postscriptum, that so intelligent and enthusiastic a music-lover as Mr. Dwight (who wrote the analysis of Elijah, quoted in the Musical World) should be against, instead of with, us in this discussion. If Mr. Dwight will explain the meaning of a single argument in the rhapsody of Dr. Zopff, we shall be happy to salute him. Meanwhile we cannot refrain from calling his attention to the premonitory inscription on the door of Trimalchio (Nero), recorded in the Satyricon of Petronius—"Cave Canem." This warning was common among the Romans; and we regard Americans and Englishmen as equally citizens of modern Rome—which means modern civilization. For the sake of music, Mr. Dwight, beware of modern German criticism, for the most part nothing better than a mixture of rhapsody, sophistication, paradox, and fables. "Cave Canem."

(From the Courier and Equivocal).

Having produced a work of the merit of "Leonora," which we believe was written about seventeen years ago, Mr. Fry had a moral right to expect other treatment than that which he has met with. He had not a right to expect his work to be praised because it was written by an American; but he had a right to a hearing in the metropolis of the United States, and to run his risk of condemnation. We do not advocate the performance, even on a stage less distinguished than that of the Academy of Music, of any and every composition that may be produced by youthful Yankees in their lyric phrensies; but an hour's examination of such a score as that of Mr. Fry's "Leonora," would have convinced any competent and unprejudiced musician that, although not a work of the first class, even in its school, it gave full warrant to the composer to appeal to the public for their judgment upon its merits.

It is needless to speak of the plot of the opera, for it is that of "Claude Melnotte," altered so as to suit the capacity of the lyric stage to express simple emotions only; and having its plot, it has all of that drama that is worth having. Of the music, we have not the space to speak in critical detail. It is written altogether in the school of the modern Italian composers; and although its composer is an American, is as much an Italian opera as La Sonnambula and Lucia are Italian, or Fidelio and Oberon are German operas—the latter, by the way, having been written to English words. The treatment throughout—of the voice both in the solo parts and in the choruses—of the orchestra, the free and fluent melodies, not often strongly marked in figure, and advancing always to a climax,—the neglect of contrapuntal effect, even in the concerted pieces,—and the direction of the composer's efforts solely to the dramatic expression of the sentiment of each scene, mark it as a work of that declamatory school which came into existence when Bellini wrote Tu Vedrai in Il Pirata.

The music is marked by an easy melodic flow throughout. The composer's thoughts are not only graceful in themselves, but he passes from one to the other with that freedom from constraint which only accompanies either great power or skill acquired by long experience. The last, however, Mr. Fry had not when this opera was written; for it must be borne in mind that this is his first dramatic work; and in this fact we find not only the reason but the justification of the resemblance which certain parts of it bear to well-known passages in Norma, La Sonnambula and I Puritani. These resemblances are not in melody—there is not a melodic plagiarism in the opera—they are resemblances of rhythm only; but they are so strong as to bring up at once and vividly the passages built upon these rhythms by the preceding composer.

(From the Evening Post.)

To illustrate a drama like this effectively is a task worthy of any composer, and it is no slight praise to say that Mr. Fry's music moved step by step with the story, taking its peculiar coloring as the scene was gay or grave, pathetic or passionate, and embodying with conscientious care the sentiment of each passage. Its chief characteristic is the abundance of graceful, flowing melodies, which, without being very striking, are free from insipidity, and never offend the ear by eccentricities or exaggerated strainings for effect. The almost prodigal liberality with which these are distributed over the work, attests the fertility of invention of a young and untried author, whose enthusiasm carries him triumphantly over difficulties which would be encountered more cautiously and perhaps less successfully by an older composer. This facility, however, entails the liability to imitate, perhaps unconsciously, the ideas or style of others; and it is not remarkable that "Leonora," written in the author's youth, and when he was fascinated by the beauties of Bellini or Donizetti, should possess many points of resemblance to these composers. It would be difficult to point to a first opera which has not been open to the first criticism; and Mr. Fry, in showing the influence which Bellini and Donizetti have exerted upon him, does precisely what they in their turn, and a long line of other illustrious composers, have illustrated in their earlier works. It cannot, however, but be regretted that, after so successful a commencement in the career of an opera composer, he should have stopped short and given no further evidence of his powers.

"Leonora" is Mr. Fry's first operatic effort for the public, and like all first works, it contains much that is admirable, and much that might be better. Its principal characteristic is melody. The fertility of Mr. Fry's invention is in this respect remarkable, and it is the more remarkable from the fact that he does not seek his inspiration in the shady and sentimental groves of the minor scale, like most young composers, but in the broad and healthful uplands of the major mode. The best melodies of the opera, orchestral and vocal, are in the long-breathed, deep-chested major. The exceptions to this general rule are, we should suppose, intentional, as in the drinking song "King Death," where sackcloth and ashes and a touch of brimstone are needed, and in the opening of the second act, where sentimentalism and an oboe are necessary, and elsewhere as occasion demanded. But the prevalent coloring of Mr. Fry's sentimentality is manly, it does not remind you of the greenhorn who trembles when he speaks to a lady, and sits down on his hat in a perspiring tremor. What the literature of the day (especially dramatic literature) lacks, this Opera supplies and illustrates—namely, abandon. It goes from one idea to another without looking back, and is as hearty, and elastic, and joyful, and satisfied at the beginning of the fourth act as at the commencement of the first. This of course shows an immensely fertile invention, which, as in the case of Rossini, subsequent productions may tame down considerably. Prodigiousity of idea is certainly an indication of genius, and with other indiscretions, belongs to youth. But what an infinite relief it is to be clothed in melody after being dry-rubbed with mere sound, as in the case of some modern composers, who like many literateurs think that nothing can be good unless it is finikin and exhausted and polished.

A frank acknowledgment of the superabundant merit of one of the first essentials of opera leads us naturally to the contemplation of a fault which is sometimes unpleasantly apparent in Mr. Fry's work. This is a certain suggestiveness in the opening bars of some of the melodies, which carries our memory to past pleasures afforded by other composers. Thus, in the second and third acts there are undoubted reminiscences of Bellini and of Donizetti, and an old Landler has not been quite forgotten in the finale to the first act. The resemblances are only momentary, and evidently not wilful; but it is one of the phenomena of music that if you but touch the memory of a tune it brings forth all that it has ever retained. There is nothing remarkable, therefore, that such resemblances provoked the ire of those shallow critics who look upon their vocation as a privileged growl, and who are never critical if not severe.

Another defect which belongs to youth, is the excessive use of brass in the orchestra, and—we might add—elsewhere. Mr. Fry "goes it" with his three trombones and his Bombardone, as if those instruments breathed the elixir of life. Not a note in the score has been changed since the time when it was first played in Philadelphia; and we who have heard in New York some of Mr. Fry's recent symphonies, have an opportunity of judging how much he has improved by subduing this excessive vitality. Apart from the brass instruments, the orchestration is remarkable for its fluency, for its fullness, and for its progress. Albrechtsberger somewhere says, that the indispensable requisites for a worthy theatrical composer, are a proved experience of dramatic effect in rhetorical declamation, a lively fancy in musical painting, practical knowledge of vocal and instrumental effect, and a judicious employment of all lawful aids. In each respect Mr. Fry is equal to the emergency suggested by the fine old theorist; his declamation is dramatic (our only objection being that it is sometimes too dramatic); his fancy luxuriant to a degree; his knowledge (theoretical, rather than practical, we judge), of vocal and instrumental effect, good; and his employment of lawful aids (and unlawful aids, sometimes) sufficient to satisfy the critical part of the audience and please the multitude. Still, as we have said, his instrumentation is loud, and brassy, and in some cases unconventional to the point of inconsistency, as in the romance and aria of Marianna in the third act, where the drum and the cymbals are employed in the accompaniment of the contralto voice. We are aware that the piece is a Moorish piece, and that the instruments are "characteristic." But truth never sounded more unpleasantly than in this case. We call particular attention to the melody of this romanza, and of the duet which follows. They are the only additions Mr. Fry has made to the opera, and show once more how astonishing is his supply of melody.

(From the Express.)

Our impressions of "Leonora" are of a mixed character. The opera seems to us a study in the school of Bellini. It is full of delicious, sweet music, but constantly recalls the Sonnambula and Norma. It is marked by skill in instrumentation, the secret of which the composer seems effectually to have probed. It has many flowing melodies, many pretty effects, much that should encourage its author to renewed efforts; but, like all early endeavors, it is full of reminiscences. It tantalizes the hearer by much that reminds him of other music. This is the case not only in the treatment of particular situations in the development of character and the expression of passion, but also in the very airs of the opera. Many of those are not imitations, but really adaptations. Still there is much that is original, or that at least indicates a promise of originality—much that one might imagine could be developed into character. The peculiarities which most strongly distinguish his production are sweetness of melody and lack of dramatic characterization. All the characters sing the same sort of music—a love passage or a burst of stormy passion is treated much in the same style. One feels the need of relief from the monotony of sweets.

We cannot now attempt to analyze the opera, but must content ourselves with saying that it progresses in merit from the opening scene to the close. The first act did not strike us at all favorably: the second was vastly better, especially in the instrumental portion, but constantly recalled Bellini, and in the finale resembles a piece from Guillaume Tell. The third act contains more originality, the music for Marianna especially being more individualized and more spirited than any in the opera. The finale of this act, however, could not but remind one again of the first act of Sonnambula, while the concluding song of the opera is also an imitation (unconscious it may be) of the "Ah, non giungo."

Were Mr. Fry now to write an opera, he would probably rely more on his own strength—he would know when he was composing, and when he was remembering. We hope some day to chronicle the production and success of his second work, which will probably be one brimful of melody, exquisitely sweet and tender—that shall evince complete mastery of all the resources of instrumentation (which have received a great development since "Leonora" was written); and, beside these, we trust, be marked by stronger individualization of the characters, by greater contrasts in the effects, and an entire reliance upon its author's own abilities.

(From the Musical Review.)

We understand that this opera was produced for the first time some twelve years ago. Perhaps it was written several years previous to that time, so that we may fairly conclude Mr. Fry was, at the time of composing it, very young. We should not be surprised if it was his first essay at composition on a large scale, for it bears all the characteristics of such a work. The inexperienced hand can be traced not only in the choruses and ensemble-pieces, but in the phrasing of most of the songs of the opera. Almost every thing is poorly shaped and put together, and what is still worse, worked closely after the most common pattern.

At the time when Mr. Fry composed this opera, Donizetti and Bellini were the most popular composers for the stage, and evidently he wrote under their influence. He ends his phrases just as they do, and unfortunately he also commences like them. There seems to be no attempt on his part to be independent from the hackneyed style of the Italians then in vogue, no attempt to mix the common ingredients of a very common dish in such a way that they may not seem too common—a most surprising fact.

We have learnt to esteem Mr. Fry in his literary pursuits for the very opposite qualities he displays in his music. In the former, he seems to have a way of his own, which, perhaps, is seldom novel, but which always excites our interest by the lively, spirited, and intellectual manner in which they are done. Shortly, Mr. Fry, as homme de lettres, presents to us a strong-minded individuality, while the music to his opera has not a fathom of individuality whatever. The cause of this anomaly is easily accounted for; it stares us in the face from almost every piece of the opera. Mr. Fry knows his own language thoroughly, but has no command over that of music. If Mr. Fry understands how to manage harmony, orchestration, and all the technical requisites for writing an opera, as well as the language he speaks and writes, he would have produced a far different work, a real opera with quartets, trios, duos, choruses, and ensembles, and not one with a quantity of ballads and a few attempts at four-part songs. He would have clothed his music with an orchestration which can be called such, and not a quantity of brass sounds which evidently were put on after the opera was finished. The whole orchestration of Leonora is somewhat like a picture in which trees and houses are daubed in red, and the people make a very green appearance. We can not help thinking if the intelligent author should read such a work in a literary book, he would be little satisfied with it himself; and if he recognized it as his own offspring, he would consider it as one of the weaknesses of his youth, and think best to put it in oblivion forever. Why it has not been done in this instance, we can not understand; for the musician Fry of our days must be so much superior to the one who wrote this opera, that he can but regret its reproduction.

We have until now avoided to speak of the merits of the work with regard to melody, because it is not a very pleasant task to tell a man whose literary ideas we respect and have often made our delight, that he bores us with the poverty of his musical ones. We expected, at least occasionally, that brilliancy and originality of ideas which characterize the writings of Mr. Fry, but in vain. Those of the melodies which are not a close imitation of Bellini's, are such as to produce on a cultivated mind an impression little favorable. He evidently aims in his opera, at popularity; but the means he employs are not worthy of his taste and talents.

The question is now: Whether there is any thing in Leonora which indicates a vocation on the part of its author for this kind of composition? We believe there is. He seems to have what we should call the feeling for dramatic effects, which, if sustained by science, is of the greatest avail to any composer of operas. Mr. Fry can be passionate and inspired; he seems to be one of those men—of whom our country is perhaps richer than any other—who attempt every thing grand and beautiful; but whether he has, on the musical field, the power to finish his attempts successfully, can only be decided when he favors us with another opera of more recent composition. Leonora make us fear he has not.

To these critical authorities we may add others hereafter. At present we give a delicious offset to them in the testimony of one who claims to be a "layman" only in the art of music. The genuine, fresh impressions of persons of soul and insight, are not without their value even in matters of Art where they have small experience. Our friend is certainly original and out-spoken. For a curious reason, he went to hear Fry's first opera; it was also his first opera,—the first he ever heard. He went with strong Carlylian prepossessions against marrying music with the drama, and he came away confirmed, of course. Fry may feel happy that his music touched at least one listener,—one who is no fool, we can tell him,—and that, in spite of scenery and action, by its pure influence as music.

Now, my dear Dwight, don't you envy me? I have been to the opera for the first time in my life.

It was quite a new sensation; I think I must have had a more vivid impression of things than it would have been possible for you to have. When I say, I was at the opera for the first time in my life on the 31st ult., I would not have you understand that I had never heard music; but I have sought oratorios and concerts in preference to operas, because I never could conceive that action and scenery could do aught else than spoil the music.

But I made an exception for Leonora, from the intense curiosity which I have had for twelve years to hear Wm. H. Fry's music. Twelve years ago I pronounced upon his daguerreotype, not knowing nor even suspecting whose it was, that it was the daguerreotype of a great musical composer. I wanted to hear his music, and judge for myself how correct my verdict on his daguerreotype was. So I went to the Academy, and listened with most attentive ears. I was delighted, I was deeply moved. Whether the music is a reminiscence of Bellini's or original with Fry, I will not attempt to decide; for I have never heard anything but brief extracts from Bellini, and have a poor musical memory; but the music of Leonora is certainly beautiful, and exquisitely adapted in its expression to the sentiment of the words. I repeatedly found the music giving me a much better conception of the scene than the mere words of the libretto could do; frequently anticipating the words, or giving the feelings of the spectators rather than of the actors.

On returning home, I sat down to the piano with the piano-forte edition of the opera, and was sorry to find that I had not heard the whole; that in bringing it out in New York they had omitted many passages, and among them the beautiful song of the wedding morning, and the sweet tenor melody, "Oh, blame her not."

But, my dear Dwight, will it shock your sense of propriety, and lower me forever in your esteem, if I tell you that I think the scenery, costumes, and acting, a most intensely childish piece of work? The only use in it, as far as I could see, was to amuse those who could not feel the music; and to prevent those that could feel the music from feeling it so deeply as to be painful. When my eyes were cast down upon the libretto, the music would thrill through me, and move me to tears; but I found instant relief when I raised my eyes to the stage, and saw men and women dressed out in such a profusion of paraquet colors and glittering spangles, strutting about, and assuming such fantastic attitudes. It seemed to me on a par with flashing gunpowder, and throwing peas against the window during the "hailstone chorus." I feel confident that I should enjoy a "rehearsal" of the opera, without costume or scenery, incomparably more than I could enjoy the "performance" of it; and I am the more confident of it from my enjoyment of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," when given by your Handel and Haydn Society as an oratorio.

The Oratorios.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 10TH.—The third of the four performances given by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, with the aid of CARL FORMES, &c., filled the Music Hall with a most eager audience, and gave the highest satisfaction. But for one or two selections, and too much encoring, it might be called in all respects a model concert. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, as follows:

- | | |
|--|------------|
| 1. Overture: "Leonora." (No. 3.) | Beethoven. |
| 2. Aria from the "Magic Flute," | Mozart. |
| Carl Formes. | |
| 3. Grand Aria: "Faust," | Spohr. |
| Miss Annie Milner. | |
| 3. The Wanderer, | Schubert. |
| Carl Formes. | |
| 5. My Sister Dear, | Auber. |
| Ernest Perring. | |
| 6. Fantasia on Airs from "Lucrezia Borgia," with | | | Orchestral accompaniment, | Cooper. |
| H. C. Cooper. | |
| 7. Aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," | Mozart. |
| Carl Formes. | |

We are sure of real soul's satisfaction and comfort, of being filled and lifted up and strengthened, whenever we can hear such music as the Leonora overture. Its human tenderness goes to the very heart, while its earnestness and vigor and consistency make one feel stronger. Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra played it with spirit and expression; but it needed a much larger body of strings for full effect of the heroic passages, especially the great violin crescendo near the end.

We know not when we have listened with so much delight to the grand organ of CARL FORMES, as in that deep song of peace, the great bass air: In diesen heil'gen Hallen, from the "Zauberflöte";—a song which shows the consummate genius of Mozart,—simple, massive, perfect in its melodic form, and set in frame-work of exquisite orchestration. How holy and serene its whole expression; how strengthening and tranquillizing to the soul passion-tossed! A true initiation into the temple where peace reigns! The musical sweetness, together with large volume, of the singer's higher tones, in the opening of the strain, and the majestic, ponderous movement of his low tones in that genuine sub-bass passage which leads down in the end to E below the staff, were alike satisfying—unequalled in sublimity and beauty. There was far more music, more melodic continuity, in these low tones of Formes, than in that "double D" business which so astonishes the multitude in his songs in the "Creation." Schubert's "Wanderer" of course required only a piano-forte accompaniment, which was played by Mr. PERRING. It was sung with great tenderness and great energy of feeling, and warmed up the audience to enthusiastic demonstrations. Formes, responding, seated himself at the piano and sang a simple German ballad of much beauty. His rendering of the famous Non piu andrai, from "Figaro," the prototype of more than one famous buffo air, revealed his rare powers as a dramatic comic singer, and aggravated the regret which all feel at not hearing Formes on the operatic stage. This also had to be repeated.

Miss MILNER has some of the most pleasing and sterling qualities of a good singer,—a voice (soprano), naturally clear and rich, though somewhat worn, an artistic style, and an unaffected manner; but she did not seem in her best voice that night; nor was her selection a very happy one. Like so much of Spohr's music, the air from "Faust," with all its sentimentality and all its difficult bravura, is unquickening. We would have preferred Mr. PERRING also in a less sweetish melody than "My sister dear," although it suits so sweet a tenor. It touched the multitude, however, whose applause was answered by an English song of his own about "the maids of merry England."

Mr. COOPER is so consummate an artist with his violin, that it is a pleasure to hear him play anything; in the merest show-piece, there would still be the finest beauty of tone, a purity of intonation not to be surpassed, a grace and symmetry of form and phrasing, a perfectness of style, with everywhere chance touches of expression, which ensure at least a refined pleasure. His "Borgia" variations were ingenious and well instrumented, and his execution of them all that could be asked. But in such a concert, for the one hearing of such an artist, a part at least of the Concerto by Mendelssohn, which he has played before so admirably, or of the Concerto by Beethoven, would have seemed more worthy.

We hasten to Part Second, the first performance in Boston of one of Mendelssohn's larger works, the Symphony-Cantata: Lobgesang, or "Hymn of Praise." It also is one of his very greatest works, alike as orchestral Symphony, or Oratorio; and it is of a much more enjoyable length than most Oratorios, occupying not much more than one hour in the performance. We doubt if any large work of sacred music, given by the Handel and Haydn Society, has made a finer impression as a whole upon the audience. From the first notes of the Symphony, where the leading theme (still ringing in our ears) is startlingly commenced by hoarse trombones, to its last return as a clincher to the "high argument" in the grand final chorus, there is not one weak spot in it. There is wonderful unity in its successively developed movements. The inspiration sustains itself throughout; the happy design goes on realizing itself with brighter and brighter glory to the end; the pregnant theme: All that have life and breath, &c., opens up beauties and splendors that never disappoint.

The Symphony was finely played. The Allegro movement, with its broad, rejoicing, flowing theme, was new to this audience, and quite fulfilled the promise of Mr. Macfarren's description (copied in our last two numbers). The lovely Allegretto, alternating its phrases afterwards with the rich, bracing Choral of the wind instruments, has been long a favorite in our concerts. And the Adagio Religioso was not wholly new to us; but its beauty of form and sentiment were only half divined, until we heard it this time as a lovely member of a vital whole. There is no pause between the three movements; and in the same way the Symphony leads, by emphatic iterations of a bold figure (first heard in an episode of the Adagio), into the majestic opening chorus: All men, all things, sing to the Lord; with which solemn prelude the fervent Allegro: Praise the Lord with lute and harp starts off with still kindling energy, only to find the burden of its song at last in that opening trombone theme. Beautiful is the soprano solo into which it leads, and beautifully did Mrs. HARWOOD's clear and fresh voice give it, while soprano and alto, in aerial chorus, rained soft light through the thrilled and tremulous air (with the accompaniment in iterated notes).

Mr. PERRING's tenor was hardly so effective as one could wish in the tenor recitative: Sing ye praise; but the air was sweetly sung. The chorus in G minor: All ye that cried in deep affliction, &c., with continuous figure of triplets in the accompaniment, is one of those exquisitely soft and soothing choruses peculiar to Mendelssohn, and was rendered with great delicacy. One of the most admirable numbers is the duet (for sopranos), with chorus: I waited for the Lord, which Mr. Macfarren has described so truly, and which was finely rendered on all hands. Miss ADAMS has a soprano voice of remarkable beauty, power and freshness; she is very young, but seems to have the gifts which under proper culture ought to make a capital singer. The voice of Mrs. Harwood blended finely with it; the themes are worked up, or rather grow, to admirable climax with the repeated entrance of the chorus; particularly fine is that part where the tenors and basses softly take up the original melody as an accompaniment to the soli.

For the very dramatic and intensely interesting passage: Watchman, will the night soon pass, a more robust tenor, in fact a great tenor, seemed required; yet the scene made its impression, and dazzlingly splendid was the transition into the major of the key (the triumphant key of D), into the uncontrollable rapture of the chorus: The night is departing, — the sublimest moment of the whole composition. What an influx of new life and heroic resolution in the strong and nervous little fugue there: let us gird on the armor of Light! And how vividly the imagination is excited at the conclusion, as those long loud calls, from one party of voices to another, echo away through the vast vaults of the night!

But perhaps the old German Choral, which follows, is not less sublime, sung in chaste, four-part harmony, without accompaniment, in the first verse; and in the second verse buoyed up upon a rich undulating sea of violin figural harmony. The duet: My song shall always be thy mercy, was finely sung by Mrs. Harwood and Mr. Perring, and the great chorus: Ye nations, ye monarchs, &c., calling on all to offer glory to the Lord, is wrought up to a sublime conclusion, with the re-affirming of the first text and key-note of the whole: All that has life and breath sing to the Lord. Hallelujah!

The success of the Lobgesang was so complete, and it is so practicable, not requiring any foreign talent for its execution, that we sincerely hope the Handel and Haydn Society will give us one or more repetitions of it.

SUNDAY EVENING. — "The Creation." Haydn's sweet, melodious, spring-like music made the usual impression — charming and refreshing sense and soul at first, but cloying by monotonous excess of sweet towards the end. As we have said before, we never could tell whether the last chorus was well sung or not; with the sense wearied by so much preceding sweetness, we always had a dull, confused impression of it. We are quite sure, however, that it is not a great chorus — not to be mentioned with the last in the "Messiah" — and a great falling off, both this and all the last choruses, from the sublime height reached in The Heavens are telling. The performance generally was a fine one, chorus and orchestra doing their best. FORMES sang this time the part of Adam, which he did not before; and this was much the truest, smoothest and most satisfactory half of his performance. In the descriptive airs and recitatives of Raphael he was more than usually false in intonation; nor was his descent to the great low D (which so excites the many) at all musical or continuous; it seemed a hard gymnastic effort; the huge boulder of tone did not roll down easily, but met with more resistance than was necessary to dignified composure of movement. And then the slide or portamento, particularly downward, is not an agreeable habit of the voice. Yet it would be folly to deny that the great qualities of Formes, his power and genius as a singer, stamped themselves upon the performance. In the rapturous thanks-giving part of one of those Trios he sang with an inspiring fervor. It is great-hearted singing.

Mrs. LONG surpassed herself in the air: With verdure clad, and more especially in On mighty pens, giving a somewhat original and, we thought, felicitous version of the dove cooings. Mrs. HARWOOD, as Eve, in the duets with Formes, sustained herself finely; and Mr. PERRING's tenor was melodious and musically modulated as usual.

THE LONDON MUSICAL WORLD is often quoted in our columns, and we owe it thanks. The London Musical World copies many of our articles and honorably gives us credit. The London Musical World is also fond of complimenting us. It is pleased with our appreciation of its idol, MENDELSSOHN, and copied our poor analysis of "Elijah." But the London Musical World cannot bear any sort of criticism upon its idol, or any limitation, or question, in the estimating of his genius. It hates the new men — Schumann, as well as Liszt and Wagner. The "Music of the Future" is a bugbear which almost threatens to drive it out of its sane senses. It has several times taken an angry pull at the long and respectable queue of Dr. ZOPFF's communications on the subject of Mendelssohn, to which we have given place. And now it pulls away again, and to more compliment adds friendly warning for our own especial benefit, raising the cry of "mad dog" against modern German musical criticism.

We give the article upon another page. We shall not enter into the general question of the musical supremacy of Mendelssohn, nor that of the "Music of the Future." All we have now to say is simply this.

1. We are not "against" you in this discussion.

Our editorial policy is perhaps different from yours; but we believe in the entertaining of questions which will and must arise until such time as they shall either get settled or prove themselves beyond solution. We like to give both sides a hearing. Do not so hastily assume that we endorse the views of every writer to whom we give the hospitality of our columns. The controversy lies between the Berlin critic and the London editor; we are not answerable for it, farther than to allow fair play.

2. We are not in the least danger of wandering away where the wholesome light and warmth of the great suns of the musical system shall not reach us. We cannot cast off the influence of Bach and Handel, Beethoven and Mozart, even with this fleshly tabernacle.

That we admire and love the music of Mendelssohn we need not assert. That very piece about "Elijah," past editorials without number, this day's paper, with our impressions of the Lobgesang, bear witness to our love. But Mendelssohn is not our especial idol. We, and many others, feel that somehow he is not quite as great, or not great in just the same sense as Handel, Beethoven or Mozart. The cause and meaning of this feeling, this very common and sincere experience, it is surely worth while to investigate. They who have had it longest, and stood nearest to the music and the man, are the Germans. The Germans, too, (of course with differences and exceptions), are the world's wisest critics in all things artistic and æsthetic. Doubtless some of them attempt too high a flight and fall to the ground. Dr. Zopff is an intelligent musician, writes fairly and in earnest, if not very clearly in respect of style. Whether he be right or wrong in his suggestions, we do not determine. But we believe there are enough grains of reason in them, and that they find enough sympathy in other minds, to make them worthy of a hearing. In the matter of Catholicity and fairness, we do think the Berlin critic has the advantage of our London Mentor.

3. Again, we think that one of the most important and useful functions of criticism is that of measuring acknowledged great men by the highest, even an absolute standard. The question of genius in the highest sense, of creative imagination, is one that is fairly raised even of many of the world's shining lights. This is a nobler function than that of criticizing little men, of showing up the false and the foolish. It may seem to partial admirers, like our English friend, to be equally a negative, fault-finding kind of criticism; but it is not; it is an attempt at honest, candid, severe appreciation by the highest standard. What if it result in the conviction that Spenser is inferior to Shakespeare, Haydn to Mozart, Mendelssohn to Beethoven? — is this disparaging to either of them?

4. We must protest against this English habit of classing Schumann in the same category of condemnation with Richard Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz. Schumann, in the first place, was a man of musical ideas, of musical inspirations, of some imaginative and creative faculty, whether the latter are or not. He has left Songs that are full of melody, fine original creations. His earlier piano pieces, with all their freakish and fantastical varieties of form and subject, abound in beauties and felicitous conceits. His Symphonies are no "puling school-boy's" work. They have ideas in them, and show a vigorous treatment. And this leads us to say, in the second place, that Schumann's Symphonies, &c., are built essentially upon the same classic form of the four movements with those of Beethoven; they are exceptional only in now and then an episode, and do by no means set the conventional structure at defiance, like the works of Wagner, who renounces all allegiance to existing models. There is one and the same principle of unity (we mean of form) in the Symphonies of Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann. By the Wagnerian "Music of the Future" standard, Schumann is conservative, a preserver and continuator, not a ruthless "Sepoy" and destroyer of the forms in which Art has instinctively and by its own innate law grown up. For our part, we must say that the same reasons, apart from the individuality of the men, lead us to admire the works of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Schumann.

5. Then, as to critical capacity and soundness, we may ask who has written better about music in our day than Robert Schumann. Read his Maxims, which we have placed on our first page; the man who gives us these out of his own life and practice, must be a sound thinker and teacher, and a true artist. Does he not tell the student to make the Preludes and Fugues of Bach his daily bread? Does that sound like a "Sepoy's" creed? What different advice would your own Mendelssohn have given? There is one of those maxims, which we beg leave respectfully to commend to the especial consideration of the London Musical World. It is this:

"Reverence the Old, but meet the New also with a warm heart. Cherish no prejudice against names unknown to you."

6. Finally, we do not think it worth while to be frightened by the cry of mad dog.

The Drama.

The course of solid, satisfying good old English comedy fare, which Mrs. BARROW has of late been supplying at the Howard Athenæum, was last Tuesday set aside, to make room for the spicier and more stimulating food of the modern drama. Each diet has its devotees, and in a well regulated theatrical table d'hôte each should be represented. The play produced last Tuesday evening, although announced as the work of a gentleman of this city, Mr. OLIVER S. LELAND, proves to be, like most of the attempts of our countrymen in the same field, a mere translation from a French drama of established fame. Mr. Leland, however, has acted more audaciously than any of his predecessors, having claimed more, while performing less. Few translators have, like him, publicly proclaimed their title to authorship, and few have reproduced so literally and exactly as he has done, the plays in imitation of which their pieces were constructed. The "Beatrice" of Mr. Leland is simply and solely the "Lady Tartuffe" of Madame de Girardin. Every one familiar with the works of this distinguished authoress knows this comedy—her masterpiece, perhaps. There is not a more elegantly written, nor hardly a more effective drama in the French language. Faithfully translated, it of course retains its effectiveness; and its own merits, together with the excellence of its performance at the Howard, secured it a complete success. The acting throughout was good, and that of Mrs. Barrow, in the part of Beatrice, especially to be commended. The piece was put upon the stage in superb style, for which, as well as for the enterprise displayed in bringing out what was supposed to be an American play, the management shall be thanked.

Mr. BARRY's magnificent preparation of the Indian drama, "Jessie Brown," has been unavailing. For the past two weeks the Boston Theatre has displayed the several attractions of a highly effective play, a most charming little actress to personate the leading part, and scenic illustrations of Eastern grandeur on a scale of splendor hitherto unseen in this country. But "Jessie Brown" has failed thus far to pay its way. Why, no man can tell, for certainly there never was a piece brought out in this city better calculated to catch the popular fancy.

The Museum has prospered well, with one of its amusing fairy spectacles—one of those in which nonsense and absurdity are so boldly promulgated, that they become delightful; especially when sustained by such shows and pageantry as the Museum affords.

Mr. THORNE's attempt to regenerate the National Theatre has resulted disastrously to him, and he will probably soon relinquish his charge.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Concert to be given at the Music Hall this evening, by the GERMANIA BAND, is one well worthy of attention. If successful, it may lead to a much needed reform in the whole system of our Band music. Bands of mere brass have long since come to be a weariness, a nuisance. Who has not longed for a return to the good old days of clarinets and bassoons and French horns, mingled with the harsher martial instruments, and lending finer outline, light and shade, and contrast of color, to the music? The Germania Band, composed of German and of native players, has now increased its numbers so that it can furnish a Reed band of 35 instruments, or an Orchestra of 40, as well as the usual brass band of 18. To-night they give the first public exhibition of their powers; and it behooves all who care that our street music should be music, and not noise,—all who desire a provision for good summer evening music on the Common, or Promenade Concerts in the Music Hall, to lend their countenance and their material aid to this experiment. Let the Music Hall be crowded.

We would remind all the world "and the rest of mankind," that next Wednesday will be the last of the Afternoon Orchestral Concerts—probably the last chance this year of hearing a good Symphony, or an Orchestra at all, except in theatres. Last Wednesday we had Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Overture to "Martha," Duet from "Tell," Schubert's Lob der Thränen, and a capital well played solo on the French Horn, by Mr. TROJST. . . . Boston has lost a most valuable and leading member of its musical world in the person of Mr. CHARLES FRANCIS CHICKERING, who has removed to New York,—the great piano-making business of Chickering & Sons requiring that a partner of the firm should represent it there. Mr. Chickering has opened large and elegant warerooms upon Broadway (corner of Fourth Street), which must soon become a pleasant resort of all musical people. In Mr. C. our Handel and Haydn Society lose the most efficient President, perhaps, they ever had. To him we are indebted for the noble Festival last May. It will be hard to fill his place. . . . That important depot of fine, cheap English editions of the best Sacred Music, Novello's Sacred Music Store, (now under the charge of Mr. Novello's enterprising successors, Messrs. WEBB & ALLEN), has been removed from its old stand in Broadway, to finer quarters at No. 6, Astor Place. There is no better place to find good editions of Oratorio, Organ, Mass, English Service, and all kinds of approved sacred music.

Our friend, RICHARD WILLIS, of the New York Musical World, has met with a severe affliction. We read in the Tribune, April 12:

The funeral of Mrs. Richard Storrs Willis, which took place at the Episcopal Church in Twenty-ninth street, was largely attended by a distinguished and sympathizing company. Among the mourners were the bereaved husband, the parents, N. P. Willis, Esq., Mr. and Mrs. Parton, and others. The services were elaborate. The choir sang; Mrs. Bodstein, too, gave some of Handel's strains in a most touching style; and the pastor of the church, beside the regular reading, delivered a discourse in which he properly portrayed the numerous excellencies of the deceased, and alluded to her church membership and Christian devotedness in a manner that flooded many eyes with tears. He also happily introduced the eminent contributions of Mr. R. S. Willis to the sacred services of his church. Mrs. Willis died in child-birth, and leaves three young children, and a wide circle of friends and acquaintances to mourn her loss.

We have received a marked copy of the Philadelphia Daily Argus, of which the heart of the matter is this:

HAWTHORNE SCHOTTISCHE.—We have sent to Mr. Dwight, this week, a copy of our Schottische, and would like to have his editorial opinion thereupon.—Musical Critic.

For the Schottische we return respectful acknowledgement, but no opinion;—the truth is, we don't dance.

RONCONI has at last made his debut at the Philadelphia Academy, on Monday, in Maria di Rohan, and with immense success. The Bulletin says:

Ronconi is small of stature, not handsome in face or figure, and his ordinary gait and motions are neither graceful nor dignified. His voice is rather harsh in quality, and not very powerful; he vocalizes with no great skill, and he often begins an air slightly below the pitch. "He is not worth hearing, then," many will say; but we answer that, with all these glaring imperfections, he is the most extraordinary and impressive performer that has ever appeared on the American lyric stage, and this appeared to be the unanimous sentiment last evening.

* * * * But the grandeur of his performance was all concentrated in the third act, beginning with the discovery of the supposed treachery of his wife. Then, the outburst of passion was wonderful to witness. Face and figure seemed to dilate, and the dignity of his presence to fill the stage. The voice, too, seemed inspired by the aroused genius, and every word was uttered with an intensity of heartfelt meaning that thrilled through every one. In the next scene, when with savage irony he taunts his wife, he was even greater. Every nerve seemed to thrill with intense vitality; every motion and every look was a study, and no one thought of Ronconi, his figure or his voice, but became absorbed in the passion of Chevreuse. The discovery of Chalais gave occasion for another wonderful display, and the catastrophe was grand beyond description.

The Mozart Society, in Worcester, Mass., gave a Concert on Fast evening, consisting of selections from the Oratorios. . . . Fast Day in Manchester, N. H., last week, was relieved by the Concert of Mr. G. W. STRATTON, assisted by Mrs. Bradley (soprano), Mr. C. R. Adams (tenor), Mr. Gärtner (violinist), and Mr. Baumbach (pianist), from this city. One half of the programme was miscellaneous; the other consisted of selections from Mr. Stratton's opera, "The Buccaneer." . . . The Traveler, speaking of the songs sung by Formes last Saturday evening, gives us this remarkable information:

The programme was arranged with particular reference to an exhibition, (so far as could be had) of his versatility in various styles of music, and in the various languages; the one being in French; another in German; and still another in the Latin; in all of which he seemed perfectly at home.

The learned critic would oblige us further, if he would inform us which of the songs was sung in French, and which in Latin! They were: "In diesen heil'gen Hallen"; "Der Wanderer"; and "Non piu andrai."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 14.—It is consoling to know that MUSARD's grand concerts, with their Express Galops, their "bœufs-et-mouton" Quadrilles, their "Bataille des Zouaves," their gongs, their liveried waiters and uniformed newsboys, &c., &c., have not entirely crushed to earth more modest entertainments. To be sure, Mr. ULLMAN does his best to leave no room in the public mind for aught else. His advertisements divide the daily papers with those of the New York Ledger; and, not satisfied with the circulation thus given to them, he resorts to still other means. Not long ago a thick letter was handed in, with: "Two cents to pay." As there was no stamp on the missive, the demand seemed suspicious. The envelope was found to contain the sum of all the advertisements relating to Musard and his concerts, which had ever appeared in our papers—neatly printed in pamphlet form. On looking for the messenger at the front door, there stood a small urchin, about eighteen inches high, with a bundle of similar notes in his hand. He was asked: "Why do you ask two cents for this?" Ans. (in a piping voice): "For profit!" "How's that?" "For taking 'em round!" No doubt he made considerable "profit" in the end, for many people would give the two cents without thinking, or looking to see that they gave them for what they can read every day in the newspapers. And that this was no mere speculation of the boy, but one of Ullman's modi operandi, was proved by the fact of his name being stamped on the envelope.

But, as I said before, there is still some room left for something better. MASON's, and EISELDE's concerts have again followed each other in rapid succession during the past week. The former, on Saturday morning, was one of the best of the series, if not as a whole, yet in some of its points. There were again, as at some of the previous ones, only three pieces on the programme; but two of these, Beethoven's Krentzer Sonata and Bach's Triple Concerto, were gems of the first water. The third, though the first in order, was the second Quartet of Schumann, Op. 42, which pleased me infinitely less than the No. 1, which we have heard at Mason's and Eisfeld's this winter. It is much more in Schumann's far-fetched, over-strained vein than the other. The Sonata was admirably played by Messrs. Mason and Thomas, and was glorious as ever. The rendering of the Concerto, as a whole, was so infinitely superior to that at Satter's concert, that the composition seemed like a totally different one. On that occasion I could not recognize it at all as the same piece I had heard at Mason's Matinée two years before: this time it made precisely the same impression on me as at the first hearing. This may have been partly owing to the different arrangement of the instruments—at Satter's concert they were scattered over the whole platform, and the string instruments placed beside the pianos, while at Mason's they were in front, which caused a much better blending of the tones,—and to the double-bass, omitted at Satter's, which marked the time more definitely; but above and beyond all, to the very excellent performance of the three pianists, Messrs. TIMM, SCHARFENBERG, and MASON, who interpreted so thoroughly the spirit of the great composer. They played as if they had one body and one soul, and the notes were so marvellously intertwined, that it was almost impossible to distinguish one piano from the others. It is a strange, quaint composition—bringing up before the mind gorgeous pageants of stately lords and ladies in powder, starch, and stiff brocade, with their straight-laced deportment, measured tread, and yet, withal, transcendent manly or delicate beauty, which no ungraceful forms of fashion can conceal.

[We must leave the remainder of this letter till next week.—Ed.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., MARCH 31.—The fourth and last concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on Saturday evening last. The audience was all that could be desired. The Programme was as follows:

PART I.

Symphony—in C, Op. 5, Niels W. Gade.
Scena—"Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," Weher.
Madame Johannsen.
Romanza for Cornet and Piston, T. Eisfeld.
Mr. Schreier.

PART II.

Overture—"Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," (Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage,) Mendelssohn.
Aria—"Ernani Involami!" Verdi.
Madame Johannsen.
Nocturne Melodique—"French Horn," W. Lawrence.
Mr. H. Schmitz.
Overture—Tannhäuser, R. Wagner.

The Symphony, it seems to me, will not bear a favorable comparison with those of Mendelssohn, to say nothing of those of the older Masters. I think, however, no one can hear this Symphony without being more than pleased. Its thoughts may not be of the Titanic kind, or as "huge as high Olympus," but it possesses merit enough to render it always a favorite with those who love the simple and beautiful.

The composer seems to waste his energies, or rather he is too lavish in the use of his material on the start. Take, for instance, the third movement, Andante Grazioso. The first theme of this movement is perfectly charming, but the remaining two-thirds fail to satisfy the expectations raised while listening to the first, so that it is somewhat difficult to tell at the close whether you are entirely pleased or not. The whole Symphony partakes of this character, but it is more apparent in this movement than in the others.

In the vocal part, the arrangements were much more satisfactory than at either of the previous concerts. JOHANNSEN sang the Scena from Der Freischütz exceedingly well. The audience were evidently not expecting so satisfactory a performance, and the applause was earnest and hearty. She cannot be called a great singer, but one who will always please, and with many she will be a great favorite.

Ernani, involami requires what Johannsen does not possess, but what LAGRANGE does possess to a greater degree of perfection than any other artist we have had with us, a facility of vocal execution capable of performing all sorts of impossibilities. The audience, however, were so well satisfied with the singing of it by Johannsen, as to ask for a repetition. If contrast is something to be desired in making up a programme, we had it in two vocal pieces. But measured by the rule of good taste, and the "eternal fitness of things," I think it would hardly "pass muster." This selection from Verdi's Ernani seemed to me much like a display of fire-works on a beautiful moonlight night, and, as a matter of course, the pyrotechnics must suffer most by the comparison.

The Romanza and Nocturne Melodique were both admirably done and gave much pleasure.

The Overture, "Calm at sea and prosperous voyage," was very much admired, and I am sure the composer himself would have been perfectly satisfied with the manner in which it was played, under the able and judicious management of Mr. EISEFELD. This gentleman still grows in public favor, and, at least with us, has no superior as a conductor.

The Overture to Tannhäuser is certainly the most wonderful, and also, to me, incomprehensible musical composition I have ever heard. I presume it was well played; at all events the Orchestra worked hard.

The "Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn," finds itself at the close of its first season out of debt, with music on hand for which they have paid $400. But it must be remembered, this has not been accomplished by having, as is the case in New York, the gratuitous services of all the solo performers, both vocal and instrumental; on the other hand, our Society has paid everybody, always a fair, and in some cases an exorbitant price for their services. While much of the success of this first season of our new Society is due to the good taste and enterprise of our citizens, much is also due to individual effort. Many of our more public-spirited citizens have aided both with their tissue and money to sustain and carry on this series of concerts. The President of the Society, LUTHER B. WYMAN, Esq., and the Secretary, Professor RAYMOND of the Polytechnic Institute, have both been unceasing and untiring in their efforts to carry them through successfully.

BELLINI.

LOUISVILLE, MARCH 20.—On the 17th inst. we had the second concert of the season, of our new Orchestral Association, "The Louisville Musical Fund Society."

The Programme could not fail to draw a choice audience to the hall of the Masonic Temple, which was well filled. In the performance of the following pieces, I found even an improvement in the orchestral parts as regards precision and accurateness.

PART I.

1. Wedding March, Mendelssohn.
2. Scena—"Come per me, Sereno," Bellini.
3. Overture—Fanchon, Himmel.
4. Quartet—Bella Figlia dell'amore, from Rigoletto, Verdi.
Misses Collier and Scheidler.
Messrs. Dolfinger and Mason.
5. Quintet—For Piano, Violin, Viola, 'Cello and Contra Bass, Beethoven.
Messrs. Zoller and Jaeger.

PART II.

1. Overture—Sophonisba, Paer.
2. Scena—"D'amor sull'ali Rose, from Il Trovatore, Verdi.
Miss Colliere and Mr. Dolfinger.
3. Elite Waltzes, Lanner.
4. Aria—from La Favorita, Donizetti.
Mons. Corradi Colliere.
5. Solo—"O Dolce Conento," Variations for the Bird Flageolet, Nicholson.
William Ratel.

6. Najaden Polka—By request—Full Orchestra, Guog'l.
The grand Wedding March, by Mendelssohn, lost something of its charm by the brass instruments and drums drowning the string instruments. I had to admire Miss SCHEIDLER's execution in Bellini's Come per me, and was struck with the accompaniment of the full orchestra on account of its softness and precision. I did not expect this from so young an orchestra, and great credit is due to the Director. The overture to Fanchon, by Himmel, pleased me less. The time was taken too slow. The beautiful quartet by Verdi went off very pleasingly. Mr. MASON's place was filled by Mr. COLLIERE.

It was one of the happiest sights to behold in Beethoven's quartet a whole family of artists performing: the father and three sons. There was nothing wanting in the execution, though the position taken by the performers was not the most suitable, and by it a good deal of the effect was lost. Mr. JAEGER was splendidly at his place; he handles his instrument with an ease and tenderness and power but rarely heard. I understand he is going to favor us in the next concert with a solo on the basso. I would, however, under all circumstances, advise the managers to procure for similar occasions a grand piano, as the square piano, good as it may be, is not sufficient to fill the large hall.

Kuffner's and Paer's overtures could not go better; unity, good tune and vigor in all the movements prevailed. Verdi's Scena from Il Trovatore was again repeated; Miss COLLIERE and Mr. DOLFINGER just suit this piece, it seems as if it were written for them. I love to hear Mr. Dolfinger's beautiful tenor, and he is a decided favorite of the music lovers here.

The Aria from La Favorita, Donizetti, was rendered by Mr. Colliere with perfection; in fact, he cannot sing otherwise; hence his appearance in our concerts is always highly welcome and appreciated.

The Solo on the bird flageolet by NICHOLSON was a beautiful intermezzo. The insignificant instrument created at first sight a general merriment amongst the audience, but the attention was soon riveted by the really masterly execution of our Mr. RATEL, the Vice President of the Society. He had to repeat it.

The Najaden Polka was a happy selection for the finale; the audience severally left the hall with happy and grateful feelings. ANONYMOUS.

PESCIA, ITALY, MARCH 18.—Of course you have never heard of Pescia before. How could you! I have not written to you of it ere this, and am not I the Great Original Discoverer, the very Christopher Columbus of Pescia?

The way of it was this. Having returned from Rome to Florence, I was waiting in the latter city for letters, and one day, an idea struck me—I would take a walk! I would walk to Lucca, I would invade the heart of Tuscany armed with a passport, an Italian dictionary, and a little book to read as I strolled along. I would walk, bear in mind. I would not go in the rail-car nor in the diligence. Nothing would induce me to ride. I would not ride even were I offered a free ticket wherever I wanted to go. I would not ride, even were the Railway Directors to come to me in a body; no, not if they were to get down before me on their two eyes; no, not if they were to implore me with tears in their knees! So, having made this Spartan resolution, I started from Florence one delicious morning in March, when the balmy zephyr and warbling birds, and azure sky, &c., &c.

Gradually the dome and campanile of the Cathedral disappeared, and then I began to come in sight of a town; so it was all the way. No sooner did I get clear of one town than I plunged into another, and so to my vexation had no opportunity of practising vocal music on the route without being overheard and creating an intrusive sensation. That evening I stopped at Pistoja, a little town where they are famous for making church organs. I know you are dying to hear my learned and acute critical remarks about the pictures in the Cathedral, but nevertheless I shall not gratify your laudable curiosity. Suffice that the next day at noon I left Pistoja.

It was all very nice—the very nicest thing in the world—this walking, but somehow or other I was horribly tired when about five miles from Pescia; when I was within two miles of the town I was still more fatigued, especially as no Pescia was anywhere to be seen. Indeed the position of the town is such, that you cannot see it till you are actually before its very gates.

It lies closely hidden in the gorge of a mountain pass, with a wild mountain stream running through its centre, said stream being about ten months of the year almost dry, and the other two presenting the appearance of an impetuous river. Its wide, gravelly bed is spanned by two bridges and divides the little town in two unequal parts, the smaller being chiefly noticeable for its Cathedral, and the larger for the noble, wide street, favorite promenade, market-place, and rendezvous of the people of Pescia. The other streets are moreover unexceptionably clean, and the houses neat, and a few really splendid.

But its natural features are the chief charm of Pescia. Standing upon one of the bridges and looking up the river at the rows of fine tall houses that line its bank, the spectator is at once reminded of Nice, that beautiful place of resort which everybody so well knows. The hillsides are covered with terraced groves of olives, through which at intervals are seen the towers of isolated churches and convents, which nestle here and there amid the soft, misty green foliage. Sometimes an Italian pine is discerned, rising majestically above the olives. In the distance, a mountain, whose top is covered with snow, seems to heighten, by the contrast of its icy coldness, the warm, luxurious life of the valley below.

There are, of course, any amount of people in Pescia. There are swarms of priests, in their long cloaks and black hats, taking solemn exercise upon the pretty road that runs along the river bank. If you are there at the proper time—say five o'clock in the afternoon—you may see the good bishop of Pescia, who belongs to one of the glorious company of fat, oily men of God, and is accompanied by an emaciated priest (he is a poor relation, I guess), and a stout servant carrying a cloak. The emaciated priest reminds me of an inquiry I have long wished to send to the Editor of "Notes and Queries." It is this: Why are poor relations always lean? Or no! not that, for that question answers itself, but rather this: Has anybody ever read, or seen, or heard of a fat poor relation?

As no creature out of Tuscany ever heard of Pescia before, and as I may fairly claim to be the first illustrious traveller who has visited it and extended its fame to the New World, I deem it no egotism to entitle myself, The Renowned Original Discoverer and Modern Christopher Columbus of Pescia. Perhaps in so doing I may slightly transcend the strict bounds of propriety, but in the words of Mrs. Micawber, that I am mainly right both my reason and my judgment alike forbid me to doubt.

As I write, I sit upon the terrace of the inn which overlooks the river and affords a fine view of the olive colored hills. My heart and head are full of Pescia, and yet at the same time the humming of some passer-by reminds me of the opera I heard the other night in Florence—the Traviata, or Violetta, as it is called in Italy. It was performed at the Pergola by a tolerable company, with one Carozzi Zucchi as prima donna, a fresh, noisy singer, who takes the part much better than the much over-rated Piccolomini, yet not near so well as our own Gazzaniga. The opera was superbly put upon the stage, the scenery being unsurpassed. Since my previous visit to Florence they had produced here Verdi's unfortunate Aroldo, of which I have previously had occasion to speak. The opera was performed just four times, which, according to the Florentine critics, was just four times oftener than it deserved. Indeed the fate of this opera is appalling. It has failed everywhere. At Parma it was played the oftenest, because it was written for the theatre there, and the good people felt a desire to deal gently with the poor thing. The Italian press unite in condemning it strongly, and the Impresarios who produced it at their various theatres have been obliged to fall back upon Traviata and Trovatore. The latter is now being played with great success in Leaning Tower Pisa, with Limberti (whose excellent performance I have alluded to in speaking of Pacini's opera, Elisa Velasco), one of the best tenors of Italy in the chief role. Talking about Trovatore, at once brings me back to first principles and Pescia. They are a musical people here, though not able to have an opera. To-day I took breakfast at the "Trovatore Eating House," and last night heard a serenade given to somebody in the next street. The selection was the Miserere scene of the favorite opera—a lugubrious choice, it must be confessed, but the effect of the solemn strains breaking upon the stillness of the night was very beautiful.

Ah! but Pescia, a lovely spot at all times, assumes an almost magic beauty towards sunset. It is a rare pleasure to sit, as I do now upon the balcony overlooking the river, and see the golden sunlight falling upon the olive groves, and gilding the half hidden fronts of the mountain convents. It has left the valley below, and is gradually fading away from the lower parts of the mountains. At the same time the bells from the numerous convents commence an harmonious chiming, which mingles with the occasional whistle of the distant locomotive. One can see the smoke of a huge factory not far off, while near by are the slight wires of the telegraph. It is Italy, with all its beauty and romance, wedded to New England, with all its practical arts and sciences.

I do not wait for the golden colors to fade away into the dim gray twilight, but leaving the balcony, go to the front of the house which looks out upon the noble wide street I have before mentioned. It is not long, but still forms a beautiful promenade, and at this time is crowded with the great majority of the inhabitants of Pescia, strolling either singly, in couples, or in groups, simply enjoying the delicious coolness of the hour, and the animated aspect of the scene. At one end stands a little church; they call it La Madonna della Piazza. The whole scene is lively and brilliant, and it only needs the music to remind one of the masquerade in Ernani.

I do not know whether you have in Boston a Geographical or Historical Society, but if you are so fortunate, I trust the learned body will invite me to deliver before them the elaborate paper that I am preparing, entitled: "Narrative of an Exploring Expedition into Pescia; with Statistics as to the Population thereof, their Modes of Dress, of Living and Eating. By Trovator, Esq." If you have not an Historical or Geographical Society, I can easily inform you what ingredients are necessary for its composition, and trust there is enough public spirit in Boston to act upon my hints and immediately form one. Here are the dramatis persone, carefully gathered from that of corresponding societies in New York:

Eleven large gentlemen with gold spectacles.
Five little dapper men with ditto, ditto.
Nineteen respectable old fogies with gray hair.
Five bald gentlemen.
Three young men with white cravats.
Six Orthodox Clergymen.
Seven sleepy men.
Two young misses, who giggle.
Six literary ladies, who wear corkscrew curls.
Six literary ladies, who do not wear corkscrew curls, and who will not speak to the other six literary ladies.
One or two eminent travellers who have explored Communipaw, or some such terra incognita, and are prepared with "papers" to read.
A lean gentleman to act as Secretary.
A fat gentleman to act as Chairman.
A dimly lighted room, and some writing materials for the Secretary, and a glass of water for the speaker.
Four newspaper reporters, who are much bored by the whole affair.
Some sandwiches and mustard in an adjacent room.

I need not assure you, that before such an intellectual body, it would give me great pleasure to read my Narrative of the Exploring Expedition into Pescia. Of course my services would be gratuitous, and I should only ask to be made an Honorary Member of the Society, and to have a lion's share of the sandwiches. The newspaper reporters should not either be allowed to go away sandwich-less, on the night when I read my valuable and instructive paper. I take this method, through the columns of your excellent journal, to make known my desires.

To-morrow I leave Pescia, perhaps forever, and in so doing will bid farewell to one of the loveliest spots God and man ever united to create. However I have one consolation. I can boldly face the Cara Padrona once more. When I left Florence, I told that estimable lady I was going to walk to Lucca. "Bless you!" she cried, "what do you walk for?" I really could not answer; it certainly was not to save time or money, for walking required more of either than going by railway would have done, and so I had to make a miserable shift by saying I wanted to "see the country." But now on returning I can proudly speak of Pescia. Had I not walked I should never have discovered Pescia, and consequently should never have been able to add to my name the proud title R.O.D. and M.C.C. of P—, Renowned Original Discoverer and Modern Christopher Columbus of Pescia.

Yours ever,

TROVATOR.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

VOCAL, WITH PIANO ACCOMPANIMENT.

- Daisy Bell, Song and Chorus. L. O. Emerson. 25 Pretty music, to words by Geo. M. Dowe, Esq.
- Jessie Brown, or the Highland Rescue. Words by Carpen-ter. Music by John Blockley. 30
This famous incident at the relief of Lucknow is here treated in a truly dramatic style by poet and composer.
- My native Land's my Home. Dr. J. Haynes. 25
A pleasing, sentimental strain.
- Our Carrie. Quartet and Harp. 25
Very easy; a true Children's Song, with a little chorus for three voices.
- Prayer for Rain. From Mendelssohn's "Elijah." 40
This very dramatic and exciting number of the Oratorio, consisting of Solos by Elijah (Bass), and a Boy (Mezzo Soprano), with responses by the Chorus, has acquired new interest lately by the singing of CARL FORMES.
- Winged Messenger (Liebesbotschaft). A. Fesca. 25
One of Fesca's most melodious airs. Only moderately difficult. For Mezzo Soprano or Baritone.
- On the Road to Brighton. A Sleighing Song, with Chorus. Morris. 30
- Will ye no come back again. Scotch Ballad. F. Dun. 30 Simple and quaint, in the true Scotch vein.
- The Sea Gull. Words by Mary Howitt. H. W. P. 25
A very poetic rendering of sea-shore impressions. Music in the same spirit.
- I think of thee. Ballad. J. P. Haggarty. 25
An affecting Song for the Parlor. Not difficult.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC FOR PIANO.

- Hungarian Air, by David. Transcribed by Liszt. 25
This is a gem for those who are fond of the strange mixture of extravagant mirth and wailing sentimentality which prevails in the national music of Hungary.
- Le Soupir (The Sigh). Schad. 25
A plaintive melody, principally for the left hand. Rather easy throughout.
- Valse élégante. A. Loeschorn. 25
A very nice little composition. The author has carefully avoided all hacknied phrases, and imparted to it a charm for musicians as well as amateurs.
- Rose of Castille Quadrilles. J. G. Callcott. 30
Spirited and brimful of melodic gems from Balfe's last, and many say best, Opera.
- An Bord du Lac. Idylle. W. Kuhe. 25
This charming composer has here laid out a simple melody of but sixteen bars, made highly effective by an ever-changing accompaniment upon the note of the dominant, quickly repeated in the higher octaves, with frequent crossing of hands. Highly suggestive of a quiet, blue lake in rural seclusion, with a faint stroke of a distant bell now and then.
- La Pensée (A Thought). J. Blumenthal. 25
A dreamy, meditative composition of a quiet flow. Rather difficult.
- Papo Schottisch. Peter Fitzgerald. 25
- Spirit Waltz. G. H. Mitchell, Jr. 10
- Love Spell Galop. Jos. Weber. 25
- Tantalizing Polka. R. Herzog. 25
- Seraphinen Landler (Redowa). C. Strauss. 25
- Clarissa Polka. J. Etling. 25
- Leviathan Waltz. C. A. Ingraham. 25
- Rippling Wave Waltz. J. W. Turner. 25
The above form a good collection of simple Dance Music, well arranged.
- Gems from La Traviata, arranged for two performers by R. Nordmanwea. 25
Three numbers of this Series have been issued, viz.: "Di Provenza il mar," "De miei bellenti," and "Ah forse lui." The name of the arranger is a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of these arrangements.
- Homage to Verdi. Fantasia on airs from his principal Operas, for four performers on two pianos, by Duroc. 1.25
This piece is excellently adapted to be performed at Exhibitions, in Seminaries, &c. It requires four players of not more than middling ability. The melodies, which are introduced, are of Verdi's best, and cannot but highly please the many friends, that this eminently successful composer has made everywhere.
- Darling Nelly Gray. Varied by Chas. Grobe. 50
This Song of universal popularity appears here for the first time in an arrangement for the piano. Surely, there could not have been found a better hand for such arrangement than that of Charles Grobe!

Robert Schumann.

(From WASIELEWSKY'S Biography.)

ROBERT SCHUMANN was a little above middle height, and slightly inclined to corpulency. In his healthful days there was in his bearing something elevated, noble, full of dignity and calmness; his gait on the contrary was usually slow, cautious, and a little indolent and shuffling.* Accordingly his eye was mostly sunk, half closed, and only lighted up in conversation with near friends, but then in the most agreeable and kindly manner. His countenance made a pleasant and good-hearted impression, without justifying the epithet of beautiful,—indeed one could scarcely speak of an intellectual physiognomy; the fine-cut mouth, commonly protruded a little and puckered up as if to whistle, was, next to the eye, the most attractive feature of his full, round, rather fresh colored countenance. Over his short nose rose a high, freely springing, arched brow, remarkably expanded in breadth about the temples. Above all, his head, covered with dark brown, full and rather long hair, had something downright, altogether strong, and one might say four-cornered about it.

His physiognomy had, with a certain shut-up cast of features, for the most part a uniformly mild, benevolent expression. The rich soul's life did not mirror itself there so vividly, as in sanguine natures. When Schumann wore the friendly mien, which was not, to be sure, too often, he could exert a fascinating influence on those about him.

While standing—long standing easily fatigued him—he held either both hands behind his back, or at any rate one hand, while with the other he musingly brushed his hair one side, or stroked his mouth or chin. If he sat or lay unoccupied, he often let the upraised fingers of both hands play with one another.

The manner of his intercourse with others was very simple. He spoke but little or not at all, even when questions were asked him, or at least only in broken utterances, which constantly betrayed his activity of thought when any subject interested him. There was nothing conscious or affected in this. His manner of speaking seemed very much like "talking to himself"; the more so, since he used his organ only feebly and without much tone. About the ordinary, every-day affairs and phenomena of life, he never cared to talk at all; and about weighty subjects, such as deeply interested him, he only expressed himself reluctantly and rarely. One had to wait the favorable moment with him, and then again one might stay hours with him, without really getting into conversation. But from his silence, to any person, one could not infer any antipathy or sympathy on his part. It was simply a characteristic trait with him, one that developed itself quite early.† Yet he often, by his persistent silence, offended persons who did not know him intimately, or who thought they knew him too well to need to notice this peculiarity.

In meeting strange and uncongenial persons, Schumann's social forms may frequently have been somewhat repulsive. Especially was he very easily offended by a certain uncalled for "confidential cordiality" and forwardness. He certainly cannot be entirely acquitted of humors and a certain peevishness, especially during the last years of his life, which were clouded by continual inward sufferings. But the kernel of his nature always was so excellent and noble, that the impeachable sides of his personality were scarcely to be taken into the account. He felt and showed himself in the best humor in the more private friendly circle, with a cigar‡ and a good glass of beer or wine, of which latter he preferred Champagne, being in the habit of remarking: "This strikes sparks out of the soul!"

In the family circle Schumann was seldom accessible; but if one enjoyed this preference he felt the most beneficent impression. He loved his children not less than his wife, although he possessed not the gift of occupying himself deeply and for hours together with them.

The outward life, which Schumann led during his last years, was very uniform and extremely regular. In the forenoon, until about 12 o'clock, he worked. Then he usually took a walk, accompanied by his wife and some near acquaintance.§ At 1 o'clock

† Kapellmeister DORN communicates the following experience: "When I saw Schumann again for the first time after a long absence in the year 1843, there was music at his house (on his wife's birthday). Among those present was Mendelssohn. We had scarcely time to exchange two words, for new parties kept offering congratulations. As I took leave, Schumann said to me in a mournful tone: 'Ah, we have not been able to have any conversation.' I consoled both him and me by alluding to the next meeting, and said, smiling: 'Then we will have a good spell of silence!' 'O,' replied he, blushing, and in a low tone, 'then you have not forgotten me?'" he dined, and then, after a short recreation, worked till 5 or 6. After that, he visited, commonly, some public place, or a private club, of which he was a member, to read the newspapers and drink a glass of beer or wine. At 8 o'clock he commonly went home to supper.

‡ Schumann smoked very fine and strong cigars, which he playfully called "little devils."

§ If, on the way, he met his children, he would stop awhile, pull out his lorgnette and look at them a moment, saying in a friendly tone: "Now, you little dears!" then he would resume his former mien, and proceed upon his way as if nothing had occurred.

Tea parties, so called, and evening parties Schumann visited but seldom and exceptionally. On the other hand, he occasionally received a certain circle of acquaintances and friends of Art in his house. At such times, when he found himself in a good mood, he could be a very agreeable host; indeed there were single instances during his Düsseldorf life, when he showed himself uncommonly cheerful and good-humored. Once, in fact, after they had had music and supper, he proposed a general dance, in which, to the joyful surprise of all present, he took a lively part himself.

In professional affairs Schumann was severe and conscientious, although he almost never gave way to expressions of violence or passion, and if he did, he soon spoke again in a conciliatory and conciliated tone. This happened, when he had once been peevish towards one he esteemed, which he immediately felt and tried to make all right again. When there was difference of opinion, he commonly kept silent; but this was always a sure sign of his unproclaimed opposition, on the ground of which he simply acted as he thought right. To all malignity and coarseness of feeling he was inexorably stern, and where it had once manifested itself to him, he was evermore irreconcilable.

Of Schumann's way of meeting his companions in Art (musicians and critics especially) I have already spoken in the course of this work; in this respect he was a model. There was no trace of jealousy or envy in him. He joyfully and warmly recognized what was great, significant, and talented, particularly when he felt himself addressed by kindred elements. In the latter case he showed too,—what must strike one in his thoroughly German tendency and way of thinking—an enthusiastic sympathy for foreign Art, although he was completely on his guard against the more recent dramatic music of France and Italy, and with regard to the latter never attained to a correct appreciation, based upon objective intuition. During his last years he sometimes expressed less interest for some great masters of the past, particularly for the art of Haydn and Mozart. Indeed he indulged occasionally in disparaging words about certain works of these composers, in which he naturally was misunderstood by most; for the principal, immediate cause of such expressions was his sickness, although it is not to be doubted that, with advancing years, his habit of spinning in his own ideal world, gaining more and more the upperhand in him, had a certain share in it.

In the departed, the Art-world of our time has lost one of its most highly and richly endowed creative minds,—one of its most consecrated priests. His life is alike valuable and instructive for the history of Art. Valuable through its restless striving for the highest, for the noblest, and the results which he attained,—instructive through the errors, with which he too, as more or less every earth-born being, had to pay his tribute to the Finite. But blessed is the man who has so striven and so erred, as he has done!

Orchestration.

WM. H. FRY, in the New York Tribune, writing of the Musard concerts, gives the following description of the instruments that compose the modern Orchestra.

The public cannot understand that great lyrical gift of heaven, the orchestra—that second sun of poetry and lustre—without study. They must go and go again if they would appreciate its colors. Let the student of it, after he has mastered the more obvious melodies, or that which relates to form and idea—look to the coloring—the orchestration—and see what beauty and variety there are for every one who has taste, and a religious—we use the word advisedly—feeling for Art. First take the flute. That has a special temper and quality. The sound is divided into two parts—the lower register is full and heartfelt, the upper volatile and brilliant. Then next in orchestral order, among the instruments, is the hautboy, a reed instrument. This recalls at a moment's notice all that Greek, Roman, Israelite or mediæval poet has sung of herds and shepherds. The primitive sadness of expression; the loneliness; the melancholy; the simplicity of an eclogue are all therein. Corydon and Phillis and their lovers, none too happy, are there told by a few notes. Now come the clarionets, breathing of gallantry and war; and of love, but of that of courts and camps. This noble instrument sweeps through a wide range; the lower tier of notes being supernatural; the middle having a vital connection with that great index of the soul, the human voice; and the upper a bird-like sway and perch as pure as brilliant. Now come the trumpets: symbol of battle and glory; but whose sonority, and variety of notes in the scale, is more made use of than formerly, when a few imperious notes told its whole story. The horn—the mellow horn—sylvan echo: the image of the chase, of manly sports, and health and joy following in their train. But the horn as now played gives the woes of that saddest of sad great stories, Edgar's blasted love. Witness the last act of Lucia; for the intensest wife-devotion, look at the use made of them in the soprano air of Fidelio. Following in orchestral order are the trombones. This is the most terrible and ghastly of instruments. Its quiet tones in the lower regions are in musical literature what the calm despair of Othello is after Desdemona is dead, and the end of the dreariest tale ever told approaches. In their loud prowess they are terrible, and are competently used by Mozart to paint the supernatural in Don Giovanni, where the statue speaks as hell yawns. There is yet a lower deep, in the ophicleide, or bass bugle, an instrument in the hands of its master now performing at the Academy, having a colossal sentiment not elsewhere found. To this may also be added the whole range of Sax-horns—the terrible depths of the bombardone—which come out so vastly in the massacre scenes of the Huguenots, where, especially in the duet of Raoul and Valentine, we have as grand painting as ever came from Shakespeare, Milton, or—never mind painters—people quarrel so about their rank. The percussion instruments, the battle-preaching side-drums, the exultant cut-throat or jubilee, (as the case may be) cymbals; the various tempered kettle-drums—these we may not dwell upon, but come to the violin family. The violin is the king of instruments. Full two hundred years ago it was perfected in that great home of the beautiful—that mother of the Arts—Italy; and by an appropriate parallelism, the highest executive and poetic finish in violin performance of it has come out of the same land; Paganini exhausting wonder and admiration, and re-forming the school not only of the violin, but of others—the piano, harp, and all other instruments following more or less in the wide field of renovated virtuosoism opened by that great musical son of the South. The beauty of the violin consists in the fact that it can more delicately approach the sounds of youth and love—of the divine utterances of the voice as it comes from God, unsoiled by the lust, crime, coarse ambition, or aught of those deflections from natural sanctity, whose images people the abode of the damned, and give rise to the ecstasies of the Apocalypse, the Inferno, and the Paradise Lost. Fully viewed, the violin is the most wonderful of all inventions, because it is most human—most soul-like. Under the hands of a great master it has the eloquence of poetry without the peridy of misdirected eloquence. It expresses passionately every shade of emotion; love, grief, joy, lightness, weariness, hope, religion even. But it cannot be understood by flippant unbelievers. Of the same color, only deeper and more sentimental, is the violoncello, which is intensely elegiac, and refuses in the depths of expression to be otherwise than prophetic of that tragedy which underlies our being, and tells that man is cut down as the flower, and passes away as the Autumn's leaf. The genius of Bottesini lent to that sub-cellar of harmony, the double-bass, a new life.

The composer is enabled to treat all these instruments by a certain mechanical means. He takes music-paper with many lines or staves upon it, and places the instruments in this order—each one either filling out a measure with some sounds or resting the while; two flutes, two oboes, two clarionets, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, four trombones and tubas; instruments of percussion, and stringed instruments, the latter (more or less numerously doubled in practice) being the first violin, second violin, tenor violin, violoncello, and double bass. So ranged one under the other, lines at right angles, scored down from top to bottom, divide off the measures, and the leader of the orchestra at a glance can observe what each and every instrument is doing, and detect the slightest deflection from exactitude of inflection or expression. Each performer in the orchestra has only the notes of his own part, with such cues as may enable him “to attack” the notes at the proper moment after rests.

(From the Courier and Enquirer, April 13).

Monsieur MUSARD was complimented by the assembling of a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening in spite of the rain. The house presented a very fine appearance, and Mr. ULLMAN had kept his promises, as he always has done, to the best of his ability. There were the “Monster Orchestra” in the “Octagonal Concert Room,” the “Sounding Board,” the “Twenty-Five Monster Candelabras;” there were the “Waiters in Livery,” each with a sheaf of gratuitous fans in his hand large enough to fill Ceres' cornucopia; and there were “the Evening Papers sold at the usual prices by Young Gentlemen in Uniform.” We beg our readers to notice the delicate distinction between waiters in livery, and young gentlemen in uniform. But to Mr. MUSARD and his music.

Mr. MUSARD is of all the conductors that we have had the most unexceptionable in manner and appearance. He wields the baton with graceful ease and power, and without the slightest taint of affectation. Indeed his manner is so simple and to the purpose that it is no manner at all: he stands before his audience simply a well bred gentleman discharging his office to the best of his ability, and without a thought of the impression he is to produce, except through his orchestra: and this is the perfection of manner in a conductor, or in any one. And Mr. MUSARD also conducts well. His forces are well under his control; his power appearing in the most striking manner in his acceleration and retardation of time by imperceptible degrees. His orchestra is a very fine one; well balanced; having fine solo players for the principal wind instruments, and a body of strings superior in volume and quality of tone to that of any orchestra that we have had. His cornet player, (who, by the way, we opine has not voyaged far of late,) is a very accomplished artist, with a pure tone completely under his control, and remarkable executive ability. In the Rondo Celestine, he played the melody and the variations almost entirely through with repeated notes by double tonguing. The repetition was very distinct and accurate; but we must own that the effect was not worth the effort. The beauty of the trumpet is its clear, penetrating tone; and it gains nothing by playing music which should be written for the violin. For instruments as for men, sum cuique.

Of Mr. MUSARD's music and of his orchestral effects we cannot speak highly; the former lacks melodic ideas; the latter originality and character. We heard nothing new last evening: and nothing old presented with the charm of a new rendering. Monsieur JULIEN was a vulgar humbug; but he was a great conductor—a man almost of genius in his way: Mr. MUSARD appears to be a well bred gentleman, an accomplished musician, and a good conductor—nothing more. The evening passed off pleasantly, Mr. THALBERG adding the charm of his ever equable talent; and Madame D'ANGRI being quite radiant in a rosy robe which gave her the look of an enormous bouquet.

Mr. Fry's Opera.

MR. DWIGHT:—The complaints of American composers, that they do not receive fair criticism from their countrymen, certainly appear to be in some measure justified when we read such thoughtless and indifferent comments as the following, on Mr. Fry's opera of “Leonora,” from the letter of one of your New York correspondents:

Monday and Wednesday night Fry's “Leonora” was given. By a glimpse which I caught of the Journal (my copy has not yet reached me), I see that you have had a notice of it; not having read it through, I do not know how far it enters into details. I will say, therefore, what I have heard, that the opera is full of pleasing melodies, but also full of reminiscences; and that it is almost as impossible to execute as the Stabat Mater of the same composer. As a specimen, I was told that in one of the choruses the Sopranos have to commence on the high C!

Now if anything is to be recorded about a work of this character, the first grand opera ever produced by an American, it should be something better than second-hand reports and manifestly unfair rumors. Your correspondent has not heard “Leonora,” evidently knows nothing of it. Why, then, reproduce the stale objections which have so long been circulated, and yet give no currency to the many expressions of approval which have greeted the work? Permit me, as one quite familiar with “Leonora,” to say that, although the “reminiscences” do exist, the “impossibilities of execution” are all fabulous. There is not a passage of extreme difficulty throughout the opera; and, as the Stabat Mater is spoken of, I may mention that the difficulties in the performance of that work were most of them created by the ill will of musicians and conductors. The absurd statement that one of the choruses of “Leonora” commences on the high C for the sopranos, is not worth contradicting.

Yours truly, E. H. H.

The Athenæum Exhibition.

I.

The title of “British Art Collection” as applied to the pictures now on exhibition at the Athenæum Gallery has a somewhat limited meaning. Instead of the impartial and complete representative exhibition of the best Art of the Old and New English Schools of Painting, which it was the rumored design of the directors of this enterprise to furnish us, we have a collection incomplete, numerically and artistically, and evincing a decided partiality for representative excellence in the New School.

This explanation of the surprise which many persons experience at the character of the exhibition, is based partly upon internal evidence furnished by the pictures themselves, and partly upon a merely verbal familiarity with the masters in English Art whose names do not appear in the catalogue.

It is to be regretted that the collection was not originally formed upon a more exclusive basis, and allowed to comprehend only the truly best works of the various schools of English Art. Many of the artists of this country, who have not been abroad and have a very limited acquaintance with other than native Art, entertain a theoretical preference for the unpretentious, solid and forcible painting of the French School, as opposed to the obtrusive, shuffling, and weak manner which is supposed to characterize the Old School of the English: and since the manner or method may be said to constitute the costume of the body of Art, it would have been a source of much gratification and perhaps more profit to them to see English Art in its best clothes. A second provocation to regret is furnished in the losses which the collection has suffered since its arrival in this country; losses for which the recent importations offer us inadequate compensation.

HOLMAN HUNT's "Light of the World," embodying more than any other picture in the collection, perhaps, the intense thought and severe power of the New School; the best works of HUGHES; the five pictures by TURNER, illustrating four distinct periods of his career; WM. HUNT's, of the Water Color Society; J. D. HARDING's, and many others of nearly equal importance have been picked off by purchase or sent back to England. Thus denuded of its chief attractions, it has come to us.

Let us not complain, but gratefully "keep what we've got, and catch what we can" of the good things that have escaped re-shipment and the liberal appropriations of New York and Philadelphia. Meantime, let us see what we have got worth the keeping, and from this learn the better what to catch hereafter.

Before entering upon the search, however, I wish to make a confession of a partial blindness concerning the nature, capabilities, and limitations of Art, from which I suffer in common with many other guessers, both great and small, who, riding upon its circumference, never catch more than a glimpse of the axis on which it turns, or the law of its revolution.

Every great Art-instinct is a law unto itself, and its fortunate possessor measures his life in simple self-obedience. Men of weak instincts are affiliated by the stronger, and become mediums of inspiration at second-hand. The great man and his media form what is called a School of Art. A little time of peace and united worship, and heresies creep in. Excommunicated by the law of individual integrity and the canons of the school, the heretics in turn become expounders of the new-born and only true faith. Thus Art moves, progressively or otherwise; its vitality dependent upon perfect individualism.

What Art is from individual stand-points we are allowed to see; the stand-point from which it can be truly scanned and measured has not yet been found. To the popular apprehension, Art is a kaleidoscope, of which artists are the bead-shakers, knowing not what forms will be assumed nor the law of their changes. A few years ago, MR. RUSKIN, the most ardent and strong-eyed explorer the world has ever seen, discovered that Art was only rightly to be seen from a nut-shell. He accordingly procured one of ample dimensions, fitted up its interior to suit his convenience, mounted therein a powerful periscopic lens, and commenced his explorations. The horizon of true Art very soon began to sensibly diminish, and whole schools of "shallow absurdities" were revealed under every movement of his glass. People caught the infection of his bold daring, and "true" and "false Art" became familiar words. Inspired by the new principle of faith by the remarkable energy and genius of Mr. Ruskin, some young men of England practically declared themselves in open revolution. With "Truth, and God's work as it really is" for a motto—nobler to the mind and heart of man than any for many years before uttered by the high priests of Art—it is not strange that Pre-Raphaelitism should have made some progress. The leaders of this revolution, now called great, would have risen to greatness in any faith. That they should not have achieved great deeds under the quickening influence of this fresh, virgin faith, would furnish the only occasion for surprise.

Meanwhile, Mr. Ruskin continues his observations. Day by day the boundaries of true Art diminish as her long-considered high priests are dragged from their altars, and with all their possessions cast out forevermore unto conventional inanity and falsehood. Driven to the extreme apparent limit of compression, nothing remains to be done but to determine Truth's meridional position and to compute its exact area. At every adjustment of his glass for the final observation, Mr. Ruskin discovers a slight wavering in those lines which should be limed with as firm and clear a stroke as marks the hill-tops against an evening sky. He reluctantly increases the angle of his observations to include these oscillations. With a single concession his control is lost. His "truth of Art," compressed beyond bearing, breaks out in open rebellion, and recaptures those very places it had recently so helplessly abandoned. Nothing daunted, Mr. Ruskin continues to sweep the horizon of Art with his fearful lens.

Seeking truth with a faith that will not be denied, he finds it floating in the way of his vision whichever way he turns; but until he can lay bare the heart and soul of man, and proclaim the absolute law of their being, truth of Art will evade his pursuit.

Yet Mr. Ruskin's labors have not been in vain. He has taught us of the fulness of a diviner beauty in nature than we had ever before known; he has opened to us familiar intercourse with an inspiring, vitalizing Art-genius in himself, which makes us nearly cease to regret that he has yet found no absolute. Of the fact that he has not yet written the indestructible law of Art, the world is fast becoming conscious, albeit, with a daily increasing sense of indebtedness to him, which nothing but a universal faith in the noble dignity of Art can ever cancel.

We have then no absolute principles of Art-criticism. Men bend the art of a picture to meet the demands of their own nature, and just in proportion to the concentrated power of their Art-instincts, their rules of criticism are limited and despotic.

Thus said, I hardly need caution the reader against giving a too ready credence to the criticisms, general and particular, which I propose offering upon the character of this exhibition. Every lover of Art had best heed his own intuitions and follow their lead to the end. If his faith be genuine and pure, his errors will not embitter his experience; and as in the spontaneity of his experience lies its verity and almost only relish, let him cultivate a self-trust which no arrogance shall poison nor false reverence betray.

Mesos.

My Diary. No. 3.

April 16.—The great satisfaction, amounting to enthusiasm, which I have heard expressed by many persons, with the Concert of last Saturday evening, recalls an idea already several times presented, but which it is to be hoped may bear being thrust forward once more. "Line upon line and precept upon precept," you know.

It is encouraging to find, here and there, one who does not look upon the "idea" as entirely visionary, and who would join in carrying it into operation; and with such encouragement, I once more broach the subject of an annual series of orchestral and vocal concerts combined, after the manner of the Boston Academy concerts of former years, though upon a grander scale, to correspond with the increased demands of our musical public.

1. Is it not high time that the lovers of orchestral music should combine to secure beyond peradventure their annual symphonic feasts? that at a point, where within easy reach of the concert room there is a population of some 300,000 persons, there should be an adequate and thoroughly organized orchestra, for the performance of the grandest symphonies? That this orchestra should be placed upon a permanent basis, and its conductor relieved from the anxieties and labors and risks of undertaking as a private speculation its series of concerts? That after some twenty-five years of symphonic music, we should cease to be satisfied with half rehearsed performances by half an orchestra? All honor to the men who have taken the burden upon their shoulders during the last few years, and infinite thanks for what they have given us; but is it not time to afford them the means of giving us more and better? Musicians, no more than lawyers, physicians, or merchants, can afford to give away their time; but make the time spent in rehearsal equivalent to the same time spent in lesson giving, and they would gladly study a symphony of Mozart, Haydn or Beethoven until all the finest effects and most delicate points of expression should come out. Beethoven wrote for sixty-four instruments; this number we ought to have and could easily obtain, would the public will it. Let it speak the creative word and call such an orchestra into existence.

2. There is a strong love for choral music in our community. Except in England, nowhere in the world do grand choral performances draw such audiences as in Boston. This may seem a strange statement to many, who remember the number of empty seats in the Music Hall at the oratorios this winter—but it is true. I have heard "Samson" in Germany, when the audience was less in number than the performers! But there are multitudes of people who gladly hear a choral performance of half an hour to an hour in length, but weary of an entire oratorio. For this class appropriate music should be given somewhere, as on Saturday evening the Lobgesang was given, to their great enjoyment. But while catering for their tastes, we should at the same time be doing a work of the highest importance to the progress of music and musical taste; for some of the sublimest and most beautiful ideas of the greatest composers are to be found in works, which would occupy but a small part of an evening's performance.

3. It is also high time that some means should be afforded, especially to musical students, to judge of various styles and eras of music by hearing specimens of them adequately performed. Ninety-nine out of every hundred are obliged to take upon trust, that Bach, his predecessors, contemporaries and immediate successors, really wrote interesting, pleasing, and beautiful music, as well as that, which for its learning appeals principally to the scientific musician for appreciation. In fact, much music two hundred years old is as fresh and comprehensible by the ordinary hearer as a melody by Rossini or Bellini. It would afford a promiscuous audience as much pleasure, after once becoming a little familiar. What delicious works the old Italian composers wrote for the female choirs of nunneries! And all this is a sealed book to us—it would be like giving an audience a new musical sense to produce some specimens of it. Had we any school, society, or association of any kind, to give us historical concerts, or concerts of ancient music, I would not urge the point; but the field is open, and three or four specimens of old vocal masters in the course of a season, would be a decided attraction to our symphony concerts.

4. But what music could a choral body obtain, were it disposed to aid in carrying out the "idea?" The psalms, hymns, motets and cantatas, sacred and secular—some even comic—of Bach, amount to hundreds in number. I am not familiar enough with his works to select from them, but there are musicians in Boston, who are. One or two of his motets in eight parts would not be bad to hear.

Of Handel we never hear his stupendous "Dettingen Te Deum," Funeral Anthem, "Alexander's Feast," nor "Acis and Galatea." True, no one but FORMES could sing Polyphemus in the last named work, but perhaps he might be obtained. Who knows?

Who among us has heard any of Mozart's splendid cantatas and motets? The Ne patris et civis superlæ? Splendete Te? Davidde penitent? "Lord, before thy throne?" "Lord, look down upon me?" "God! to Thee be praise and honor?" and so forth.

Then from Haydn we would gladly hear "The Seven Words," "Insane et vane cura," "The Storm," or one of his sacred cantatas, the very titles to which are unknown here, but which, with full orchestral score, were long since published at Leipzig.

Beethoven will give us his Vienna cantata with an adapted text, "Praise of Music," the piano-forte fantasia with orchestra and chorus, the music to the "Ruins of Athens," the "Calm at sea and prosperous voyage," the "Song of Sacrifice (soprano solo, chorus and orchestra), the Terzetto: "Tremate, empi tremate!" the "Christ on the Mount of Olives."

Mendelssohn embarrasses us with his richness. Of course the fragments "Christus" and "Lorelei" would want a place upon one or two programmes. Of his works not known here, I may mention as suited to our plan, Op. 39, three motets for treble voices, composed for a convent at Rouen; Op. 78, three Psalms for chorus of 8 parts; Op. 51, the 14th Psalm for chorus in 8 parts with orchestra; Cantata from Schiller's poem "To the Sons of Art," male voices, quartet and chorus, and brass instruments — and quantities more!

Schubert offers a fine variety from which to select, and some readers will remember a beautiful specimen of his works sung at a private concert recently. Another of his works which would be very attractive is the Psalm 23d for two soprani and two alti.

But, sufficient of this — perhaps too much.

5. The plan, as before explained, would be to organize a series of ten concerts, at each of which a symphony, and a psalm, cantata or other choral performance, would be the two leading features, the rest of the programme to be filled by miscellaneous music, orchestral and choral, solo, instrumental and vocal. A generous subscription on the part of the public would enable the directors to make them the grand concerts of the winter, and to employ whatever remarkable solo singers or instrumentists should visit America.

6. To whom can we look as the proper "powers that be" to put a plan of this nature and extent in execution? My own thoughts turn to that Society which established chamber concerts as an annual necessity with us: the Harvard Musical Association, in connection with our old and well-known Handel and Haydn Society, and perhaps the Music Hall Association. It is of equal importance to all these bodies, and to the individuals composing them, that a really effective orchestra should be established upon a firm basis, and the musical taste and knowledge of the public should be cultivated still higher than at present. Can these three bodies, whose existence was originally based upon the idea of improvement and progress, devise a better school?

I am not ignorant that the entire chorus of the Handel and Haydn could seldom be obtained for Saturday night concerts; but I feel very confident that voices to the number of 150 or 200 could be obtained, and that so many members would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity thus presented of studying new music and extending their acquaintance with the great masters in their compositions of less extent than complete oratorios. They would gladly renew their acquaintance with Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mozart's Requiem, which are not too long for the second part of a concert, provided a symphony like Beethoven's first or one of Haydn's were played in the first.

It does seem to me that the public would sustain an enterprise of this kind, for it is a case where individual emolument is not an object, — where the proceeds, if by a possibility there should be any above the expenses, would go for the advancement of the art, and one in which the initiative would be taken by men and associations in which it could confide.

Next year, April 30th, is the centennial anniversary of the death of HANDEL. It is to be hoped that the Society called by his name will pay due observance to the day. How fine a record in the Art history of Boston would be the successful issue of the plan herein proposed, the season closing with a festival equal or superior to that of which the recollection is so pleasing.

These observations, though crude and hastily written, are the result of long thought and much conversation with others, and of a belief that "the plot is a good plot."

April 16. — A contrast — last Sunday evening, Haydn's "Creation" in Boston, sung by a chorus of two or three hundred, with orchestra, Formes, Perring, and two of the best Boston Soprani; last evening, the same work, sung by a country choir of fifty-one or two members, with organ, and amateurs for the solos.

To be more particular. The choir of the Congregational church in Holliston, formerly under the charge of our friend Bullard, numbers some sixty members, and has been in the habit of practising and singing in public occasionally, music of a higher order and more difficult than their ordinary psalmody, and at length has been able to achieve an entire work by a great master. At present their conductor is Mr. W. L. Payson; — the organist, quite a young man for so severe a task, is Mr. Geo. E. Whiting. The gentlemen and ladies who sang the solos, with the exception of a tenor from Worcester, and a bass from another society, are all members of the choir, and, as I understand, not one of them a professional musician or singer.

These performers labored under certain disadvantages, which would have ruined their attempt had they not, through long practice, learned in some measure to accommodate themselves to them. First, the form of the church in which they sang is bad for music; it is quite large — long, broad, but too low. A broad gallery runs along the sides, and this, with the space allotted to the singers, is far too much elevated from the floor. It must be a hard place to sing in when empty, as at rehearsals; now imagine the place densely packed, even to the passageways, and it is obvious that all reverberation, all resonance will be at once killed; the tone-waves are instantly absorbed. Then the organ, which is quite a large one for the place — one of Holbrook's — reaches up close to the ceiling, and has a screen front lined with three or four thicknesses of mosquito netting; consequently the organ pipes speak somewhat as a choir of women would sing with their veils drawn over their faces. Several persons asked me how I liked the instrument. I could only say, that I did not know, for I had not heard it. I should not feel competent to judge of Formes if he sang with a thick veil over his face. Of course there was no flood of tone pervading the choir and carrying them along with it, keeping everything in harmonious blending of voices, and the choir had to look out for itself, letting the organ — in a measure — go its own way.

Well; I was surprised and gratified at the success of the performance. If it had been done positively in a bad manner, or in such a way as to prove that the work was entirely beyond their powers, I would have passed over it in silence; but it was so well done, as to be worthy of some kind notice of the points, wherein at a second performance, there may be an improvement made, and I notice them the more, in the hope of giving some valuable hints to other of our country choirs and singing societies.

The chorus singing was remarkably prompt, and energetic in taking up the difficult parts. In their zeal and good will, however, the tenor, — which was rather too strong for other parts as heard where I sat, — hurried the time a little, and forced the choruses into too rapid a movement at the close. There was also observable, in the general effect, a sort of thinness of voice, which may be owing either to the defective room or to the fact that the individual singers have not paid due attention to vocalization; for no number of their voices combined can result in producing a full, round volume of tone.

As to the soloists, no great Formes-d'Angri-like exhibitions of singing were expected; nor was one disposed to draw invidious comparisons. It was upon them that the disadvantages of the place of the performance told the most. The want of resonance in the room affected the 'pitch in a few cases quite unfavorably; but I can think of no means by which, at a second performance, the evil could be remedied, except, perhaps, by accompanying the Soprano airs with a quartet of stringed instruments, or by a good pianoforte; — possibly, taking away the veil from the organ's face might be a gain. In the style of performance there might be some improvement; particularly in recitative — the most difficult branch of the vocal art. At the best concerts, and from the finest singers, one hears more airs well sung, than recitatives well recited. The tendency always is to sing them. They are not to be sung — but to be recited — declaimed — the time, the accent, emphasis and mainly the cadence — all are left to the taste and feeling of the singer. The composer gives him only the pitch and general directions as to the use of his voice; all the niceties upon which the recitative depends for its beauty, the vocalist must supply. For the nonce, the singer must become an orator. He must study his text, and if any feeling is expressed in it, he must find it out, and devise means of expressing it. One may take a certain passage very slow and it will sound well; another the same passage fast, and it will sound well, provided in each case the vocalist has a feeling and sense of his text. No rules can be given. Of all our singers, now in Boston, I like Mr. Wetherbee best in recitative, and would suggest that Holliston send him a pupil or two. The general culture of the voice under a good instructor would soon remove the few faults which were noticeable in the performance of the airs.

So much of critical notice, which is written in the kindest spirit; for, if there be any one thing for which this writer has labored more than another, it is to urge on the time when in our country towns and villages, the magnificent music of Handel, Haydn, and Mozart shall drive away negro songs, sentimental ditties, and all sorts of mere trash, and the country choir shall begin to share in the pleasure with which the oratorio societies of our large cities work upon the "Messiah," "Elijah," "Creation," "Samson," Mozart's "Requiem" and their like. To the Holliston choir, individually and collectively, God speed!

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 20. — Since Monday, 12th instant, our present opera season has been convalescent. Our "right-angled village," (for which harmlessly facetious soubriquet, see the New York Herald of any date,) has been thrilled with a triple sensation in the production of "Maria di Rohan," the debut of RONCONI, and the first performance in this city of Wm. Tell." Your last number contained an admirably judicious critique upon Ronconi's Chevreuse in Maria di Rohan, clipped from the evening Bulletin, for the most part an excellent and reliable musical authority in this latitude.

In fact, Ronconi's transcendent histrionic achievements have taken the public and the press willing captives; and while the accomplished connoisseur ignores his invariably false intonation, and the many other defects of his voice, he bows in homage to the flashing of that diminutive gray eye, which, in every impassioned scene, seems lighted with the inward fires of a pent-up volcano, or the concentration into a focus of all the latent passions of the human heart.

Well, we did have "Wm. Tell" last night, after many broken vows on the part of our manager, who, as Jules Janin said of a Prima Donna who owed him a bonus for a flattering feuilleton, "is very promising." The great chef d'oeuvre of the immortal Rossini has been put upon the stage in a style of almost unapproachable splendor, and with a cast rarely equalled in this country. The latter was as follows: Gessler, AMODIO; Matilda, LA GRANGE; William Tell, RONCONI; Jemmy, (Tell's Son,) CARIOLI; Melchthal, the Pastor, MUELLER; Arnoldi, BOTTARDI, (Tenor,) Walter Furst, GASPARONI.

MAX MAREZKE (handsome Max, — so says the City Item) conducted the orchestra in a vigorous, but slightly flurried and noisy manner, as he invariably does. The spirited overture called forth a spontaneous encore of the most flattering description; when Max, in his obeisance, had turned his immaculate white cravat for the sixth time to the gaze of the immense audience, the elegant drop curtain arose upon an enchanting Alpine scene, in which Tell's cottage occupied the fore, and a charming lake at the foot of the Alps, the back-ground. A night view, in the second act, which, at first sombre with the shadows of darkness, is eventually illuminated with the rays of "Pale Cynthia," as she arises majestically amid the mountain peaks, throwing her mellow flood of light glimmeringly upon the waters, enhanced to a marked degree the grandeur of the scene wherein the inhabitants of the Cantons assembled to swear dire vengeance against their oppressors.

Another magnificent stage effect is the "Lake of the three Cantons and Mountain Gorge," in the final act. The troubled waters in the foreground, and the frowning mountains girding the shores, constitute an indescribably grand nocturnal picture, occasionally lighted up for an instant by vivid flashes of lightning, or rendered fearful by very formidable thunder, manufactured by harmless "supes" between the flats. Then approaches the boat with Gessler, (Amodio, whose Falstaffian proportions seem to imperil navigation still more, and threaten to "swamp" the fragile bark at each turn of the oar) and Tell, who leaps upon a rock, and with an unerring kick sends the boat and his arch-enemy to perdition, with an arrow, by way of a pointed souvenir, probing the vitals of the latter. All this constitutes a superb tableau!

The music was not rendered with that precision and correctness which would have ensured a "bravo" from Rossini; the prompter usually fills the most important role upon the representation of a newly studied opera. Nevertheless, some of the massive architectural choruses, in which "Tell" abounds, were very acceptably rendered; one more rehearsal will enable the vocalists to do ample justice to them upon the second representation.

Ronconi vocalized his portion of the score with the same unsteadiness of intonation, which has characterized him on each night of Maria di Rohan. He rarely pitches the opening note of an aria or recitative perfectly, and slurs over many passages in very bad style.

Nothing, however, can equal his intense paroxysms of paternal emotion, when, overjoyed at the steady aim, which has safely and successfully pierced the apple, he falls half-swooning into the arms of his compatriots. In this scene, the great Ronconi draws the most callous stoic irresistibly into the plot, and forces him to share with him his paternal emotions. It is a masterly histrionic achievement, which causes one to forget, while the magic spell lasts, the imperfections of the singer in the perfection of the actor. The Tell of Ronconi was a magnificent delineation throughout.

Bottardi, the Tenor, combines with a well cultivated taste and finished school of vocalization, a voice, which, howbeit pure and sympathetic in its middle register, becomes, in its higher notes, a sharp surgical instrument which inflicts an incision upon the tympanum of the opera habitué.

Mme. La Grange rendered her unimportant part in a somewhat indifferent manner; but then she distinguished herself so nobly in the great part of Maria di Rohan last week, that one may readily overlook an occasional shortcoming. Carioli's voice and figure made up admirably for a delineation of Tell's son. Amodio looked like an overfed alderman, but sang and acted his limited role very judiciously. The house was crowded, and "William Tell" will probably enjoy a successful run.

NEW YORK, APRIL 14. — At EISELDE's concert, last evening, we had the long-wished-for posthumous Quatuor of Schubert. This composition is so extremely difficult, that it is seldom ventured upon; but how well does it repay any unusual exertion! It would have been quite satisfactorily rendered last night, had the first violin been a little less harsh. It is Schubert-like in style throughout — full of strange harmonies, startling modulations, wild, weird, yet exquisite melodies — but the crown of the whole is the Andante, with its simple, almost monotonous melody, which modulates in only a very few notes, yet contains in them a world of expressive beauty, of touching tenderness, and its variations, so different from each other, and each a gem in itself. The second quartet was Beethoven's No. 6 of Op. 18; a most lovely one, which, however, does not quite equal, in my opinion, its immediate predecessor, No. 5. Still, this was beautiful enough to make me feel, as I do whenever I listen to anything of Beethoven's: "this is the music, after all!" The trio was again in the hands of Mr. Satter; but was not as happy a selection as at the last Soirée, being his own composition, descriptive of Byron's Sardanapalus. Still, it was interesting to listen to it, as it is to any such work by a young talented composer, and there seemed to be many very fine parts in it, though others did not please me at all. The romance is indeed, beautiful, and original both in the melody and in the working up and harmonization; and in the last part of the finale, the theme of the first movement is finely enriched and wrought out. The whole thing affords a fine opportunity for the display of Mr. Satter's various powers as a performer. Such volumes of sound issue from beneath the fingers of no other. I could not find, I must confess, much connection between the composition and the poem on which it pretends to be based, nor am I much the wiser after reading Mr. Satter's letter of last year, in which he explains the origin of his work.

Miss HATTIE ANDEM, in Dove sono, from Mozart's "Figaro," surpasses herself. I have never heard her sing, nor her voice sound, better. In Kücken's "Jewish Maiden," she was not so satisfactory.

Our musical season, though lengthened out more than usual, is fast drawing to a close. The last Philharmonic on the 24th inst., and Eiselde's sixth on the 4th of May, will probably end the list. Mason's last is announced for next Saturday, and it is said that Vieuxtemps will take part in it. In due time, I shall endeavor to give you a little summing up of the musical advantages we have enjoyed this winter.

WORCESTER, MASS., APRIL 17. — The "Mozart Society" gave a concert at our beautiful Mechanics' Hall, on the evening of Fast Day, with the following programme:

PART I.

1. Chorus.—From the Messiah: "And the glory of the Lord."
2. Air.— " " (Mrs. Allen) "Come unto Him."
3. Chorus.— " " "All we like sheep."
4. Air.— " " (Mrs. Field) "I know that my [Redeemer liveth."

5. Hymn-tune.—"Night." E. Hamilton.
6. Quartet.—"Oh, how lovely is Zion!"
7. Chorus.—From the Messiah: "Their sound is gone out."

PART II.

1. Chorus.—From the Creation: "Awake the harp!"
2. Air.— " " (Mrs. Allen) "With verdure clad."
3. Holy! Holy! Holy! " " (Mrs. Field) "The [marvellous work."
4. Air and Chorus.—From the Creation. (Mrs. Field) "The [marvellous work."
5. Hymn-tune.—"As down in the sunless retreats." J. Lange.
6. Duet and Chorus.—From the Creation. (Mrs. Field and Mr. Hamilton).
7. Chorus.—"Hosanna." J. Lange.

The audience was too small to express the gratitude due from the citizens of Worcester to a Society whose weekly rehearsals, through a long famine of concerts, had prepared a series of choruses from the best oratorios of Handel and Haydn. The second chorus from the "Messiah" was received with a marked applause, which the more spiritual theme of the first one had failed to elicit. This may have been owing to the power that imitation in music always has of affecting many who are insensible to higher Art. Yet the imitation, in this instance, and the consequent emotion of the audience, can by no means be called low. When Handel has attempted, in "Israel in Egypt," to express the hopping of frogs by passages broken in time; and, in "Joshua," "by the harmony of one long-extended chord, to impress upon the imagination of his hearers the idea of the great luminary of the universe arrested in his course; or, in other words, to make them hear the sun stand still," it has been questioned whether there is not a descent from his native sphere of genius. But in this chorus: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way," although the composition is equally imitative, there is a great, pervading truth. The singers are themselves the men and women for whom the prophet spoke. Through them, the art of the composer becomes, in the simplest sense, a revelation of nature. And thoughtful listeners can hardly smile at the repeated "astray—astray," remembering that they, too, are numbered with the "All we."

The Evening Hymn: "The day is past and gone," with its dream-like repetition, showed, perhaps more clearly than anything else, the perfect unity of the great choir and the thorough discipline that has produced it. A sacred lyric by Thomas Moore: "As down in the sunless retreats of the ocean," followed, with a deeper thrill. If the hall had seemed a temple before, it was then filled with smaller sanctuaries, in each of which a soul might respond to the harmony with its own secret prayer.

Mrs. FIELD, well known previously to the friends of music in this city, sang with even more than her usual power. A defective articulation is one of those faults in her style which practice has not yet removed. Her rich and full voice is well adapted to spirited compositions. She was twice encored; first in the chorus: "The marvellous work," &c., and afterwards in the Duet: "By Thee with bliss," &c., with Mr. HAMILTON, the conductor of the Society. It is difficult, in connection with a single concert, to give anything like a just acknowledgment of Mr. Hamilton's efficiency.

There are singers from whom the loudest applause of the concert-room is instinctively withheld, as if it were too rude an offering. The sweetness and purity of Mrs. ALLEN's voice ensure the more delicate tribute of a grateful and tender remembrance, that will always welcome her reëpppearance with a smile. In any city, we may find church-windows of stained glass, through which the sunlight falls in gaudy patches. When a lost art shall be restored, the churches will have a more "religious light," transmitted, but not colored, by the many-tinted panes. Truth, in musical execution, seems to be such a faithful rendering of the composer's thought as will preclude any coloring from the performer. Those who have heard Mrs. Allen will appreciate her best, when they reflect that she has the power, while she is singing, of making them forget her, and realize only the music in which she forgets herself. LINDA.

ALABAMA, MARCH, 1858.—From the land of negroes and magnolias, quite out of the world of Music, here, on the banks of the Alabama, I will give you a line from my present location, amid springs, rivers, caves, "tumble-down" buildings, fine gardens, deserted dwellings, and things generally antique. But I must forbear to speak of the beautiful landscape, since I would present a picture of the state of Music, from general observation and experience, in this section.

The hill of a late Soirée Musicale was good, but all thought seemed centred on the expected comio Finale—sung and acted, to suit popular taste, according to previous custom. It was partially arranged for the occasion, and the music was pronounced charming! Let me add a few sentences that fell on my ear as the crowd passed from the hall. "Was not that a beautiful piece, and so well acted by all?" "We ought to have more of such music—it takes." "I wish the Glee Class would sing 'Jordan am a hard road'!" (Have never heard the melody, and must plead ignorance of its merits.) Then a teacher of Psalmody ventures to express his opinion, that I am "on the right track, now," and that I've been giving them "too much of this high-fallutin music!" The same gentleman declined singing the bass solo in the chorus "Oh, Hail us, ye free!" from Ernani, on the ground of its being devoid of melody; also, from being unable to ascertain the key into which it modulated, or to locate "Do," for a starting point! I am here reminded of an anecdote, which I remember to have read somewhere, of the late De Begnis, who was astonished and enraged at the presumption of one who had written a volume of music without ever having heard an Opera! At a Concert, in October last, where a solo from Il Barbiere appeared on the programme, from my position in a side-room, during the intervals of performance, I heard a lady inquire if "Una voce poco fa," was Dutch! After this, I persuaded the violinist to omit a fine solo, in which I was to accompany him on the piano, and give some familiar air in its place. I find here several fine pianists, who, with others, can appreciate good music, vocal or instrumental; but they join with the crowd in desiring "something that will take"—an expression I hear often, of late.

If concerts in seminaries are to be given as popular entertainments, in place of exhibitions of the skill and improvement of the pupils, I would respectfully suggest the composing and arranging of pieces for such occasions, accompanied with stage directions, costumes, &c. Will you not select a theme for such, worthy the farcical nature of the subject and suggestion?

BOSTON, APRIL 24, 1858.

Music in Boston—Review of the Season.

Our Concerts are over. This week has given us the last sound of orchestral Symphony, and the last Chamber Concert; the Oratorios had already made a glorious finale in that festival of four nights, with FORMES, and we now can only look back on the musical season of 1857-8. It is quite common to hear it called a very unmusical season for Boston; the commercial "panic" with which it entered prepossessed most minds with the idea that Concerts were impossible, that neither Opera nor Orchestra would "pay," that good music was to be calmly and heroically renounced as a luxury which the times could not afford. Opera, to be sure, we have not had at all,—no other year could that be said since Boston was first bitten by the sweet, delirious poison of Italian Opera. But this privation has not been without its compensations. To say we have not had any Opera, amounts practically in these times simply to saying that we have not had another round of repetitions of Verdi's Trovatore, Traviata, and the like. A good Opera, with a repertoire of the best, were a privilege indeed; but surely we can well afford to let the Trovatore stimulants lie by until our jaded senses shall have recovered some fresh tone. Such Opera as we might conceive of, as we sometimes read of, would be glorious; but such Opera as we are likely to get (judging from past experience) requires not much philosophy to do without. Yet we must envy our New York and Philadelphia friends their "Huguenots," and "Don Giovanni," and "William Tell," and "L'Italiana in Algieri," with such singers as Formes and Roneoni and Lagrange and D'Angri.

But our consolation is, that the absence of Opera, and of all the exciting, showy, fashionable sort of musical entertainments has left the field free for music of a more quiet, sterling and soul-satisfying character. After all, the best measure of the value of a musical season is, not the number of brilliant and exciting occasions, not the great crowds and furors, not the thousands of dollars spent and made,—but it is rather the amount or quality of good sterling music that has been heard. What a true music-lover covets most is opportunities of hearing and appreciating the best compositions of the men of genius. A season in which Beethoven, Bach, Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Rossini, Weber, Chopin, Schumann, &c., have been largely represented, is a season to be contemplated with some satisfaction. Judged by this criterion, the past musical winter with us has not been so poverty-stricken. Counting up the fine classical compositions, that have been publicly performed in Boston during the last six months, we may even feel rich. Here is the list, as near complete as we could make it, though it doubtless lacks some items. It is by no means so formidable a list as we were able to present some four or five years ago; but it is pretty solid; it shows that we have had considerable good music—we that are fortunate enough to find music in some forms besides the Opera—and it is interesting to analyze in several points of view:—

1.—SYMPHONIES FOR ORCHESTRA.

BEETHOVEN: No. 1, in C; 2, in D; 3, (Eroica), in E flat; 4, in B flat; 5, in C minor; 7, in A; 8, (the Allegretto only).

MOZART: in E flat (played twice); in C ("Jupiter") twice; in G minor.

HAYDN: in D; in E flat; "Surprise."

MENDELSSOHN: in A major ("Italian"); Lobgesang.

SPOHR: "Die Weihe der Töne."

2.—CONCERTOS.

BEETHOVEN: Piano, with Orchestra, in G.

MENDELSSOHN: Piano with Orchestra, in D minor; Violin with Orchestra.

3.—OVERTURES.

BEETHOVEN: Leonora, No. 3, in C, (twice.)

MOZART: Nozze di Figaro, (twice).

ROSSINI: William Tell, (twice).

WEBER: Freyshütz, (twice); Oberon.

SCHUMANN: Fest-Overture.

SPOHR: Jessonda.

KALIOWDA: Concert Overture.

4.—VIOLIN QUINTETS.

MOZART: No. 4, in D, (three times); 5, in G minor, (twice); in B flat, (twice).

BEETHOVEN: No. 1, in E flat; 2, in C.

MENDELSSOHN: in A, op. 18; in B flat, No. 2 of op. 87.

SPOHR: in C minor (with piano), op. 53.

5.—VIOLIN QUARTETS.

HAYDN: Quartet in B flat, (twice); in D; in C, No. 45; in G; in D minor, No. 76.

MOZART: No. 2, in D minor; 3, in B flat; 4, in E flat; 6, in C.

BEETHOVEN: No. 6, op. 18, in B flat; 1, of op. 59, in F, (twice); 2, of op. 59, in E minor, (three times); 3, of op. 59, in C.

SCHUBERT: in D minor.

MENDELSSOHN: in A minor, op. 13; in D, op. 44; in E minor, op. 44; in E flat, op. 44; Posthumous.

RUBINSTEIN: No. 3, op. 17, in C.

6.—TRIOS FOR PIANO WITH VIOLIN, &c.

BEETHOVEN: Trio in B flat, op. 97, (twice); in E flat, op. 1, no. 1; in G, op. 1, no. 2; in C minor, op. 1, no. 3, (three times).

MOZART: in E flat, (with clarinet and violin).

FESCA: in E flat, op. 12.

7.—FOR PIANO-FORTE SOLO.

BEETHOVEN: Sonata in C sharp minor, ("Moonlight").

CHOPIN: Ballade in A flat; Two Nocturnes.

MENDELSSOHN: Capriccio; Andante with var., op. 82.

MOZART: Sonata for two pianos; Sonata with violin; Fantasia; Rondo from Concerto; "Jupiter" Symphony, (arranged); Minuetto in E flat, (arran.); "Zauberflöte" Overture, (arranged); "Figaro" Overture, (arranged).

8.—VIOLIN SOLO.

J. S. BACH: Ciaccona.

TARTINI: Sonata.

9.—ORATORIOS, CANTATAS, &c.

HANDEL: Messiah, (twice).

HAYDN: Creation, (twice).

MENDELSSOHN: Elijah, (twice); Hymn of Praise, (Lobgesang); Christus, (fragment); Landa Zion; Psalms 43d and 95th, (portions); Athalia, (portions); Hymn, "Hear my Prayer," Ps. 55.

BACH: Motet, No. 5; Crucifixus, from Mass in B; Cantata, No. —.

MOZART: Ave verum corpus, (3 times).

SCHUBERT: "Miriam" Cantata; Psalm, "The Lord is my Shepherd."

HAUPTMANN: Sacred Song, with chorus.

10.—PART-SONGS, CHORUSES, &c.

MENDELSSOHN: Wanderlied; Wasserfahrt; Turkish drinking Song; Choruses from Oedipus and Antigone.

MOZART: "O Isis und Osiris".

GLUCK: Choruses from Armida.

F. HILER: Soprano and Chorus: "Lebenslust".

WEBER: Körner's Battle Prayer.

ROBERT FRANZ: Several Part-Songs.

LENZ, KREUTZER, MARSCHNER, &c., &c., (Ditto).

11.—SONGS, DUETS, &c.

BACH: Air for Soprano, with cello; "My heart ever faithful," &c.

MOZART: Duet from Così fan tutte; Trio (tenors and bass) from the Figaro; "Deh vieni, non tardar"; Serenade, from Don Juan; "Deh per questo," from Titus; "Parto, ben mio" (do.); Duet, "Crudel perché," from Figaro; "Non mi dir" (Don Juan); "Dove sono" (Figaro); "In diesen heiligen Hallen"; "Non più andrai".

BEETHOVEN: Recit. and Air, "Abscheulicher," from Fidelio; Terzet "Tremate empi"; Scena, "Ah perfido!"; "Adelaide".

WEBER: Trio, with chorus, from Euryanthe; Scena and Prayer from Freyshütz.

CHERUBINI: Ave Maria.

SPOHR: "Das heimliche Lied"; "Die Rose"; Cavatina from Faust.

SCHUBERT: "Die Barcarolle"; "Der Wanderer"; "Hark! the Lark!"

R. FRANZ: "Waldfahrt"; "In Walde"; "Er ist gekommen".

MENDELSSOHN: "Zuleika."

ROSSINI: Romanza from Tell; "Mira la bianca luna," (duet); Cavatina from Donna del Lago, &c.

The above list is limited to works of masters, works which it is customary to term classical. Of course it would be more pains than profit to count up all the lighter things that have been given, from clap-trap songs and variations, to the hacknied concert extracts ("gems") from Italian Operas. Yet, strange to say, and happily as strange, the Concerts of the winter have really given an unusually small proportion of this sort of miscellany. Especially has this been the case with songs. Our prima donnas and tenores of the concert room have, in far the majority of cases, had the good sense to select such pieces as are named above; singers feel the public pulse quite carefully, and therefore we regard this as a good sign of improving taste. Partly let us thank "hard times" for that; they have shut out the fashionable, showy sort of "monster" concerts, such as demoralize us musically, and confuse the taste, exciting more than nourishing or refining; what concerts we have had, were of the quiet kind, in answer to the constant, reasonable demand of genuine music-lovers; and the complexion of the programmes corresponded.

Again, we must remark, the list, although a rich one, is equally remarkable for its deficiencies. Many things one misses there, which he would hardly think could have failed to figure in the winter's programme of so musical a city. The list of overtures is meagre. One department, which has often been the richest, is almost entirely unrepresented; that of classical piano-forte music. We have not had the usual supply of Chopin. Of Beethoven but one Sonata! On the other hand, the pianists have been doing us the best kind of service in concerted music, such as Trios, Quartets and Concertos. In fact, it is in quiet classical Chamber Concerts, that we have been strongest,—thanks principally to the persevering nine years' labors of our Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

We count up well in Symphonies, compared with other cities; especially in those of Beethoven. We have had seven of the nine; but we still wait in vain for a full hearing of that climax of "Joy" and Genius, the Ninth, ever since that first inspiring taste of it which the Germanians and the Handel and Haydn Society gave us in 1853. Nor have we had Schubert's glorious one this season. The reason appears in a still more painful, general confession: We have not had the orchestra for such things. So far "Panic" had the best of it; our orchestra had to be put on an economical footing; it was late before the machinery began to move at all, and then only by the energy and courage of one man, our excellent conductor CARL ZERRAHN, to whom we owe all our orchestral feasts this winter; the orchestra was small, the rehearsals few, the remuneration extremely moderate at that, and the only wonder is, that in such times, with such small means, we have yet been enabled to hear so many noble Symphonies, and most of them so well performed. Boston is still without a permanent grand Orchestra, still without a sure and regular provision for orchestral Concerts of the first class. How long shall this be? We refer the reader for the present to some pertinent suggestions in another column by our "Diarist."

About the Oratorio, and some other points in this connexion, we have yet to speak.

The Drama.

There is little to be recorded this week. The Howard Athenæum continues its career of almost unmeasured success and, what is better, continues to merit it. The week has been devoted to revivals of the best old English comedies, played with remarkable perfection, and set upon the stage with excellent taste. The Boston Theatre, while putting forth strong attractions, has yet failed to receive its reward. Miss Robertson, always delightful and charming, has given a series of her most popular personations, in all of which she has been ably supported by Mr. Bourcault, Mr. Gilbert, and others. But the cloud that darkened the fortunes of the theatre during the opening weeks of the season, seems, since the departure of the Ravels, to have rested more heavily than ever upon it. The Museum prospers with its pleasant piece of pageantry, and the National Theatre is closed.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—The GERMANIA BAND had their Concert Saturday evening. Though the exhibition showed that there is talent enough among our musicians to make up a complete band, it was not so successful as we had expected. There were half a dozen good clarinets, with oboes, flutes, bassoons, French horns, a couple each; but even these, although well played, were but a trifle against such a "power" of brass. There should be less of the noisy, more of the softening element.—Then again the programme was not such as fairly showed the qualities of a band. They played scarcely any marches; but overtures, &c., proper for an orchestra, throwing away the orchestra they had upon Quadrille medleys a la Julien. The Germania can and will do better. Proportion is the thing required.

Wednesday brought with it the last of the twelve Afternoon Concerts of the ORCHESTRAL UNION. There was a great audience. It was a rare pleasure, after a long interval, to hear again Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major, full of impressions of his young days in Italy, with its ardent, fresh, exhilarating Allegro; the musing, twilight, old cathedral mood of its Andante con moto; its perfectly summer-like, blue-skied, genial, Mozart-like Scherzo; its fine delicious finale in form of the Saltarello and Tarantella dances of the land. The orchestra was short of cellos; yet they made shift to play the "Tell" overture quite well.

The GERMAN TRIO gave the last of their six concerts at Chickering's, that evening, with this programme:

Part I. Trio in G, op. 1, No. 2, for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, Beethoven. Part 2. Song, "Adelaide," Beethoven; Concerto for Violin, op. 41, De Beriot; a. Ballad, "Then you'll remember me," Balfe; b. Song, "Love, my Mary, dwells with thee," Gartner; Fantasia Brilliante for Violin and Piano, (Themes from William Tell), De Beriot and Osborne. Part 3. Trio, op. 12, for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, Fesca.

The performers were MESSRS. GAERTNER, HAUSE, and WULF FRIES, (Herr JUNGNIKEL and his 'cello having become absorbed, for the nonce, in Musard's orchestra, at New York.) The audience was large and highly pleased. Mr. C. R. ADAMS sang the Adelaide very tastefully.

Musical Chit-Chat.

A delightful private concert by an amateur Club, in compliment to their director, OTTO DRESSEL, took place at Chickering's last Monday evening. We shall have more to say of it. . . . A letter from New York, and many more things, must lay over till next week. . . . An admirer of RINK's organ music writes us in distress to find a portrait of the man; he thinks he surely must be in our "Athena." Not to our knowledge. We never saw Rink's portrait; perhaps he was one of those eccentric individuals who would not be taken and could not be caught.

. . . . The Atlantic Monthly for May has an admirable article upon the early life of BEETHOVEN, drawn from original sources. It is from the pen of Mr. A. W. THAYER (our "Diarist"), who knows more of that great master's history than any other man. This sample warrants the best anticipations of Mr. Thayer's Biography of Beethoven, which has been so long in preparation.

The new phase of the MUSARD kaleidoscope, this week, has been a couple of "Berlioz Nights," at which the overtures Le Franc Juges, Carnival Romain, &c., were played by the monster orchestra. (Ullman announces his intention to import Berlioz, and talks of his works as popular and all the rage in Europe! That is a joke.) Another shake of the monster musical kaleidoscope, and we have, on Sunday evening, an Oratorio and Sacred Concert. "Elijah," too, is in rehearsal, and Formes, D'Angri, the Liederkrantz, &c., are engaged. . . . The N. Y. Mendelssohn Union performed Reinthaler's new oratorio: "Jephtha and his Daughter" this week. . . . Messrs. U. C. & C. F. HILL gave a soirée last night at Dodworth's to exhibit their new invention of a "Key-Harp," played like a piano.

We have the first number of a new Philadelphia paper, called the Sunday Topic, which seems to dip largely into music, as well as literature. It gives a classified list of all the operatic performances in the Academy of Music there, from its opening (Feb. 25, 1857) till April 14, 1858. It includes 30 different operas, and 102 representations. La Traviata takes the lead, 13 times. The Troatore comes next, 10 times; then Lucrezia Borgia, 8 times; Linda, 6 times; Fidelio, 4 times; Lucia, Ernani, Il Barbiere, L'Elisir, each 4 times; Freyschutz, Don Juan, L'Italiana, &c., &c., 2 each.

Mme. CASTELLAN has arrived in London. . . . Mme. PAULINE VIARDOT GARCIA has arrived in Paris, after her triumphs in Berlin. . . . Mr. CHARLES SALAMAN delivered a lecture on Beethoven lately, to a select circle, at his house in London. . . . We are sorry to learn that Mr. AUGUST FRIES, one of our most esteemed musicians, and leader of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club during the whole nine years of its existence, is soon to leave, having an excellent position offered him in Bergen, Norway, where music is much cultivated. Mr. Fries will leave a host of friends in Boston and its musical dependencies. We wish him God speed, if he must go. By the way it has occurred to us that, it would be interesting and well worth while to count up all the valuable works of instrumental chamber music with which the Quintette Club have, first and last, made their circle of listeners acquainted. Perhaps we shall present a list.

Music Abroad.

LONDON.—They love solid programmes in London—good music and a great deal at a time. For instance here is the programme of Mr. JOHN HULLAH's sixth and last Orchestral Concert, at Saint Martin's Hall, selected wholly from the works of Beethoven:

PART I.—Overture: "Men of Prometheus;" Air: "The Call of the Quail;" Air: "In questa tomba;" Choral Fantasia (piano, Miss Arabella Goddard); Trio: "Tremate, empi;" Overture (in E), Fidelio.

PART II.—The Choral Symphony.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD's first Soirée (second series) for April 14th, is quite as remarkable for weight of programme:

PART I.—Sonata in E flat, Pianoforte and Violin (No. 18), Mozart (Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton); Grand Sonata in D major (Op. 106), the last Pianoforte Sonata composed by Hummel (Pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard); Fuga Scherzando and Fuga, in A minor—No. 15 from book 9, and No. 2 from book 4 of F. C. Griepenkerl's "Complete Collection of the Pianoforte Works of J. S. Bach"—(repeated by desire) J. S. Bach (Pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard).

PART II.—Sonata in A major (Op. 101), Beethoven (Pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard); Grand Quartet in F minor (No. 2), Pianoforte, Violin, Viola, and Violoncello, Mendelssohn (Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, and Sig. Piatti).

There was a long list of Oratorios produced in the last weeks of March. It includes "Israel in Egypt," by Hullah's upper Singing School; "Samson," the "Lobgesang," and Mozart's "Requiem," by the Sacred Harmonic Society; the "Messiah," by Hullah; and, the great event of all, Bach's "Passion" music (according to St. Matthew), by the Bach Society, whose members, under their enthusiastic chief, Prof. STERNDAL BENNETT, have spent five years in studying it. It is said to have cost Mendelssohn very nearly as much trouble at Leipzig.

Passion week was full of music in London. Besides the Oratorios, &c., above named, a series of five Concerts were commenced at Drury Lane, under the auspices of Miss LOUISA PYNE and Mr. HARRISON. The first part of the first programme contained the "Pastoral Symphony;" Mozart's Piano Concerto, in C (by Miss Goddard), Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture, airs, scenas, &c., by Rossini, Webber, and Mozart; the second part, selections from Troatore.

The Royal Italian Opera, at the new theatre, Covent Garden, is announced to open May 15. Mr. Lumley, too, has issued his prospectus:

The list of prima donnas includes Mesdames Alboni, Ortolani, Spezia and Piccolomini—besides Made-moiselle Titiens, or Titiens, from Vienna.

Her Majesty's Theatre opens directly after Easter, and the Huguenots will be the first opera.

The list of male singers is the same as last year, Signor Corsi alone is missing. A Signor Mattioli (barytone) is the only novelty. The tenors are Signors Giuglini, Belart and Mercuriali; the barytones, Signors Benevanto, Belletti, Aldighieri and Castelli; the basses, Signors Rossi and Vialletti.

Signor Bonetti retains his post as conductor, but Signor Arditì remains on the establishment.

PARIS.—We gather the following items from the Paris correspondence of the London Musical World of March 27.

La Magicienne, after eight month's preparation, has been produced at the Imperial Opera in a style of lavish magnificence. Their Majesties "assisted" at the performance, and the theatre was crowded to suffocation. The success of the opera, however, was very equivocal, and I do not think there is much chance of this new production of M. M. Halévy and St. Georges surpassing (if equalling) that of the Juif Errant. For my own part I never remember sitting out a more dull performance. The book is one of the silliest ever written. The old legend of Melusine might have been turned to much better purpose. I have no patience to relate the story, which is unworthy of M. St. Georges even in his weakest moments. The music is by no means the best M. Halévy has written; nor could I trace those extraordinary beauties which his admirers detected, in the fifth act. The "interpreters" were Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Mad. Lauters-Gueymard, Mdle. Delisle, MM. Gueymard, Bonnehée, and Belval. In the ballet Mdle. Zina Richard was the principal dancer. At the end of this very heavy and glittering performance I sighed for the days when such operas as La Muette de Portici, Guillaume Tell, and Robert le Diable were produced in rapid succession!

At the Italiens, Prince Joseph Poniatowski's opera buffa, called Don Desiderio, was produced on the 10th inst. The excessive lightness (not to say triviality) of this music, though somewhat monotonous at the Imperial Italian Opera, made itself regretted on the following evening at the Imperial French Opera. Mario, Mdle. Donatelli, Zucchini, and Corsi did their utmost for the principal parts.

M. Litoff has given his concert in the salle Herz with enormous success. He repeated his "concerto-symphony" (No. 4), and both the playing and the composition pleased more than ever. M. Berlioz (who admires the Brunswick orchestra) praises M. Litoff's music to the skies. My opinion (with deference to MM. Berlioz and Fétis, who do not always agree) is that M. Litoff's music by no means comes up to what they have said of it. As a player, I find that, with immense fire and energy, he does not combine clearness and accuracy. The overture entitled Le Chant des Guelfes, and the "Illustrations" of Faust were interesting in different degrees, the first in a much less degree than the last. However, M. Litoff left the concert room, his brow covered with laurels. How long the present vogue for him may last depends upon Parisian caprice, which, even as caprice, is wonderfully capricious.

M. Rubinstein has already given his first concert, and although his playing produced just the same sensation as last year, his music seemed to please less.

Tamberlik is to make his first appearance at the Italian Opera on the 28th instant. The opera selected for this event is Otello. Grisi is to be the Desdemona; Corsi, Iago; and Belart, Roderigo. M. Calzado has, I am told, made another valuable acquisition for next season, in the shape of Signor Galvani, who made a fiasco some years ago at the Royal Italian Opera. Apropos of pianists, M. Rosenhain gives a concert for the benefit of a German charity to-day, at which he is to play the adagio from an early concerto of Beethoven—a not very classical proceeding by the way, for so classical a musician. M. Alexandre Billet has announced a concert for the 9th prox, in Pleyel's Rooms; and M. Henri Wieniawski, the violinist, who has just arrived, has also indicated his intention of astonishing the Parisian connoisseurs. I have not heard whether he is accompanied by his brother, the pianist. The violinists here, though not quite so numerous as the pianists, are still in flocks. Among the most remarkable is Signor Sivori, who gives a concert on the 29th (Monday), at which perhaps M. Wieniawski may be inclined to take a lesson. Madame Vanden Heuvel-Duprez is engaged for eight months at Marseilles; so that there is no chance of seeing her again at the Opéra-Comique for a considerable period. She has already appeared in Les Diamants de la Couronne and the Etoile du Nord with great success.

LEIPZIG.—At the seventeenth of the Gewandhaus concerts, (Feb. 11), Mme Viardot Garcia's singing caused the greatest enthusiasm. One of the German critics speaks of her as "perhaps the greatest singer just now in the world" . . . "the only one who still represents the glory of the older Italian school." She sang a scena with chorus from Gluck's Orfeo; an aria from the opera Britannicus, by Graun; Rossini's Non piu mesta; two Spanish songs, and a Mazurka by Chopin. At the last Gewandhaus concert the introduction and finale of the first act of Wagner's Lohengrin, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven were brought out.

VIENNA.—Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," much abused by the English, much admired by Jenny

Lind, who brought it out in England, was performed here last month for the first time by the Philharmonic Society, and well received. For the Italian opera season at the Court theatre, Mme. Steffanone, Miss Elise Hensler, and the buffo Zucini are engaged.

M. Roger, the tenor, has been singing in the Huguenots and in the Prophète with great success at the Karn'thor Theatre, the prima donna being Mdle. Tietjens, who has been engaged by Mr. Lumley. M. Colasanti, the ophiclidist, one of M. Jullien's many discoveries, who was reported dead, is performing on his instrument with great liveliness. The Helmsberger Soirées have recommenced. One of Schumann's quartets was played at the first. At a Soirée of the Männergesang-Verein, several pieces from Schubert's opera of Fierabras, including the overture, a duet for tenor and bass with chorus of male voices, and a scena for soprano, also with male voices, were performed. The Chant des esprits sur les eaux, by the same composer, and some pieces of M. Berlioz, were also played, and the whole concert excited more than ordinary interest.

BERLIN.—On the 10th of March the three hundredth representation of Der Freyschütz was given at the Royal Opera. It was first produced on the 15th of June, 1822. Between that date and 1836 the part of Agatha was sung 91 times by Frau Seidler; that of Caspar, 112 times by Herr Blume, and that of Max 96 times by Herr Stümer. Taubert has composed music for a commemoration fête, in honor of the sculptor Rauch, which was to take place on the 30th.

MUNICH, March 2. The Allgemeine Zeitung says: "The concert of yesterday, which followed immediately upon Wagner's Lohengrin, may be regarded as a lofty Song without Words, with the refrain: What need of a Music of the Future, when that of the sacred Past was made for all eternity! We had Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica; a Passacaglia by J. S. Bach; an Andante aria from Mozart's Il Re Pastore, and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture!"

BONN.—Sebastian Bach's Passions-Musik (according to the Gospel of St. John) was performed on the 11th ult., by the Gesang-verein, under the direction of Albert Dietrich.

COLOGNE.—The programme of the sixth Gesellschafts-Concert consisted of the "Spring" and "Summer" from Haydn's "Seasons," and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Of the seventh concert this was the programme:

PART I.—1. Symphony in C minor, by L. Spohr; 2. "Tantum ego," for chorus and orchestra, by Cherubini; 3. Concerto in G minor, for the pianoforte, by Mendelssohn, performed by Herr Alex. Dreyshock. PART II.—4. Overture ("Nachruf an * * *") by Joachim; 5. Spinnerlied und Rhapsodie, by A. Dreyshock; 6. Hymn, for chorus and orchestra, by G. F. Handel; 7. Concertstück, by C. M. Von Weber, played by A. Dreyshock.

The Lower Rhine Musik-Zeitung is enthusiastic about the playing of Dreyshock.

BORDEAUX.—Spontini's Fernand Cortez has been produced with great success. The widow of the celebrated composer was present at the first representation. For the sake of strong contrast the next opera is to be Verdi's Trovatore, the French version of his Trovatore.

NAPLES.—The directors of the San Carlo have summoned Verdi before the tribunal of commerce for refusing to allow his new opera (to the same book as Auber's Gustave III.), to be produced, with certain changes which the political atmosphere of this patriarchally governed state rendered inevitable.

GOtha.—Just as Dr. Liszt at Weimar doses the inhabitants with Wagner, so does the Duke of Saxe Cobourg-Gotha regale his liege subjects with music from his own pen. His third or fourth opera, Diana von Solange, is terminated, and though the first performance was originally intended to be given for the benefit of the Parisians, it is understood that the population of Gotha will have the privilege of inaugurating its career.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—Madame Bosio and Signor Tamberlik are both re-engaged for three consecutive years at the Imperial Italian Opera here.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Minnie Moore. J. L. Hatton. 25
A Ballad in that sweet and expressive style of which "O whisper what thou feelest" is the prototype.
To Chloe in Sickness (English and German words). Sterndale Bennett. 25
A touching song in B minor, quite worthy of the renown its author enjoys of being the most classical amongst England's modern musical writers.
The Hindoo Maiden (Eng. and German words). Louis Huth. 25
A simple Story with a pathetic Refrain. It tells of a young Hindoo girl, forsaken by her lover, who has returned to his home in Europe. The poor girl still fondly clings to his memory. She sees other friends depart for England, and prays them to find him out and tell him how she still loves him. No answer comes. She pines away and dies, still faithful to the last. Mezzo Soprano.

When the bright waves are dashing. Duet. Mrs. Sullivan. 25

A nice little duet for equal voices.
My Home is a cave by the dark sea-shore (Song of the wild Poet). M. Naughton. 25
Poem and Music breathes a bold, free spirit; quite original.

Annie Lyle (Song and Chorus). H. S. Thompson. 25
A simple, smoothly-flowing Melody; easy and pretty.

The Lake (Eng. and Fr. words). Niedermeyer. 25
This is a celebrated Tenor Song. After a long, passionate outburst of grief, caused by reminiscences of happy days, now gone forever, which are called forth by the sight of an Italian lake, the mood of the Singer relapses into a quiet reverie, not entirely devoid of sunshine. This reverie takes the form of a lovely Romanza in 9-8 time. An excellent Concert Song.

Oh, worship not the Beautiful (Song). Burnham. 25
A simple Song for the Fireside—quite pretty.

Soft skies of sunny Italy (Song). Cherry. 25
This favorite composer sings here of Italy's azure sky, with such a sunny glow and warmth of feeling, as if he was drifting slowly through the water-streets of Venice, reposing on the couch of a gondola, and shaded by proud palaces, improvising, as only Italians can.

The Young Recruit. Kücken. 25
A youth relates to his sweetheart his dreams of future military glory. A march-like melody, full of vivacity, easy to learn and sing by heart. This is the Song of the day in Germany and England. It is enjoyed in every possible shape and arrangement. In England Jatty Treffz had to sing it on sixty consecutive nights, and was encored every night.

List to the gay Castanet ("Rose of Castille"). 25
Another pretty Song from this Opera, the melody happily expressive of Spanish coquetry and stately grace.

Instrumental Music for Piano.

Le Galopin. V. Busch. 25
A spirited Impromptu in the form of a Galop.
Flying Cloud Schottische. D'Albert. 25
Lovetear Landler (Redowa). C. Strauss. 25
Always Cheerful (Galop). P. Bayer. 25
Five Step Waltz, Valse a cinq temps, (in 3/4 and 2/4 alternately). Conner. 25
Excellent dance music of moderate difficulty.

Lancer's Polka. A. Scard. 25
A beautiful, spirited and fascinating composition.
La Montagnarde (Mazurka de Salon). Ascher. 40
This "Mountain Girl" is a little gem, bold and handsome, dashing, yet tender. Ascher has written nothing of late that can compare with this unpretentious little piece in point of freshness, originality and beauty of melody. Nor is it at all difficult. The mountain-echo introduced will be found of charming effect.

Books.

PRACTICAL (A) TEXT BOOK OF MUSIC, as connected with the Art of Playing the Piano Forte. By Edward B. Oliver. Price 38 cents.

This volume is the production of a thoroughly educated and skillful teacher, one who has, in the exercise of his professional duties, been much at a loss for a suitable book on the Art of playing the Piano-Forte, as an assistant in communicating much instruction that is most valuable and important, and who therefore has been led, in endeavoring to supply his own wants, to prepare this volume. It will be found to contain those essentials of a musical knowledge, which every student of the Piano, or of any instrument, must possess, as the conditions of intelligent practice; they are presented with an admirable consistency and clearness. Among the multitudes of attempts to state the rudiments of music in a popular form, it is, indeed, seldom that we find so much real thought and judgment brought to the task. The matter is thoroughly digested, and the topics placed in their true relations. The definitions are philosophical, precise, and satisfactory. It is not a book of Exercises, a "School," or "Method," for the Piano-Forte; but it conveys, in the form of question and answer, a very convenient and intelligent solution of those theoretic questions which arise to puzzle every young beginner in the practice of the Art.

Schumann on Mendelssohn.

[Scattered through the four volumes of Robert Schumann's collected writings about music and musicians, are various brief reviews and notices of works by MENDELSSOHN, soon after their first publication, which appeared in the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. They are interesting as showing the fresh impression made by the works of one great composer upon the mind of another, who was fast rising into prominence. Especially is their pervading tone of sincere, cordial admiration worthy of notice, in connection with the charge of "jealousy" of Mendelssohn's great fame so often brought against him by the Anti-Schumannites of London. (See article from the Musical World, copied in this Journal, April 17.) For this and other reasons we have thought these bits of criticism worth translating. We give herewith a few of them, and shall continue them hereafter.—Ed.]

OP. 56. SYMPHONY ("ITALIAN,") IN A MAJOR.

The Symphony by Mendelssohn Bartholdy has been most eagerly expected by all who have thus far followed with a sympathetic interest the shining path of this rare star. They looked forward to it as in some sense his first achievement in the symphonic field; for what was actually his first Symphony, in C minor, falls almost within the artist's earliest period of youth; his second (the "Scotch," in A minor), which he wrote for the Philharmonic Society in London, has not yet been made known through the press (1843); and finally the Symphony-Cantata, Lobgesang, cannot be regarded as a pure instrumental work. Thus in the rich wreath of his creations there was only wanting (with the exception of the Opera) the Symphony: in all other kinds he had already shown himself fruitful.

We know it by third hand, that the beginnings of the new Symphony date back to an earlier period, that of Mendelssohn's sojourn in Rome; it was resumed and finished only very recently. This is certainly interesting to know, in estimating its quite singular character. As when from some old book laid aside we suddenly pull out a yellowed leaf, which reminds us of a vanished time, that now comes up again in all its brightness, until we forget the present, so may fair recollections have played around the imagination of the master, when he found once more in his papers melodies once sung in beautiful Italy, so that, consciously or unconsciously, at last sprang up this gentle tone-picture, which, like the description of the Italian journey in Jean Paul's "Titan," can make one for a while forget his sorrow that he has not seen that blessed land. For that the whole Symphony is pervaded by a peculiar peoples'-tone, has many times been said; only a wholly unimaginative man can fail to mark this. It is its peculiarly charming color, then, that secures to this Symphony of Mendelssohn, as well as to that of Franz Schubert, an especial place in symphonic literature. The traditional instrumental pathos, the usual massive breadth you do not find in it,—nothing that looks like bidding against Beethoven; it comes much nearer, and especially in character, to that one by Schubert, with the distinction that, whereas the latter intimates to us a wild and gipsy sort of people's life, Mendelssohn's transports us to beneath Italian skies. And this is equivalent to saying, that a more graceful, polished manner dwells in the new work, while to Schubert's on the other hand, we must accord other excellencies, especially that of a richer power of invention.

In its ground-plan the Symphony of Mendelssohn is distinguished by the internal connection of all its four movements; even the melodic conduct of the main theme is a kindred one in all the four; one will discover this on the first hasty comparison. Thus more than any other Symphony it forms a closely involved whole; character, key, rhythm, vary but little in the different movements. The composer himself too wishes, as he says in a prefatory remark, that the four movements should be played one after another without long interruption.

As to the purely musical part of the composition, no one can doubt that it is masterly. In beauty and delicacy of structure, as a whole and in the connecting members singly, it takes a place beside his overtures; nor is it less rich in charming instrumental effects. How finely M. knows how to reproduce an earlier thought, and to adorn a repetition, so that the old shall meet us as it were newly transfigured; how rich and interesting the detail, without any overloading or Philister-ish pedantry of learning,—of this every page of the score gives us new proofs.

The effect of the Symphony upon the public will depend in part upon the greater or less virtuosity of the orchestra. This to be sure is always the case, but doubly so here, where there is less question of masses, than of refined delicacy of single instruments. Above all it requires gentle blowers. The Scherzo is most irresistible in its effect; a more genial one has scarcely been written in recent times; the instruments talk in it like men.

The piano-forte arrangement is by the composer himself, and certainly the truest transcript that could be conceived of. Still it gives you an idea of only half the charm of the orchestral effects.

The conclusion of the whole Symphony will call forth contradictory opinions; many will expect it in the character of the last movement, whereas he, rounding the whole off as if in a circle, reminds us of the commencement of the first. We find it only poetic; it is like the evening corresponding to a lovely morning.

OP. 30. SIX SONGS WITHOUT WORDS.

(SECOND SET.)

Who has not in some twilight hour sat at the Clavier (a Flügel seems too grand and courtly) and in the midst of his phantasien sung to it unconsciously a soft melody? Now should one chance to bind the accompaniment with the melody in the hands alone, especially were he a Mendelssohn, there would result the most beautiful Songs without Words. It would be still easier, were one to compose a text, then strike away the words and so give it to the world—although that is not just the right thing, but a kind of deception,—one might by this means test the power of music to express feelings, and give an opportunity to the poet, whose words have been suppressed, to put a new text to the composition of his own song. Should the new words chime with the old, it would be one more proof in favor of the certainty of musical expression.

But to our Songs! Clear as sun-light is the face with which they meet you. The first, in beauty and purity of feeling, comes very near the one in E major in the first set; only there it gushes more immediately from the first spring. Florestan said: "Whoever has sung such, may yet expect long life, both in this world and after death; I think, to me it is the most dear of all." The second Song suggests to me the "Hunter's Evening Song (Jägers Abendlied) of Goethe: Im Felde schleich'ich still und wild, &c.; in delicate and airy structure it reaches that of the poet. The third seems to be less significant, and almost like a roundelay in one of Lafontaine's family scenes; still it is real unadulterated wine, that passes round the table, if it is not the heaviest and rarest. The fourth I find extremely lovely; a little sad and introverted, but hope and home speak in the distance. * * * The next has something undecided in its character, even in the form and rhythm, and its effect is corresponding. The last, a Venetian Barcarole, softly and gently concludes the whole. And thus shall you enjoy anew the gifts of this noble spirit!

TRIO FOR PIANO, VIOLIN AND 'CELLO.

This is the master Trio of the present day, as those of Beethoven in B flat and D, and that of Schubert in E flat, were of their day. A truly beautiful composition, which will delight our children and our children's children years to come. The storm of these last years is beginning gradually to subside, and, we confess, has cast up many a pearl upon the shore. Mendelssohn, although less driven by it than the rest, still remains a son of the time, and has had to struggle, has had to hear continually the prating of some narrow writers, about how "the period of full bloom in Music lies behind us," and has summoned up his energies, so that we well may say: he is the Mozart of the nineteenth century, the most luminous musician, who sees the clearest through the contradictions of the age, and is the first to reconcile them. And he will not be the last artist either. After Mozart came a Beethoven; upon the new Mozart a new Beethoven will follow; perhaps indeed he is already born.

What shall I say about this Trio, which every one, who has heard it, has not said already? Happiest they, who have heard it played by the creator himself! For though there may be bolder virtuosos, it is scarcely possible that any other can reproduce the works of Mendelssohn with such enchanting freshness as himself. Yet let this not deter any one from also playing the Trio; it has in fact, compared with others, Schubert's Trio for example, fewer difficulties; although these in works of Art of the first rank are always in proportion to the effect, increasing as that increases. That the Trio is not one for pianists only, that others too may take it up with spirit, and find their pleasure and reward in it, needs hardly to be said. Let the new work exert its influence, then, on all sides, as it must, and be to us a new proof of the artistic energy of its creator, which now seems to stand at almost its height of bloom.

OP. 35. PRELUDES AND FUGUES FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

A hot-brained fellow (he is now in Paris) defined the idea of a Fugue pretty much as follows: "It is a piece of music, in which one part starts off before the others—(fuga from fugere)—and the hearer before all;" for which reason he himself, whenever fugues occurred in concerts, would begin to talk aloud and not unfrequently to jeer at them. In fact, though, he understood little of the matter and resembled very much the fox in the fable; that is, he could not make a fugue himself, much as he secretly desired it. How differently indeed it is defined by those who can! by cantors, finished students of music, &c. According to these "Beethoven never wrote, and never could write a fugue; and even Bach himself took liberties, at which one can but shrug his shoulders; Marpurg alone gives the best introduction," and so on.

Finally, how differently think others—I for instance, who can revel hours together in the fugues of Beethoven, of Bach and Handel, and who have therefore always maintained that, with the exception of watery, luke-warm, miserable, patch-work affairs, there was no one any longer who could write fugues in our day, until at last I was somewhat silenced by these fugues of Mendelssohn. But ordinary writers of fugues by rule and pattern will deceive themselves if they expect to find applied here certain of their excellent old arts, their imitationes per augmentationem duplicem, triplicem, or their cancricantes motu contrario, &c. And equally deceived will be the romantic high-fliers, if they hope to find here phœnixes undreamed of, soaring from the ashes of an antique form. But if these persons have a sense for sound and natural music, they will get it in these fugues. I will not indulge in blind praise, and I know well enough, that Bach has made, in fact created fugues of quite another sort. But were he to rise now from his grave, he would—at first perhaps storm away both right and left over the state of music in general; but then too he would certainly rejoice, that there are yet individuals who at least pluck flowers in the field, where he has planted such gigantic oak forests.

In a word, these Fugues have much that is Sebastianic, and might deceive the most sharp-sighted critic, were it not for the melody, the finer blending, by which you recognize the modern period, and here and there those little touches, so peculiar to Mendelssohn, and which betray him among hundreds as the author. Whether the reviewers find it so or not, it is certain that the composer wrote them not for pastime, but to direct the attention of piano-players once more to that old master form, to accustom them again to it. That he chose the right means for this, in that he avoided all those unhappy, good-for-nothing artifices and imitationes, and gave more prominence to the melodic element, the cantilena, while still holding fast to the Bach form, looks altogether like him. But whether this form might not perhaps be altered to advantage, without thereby losing the essential character of the Fugue, is a question, at whose answer many a one will yet try his hand. Already Beethoven tugged at it somewhat; but he had occupation enough of another sort, and was too loftily engaged in building out the cupolas of so many other domes, to find time for laying the corner stone of a new Fugue edifice. Reicha also made the attempt; but evidently his creative power fell short of his good intention; yet his often curious ideas are not to be entirely overlooked. At all events that always is the best fugue, which the public takes—for some sort of a Strauss waltz; in other words, in which the artificial root-work is covered up, like that of a flower, so that we only see the flower. Thus it once actually happened that a man, who otherwise was not a bad connoisseur in music, took one of Bach's fugues for an Etude of Chopin, to the honor of both; and so might many a maiden take the last part of, say the second of these Mendelssohn fugues (in the first part she might be puzzled by the entrance of the voices) to be a song without words, and in the grace and softness of the forms forget the ceremonial place where, and the abhorred name under which it had been put before her. In short, there are not only Fugues, which are wrought out with the head and according to the receipt, but there are Fugues which are musical pieces, sprung from the soul and executed in poetic fashion. But as the Fugue affords an equally happy organ both for the dignified, and for the bright and merry, this collection contains some too in that short, rapid style, in which Bach flung forth so many with a master hand. Every one will find them out; these especially reveal the facile, genial artist, who plays with his chains as with flowery garlands.

A few words of the Preludes. Perhaps the most of them, like many to be sure of Bach's, stand in no original connection with the Fugues, and seem to have been prefixed to them afterwards. The majority of players will prefer them to the Fugues, since their effect is complete, even when they are played separately; the first especially siezes you at the outset and hurries you along with it to the conclusion. The rest one may examine for himself. The work speaks for itself, even without the name of the composer.

Mendelssohn.

From the New York Musical World.

MENDELSSOHN was a man of small frame, delicate and fragile-looking; yet possessing that distinguishing peculiarity of the Hebrew race—a sinewy elasticity and a power of endurance which you would hardly suppose possible. His head appeared to have been set upon the wrong shoulders—it seemed, in a certain sense, to contradict his body. Not that the head was disproportionately large; but its striking nobility was a standing reproof to the pedestal on which it rested. His eye possessed a peculiarity, which has been ascribed to the eye of Sir Walter Scott—a ray of light seemed often to proceed from its pupil to your own, as from a star. But yet, in the eyes of Mendelssohn there was none of that rapt dreaminess, so often seen among men of genius in Art. The gaze was rather external than internal—the eye had more outwardness than inwardness of expression. Indeed this corresponded very much with the character of Mendelssohn; who, although an inward man, was also an outward one—and although a great artist, was also something of a courtier and diplomatist. In his gait, Mendelssohn was somewhat loose and shambling; he had a flinging motion of the limbs and a supple-jointedness, which, coupled with other little peculiarities of carriage, determined him—according to popular German tradition—as of Oriental origin. But this listlessness of bearing seemed to disappear entirely the moment he sat down to a piano-forte, or organ, and came into artistic action. Then, like a full-blooded Arabian courser, he showed his points—you had before you a noble creature. All awkwardness disappeared: he was Mendelssohn—and no longer a son of Mendel.

Mendelssohn married into a Gentile family—that of a wealthy banker of Frankfort. The lady of his love was as beautiful as she was high-bred and refined. She bore him children of remarkable personal charms. One boy, particularly, I was never weary of gazing at, for his extreme comeliness. He had his father's eye and his mother's elegance and grace of figure. I used to watch father and son, as hand in hand they sauntered around the charming gardens of Frankfort, and silently applaud the father of such a son—the son of such a father.

Mendelssohn was too much a celebrity to be suffered to rest long in one place, and he became very much a citizen of the world and a traveller. But from all his wanderings, his steps seemed to return oftenest to Frankfort, the home of his wife. Here on his arrival, he was frequently serenaded by the Liederkrantz of the city. The house he occupied was on the bank of the river Main; and beneath his windows—illuminated by colored transparencies, or the light of a summer moon—the minstrels were wont to gather. Then were poured forth, from hundreds of manly throats, those tones of welcome, or those songs of Fatherland (chief among which were Mendelssohn's own compositions) that thrilled to their very depths the souls of the listeners. Mendelssohn usually stood at the window above, waving his thanks or addressing his friends. I shall never forget one serenade which was given him from the smooth breast of the river. Starting some distance up the stream, at a point from which the music was but faintly audible, the serenaders floated down in their barges, bearing beautiful colored transparencies, disappearing for a moment beneath the lofty arches of the bridge which spans the river, and then picturesquely reappearing, the music now swelling grandly as they neared the house and wafted to the ears of the master those profound, smooth harmonies which only a German chorus, aided by the softening effect of tone passing over water, is capable of producing.

On occasion of such visits to Frankfort, Mendelssohn was often persuaded by his friends to gratify them by his organ-playing. He generally selected for this purpose the organ in St. Catherine's church—a quaint old edifice on the Zeil—although the organ in St. Paul's is a far larger and better one; this advantage being counterbalanced, however, by the structure of the edifice, which, handsome to the eye (the same, by the way, in which the celebrated German Parliament was held during the revolution), was offensive to the ear, by reason of its bewildering echoes.

I once heard Mendelssohn in St. Catherine's, when he performed in company with Adolphe Hesse—the celebrated organist of Breslau, and pupil of Rink. On this, as on other occasions, Mendelssohn played mostly Bach, for whom, of all the old masters, his reverence seemed deepest. It is mentioned as quite a triumph of Mendelssohn's critical acumen, that he discovered a positive, downright, consecutive fifth in Bach, which had been lying perdu ever since the death of the old master, unobserved of any of those who had so sedulously and critically studied him.

The Cäcilien Verein of Frankfort—a kind of N. Y. Harmonic Society, or Mendelssohn Union—was one of his favorite places of resort. After the rehearsal, he would occasionally play for his friends; sometimes giving them a sonata of Beethoven—and always by heart. The allegros and prestos of these sonatas were dashing and brilliantly executed, his high-strung nervous organization seeming to exult in a conquest of whatever mechanical difficulties they might present. He bounded rejoicingly on, like a courser put upon his mettle; but, amid all the heat of the course, he never forgot a certain significant interpretation of the music—an intelligent and, in some respects, peculiar phrasing of the text. Even the musically uninitiated can understand that a difference in the collocation of notes might produce a marked difference in the significance of music—the effect being the same as, in literature, a change of punctuation; or, in rhetorical delivery, a difference in the breathing places, or pauses. Beethoven's allegros were better rendered by Mendelssohn than by any one else I ever had the fortune to hear.

The andantes, or more emotional movements, were, to my own ear, less satisfactory, from a certain classic polish and—if I may so express it—half reserve of style. Perhaps Mendelssohn felt, as others have felt, that in the matter of feeling, Beethoven had been somewhat overdone. Like persons who would seek deeper significance than really exists in the child-like simplicities of sacred text, so artists, in their morbidly intense manner of rendering the master, had fallen into affected depths of pathos. I would not do Mendelssohn the wrong, however, of representing him as really lacking in feeling. The heart was there; but it was the heart seen through a polite conventionalism of amber—like the insect, perfectly recognizable, but not too exposed to the common view and the touch.

Mendelssohn would occasionally extemporize, also, for his friends of the Cäcilien Verein. His improvisation was highly imaginative and masterly. The theme was usually wrought upon in counterpoint style, with occasional dashes into a brilliant freie fantasia. The Cäcilien Verein, by the way, gave annual performances of oratorio appropriate to the season, similar to those given in New York. On Good Friday, Bach's sublime oratorio of The Passion was always sung. Why has this masterpiece never been produced here? It ought to be as regularly and religiously given as the Messiah. If we celebrate the birth of the Messiah, we should also celebrate his death. I was once seated next Mendelssohn when the Verein was rehearsing Bach's works. He seemed entirely absorbed in the music—a silent movement, only, drawing attention now and then to the wonderful harmonic effects produced by the intertwining of such a mass of independent melodies. The last chord of this masterpiece, uttered to the word Ruhe (rest), seems to drop the soul, like a weary child from the arms of its nurse, into a profound slumber, from which it would never more be awakened.

Mendelssohn's influence in Leipzig upon the scholars of the Conservatory was always very salutary. He was in the habit of breaking in upon the usual routine of study and opening new vistas upon them of the world of music. When accidentally present during an exercise, he would sometimes assume the task of teaching himself, and, with crayon in hand, give some invaluable hint in the treatment of orchestral instruments, or elicit knowledge from the pupils themselves, by asking them to accompany a given passage with horns or other less obvious instruments; thus breaking in upon the ordinary routine of the day. This letting in of a little fresh air upon the mind, in teaching, is an excellent device, the uses of which Mendelssohn seemed well to understand.

There existed, at this period in Leipzig, a club of amateur ladies and gentlemen who met to sing part-songs. Mendelssohn and Hauptmann both contributed largely to the compositions used on such occasions. Hauptmann, whose name is not as familiar as it should be on this side of the water, is Cantor of the Thomas Schule of Leipzig—a post originally filled by grand old Sebastian Bach himself. This school is a kind of seminary for young men mostly intended for the ministry, and all of whom receive a musical education; they rendering, by express stipulation, musical services in the churches during this scholastic period. Once a week they perform motets in the St. Thomas Church adjoining the seminary, sometimes accompanied by orchestra. It is a very ancient and admirable institution. At the time the office of Cantor was vacated by the death of the previous incumbent, both Mendelssohn and Hauptmann were candidates for the position; and I have been told that Mendelssohn felt, somewhat, his non-appointment to an office which he would really have liked to fill. Hauptmann, however, is admirably qualified for the position.

The last I ever saw of Mendelssohn was during the summer alluded to in a late article on Freiligrath, in the Taunus mountains, at the small spas Soden and Kronthal. Notwithstanding his great pre-occupation, partly with his own genius and musical productiveness; partly with his engagements to visit England or to conduct great festivals; partly to receive the incessant individual homage offered him, which he was not always able to parry, he was ever ready to see and serve, if he could, a true student of Art. Like all great masters, however, he had a holy aversion to mere dabblers in Art and those who were but in the A B C of progress. And what could he do for such? The schoolmaster was what they needed—not the finished artist; their time for the latter had not come. And this, let me passingly say, is the great mistake our countrymen are constantly making who go abroad to study musical art. They go before they are ready to go. The preliminary schoolmaster is neglected. The scholastic part of Art can at the present day be as well pursued in this country as in any part of Europe. Our artists should not go abroad to learn their A B C's. It is an expensive way of learning the alphabet,—both as to time and money. Let them learn all they can here, first—and by "all" I mean harmony, counterpoint, form, instrumentation; they might then profitably go abroad to exercise themselves in composition, and to hear music. In a word, let them learn the science of music at home—but pursue the Art under the guidance of a great master, if they will, abroad. Most celebrated men in Art are accessible in this way. They are willing to give one lesson, in the sense of examining compositions—but not in the sense of teaching the first rudiments of the Art. Nor let our Art-students think that the Conservatories of Music are the only desirable thing. They are desirable for those whose means are limited—they are the common schools of Art. But Hauptmann himself once told me, that—Professor as he was in the Leipzig Conservatory—he was glad that he was not put through a Conservatory course. The idea being, that, in Art, it is not always well to shape a mind by the square and compass; but it is better to adapt the course to the individual mind, in order not to interfere with its originality, or check its independent development. Mendelssohn would, and did, examine and advise, in case compositions were submitted to him, and his suggestions and his counsel were as invaluable as they were ever readily rendered.

A singular circumstance, to me, at this time, was the approbation which he expressed of certain Æthiopian melodies—some of those earliest in use in America—which his friend Hoffmann von Fallersleben had persuaded me one day to put on paper for him, in order that he might write a series of songs to them for German emigrants to America. Hoffmann—much to my astonishment and chagrin—submitted these one day to the classic eyes of Mendelssohn—an act of innocent audacity of which it seemed to me none but a poet, ignorant of musical valuations, and certainly never a musician, would ever have been guilty. We often undervalue trifles, however, and Mendelssohn's opinion of these little bagatelles (like that, subsequently, of other German masters) taught me quite a lesson as to an over-fastidiousness in Art-matters, and a too dignified standard of judgment.

R. S. W.

The Garcias and Da Ponte.

[From an Address before the New York Historical Society, Nov. 17, 1857, by Dr. J. W. FRANCIS.]

Were my individual feelings to be consulted, (says Dr. Francis), I would fain dwell at some length on the introduction of the Garcia Italian Opera troupe in this city, as an historical occurrence in intellectual progress of permanent interest. It was destined to create new feelings, to awaken new sentiments in the circle of refined and social life, and its mission, I believe, is accomplished. The opera, whatever may be the disputes touching its origin, was known to be the offspring of genius. It had universal approval, as an exalted mental recreation to recommend it; its novelty here secured prompt attention to its claims, and its troupe of artists who honored us with their entrée were considered the recognized professors of the highest order in the art. It captivated the eye, it charmed the ear, it awakened the profoundest emotions of the heart. It paralyzed all further eulogiums on the casual song-singing heretofore interspersed in the English comedy, and rendered the popular airs of the drama which had possession of the feelings, the lifeless materials of childish ignorance. Something, perhaps, was to be ascribed to fashionable emotion, for this immediate popular ascendancy. For this advantageous accession to the resources of mental gratification, we were indebted to the taste and refinement of Dominick Lynch, the liberality of the manager of the Park Theatre, Stephen Price, and the distinguished reputation of the Venetian, Lorenzo Da Ponte. Lynch, a native of New York, was the acknowledged head of the fashionable and festive board, a gentleman of the ton, and a melodist of great powers and of exquisite taste; he had long striven to enhance the character of our music; he was the master of English song, but he felt, from his close cultivation of music, and his knowledge of the genius of his countrymen, that much was wanting, and that more could be accomplished, and he sought out, while in Europe, an Italian troupe, which his persuasive eloquence, and the liberal spirit of Price, led to embark for our shores, where they arrived in November, 1825. The old Italian poet and composer of the libretto of "Don Giovanni" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," the associate of Mozart, was here in this city to greet them, and on the night of the 29th of October, 1825, at the Park Theatre, we listened to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," of the matchless Rossini.

More was realized by the immense multitude who filled the house than had been anticipated, and the opera ended with a universal shout of bravo, bravissimo. The city reverberated the acclamations. The indomitable energy of Garcia, aided by his melodious strains and his exhaustless powers—the bewitching talents of his daughter, the Signorina Garcia, with her artistic faculties as an actress, and her flights of inspiration, the novelty of her conception and her captivating person—proved that a galaxy of genies in a novel vocation unknown to the New World demanded now its patronage. To these primary personages, as making up the roll, were added Angriani, whose base seemed as the peal of the noted organ at Haerlem; Rosich, a buffo of great resources; Crevelli, a promising debutante; the younger Garcia, with Signora Garcia, and Madam Barbieri, with her capacious tenor, (?) constituting a musical phalanx which neither London nor Paris could surpass, nay, at that time could not equal. From the moment that first night's entertainment closed, I looked upon the songs of Phillips, (which had made Coleman, the editor, music-mad,) the melodies of Moore, and even the ballads of Scotland, as shorn of their popularity, and even now I think myself not much in error in holding to the same opinion. The Italian opera is an elaboration of many thoughts, of intelligence extensive and various; while it assimilates itself by its harmonious construction and entirety, it becomes effective by external impression and rational combination. It blends instruction with delight; if it does not make heroes, it at least leads captive the noblest attributes of humanity; and, had a larger forethought and wiser government watched over its destinies, it might still exist, in its attractive displays, as a permanent institution in this enlightened and liberal metropolis.

I must add a few words on that great maestro, Garcia. It is true, that his vast reputation is secured for the future by his biographer; he was a successful teacher, a composer of many operas, and his merits as a performer are fresh in the recollections of the operatic world; but it is sometimes profitable to cast a backward glance over what we have lost. He was a native of Seville, reared in Spanish music, and, in fulfilling his part in that role with enthusiasm, was summoned in 1809 to Paris, where he was the first Spanish musician that appeared in that capital. Garat, on hearing him, exclaimed: "The Andalusian purity of the man makes me all alive." Prince Murat chose him as first tenor of his own chapel in 1812, at Naples. Catalani obtained him for his first tenor, 1816, in Paris. Here Rossini saw him, and arranged affairs so that he appeared in the "Barber of Seville," of which he was the original representative. He visited England in 1817, where his wonderful powers were still higher extolled, from his Othello and his Don Juan. In Paris, our New York friend, Lynch, found him, and proffered inducements for him to visit America. Here his combined qualities as singer and actor have never been equalled; his Othello, for force, just discrimination, and expression, astounded the beholder, and filling the house with raptures. His career in Mexico followed; and, sad to relate, while on his return to Vera Cruz, he was beset by banditti, stripped of his clothing, and plundered of his one thousand ounces of gold, (about seventeen thousand dollars of our money), the results of his severe earnings. Penniless, he finally reached Paris, to resume his professional labors. His spirits failed him not, but his musical powers were on the wane, and, being the first to detect the decline of his great talents, and too honest to pass a counterfeit note, he left the operatic boards, and died June 2, 1832, aged fifty-eight.

From the sixth year of his age, and through life, Garcia was the arbiter of his own fortunes. He may be pronounced the restorer of Mozart, and the promulgator of Rossini's matchless works. His daughter, afterwards Madame Malibran, eclipsed even the talents of her father; and her abilities are still a popular topic of conversation. She had the rare gift of possessing the contralto and the soprano. Her ardor, both as actress and as singer, exhibited almost a frantic enthusiasm. Animated by the lofty consciousness of genius, the novelty of her conceptions, her vivid pictures, her inexhaustible spirits, had, in no predecessor in her calling, ever been equalled. She had no Farnelli for an instructor, but the tremendous energy, not to say severity, of her father, brought out the faculties of her voice to the wonder of all who heard her. She may be said to have been consumed by the fire of her own genius. Her "Una Voce," and other airs, reached the highest point of instrumentation, according to the opinion of the most astute judges. She has been followed by no imitator, because none could approach her. Recently, with Alboni and Jenny Lind, we have had a partial echo of her. Perhaps her ravishing person served to swell the tide of public approbation of her ravishing voice. She enchained eyes and ears. Her earlier (not her earliest) efforts were first appreciated at the Park Theatre, and the predictions there uttered of her ultimate victories, were fully verified on her return to England. So far American appreciation did honor to the then state of musical culture with the New Yorkers.

In my medical capacity I became well acquainted with the Garcia troupe. They possessed good constitutions, and took little physic. But what I would aim at in the few remarks I have yet to make, is, to show that those who are not artists little know the toil demanded for eminent success in the musical world. Some twelve or sixteen hours' daily labor may secure a medical man from want in this city of great expenses and moderate fees; more than that time may earnestly be devoted for many years to secure the fame of a great opera singer. It seemed to me that the troupe were never idle. They had not crossed the Atlantic twenty-four hours ere they were at their notes and their instruments; and when we add their public labors at the theatre, more than half of the twenty-four hours were consumed in their pursuit. A President of the United States or a Lord Chancellor methinks might be easier reared than a Malibran. I dismiss all allusion to nature's gifts and peculiar aptitudes. It is assumed that brains are demanded in all intellectual business. The simplicity of life, and the prescribed temperance of these musical people, was another lesson taught me. How many things are attended to lest the voice may suffer! A taste of claret, a glass of lemonade, eau sucrée, were all the drinks tolerated, and scarcely a particle of animal food until the opera was over, when, at midnight, a comfortable supper refreshed their exhausted spirits, and gave repose to their limbs. The youth who aims at distinction in physic, in law, or in divinity, and who is at all cursed with indolence, might profit by studying the lives of these masters in song, as the naturalist philosophizes with the habits of the bee.

Many of this assembly, and particularly the ladies who now grace this audience, must well remember their old teacher, Signor Lorenzo Da Ponte, so long a professor of Italian literature in Columbia College, the stately nonagenarian whose white locks so richly ornamented his classical front and his graceful and elegant person. He falls within the compass of this imperfect address from his "lonely conspicuity," for the taste he cherished and the industry he displayed in the cultivation of Italian letters—more than two thousand scholars having been initiated in the language of Italy by him; and he is still more interwoven with our theme by his enthusiastic efforts to establish the Italian opera with us. He was upwards of sixty years of age upon his arrival in America, but enjoyed sturdy manhood. His credentials to consideration challenged the esteem of the philosopher, the poet, and the man of letters. His long and eventful life deserves an ample record. His own "Memoirs" in part supply our wants, and the sketch of his life by one of the members of our Historical Society, Samuel Ward, is a grateful tribute to his character, from the pen of an accomplished scholar and competent judge of his peculiar merits. I enjoyed the acquaintance of Da Ponte some twenty years. Kelly, in his reminiscences, has given us some idea of his early personal appearance, and his fanciful costume at the London opera. But his glory and inward consolation had not been attained until the Garcia troupe triumphed at New York, as erst at Vienna, in "Don Giovanni." The language of Italy and her music were deeply rooted in his heart. It was a day of lofty thought for the old patriarch, says his American biographer, when came among us Garcia, with his lovely daughter, then in the morning of her renown; Rosich, the inimitable buffo; Angrisani, with his tomb note; and Madame Barbieri, all led by our lamented Almaviva, (Dominick Lynch, Esq.) I must refer to the able articles on the introduction of the opera, written by a philosophical critic in the "New York Review and Athenaeum Magazine," for December, 1825. They constitute a record of the social progress of this city that cannot be overlooked. Da Ponte died in New York in August, 1838, at ninety years. His remains were followed to the grave by many of our most distinguished citizens, among whom were the venerable Clement C. Moore, the Hon. G. C. Verplanck, Pietro Maroncelli, the fellow-prisoner of Sylvio Pellico, etc. That his long life created no wasting infirmity of mind, was shown in a striking manner by his publication of a portion of the poet Hillhouse's "Hadad," not long before his final illness, and which he beautifully rendered in Italian with scholastic fidelity. The day before his death he honored me with a series of verses in his native tongue, partly, I concluded, in token of gratitude, and partly to evince to his friends that, though speech had nigh left him, his mind was still entire. He died firm in the Catholic faith, and was buried in the Roman Catholic Cemetery, Second Avenue.

Vicissitudes had made Da Ponte a great observer of life. His intimate associations with Mozart, the countenance and encouragement he received from Joseph II., his acquaintance with Metastasio, the lyric poet and writer of operas and dramas in Italy,* are prominent among the events of his earlier career, at which time he established his reputation as a melodramatist. It was easy to perceive, after a short interview with him, that his capacious intellect was filled with bookish wisdom. He had recitals at command for the diversion of society in which he chanced to be. He loved his beautiful Italy, and was prolific in praise of her authors. He extolled Caldani and Scarpa, and had many charming stories concerning the great illustrator of sound and morbid anatomy, Morgagni. Da Ponte attended the last course of instruction imparted by that pre-eminent philosopher, who had then been professor some sixty years. On that memorable occasion, when Morgagni was to meet his class for the last time, he summoned his cara sposa, Signora Morgagni, a lady of noble family, and his surviving children, some ten out of fifteen whom she had blessed him with, and, forming with them a group around his person, he pronounced a benediction on the University and on his class, and then appealed to his venerable wife for the fidelity of his domestic life, and to his children as the tokens of her love and affection. He was now in his ninetieth year. Da Ponte said he was never more in earnest, never more powerful, never more eloquent. Padua then lost the brightest teacher of anatomical knowledge the world possessed, and the University a name in its possession high above all others, which commanded the admiration of the cultivators of real science wherever the dignity and utility of medicine was appreciated. I am aware I have trespassed beyond my proper limits in this notice, but it was difficult to do otherwise. Perhaps at this very day, casting a look over the many schools of medicine established in this land, there is not an individual oftener mentioned in the courses of practical instruction, on certain branches, than Morgagni, though now dead more than two generations. I wished to draw a moral from the story, cheering to the devoted student in his severe toils to qualify him for medical responsibility. Morgagni, besides great professional acquisitions, was a master of elegant literature, an antiquarian of research, a proficient in historical lore. The learned associations of every order in Europe enrolled him as a member. His numerous writings, full of original discoveries, are compressed in five huge folios, and are consulted as a treasury of established facts on a thousand subjects. To his responsible duties, involving life and death, he superadded for more than sixty years, his University teachings, and died at ninety with his mental faculties entire. How was the miracle wrought? In the pressure of herculean labors, if enun ever dared to approach, an Italian lyric of Metastasio was all-sufficient for relief. By proper frugality he secured property; by a regular life he preserved health; by system and devotion he secured his immortal renown.

Thus much may suffice as an historical record of the introduction of the Italian Opera in New York, and, consequently in the United States.

* Metastasio came to Vienna in 1729, 20 years before Da Ponte was born. He died there in 1782.

An Impressive Funeral.

From the Home Journal.

The funeral of Mrs. RICHARD STORRS WILLIS, (wife of the Editor of the Musical World), which took place on Sunday, the eleventh instant, at the Episcopal Church in Twenty-ninth Street, was, and from many combining circumstances, unusually impressive. Residing opposite the vicarage, and directing the music of the church, Mr. Willis with his family held almost the same relation to its sacred associations as the family of the pastor. The funeral was separate from the usual service of the afternoon; but, as the body was borne across the street, and received at the entrance with the playing of a solemn dirge and with the reciting of the initiatory passage of the burial ceremony, the two naves of the beautiful structure were densely crowded with friends and mourners. The coffin was deposited before the chancel, and then commenced the singing of one of the most affecting beautiful chants it has ever been our privilege to hear. It was composed by Mr. Willis on the occasion of the death of the mother of the clergyman who was now to perform the service, and had been sung before, only on that one occasion. But, in addition to this touching interest, it was sung by one who was a personal friend of the deceased, and who, as a singer of sacred music, is probably without an equal. Julia Bodestein's voice, coming, as it always seems to do, through tears, was intensified, in the singing of this chant, to a weeping agony of sweetness almost supernatural. To the unutterable grief of the mourner it seemed, for that moment, to reach and lend an utterance! The rapt and tearful singer sang with her heart as well as with her wonderful skill, and there was a spell in it, it is not too much to say, which might well make the Angel of Death look back with sorrow on his victim.

Dr. HOUGHTON, the clergyman, departed from his usual custom by coming forward to the railing of the chancel and introducing the service with a brief address over the body. The young mother who lay before him had been one of the purest and loveliest of his flock. She was one of those rare completeness of character for whom their share of happiness in this world seems just enough. In the last hour of her life she expressed her thanks to God, that, as a wife and a mother, she had been as entirely blest as she could conceive it possible to be. Simple from her exceeding purity, beautiful in person and of manners made most winning by her utter unconsciousness and disinterestedness, she was too natural to seem to the common eye the exception that she really was. And, to these qualities alluding delicately, Mr. Houghton paid full tribute to the dead as one of the children of his flock. It was an address of subdued and touching tenderness, and marked throughout with exceeding judgment and good taste.

The service over and the handful of earth thrown upon the coffin, the body was borne to the hearse, attended by the wardens of the church as pall-bearers; and the funeral procession then went upon its way to Greenwood. Mrs. Willis was there laid in the family vault of her father, Mr. Carnes. She leaves three children, the youngest of whom is but three weeks old—a puerperal fever, consequent upon its birth, having been the occasion of her most sudden and unexpected death.

The Encore Nuisance.

(From Punch.)

Certainly in one respect, at any rate, we agree with a contemporary that the new St. James's Hall has been "—most promisingly opened, and the occasion gave hetero-entertainment and sign of a new era in our musical entertainments."

The respect which we refer to is that on the night of the Inauguration Concert the programme was gone through without there being an encore. As far as our experience enables us to judge, this fact is unparalleled in concerts now-a-days; and on this account alone, if for no other reason, the opening of the Hall deserves a special mention in our world-read columns. A performance of such promise reflects a like credit upon all who took a part in it, whether vocally or instrumentally, or indeed auricularly. The audience did their parts as well as band and singers, and the result was a success beyond the wildest hopes of the well-wishers of the hall. To inaugurate a concert-room without suffering an encore is an achievement such as even the most sanguine would have hardly dared to dream of; and every one of those who had a hand or voice or ear in it, we heartily congratulate upon the triumph they have won.

Encores are not solely matters of bad taste. They result from greediness more even than from ignorance. People have a tendency to try and get as much as they are able for their money, and are especially delighted if they can manage to get something more than what they've paid for. Your shop-huntress is charmed with half-an-ounce of over-weight, or an inch or two of ribbon more than has been charged her; and persons who contrive to swindle an encore are gratified by thinking that they've got a something given in, and are apt to pride themselves upon their sharpness in so doing. Now it may do these people good to take this ill conceit out of them; and the best cure for their cheating is to show their fancied sharpness only proves them to be flats. It may be assumed that the getters up of concerts know pretty well the money's worth of what they have to offer; and make allowance in their estimates for the chance of being asked to give a trifle over-measure. Caterers of music, in drawing up their programmes, reckon the encores as a part of the performance, and so shorten their selection, in order to make room for them. They have to pay their artistes for a fixed amount of work, and of course must keep the quantity within the stipulated limits.

Herr Splittskull, is engaged to sing four songs per night, and as he's sure to be encored, he is announced to sing two only. Herr Splittskull knows the current value of his notes, and of course will not part with them without their aureous equivalent. He is not a whit more likely to give a song in gratis, than a pastry-cook would be to let the buyer of a Bath-bun take another without paying for it. In persisting therefore to encore the Herr, the public in reality gains worse than nothing. It gets two songs sung twice over, instead of four distinct and fresh ones. It thinks to cheat the Herr, whilst in fact it cheats itself, getting two stale buns and paying for two new ones; and the verdict we should bring in would be, served it right.

We perfectly agree with our contemporary aforesaid that—"Mr. Owen Jones has shown both taste and skill in the internal decoration; and the St. James's Hall may be pronounced by far the most complete and highly ornamented concert-room in London."

Nevertheless, as there is nothing which Punch could not improve, if allowed to take his way with it, we think if Mr. Owen Jones had consulted us beforehand, we could have suggested an amendment in the way of decoration which might have pleased the audience as well as the spectators. We should have proposed that on the walls and ceiling of the hall, and especially conspicuous upon the orchestra and organ, the words should be enrolled—

"NO ENCORES ALLOWED."

All caterers of concerts should take this as their motto, and emblazon it on all their programmes and admission tickets; and efficient M. C's should attend at the performances, to take care that the rule be strictly carried out. Anybody wilfully demanding an encore, or aiding and abetting any swindler who might do so, should be taken up and sentenced to attend the House of Commons every evening for a week, to cure him of his wish to hear the same things over twice. If this tremendous punishment were vigorously enforced, we think that the Encore Nuisance would speedily be checked; and Mr. Punch and other sensible and rightly thinking persons might find it possible to go to concert-rooms in peace, without their having nightly to do battle with the fools who clamor for encores.

A Private Concert.

A good thing is not the less a good thing because it is done in a corner, nor is its influence naught. Indeed it is but manly, it is but Christian to believe that real influence for good in the long run is more proportioned to the quality, than to the publicity of any act; that the high purpose and true spirit are worth more than the great display; that the true thing on a small scale is better than the questionable and vulgar thing on the grandest; that a grain of gold outweighs a lump of copper. Such faith as this—for truly it requires Faith—is indispensable to the artist. There can be no real progress in musical or other Art without it. One must still have faith, patience to measure his success by the intrinsic excellence, the truthfulness of his performance, and not by the outward recognition of the world. The best things, those that have won fame worth having for their authors, were never done from the immediate motive of display, and would have miscarried and become superficial, false, and empty things, had they been dragged at once before a general audience. The artist, the public benefactor in Art, is he whose works, whose life still preach, for those who can receive, the highest and the truest, the ideal beauty, and who does not care to keep himself before the public. The popularizers, the great caterers for public amusements more or less artistic, the concert-giving speculators, and so forth, doubtless do good in their way; but the tendency of all this grand display would be to drag Art down, to bring all to the level of the lowest tastes and idlest listeners, were it not counteracted quietly by those who labor in more private spheres to make the highest music loved for its own sake.

In music it is eminently true, that one hears the best in private circles. It is almost impossible that a great concert should be thoroughly pervaded by an artistic tone; the gold it gives you always must have some alloy; the programme must be made up, like a newspaper, for too many and too multifarious tastes; you are inspired by listening to a noble piece, and then are rudely disenchanted by something that is vulgar; or, if the music be all of the best, there will be something to disturb you in the audience, something unmusical in the mere glare and glitter and distractions of the "well-filled, fashionable house." Good things are possible in private, which could not otherwise be realized at all. And it is to be counted among the best signs of musical improvement in our community, that, whether the opera and concert managers drive a thrifty trade or not, there is much excellent music organized in private circles. We have frequently alluded to the Quartet and Quintet parties, by the Mendelssohn Quintet and other Clubs, in private houses, where audiences of thirty, fifty, it may be a hundred, all true listeners,—if not sympathetic, yet at least respectful,—come into closer contact with the inspirations of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, &c., than is often possible in concert rooms.

But we have been led into this train of remarks especially at this time by the occurrence of another of the private concerts (the fourth this season) of that fine amateur club of singers, who have for several winters been engaged in the practice of some of the choicest and least known choral compositions, with solos, by Bach, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Franz, &c., under the severely careful and instructive training of perhaps the most competent musician in the country for that work, Mr. OTTO DRESEL. This gentleman devotes himself heart and soul, like a self-sacrificing artist, to the rendering of this one thing perfect in its way, (not that it is all he does, by any means), and his efforts are rewarded by the remarkable degree of unity, precision, delicacy and expression of the singing of this choir of twenty-five or thirty voices, and by the eagerness with which every opportunity to witness it is seized upon. Of course delighted listeners have wished that many more, that all the world in fact might hear it too, and get a new idea of what is truly excellent in music. But this in the nature of the case was impossible. The concert referred to, however, was almost an exception. It was a subscription concert given by the Club in compliment to Mr. Dresel, and the Chickering saloon was overflowing. The programme, of the same general character as those of former evenings when the club have invited their friends, was very rich and rare; to-wit:—

PART I.

1. Crucifixus from the Grand Mass by J. S. Bach.
2. Oratorio of Christus, Mendelssohn.
Recitative: Trio for male voices—"Say, where is he born, the King of Judea, for we have seen his star and are come to adore him."
Chorus: "There shall a Star from Jacob come forth and dash in pieces Princes and Nations," and Chorale.
Recitative: Chorus—"This man have we found perverting all the nation, and forbidding to render tribute to Cæsar."
Recitative: Chorus—"He stirreth up the Jews by teaching them."
Recitative: Chorus—"Away with Jesus, and give Barabbas to us."
Recitative: Chorus—"Crucify him."
Recitative: Chorus—"We have a sacred Law; guilty by that Law let him suffer."
Recitative: Chorus—"Daughters of Zion, weep for yourselves and your children."
3. Ave Verum. Mozart.
4. Chorus: "Come let us sing,"—"For the Lord is a mighty God,"—from 95th Psalm, Mendelssohn.
5. Morning Song, Robert Franz.

PART II.

6. Hymn (from Psalm 55.) for Soprano Solo and Chorus, Andante: "Hear my prayer," Mendelssohn.
Allegro: "The enemy cries!"
Finale: "O for the wings of a dove!"
7. Duet and Trio for Treble Voices, with Chorus, from "Athalie," Mendelssohn.
8. Two Choruses from "Armida," Gluck.
"Sougs of love in the grove sings the nightingale,"
"Great is the glory when laurels we gather."
9. Volkslied and Hunting Song, Mendelssohn.

That Crucifixus, from the great Mass by Bach, was the most tenderly, profoundly solemn music that we ever heard. The whole audience seemed breathless for some moments after the sounds had ceased. The voices rose and swelled and died away together, beautifully blended, in the successive waves of rich and mournful harmony. But we could not describe or analyze; music had done its perfect work; such strains are simply felt. This brief taste much increased the desire we have long felt to hear the Mass in B minor complete. The fragments left by Mendelssohn of his unfinished "Christus" were sung by the same choir, in the same place, a year or two ago. We thought then, and still think, that this third Oratorio, judging from the fragments, would have been the greatest of the three. At all events we have had nothing in this kind of music so intensely, thrillingly dramatic (leaving Bach's "Passion" music out of the account). The first fragment, consisting of the Trio of male voices (the three Magi), and chorus, is full of religious hope and wonder. The sympathetic, human tone of the narrative recitatives, by a tenor voice, contrasted against the angry bits of choral responses: "Crucify, crucify," &c., and "We have a sacred law," &c., seemed almost too painfully tragic. But the mournful chorus: "Daughters of Zion, weep," &c., one of the most beautiful that Mendelssohn has written, commencing with soprani and alti alone, is like the sweet relief of tears. The rendering of the whole was faithful and effective, and greatly helped out by the conductor's piano-forte accompaniment.

Mozart's Ave verum corpus is a model of pure, simple, flowing, perfectly blended religious harmony, in which no one voice or part stands out before another; and we never heard a purer specimen of choir singing,—all so true and smooth and balanced, and as it were instinctively regardful of all points of light and shade. We print the music in this number, and commend it to the study of all choirs.

"Come, let us sing," by Mendelssohn, is a bright and quickening chorus, fully rendering the spirit of the words, whose cheerful call sounds out from one set of voices after another, till the harmony is complete. The "Morning Song," by Franz, is one of the six "Songs for Mixed Voices," to which we alluded a few weeks since as having been republished by Messrs. Ditson & Co. They should be known in every circle of part-singers, or "Glee Clubs."

"Hear my prayer" (soprano with chorus) will be recognized as the beautiful piece of music which we have been printing for the benefit of our subscribers, and which is concluded in this number. We only wish that all the musical societies and choirs, who take it up, could have heard it so admirably rendered as it was that evening. There was a soprano of a sweet, pure, sympathetic quality, for which the solo ("O for the wings of a dove!" &c.), might seem almost to have been written; the first choral responses (in unison) were prompt and decided; and the pianissimo of the choral accompaniment to the melody, growing softer and softer at the close, gave just the right idea of how it should be sung. The pieces from "Athalia," (music to Racine's tragedy), are of much the same character, a duet of soprani, and then a trio of soprani and alto, each with chorus; sung by voices admirably suited to the music. How refreshing (in these days of overstrained and morbid pathos, of Verdi and the like) were those spontaneous, natural, simple, yet inimitable strains from Gluck, with their quaint, antique accompaniment—the first a warbling of whole forests full of birds, the last a swelling, joyous song of victory! The two little part-songs, by Mendelssohn, the first grave, the other wild and full of life, one of his most imaginative and striking, were finely sung, of course without accompaniment.

Now we have not alluded to this interesting Concert to excite the envy of those who had not the good fortune to be present. We simply point to it as an example, worthy to be imitated if not emulated; an example of what good things may be done by little social clubs of earnest music-lovers, who have voices, and some skill in reading music, by meeting in this way for practice of such sterling kinds of music, calling to their aid the most high-toned and competent professor they can find for teacher and conductor, and—for this is the condition absolute of all success—trusting him to the extent of letting him be perfect "autocrat" in the whole matter. Such circles will find good material for practice in the compositions we are publishing from week to week in this Journal. Let every member of a Club subscribe, and each will have a copy of a goodly number of such pieces in the course of the year.

From My Diary. No. 4.

April 27. — The Boston Quintet Club gave a concert at Framingham, last evening, which however, to my disappointment, I could not attend. The programme was excellent, made up from Mozart, Schubert, Haydn, &c. A Verdi trio was omitted and something else given instead. Two acquaintances who attended, speak in highest terms of the concert, and report that the audience, though small, was greatly interested in the music, and evidently appreciative and discriminating. One of my friends remarked "that the men played as if they loved their music!"

In looking back through the years during which the said Club has wrought in this field of chamber music, and comparing the state of things then and now, one sees that progress has been made. At first a small and rather variable audience gave the club its support in Boston. Now Chickering's room fills at their regular performances, and the club is called into many of the other cities and larger towns about. Wherever they go, they leave an abiding impression upon some minds that there is something in music above and beyond a mere tune or melody; they enlarge the ideas of those who hear them, and plant seed which will in time produce fruit. The musical public certainly owes a debt of gratitude to the men, who have with so much perseverance, labored on, often at sacrifice and under discouragement, devoting themselves to a conscientious study and performance of works often of great difficulty, when others would have met the wishes of an audience as well. In looking over the "annals" of the club one is surprised at the great variety and the almost invariably high character of their programmes; and it is only by such a review that one can form any adequate conception of the amount of laborious study which must have been devoted to this music, by men who at the same time had regular duties to perform as members of orchestras and as teachers.

Has the pecuniary reward been at all in proportion to the labor? Doubtful. The conviction forces itself upon the mind of any one who will look back, that nothing but a true love of Art—a really artistic spirit—could have kept this club so long together, and made it really one of our musical "institutions."

The announcement is a painful one, that he who has so long been at the head of the Quintette, and whose energy and perseverance must have been powerful elements in its success, leaves us for a residence where the position of the practical musician is other and better than here. But what has the musician here to look forward to? In other countries, where aid is not considered beneath the dignity of Government, and city authorities consider it their duty to use some of the funds, which, in America, are appropriated to fireworks, or the pockets of infamous officials, for the support of good music, whoever can by his talents gain admittance into the orchestra, is sure of receiving an annual stipend and of having something secure, when his active days are over. Thus Leipzig, Cologne, Düsseldorf, Frankfurt, Mayence and other cities, not one of which has a hundred thousand inhabitants, each has its fine orchestra, its club for chamber music, its city music director, and guards all against want, without compelling them to overtask their brains, and when superannuated sending them to the almshouse. But here no such provision is made either by the public or by any private foundation; it is no cause of surprise then that the overtasked artist should gladly accept an offer of a position, which at the same time insures him a less laborious life and a more certain future. Wherever AUGUST FRIES goes, God speed him! There are many who will miss his form and face at the Orchestral and Quintette Concerts.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — The beautiful Hymn: "Hear my Prayer," by Mendelssohn, which has occupied the last four numbers of the Journal, ends to-day, two pages short of our music printer's first calculation. We find ourselves therefore obliged to fill the two remaining pages at short notice. Fortunately, our publishers' rich stock of plates affords us just the very piece we want, of just two pages, that Ave verum, by Mozart, above referred to in the notice of a private concert. It is a leaf from Mr. Werner's capital collection of Masses and shorter pieces for the choirs of Catholic Churches, called "The Memorare," and is a specimen of many good things that may be found there, useful not for Catholics alone. We do not, to be sure, like the cross-grained look occasioned by the shape of the page; but the leaf is easily severed from its mate, so that the Mendelssohn Hymn can be stitched together by itself, or kept to be bound up hereafter with other pieces of like character which we shall publish. The loose leaf containing the entire Ave verum corpus, will serve clubs and choirs for practice, and (better still) perhaps induce them to seek more such treasures in the "Memorare."

Reilstab, the German critic, tells us that this Ave verum was composed during Mozart's stay in Potsdam and Berlin, in 1789, and gives the following interesting particulars about its origin:

"Mozart was invited to dine with the father of our present oldest and most worthy piano-forte teacher, Türschmid, also known as the excellent hornist of the royal orchestra. The conversation turned upon church music, and its use in sustaining the services of the church, and Mozart spoke with great animation for its employment in the manner of the Catholic Church. He suddenly sprang up, called for music paper, and seated himself at a table to write; the conversation at once ceased, in order not to disturb him, but he called out good-naturedly in his Austrian dialect: "Talk away, that don't disturb me, only no one must sing or utter even a single tone." And so in the midst of the conversation, he wrote in an incredible short time that wonderful piece of music, which he handed to the company with the words: "There you have something that will suit your church!"

Musical Chit-Chat.

This is May Day! May it be a bright one. At all events it will be bright enough in the Music Hall; trust the Warren Street Chapel folks for that, who there hold festival, with flowers and dances, with music in the form of reed band, brass band, and orchestra by the newly re-organized Germania Band. . . . Our School Committee have under consideration an order establishing an annual musical festival of the elder children of the public schools. This measure, if carried out in the spirit which we know to be intended, will do much to lend unity of method and true value to what is called the musical department in our common school education. We shall have more to say of it in due time. . . . The Mozart Society, in Worcester, Mass., gave this week a "ten cent concert" in Mechanics' Hall.

We ask attention to the announcement of the music store of our neighbors, Messrs. RUSSELL & FULLER, the successors of the well known firm of Russell & Richardson. Mr. Nathan Richardson has been compelled by poor health to withdraw from the business, and is now in Smyrna. His interest has been purchased by Messrs. Russell & Fuller, who have abundant capital and knowledge of the business, and whose stock in trade includes that of Geo. P. Reed & Co., and of Richardson's "Exchange," with the additions of the late firm. We congratulate our friends on this arrangement, which places on a solid basis one of the most complete and tasteful music depots in the country. Their publications are very numerous, and generally models of good style. The store itself is an attractive place, truly a musical "Exchange," where artists and music-lovers will meet with every courteous attention, and doubtless find whatever they may want.

The New York Philharmonic Society gave its last Concert for the season on Saturday evening, when were performed Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the overture to Tannhäuser, and an overture by Schumann. Miss ANNIE MILNER was the vocalist, and Mr. COOPER played a Concerto by Spohr. . . . The Misses HERON, of Philadelphia, have joined an Italian Opera troupe, of which Sig. Morelli is the impresario, and which is to give performances in Caracas, Rio Janeiro, and other parts of South America. Miss AGNES HERON is the soprano; Miss FANNY HERON, the contralto; Sig. GIANNONI, the tenor; MORELLI, the baritone; and ROCCO, the basso. . . . SALVI, the tenor, has become stage manager at Madrid.

The "musical man" of the Philadelphia Evening Journal wields a witty pen; witness the following very graphic bit-off of Manager Ullman's style of advertisements:

Suppose that Mr. Ullman is producing "William Tell." The "Amusements" column of this journal is entirely taken up with the announcement of the "colossal" event. Mr. Ullman assumes all sorts of attitudes towards the public. He prostrates himself before them. Tears are in his eyes, his lip quivers, and his whole frame is convulsed with sobs, as he refers to the pure and splendid character he has sustained in past time and asks to be informed whether he has done anything not to deserve their endorsement of his "William Tell" on this occasion.

He woos most tenderly. He represents himself to be devoured by respect and love for this discriminating Philadelphia public, and seductively presses his claims to a place in its affections. He pictures "William Tell." He paints, in sparkling and gorgeous hues, the music and action, and the apparel of the stage. He dwells upon Ronconi. He swells with pride as he points to the magnificent European fame of Ronconi's William Tell. He hints at the probable slovenliness and disrespect with which any other manager but Ullman would have produced Rossini's master-piece. He enumerates the gentlemen of the orchestra, the choristers, the costumers, the carpenters.

He makes his "William Tell" a matter of conscience and duty with the community. With a sublime burst of eloquence he closes his appeal, not, however, before he has depicted, in graphic and agitating terms, the perils of not procuring seats early, and laid down a strict code of laws for cabmen, policemen, and the city authorities generally.

Here is a chance for American composers; they do not shrink from anything; suppose they carry the war now into the enemy's own country,—compete with Italy on her own ground. We have a circular from the Imperiale e Reale Accademia delle belle Arti of Florence, offering prizes for the best production on a given subject in each of the Fine Arts: Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, Design, Engraving, and finally in Music. The subject for the latter is "the Canticle of Zacharia: Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, for four voices, with full orchestral accompaniment. The style must be ecclesiastical, in the Sixth Tone, with responses in the different vocal or instrumental parts; it must close with a Fugue with two subjects on Gloria Patri, &c. The works must be sent in by the 15th of August.

According to the New York Times, "The poor fiddlers had a hard time of it on Saturday—almost twelve hours of constant sawing. At ten o'clock in the morning the final rehearsal of the Philharmonic society; and at three o'clock the Musard Matinée; at eight the concert of the Philharmonic Society. What an opportunity for the purveyor of lager beer," &c. Of the two Berlioz nights the same writer says: "Berlioz's Classical pieces were listened to attentively by five or six august audiences, and it was perhaps owing to the intensity of their veneration that they failed to applaud."

On Tuesday evening the American singer, Miss JULIANA MAY, was added to the attractions of the thirteenth Musard Concert. THALBERG and VIEUXTEMPS' engagement at the same will "positively close" this week. On Tuesday was a "Grand Beethoven night," when were performed the Fifth Symphony; the overtures Namensfeier and "King Stephen" (both wholly new in this country, with the exception that the last was once performed in Boston); the violin Concerto (by Vieuxtemps), and the Allegro of the E flat Concerto for piano (Thalberg); followed by promenading and Musard-ing. Under the auspices of the same great Ullman-Musard institution, too, the first Sacred Concert has been given, including Mozart's "Requiem," a Symphony, and smaller selections. Thursday evening was the first night of the Oratorio "Elijah," with FORMES, CARADORI, &c., and the N. Y. Harmonic Society. Meanwhile "in active preparation, the Washington Quadrilles, by 500 performers (!) and the Electric Telegraph Quadrilles:" in short a great deal of every thing.

The Athenaeum mentions the death of the sister of Mrs. HEMANS, Mrs. OWEN, who set to music (as Miss BROWN) many of the lyrics of the poetess. She was an accomplished woman and possessed a good deal of musical talent. . . . The Courrier-Franco-Italien states the astounding fact (which goes ringing through the newspapers in every land), that ROSSINI has just written a new melody, or Nottuno, for the violoncello, which he has presented to M. Servais, the famous solo-player. . . . The New York Courier and Enquirer (whose literary and Art criticisms are always well considered), in noticing with just praise the last number of the Atlantic Monthly, says: "If any one can point out in a similar English publication of the present day papers equal to those on Intellectual Character, and Beethoven's Childhood and Youth, and the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table's discursive dissertation on Old Age, we should be glad to avail ourselves of his superior knowledge." By the way, the writer on Beethoven desires us to point out some typographical errors, which crept in, owing to his absence: In what is said of B.'s teacher, Pfeiffer, "chorist" should be Oboist; and the chivalrous "ballad," which he is said to have composed, should be ballet.

The Athenaeum speaks of a couple of new operas founded upon English novels:

"Scott's 'Quentin Durward,' done into an opera book by MM. Cormon and Carré,—this set to music by M. Gavaert,—has been just produced at the Opater Comique of Paris with elaborate splendor; and with the advantage of such a consummate actor as M. Couderc in the principal character. But, so far as we can trust the Gazette Musicale, the drama is found too serious, and (which we can believe, recollecting former compositions by M. Gavaert) the music is "brought in guilty" of heaviness and want of style. We have never augured a better issue for an opera founded on a subject which, however romantic it be, is also grim in the quality of its principal figure. There is no making a prima donna out of a Mary Tudor,—no fitting a Louis Onze with music by any one less subtle than M. Meyerbeer. What shall we not see next set as an opera? 'Clarissa Harlowe,' we perceive, has been taken in hand for the Vienna Italian season by M. Perelli."

A circular has been sent round in London indicating some of the objects of a proposed new musical Society. It is therein proposed that the Society shall give during each year:

"1. Grand Orchestral Concerts of the highest class. 2. Chamber Concerts, Instrumental and Vocal, including Quartetts, Glee, Madrigals, &c. 3. Illustrated Lectures on subjects relating to the History and Art of Music. 4. We all propose to publish a Periodical, which shall contain Literary matter—Historical, Biographical, and Critical—in connexion with Music. 5. To hold Conversazioni of the Members, at which Papers on Musical subjects shall be read. 6. To have Trials of New Compositions, and to give Commissions to Composers."

"M. d'Ortigue's feuilleton on 'Don Bruschino,' (says the Athenaeum) gives us a new reading of Signor Rossini's indolence, worth adding to the treasury of odd stories and smart sayings to which the composer's life and works have given occasion. The fatal facility of Donizetti is well known,—and such an anecdote being in circulation (for those who believe it) as his having put on paper his best act,—the fourth act of 'La Favorita,'—in a single night. It may have been on this occasion,—at all events, it was in the case of his bringing some prodigious quantity of unexpected music to rehearsal at a few hours' notice,—that some one complimented the fluent meas-tro on the feat, and asked whether it was true that Signor Rossini had written 'Il Barbiere' in fourteen days. 'Thereabouts,' was Donizetti's reply, 'for you know he is so lazy.'"

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 27.—"William Tell" drew three very fine audiences last week, and while all true connoisseurs recognized in its noble choruses, its admirably wrought concerted pieces, and the more than ordinarily elaborated orchestration, the grandest of our Italian Operas, Miss Flora McFlimsey and her white-kidded cavalier attendant vowed the chef d'œuvre of Rossini a "perfect drag," and sighed for the Gran Dio of Verdi.

Hereupon, the anxious impresario offered, for last night, the following immense combination:

1. The 4th act of Trovatore, with GAZZANIGA, BRIGNOLI, AMODIO, and our own (your own—pardon me!) ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, who, by the way, rapidly improves.
2. The 2nd act of Puritani, with LA GRANGE, RONCONI, and GASPARDONI.
3. The 3d act of Traviata, with GAZZANIGA, AMODIO, and BRIGNOLI.
4. The 3d act of Maria di Rohan, with LA GRANGE, RONCONI, and BOTTAEDI.

Certes, this was an immense propitiation to Miss Flora for the faux pas of having served up "Tell" three times for supper last week; and it filled the Opera House from parquet to dome. Not that alone, but it aroused a wild, Havana enthusiasm, during which the adored Gazzaniga especially received an ovation, the like of which was a sensation even to that blasé individual, "the oldest inhabitant." La Grange, too, encountered a spontaneous outburst of applause, which clearly evidenced to what an extent her finished style of vocalization is appreciated by all true lovers of music.

The Adonis of the Opera, Brignoli, drew down upon himself two thousand black lenses, for the ladies stare boldly, and sigh sentimentally, whenever he "goes on." As for Amodio, his welcome consisted in a genial round of applause, which meant something akin to the following: "We don't go wild about you, Fat Boy, but we appreciate you wialth." Ronconi's Duc de Chevreuse capped the climax to one of the most successful Opera representations ever offered to an American public, and sent the vast audience to their couches to dream of the most magnificent histrionic achievement of the lyric stage. Tomorrow night, (Wednesday,) this matchless doctor is to enjoy a benefit, for which he offers Linda di Chamounir, and the second act of L'Elisire d'Amore, with himself in the fine rôles of Antonio and Dr. Dulcamara; the latter being his first appearance here in a buffo character. Thereupon a new season, with the same artists, and additional novelties, is to be announced.

The performance last night numbered the 106th, since the opening of the Academy in February of 1857,—an average of two operas per week for the year. The N. Y. Tribune has noticed this fact in a most complimentary manner.

The Musical Fund Hall was the scene, last Tuesday evening, of a complimentary Concert, tendered to PHILIP ROHR, Editor of the "Deutsche Musikalische Zeitung," and leader of the "Musical Union." He was assisted by Messrs. FRAZER, THUNDER, RUDOLPHSEN, TAYLOR, Mrs. SHEPPARD, Miss FAAS, and others, who perseveringly struggled through a lengthy programme, despite a merciless storm, and an unremunerating audience.

SATTE is coming. At least there are an immense number of dull-red posters, gracing the brick walls and fences of the city, which bear in black letters, of considerable dimensions, the name of "Gustav Satter," and which are unquestionably the avant couriers of the pianist, whom some of his admirers beseech us to consider equal to Liszt; and as far superior to Thalberg as "Tell" is to "Traviata." Nous verrons! MANRICO.

NEW YORK, APRIL 19.—Our concerts seem to rise in quality as they decrease in number. MASON'S last Matinée, on Saturday, was an entertainment such as we rarely hear anywhere. The five names on the programme were taken from among the highest in Tone-Art. Beethoven, Handel, and Bach, represented different phases of the old school; Mendelssohn and Schumann its more modern development. The "Music of the Future" was left untouched. And various as was the character of the composers who bore these names, so unlike, too, were their works which were laid before us here. Each was a fair type of its creator. First came Beethoven's Quartet, op. 95, No. 11, generally considered, I believe, one of his less comprehensible ones. It was, however, so well interpreted by the excellence of its performance, that it belied its reputation on this occasion at least. The quick passages were played with a clearness and energy, and the slow, serious ones with a pathos, fullness, and depth of feeling, which made it difficult to believe that the performers were the same who "scratched" off this very piece in a most heart and ear rending manner two years ago. The same may be said, too, of Schumann's beautiful Quintet, in which Mr. Mason's uncommonly spirited and expressive playing was most worthily accompanied by the stringed instruments. The solemn, mournful march was particularly beautiful. The two remaining numbers of the programme were solos by Messrs. MASON and THOMAS. The former gave us a Fugue in E minor, by Handel,—the same, I think, which he played repeatedly just after his return from Europe, but now infinitely superior in its rendering—and a most characteristic Rondo Capriccioso by Mendelssohn—sparkling, fairy-like, and then again flowing on in lovely melody—a mixture of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" style and that of the Songs without Words. This was loudly encored, in answer to which demonstration the pianist gave us his pretty, rippling little "Silver Spring."

Decidedly the most wonderful performance of the concert was Mr. THOMAS'S playing of the celebrated Chaconne, by Bach. This young artist (and very young he is, although the stamp of genius matures his almost boyish face) bids fair to rise high in the musical world. His tone is pure and full, his command of his instrument very great, and his interpretation of the music he plays most faithful and artistic. The Chaconne is a strange composition, which must be heard often to be thoroughly appreciated; though even in first listening to it, you discover enough to wish to know it better. It is extremely difficult, and must be very fatiguing for the performer. It is intricate, and has no regular forms or themes to assist the memory; and yet young Thomas played the whole unflinchingly, without notes, and consequently with all the more freedom and abandon. His mechanism, too, gave proof of untiring industry in practice; but more than all, his evident enjoyment of what he was playing, and his thorough entering into the spirit of the music, showed the true artist in him. His choice of pieces also betokens real Art-love and reverence: he never plays any but good music. Such men are and ought to be the Missionaries of Art in this country. Few of them visit it; but in proportion as their numbers increase, and they keep steadily on their path, without letting necessity, or flattery, or thirst for fame turn them from it, their own true creed will spread and gain influence. Will the day ever come when Humbug succumbs to true Art in our land! This was once a hopeless question, but of late years a faint light has begun to appear. True, it breaks but slowly, very slowly, and the rays of the rising sun are still dimmed and thickened by the clouds which they shall finally disperse; but there is at least hope of fair weather. Of these sun-rays Mason's concerts are among the most effective; and we owe him and his fellow-laborers a vast debt of gratitude for their winter's work. Every one of these quiet, unpretending concerts has brought us something new, and nothing but what was good; and though at first the little hall was but scantily filled, the end of the series found it so crowded that a large room will be needed in its place next winter, when we hope that the ground now broken, will be farther tilled.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., APRIL 27.—Your compositor takes it upon himself to make nonsense out of one part of my last letter. For "time and money," it was printed "tissue and money."

Having made a good beginning by establishing a good and efficient "Philharmonic Society" in this "city of churches," we now propose to follow on with a "Harmonic Society," which is already organized and in working order. It is made up out of two small societies, one of which is the "Harmonic Society," a small vocal body, organized some two years ago, but which has never made much progress; and the other, a small band of twenty instrumental performers under Mr. CARL PROX. These two, united in one, under Mr. Prox as conductor, and styled the "Brooklyn Harmonic Society," propose to give two Concerts during the month of May, and the following are among the things to be performed:

Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven.
Overture "Magic Flute," Mozart.
Terzetto from "Titus," Mozart.
Easter Morn'ing, Chevalier Neukomm.
Cantata for Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.

In addition to the regular Orchestra belonging to the Society, some dozen instruments or more will be added from New York for these Concerts, and by the beginning of the next winter's season we shall have all we want as regular members of the Society.

LUTHER B. WYMAN, Esq., the President of the "Philharmonic," was unanimously elected President of this new society, and of course no better selection could have been made. Mr. Wyman is to Brooklyn in musical matters what your lamented CHICKERING was to Boston.

I regret exceedingly to learn that there is a feeling of jealousy on the part of the New York Philharmonic Society towards our Brooklyn Philharmonic, and a Resolution, I am told, is already pending before that Society to prevent the conductor or members of the N. Y. Society from taking any part in a similar Society out of New York. I do not believe such a resolution can pass, but if it does, depend upon it the New York Society will be the one most to suffer by it.

For the benefit of those who have taken any interest in the Brooklyn Congregational Singing discussion, I cut the following from Mason's Musical Review and Gazette: "At the Plymouth Church (Beecher's) we find congregational singing prevailing with an effect beyond the power of description."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Fly away o'er the Deep. Quartet and Solo. Thompson. 25
This Quartet has a very fine effect when sung by well blended voices. It is followed by a plaintive Solo for Soprano or Tenor voice, after which the Quartet is repeated.
- You need na come courting o' me. Wrighton. 25
In happy imitation of the peculiar style of Scotland's little national songs.
- My Father's a Drunkard. Song. E. F. C. 25
Describing the evils of intemperance.
- The two Rivers. German and English words. Franz Keiser. 25
A well-sustained, pathetic melody.
- Rouse, Brothers, Rouse. Russell. 25
Stirring music to a poem, by Charles Mackay.
- The Reason Why. Macfarren. 25
Playful and pretty. A Song for the parlor.
- Tell me, ye Winged Winds. Song with invisible Chorus. Thompson. 30
This well-known poem has received a very effective musical treatment at the hands of this favorite Song writer.
- Under a Hedge. Song. T. German Reed. 25
For friends of the beauties of nature, and particularly the lovers of flowers.

Instrumental Music for Piano.

- The Dripping Well. Characteristic piece. Gollmick. 30
This piece, when neatly played, with a light, crisp touch, sounds quite charming. You see the little sparkling drops trickle down, now slow, and now faster, as if following some little caprice of their own.
- Polka, Mazurka Brillante. F. Abt. 40
It is very seldom that this Composer, whose proper calling seems to be the Field of Song, writes for the Piano. If he does, however, his cleverness and polished taste do not show to less advantage. This Polka Mazurka is fresh and sparkling, and should be a welcome addition to a Lady's Music Portfolio.
- Auld Lang Syne. Varied. Charles Grobe. 50
A very fine arrangement and variations, showing forth this familiar melody in all its simple beauty.
- Lucknow Quadrille, founded on popular Scotch airs. T. Comer. 30
It will be unnecessary to commend this Quadrille to any one who has seen the performance of "Jessie's Dream on the Fall of Lucknow." To others we will remark that Mr. Comer has collated the Gems of Caledonia and wrought them into a graceful Ballet, for the benefit of all lovers of dance music.
- Avonia Waltz. J. W. Turner. 25
- Speedwell March. A. B. 10
- Fair Star Waltz. D'Albert. 15
- Rockriver Waltz. D. N. Hood. 25
Dance Music, well adapted for its purpose.
- Le Jeune Artiste. F. Beyer, each 50
This is a collection of very brilliant Fantasias, composed expressly for far advanced pupils, whose hands cannot yet reach an Octave. Three numbers issued, viz.: No. 1 on "Lucia," No. 2 on a Favorite Tyrolean air, and No. 3 on a Melody in Bellini's "Romeo and Juliet." These are the only Compositions of this kind extant. Teachers, therefore, will do well to keep them in mind.
- The Fall of Delhi. Characteristic March. Glover. 25
Pretty March, with bits of Indian melody.
- Vaillancé. Polka militaire. Varied. Charles Grobe. 50
The beauty of this much admired Polka is but enhanced by this arrangement.

Books.

THE NEW GERMANIA. A collection of the most favorite Operatic Airs, Marches, Polkas, Waltzes, Quadrilles, and Melodies of the day. Arranged in an easy and familiar style for four, five, and six instruments. By B. A. Burditt. Price, $1.25
A very desirable collection of instrumental music; one that the musical community have long required, and one for which the thousands of small hands and amateur clubs throughout the country will be very thankful. The Melodies are of that class which the great mass of the people, both as performers and listeners, at once adopt as their own and stamp as "favorites." They are very finely arranged, and, as the title indicates, in a style easy, familiar and acceptable to all. Mr. Burditt has been long and favorably known as the leader of one of the best Bands in this city, and as a composer and arranger of this class of music. His long experience has enabled him to determine correctly as to what was wanted in a collection of this kind, and how it was wanted; he has therefore acted understandingly in the preparation of this volume.

Schumann on Mendelssohn.

OVERTURE TO THE LEGEND OF THE FAIR MELUSINA.

[First heard in the Leipzig Concerts in December, 1835.]

Nothing troubles many persons more, than the impossibility of deciding, which of the overtures of Mendelssohn is really the most beautiful, the best. Even about the earlier ones the question was difficult enough,—and now a fourth appears. Florestan therefore divides the parties into Midsummer-Night's-Dreamers (by far the strongest), Fingallers (not the weakest, especially in the other sex), and so on. That of the Melusinites may indeed be called the smallest, since at this time the overture has been heard nowhere in Germany, except in Leipzig; and England, where the Philharmonic Society first brought it out as their own property, could only be called in as a corps du reserve.

There are works of so fine a spiritual structure, that hearish criticism stands before them quite abashed and only offers compliments. This was the case with the "Midsummer-Night's-Dream" overture (at least I do not remember to have read any but poetical reviews of it); and it is now again the case with the overture to "The Fair Melusina."

We think that, to understand it, no one needs to read the long-spun, although very richly imaginative tale of Tieck, but at the most simply to know, that the charming Melusina was inflamed with violent love for the handsome knight Lusignan, and married him under the promise that he would leave her certain days in the year alone. One day it breaks upon Lusignan, that Melusina is a mermaid—half woman and half fish. The matter has been variously worked up, in words, as well as in tones. But one must not seek in this, any more than in the overture to Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's-Dream," to trace any such coarse historical thread.* True to his poetic manner of conceiving every subject, Mendelssohn here sketches only the characters of the husband and the wife, of the proud, knightly Lusignan and the enticing, self-surrendering Melusina; but it is as if the waves of the sea came over their embraces and overwhelmed and parted them again. And here may every listener perchance feel revived in him those pleasant images, with which the youthful fancy so delights to linger, those legends of a life deep down beneath the waves, full of shooting fishes with gold scales, full of pearls in open shells, full of buried treasures, which the sea has taken from man, full of emerald castles towering one above another, &c. This, it seems to us, is what distinguishes this overture from the earlier ones: that it as it were narrates these sort of things right on, quite in the manner of the legend, and does not itself live them. Hence at first sight, superficially regarded, it seems somewhat cold and dumb; but how things live and weave there in the deep, admits of clearer expression through music, than through words; wherefore the overture (we must confess) is better, by far, than this description of it.

* A curious person once asked Mendelssohn, what the Overture to Melusina meant peculiarly. M. quickly answered: "Um—a mesalliance."

What we find to say of the musical composition, after twice hearing and a few occasional peeps into the score, limits itself to what is understood of course,—that it is written by one who is a master in the handling of form and of material. The whole begins and ends with a magical wave figure, which now and then emerges in the course of the piece, and which has the effect, before alluded to, as if one were suddenly transported from the battle place of violent human passions out into the vast, earth-embracing element of water, particularly from the point where it modulates from A flat through G to C. The rhythm of the knightly theme in F minor would gain in pride and consequence by a still slower tempo. Tenderly and caressingly still sounds to us the melody in A flat, behind which we descry the head of Melusina. Of single instrumental effects we still hear the beautiful B flat of the trumpet (near the beginning), which forms the seventh to the chord;—a tone out of the primeval time.

At first we supposed the overture written in six-eight measure, owing perhaps to the too quick tempo of the first performance, which took place without the presence of the composer. The six-four measure, which we then saw in the score, has, to be sure, a less impassioned and a more fantastic look, and keeps the player at all events more quiet; yet it always seems to us too broad, too extended. To many this perhaps seems insignificant; yet it rests upon a feeling not to be suppressed, which in this case I can only utter, but not prove its justice. Whether written so or so, the overture remains as it is.

OP. 33. THREE CAPRICCIOS.

It often seems as if this artist, whom chance already at his baptism called by the right name (Felix), broke certain bars, nay chords out of his "Midsummer-Night's-Dream," and expanded them and worked them up again into single works, somewhat as a painter works up his Madonna for all sorts of angels' heads. In that "Dream" for once the artist's dearest wishes flowed together to their goal: it is the result of his whole being—and how significant and beautiful it is, we all know.

Two of the above Caprices might belong to an earlier period; the middle one alone seems recent. The others, too, could have been written by other masters; but in this middle one stands upon every page as in great letters: F. M. B.; above all I love this one and hold it to be a Genius, which has secretly stolen upon the earth. Here is no straining and storming; no spectre haunts, and never a fairy teases; everywhere you tread upon firm ground, upon flowery, German ground; it is like a Walt's summer flight over the country, from Jean Paul. And though

I am almost convinced that no one can play this piece with such inimitable grace as the composer, and see some reason in the opinion of Eusebius, that "he (the composer) might with this music make the most loving maiden for some moments false," yet this transparent, shimmering vein, this opaline color, this finest play of features cannot be entirely suppressed by any one.

How different from this are the other Capriccios! They seem in no way related to the middle one. In the last especially there is a certain suppressed, speechless rage, which becomes tolerably subdued towards the end, but then breaks out again to heart's content. Why? who can tell! one is at times even wild, not about this or that, but as if he would like with "a most gentle fist" to dash right and left into the world in general, and dash himself out of existence, should this humor not be tolerated. The Caprice may affect others differently; this is the way that it affects me. But on the other hand we shall all agree about the first of the three, in the feeling of a gentler sadness, asking and receiving comfort from the music into which it plunges. More we reveal not; let the next look of the reader fly to the book itself.

Mass Music—New Mass by Gounod.

From the London Athenæum, (H. F. CHORLEY.)

Solemn Mass, for Soli, Chorus, Orchestra and Organ Obligato—[Masse Solennelle, &c.] By Charles Gounod. (Paris, Lebeau.) We are acquainted with no monograph on "The Mass" which treats the Roman Catholic Church Service as affording scope for the musician. Yet a more fertile subject could hardly be propounded:—even to a writer who avoided the traditional and canonical sides of the question, and who did not presume to decide how many genuflections at the altar—accompanied or not by certain voices in choir or orchestra—are (because they were) to be provided for, as matters of first and last importance. Such an essayist, supposing him neither Ambrosian nor Gregorian, would have to begin with a pausing pause at Palestrina, who by his "Missa Papæ Marcelli" replaced the school of church pedants, and who carried unaccompanied choral Service-music to a perfection which no successor has reached. Later must come an appreciation of the dilution or difference of style, in Roman Service-music, wrought by the permission of rhythmical melody, of individual display, and of orchestral admixture in the Church; or, to put it otherwise, by the admission there of operatic materials. The writer would presently arrive at the Claris, Colonnas, Erbas, and other writers in church vogue when Handel was in Italy. It would be impossible for him to pass such an example of out-lying divination or dramatic force as is displayed in the Roman Catholic music of Sebastian Bach—a composer who has been pronounced by the Separatists in their jargon as the Protestant writer of Service-music,—a Lutheran living in a far country,—within the limits of a homelier (not narrower) creed,—beyond the spells of Italian vocal seduction; and yet who was capable of producing the loftiest contemporary work of its class. Such is Bach's mass in B minor. Parts of this "Credo" could not be exceeded, though in other passages of this Confession of Roman Catholic faith, it is curious to observe how the Protestant writer availed himself of modern Romish example to produce merely sweet sounds and delicious melodies, without any relation to the text, save such as could be established by a herald discussing a canting motto. An apologist of this order might possibly, by stretch of ingenuity, defend Sebastian's setting of the "et unam sanctam et apostolicam ecclesiam," to the pastoral melody with which it is mated; but by no one less far-fetched could the mood of the musician, as interpreting a text, be defended. Nevertheless, allowing for these specks, aberrations, puerilities, as may be, this Mass by old Protestant Bach towers among other Roman Catholic orchestral Masses written during the first half of the eighteenth century. Nor can we recall any specimen by Italian writer of corresponding or later date, which so notably stands its ground. Tuneable and gracious Motets and Sacred Songs have been given out in plenty—fragments as admirable as Pergolesi's well-known "Gloria" (the Gloria of Glorius for Christmas time, in right of its cheerful and pastoral beauty); but a single Southern grand Mass of the period (except in the form of a Requiem), which lives, does not occur to us.

The first name among the newer people who conciliated instrumental and choral writing, with something like an equal balance, written in the Mass-books, to be remembered, is that of Haydn: whose Catholic Service-music, taken as a whole, rises higher in strain than Mozart's. It is true that at times Haydn gave way to his cheerfulness of temper more than befits the text, that some of his "Kyries" are anything but supplicatory,—that more than one "Benedictus" by him could be cited in a tone approaching hilarity,—yet there is hardly one Service in which the consummate melodist and man of science does not rise in some one movement or phrase to the height of the words; and Haydn's third or "Imperial Mass," as it is called, has a glow and a charm which, in spite of our severer judgment, are irresistible. With Haydn's Masses, those by Mozart are generally coupled, though somewhat unfairly—because to the disadvantage of the more modern and greater composer. Setting aside his "Requiem" and his "Ave Verum" (that hymn of hymns most exquisite), in no place does Mozart seem to us to have been so little present to himself, so little master of his art, as he was in the Catholic church. He could not write what was otherwise than melodious. He had at his fingers' ends—as a plaything—all the science and tradition which his predecessors had accumulated;—but whether his compelled service in the family of the Prince Archbishop had given him a distaste for the Church, or whether his predilections propelled him towards the stage, let others say—certain it is, that his Masses are (for Mozart) theatrical, mundane, slight, inexpressive,—ranking low—the stature of their writer considered, and without question inferior to productions for the same purposes by Hummel, Cherubini, and Beethoven.

The masses of the last two composers claim a few words. The first are admirable in the balance of power which they exhibit—sedate, superb, stately: often expressive, without any sacrifice of voices to orchestra or of orchestra to voices. The very dryness—to repeat an epithet employed by us before—which characterizes Cherubini, in part ascribable perhaps to the influences of German study and French residence over not the most genial of Italian natures,—gives to his Masses that certain dignity which belongs to the utterances of those who are reserved and chary of displaying emotion. He is often august,—seldom warm,—more rarely still tender. No science is obtruded, but we feel that science has been there. The brain of understanding, as well as the heart of love, are in his prayer and in his praise. With reference to more technical considerations, it may be remarked that the peculiar richness of Cherubini's orchestral arrangements eminently fitted him to write full Services for the Church. Sustained and complete fullness like his, without heaviness (such as may be found in the full writing of Dr. Spohr)—his brilliancy, without strident acuteness (such as wears out the ear in the music of Dr. Marschner, Lindpaintner, and certain French composers)—eminently fitted Cherubini for any Temple in which the pomp should not oppress nor the glory pierce too keenly. We have elsewhere spoken of the transcendent solemnity of his Funeral Mass. On former occasions, too, we have endeavored to range aright the two Catholic Services left us by Beethoven—the last, however, a Service of which no use could possibly be made. Among all existing Masses, Beethoven's first, in C, ranks perhaps the highest: for the manner in which it is sustained throughout, for its nobility of design, and for its completeness of execution. Yet, it is the work of Beethoven which has found the fewest commentators. M. Berlioz, with true French insouciance, dismisses it as a sort of pasticcio, into which music written for other uses had been unwrought. MM. Lenz and Oulibicheff are too violently partizan on the gold and the pewter sides of the shield, respectively, to have troubled themselves to analyze a whole which gives no space for dithyrambics concerning "styles,"—nor outlet for that mystical jargon to which the mathematical rejoinder is commonplace sarcasm. This Mass in C seems to have crept forth from Beethoven's desk, little thought of, little prized,—no object of its maker's own rhapsodies nor of the study of his pupils,—to have been made, in short, with less consciousness than distinguished Beethoven generally when he was making any work of importance. Is it for this very reason that it is one of Beethoven's highest works? that the strain which is observable in all his later productions is nowhere to be recognized? It would be useless to speculate how far the self-effacement enjoined by Catholicism,—how far the indifference of a stubborn man of genius (who could only conform when he was indifferent) have contributed to the natural beauty and the devotional propriety of this work. This Mass remains, and its fame, we fancy, may grow—when time shall have swept away the haze, and the cobweb, and the false light, which in days of the early present are sure to gather round the memory of the dead.

Though the matter for remark seems to grow under the eye, while we are offering remarks,—we must restrain ourselves simply to point out, that, besides the pure Italian, and Italian-German, and pure German school of Mass writers, there has been, ever since the days when pilgrimages to Val de Grace were made, a school of French Catholic Church composers, distinct and national. Let us name but two recent writers—Gossec and Lesueur:—the one dry and scholastic; the other, grand, dull, and a little sickly, but both as far from Italy or Germany as are the Churches of Saint-Eustache or Saint-Sulpice from the Cathedrals of Cologne and Bamberg, Magdeburg, Ratisbon, or from the sacred buildings of Venice, Ravenna, Pisa, or Rome.

The above slight outlines could be doubled in number, and filled up by any amount of examples required. From such mere indications, as they offer, however, it will be gathered that "The Mass" has been considered susceptible of every variety of musical treatment, in spite of the attempt from time to time to establish certain forms as final and canonical. Man's genius will have its play when it is laid on the altar—let the purists and disciplinarians say what they will, concerning chosen herbs as orthodox, or elect chords as not to be transgressed without overleaping the boundaries which separate sanctity from propriety. Michael Angelo will have his Church of Santa Maria degli Angeli, as well as Erwin von Steinbach his Strasburg spire. So, to come to our point, this French Mass, with its novelties, is religious music of the loftiest tone; though its author follows in the wake of none of the great composers; and though, therefore, he must abide to be ill spoken of, for awhile, by those who can only endure certain works, or certain authors, or a certain period: who can pray under the dome of St. Mark's, but not beneath the dome of St. Peter's; who can sigh in unison to the "Lachrymosa" of Mozart's "Requiem," while they are shocked past consolation by the opening of Rossini's "Stabat." A solemnly devout spirit breathes through this Mass, but the "conventionalities" have not trammelled M. Gounod. He appears to have treated the text of the Service at once spiritually and scenically, (and that the rite, when performed on a grand scale, is scenic, none will deny). While there is not a bar from first to last which can be complained of as secular in its excitements and associations, a taste for what is ornate and picturesque is present everywhere, pointing out the scene of the Mass to be some vast temple, and its occupation one of those grand festivals when praise rather than prayer is the mood of the hour. The work is grand in design, simple in detail, rich in color, exquisite in finish, always pompous, never severe; neither Italian nor German in its tone and style, but as French as the Gothic of La Sainte Chapelle, or as the pulpit eloquence of Massillon, or as the finest cloister-picture by Philippe de Champagne; a new national hymn, in short, to be laid together with those of Palestrina, Mozart, Cherubini, and Beethoven.

Let us specify the peculiarities which mark the country of this Mass. The solis are a trio of voices, not a quartet; our neighbors, till the other day, having hardly possessed such a commodity as an alto voice (their "haut-contre" in no respect representing this). The harp is a necessity in the score; the bassoons are in quartet, not in duet, as with us. For the disregard of an uniform tonality in all the movements, precedent may be offered in Mozart's and Beethoven's Masses. On the other hand, M. Gounod's administration of the organ is masterly; the vocal parts are written in that part of everybody's voice where everybody sings best—and the instrumentation is ingenious without being super-refined. The "Gloria" contains the greatest innovation, though the conception of what may be called a celestial treatment of the words was anticipated in "The Messiah." M. Gounod opens this division of his Hymn with a single soprano voice, supported by a chorus, breathing, not uttering words, and these aided by a tremolando of violins, a few harp-chords, and a delicate wind instrument or two; reserving the full burst of jubilation for the phrase "Laudamus te." The subsequent passage for the solis, "Domine Deus," is both powerful and elegant. In the "Credo," by way, it may be presumed, of giving an effect of recitation, the principal clauses are given out in large unisonal phrases—M. Gounod having thrown the weight of his contrapuntal science into the orchestra, which at once diversifies and supports the cantilena of the voices, by a phrase not less muscular but more rapid in motion and susceptible of being heightened and enriched at every return of the theme. The effect of climax thus obtained is singularly vigorous and legitimate. Very ample, serene and lofty is the close, in which the movement finishes on the words, "Et vitam venturi seculi," where the aerial commencement of the Gloria is reproduced with an intense depth of glory added to its luminous coloring. Another novelty in the "Credo" to be signalized, is the manner in which the verse "Et Incarnatus" is set—to be breathed pianissimo almost without accompaniment, a few chromatic progressions adding a tone of mystery and awe to the recitation. The usual practice has been to treat this verse with great intricacy; but we are here shown how the desired result may be obtained by a totally opposite mode of procedure.

The "Credo" is followed by a short, instrumental offertorium in A flat; felicitous as a specimen of melody and harmony, drawn out by that thorough use of the powers of the stringed quartet, to which imperfectly taught musicians can never attain. Then succeed the "Sanctus" and "Benedictus," which have been already heard in London. The former, to our thinking, contains one of the noblest solos for a tenor voice in the library of religious music. There has been some change in the instrumentation of both movements. After this comes a rich and flowing "Agnus Dei,"—lastly, the "Dominum salvum fac," (to bring home the Mass to the key of G, in which it began), which is as ingeniously presented for the army and the people, with obstinate intrusions of characteristic instrumentation, as though M. Meyerbeer had done it. The best of such settings is a mere tour de force, and one, under any circumstances, which appears more difficult of accomplishment than it is.

In conclusion, we commend M. Gounod's "Mass" to the care of all who in music have open minds

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Awful Announcement.

A Gigantic Musical Festival, on a scale of unprecedented pretentiousness, and unmitigated impudence, will be given in this village on Wednesday evening, the 32d instant, under the entire direction, and sole Conductorship of Major General, Brigadier Lieutenant Colonel, the Captain Dooemall, Esq., standing Professor of rafts, steamboats, law, music and Brass, and the Managing Committee being fully sensible of the fact, "that it is better to perform good music badly, than not at all," have secured for this purpose, at an "Awful Sacrifice," with the most reckless prodigality, and without the slightest regard to either cost, or propriety, the following Imminent Talent: Professor English, with a name, and a reputation. Dingleby Dabbler, Esq.; Wilful Dauntless, Esq.; A. Barytone, Esq.

Low Doubledee, Esq.; Primo Subbasso; Profondo Orphicleido (positively his first appearance).

The Managing Committee having made extensive and costly arrangements for the speedy issuing of the Programmes, most respectfully announce that they will be in readiness for delivery at our Music Shop, on Wednesday morning the 32d instant, (only) between the hours of 12, and 10 minutes past, and at that time the Clergy, heads of Families, and Family circles will be taken in, but no paper money, on any consideration.

Among the experiments announced in the Programme, are the following:

Mr. Dauntless will attempt the performance of a difficult Song, and be frustrated on the Piano-forte by Mr. Dabbler.

Mr. Barytone will practice (to no purpose) a very difficult Recitative and Air, accompanied by circumstances beyond his control—Circumstances, Mr. Dabbler.

IMMENSE ATTRACTION.

In order to test the acoustic properties of the Hall, Mr. Doubledee has consented to sing his celebrated variations, on the well known air "Oft in the Stilly Night," accompanied by the boys outside, and at the conclusion he will slowly go down to the double B flat, and after holding it with a gradual crescendo for eighteen bars, he will sit down. N. B.—If this piece should be redemanded by the audience, Mr. Doubledee will sing "Deeper and Deeper Still."

The appearance of the last English Pianist in his world-renowned Phantasmagoria, entitled "Gemon-tioskiontigon," (for the 9386th time,) introducing such a wonderful imitation of the Drum and Fife, that the audience will collectively march out of the Hall. N. B. A silver cup of the value of $50, will be given to any person remaining in the Hall at the close of this performance. No words can adequately convey the slightest conception of the enormous and frightful difficulties contained in the "Gemon-tioskiontigon," but the audience will find that Professor English will meet, and vanquish them with an ease which staggers credulity, bewilders the imagination, and baffles description.

N. B.—No one should fail to be present at this performance, "whose wish it is to promote the general welfare of the Arts and Sciences in their purity."

Professor English has kindly consented to teach the Drum and Fife business, to a very limited number of pupils. Terms, $1.00 for thirty lessons, payment invariably in advance. Parsons, Lawyers, Farmers, and Tinkers, traded with, but most positively no paper money taken.

The following striking notices are extracted from newspapers, books, and other sources, proving beyond the shadow of a doubt, that He is no ordinary musician:

"He is the greatest Pianist of modern times."—London Court Journal.

"Everywhere shines conspicuously his comprehensive knowledge of all the secrets of great piano-forte playing, his execution is prodigious, his style faultless, and his compositions marvels of high classical art."—London Times.

"In the performance of compositions embracing every known difficulty he is without a rival, and in the bringing out of the Canto fermo, with the prodigious thunder of both wrists, the auditor staggers into the belief of impossibilities."—Berlin Musical World.

Who would dare to question such an authority as this?

"He is a most a splendid Organist."—Greenland Courier.

The Managing Committee have the honor to inform the musical public, that they are in treaty with the Messrs. Broadwoods of Boston, for the extensive use of FOUR of their incomparable Piano-fortes, each of them containing a high pressure Sheriff's attachment. These instruments will contain the double patented, grand diagonal sided, top and bottom inverted repeating action, with magnificently rounded scales, and heavily embossed strings, inlaid with the richest mother of pearl, ivory, and sandal wood. Roman arch rest brace, patent Corrugated Treble, Alto, Tenor, and Bass sounding boards (warranted unfathomable) double side nuts, round cornered all over, with five square toed, bow legs, carved late in the autumn, including a patent double inverted cast iron Suspension Bridge, with side lights back and front and thoroughly macadamized in all directions with the most expensive, and richest variety of the choicest metals.

At the conclusion of the Concert, these Piano-fortes will be offered at private sale. Each of them cost $500, reduced price $75.00. No paper money taken, on any consideration.

An intermission of two hours between the First and Second parts, during which "The New Band," (consisting of nine distinct Amateurs) will practice an endless variety of new and difficult music.

Special Notice—The Managing Committee having learned from a local newspaper, that the surrounding towns abound with musical talent, they have determined to enter into immediate negotiations for the engagement of 250 of these unknown Professors and Artists, with the intention of bringing before the public, (and without any previous rehearsal,) the following Classical Works:

Bach's "Passion" music.

Joe Hinks's Anthem—"My friends, I am going a long and tedious journey."

Handel's (Dettingen Te Deum).

A selection of twenty-eight tunes from the "Pious Triangle," a new work for Choirs, Congregations and Family Circles, price $5.00 per dozen.

Beethoven's (Grand Mass in D).

The whole to conclude with Ebenezer Psalm-Smither's arrangement of the Old Hundred Psalm Tune, led off by Consider Meekins, and joined in by the audience "With one consent."

The Last Years of Robert Schumann.

From the Biography of Wastielewsky.

The symptoms of disease which had shown themselves already in the year 1852, were augmented by additional ones in 1853. Especially was it the so-called moving of the tables which put Schumann in real ecstasies, and in the full sense of the word, moved his senses.* He wrote about it to Ferdinand Hiller, April 25th, 1853:

"Yesterday, for the first time, we have been moving tables. A strange power! Imagine: I asked him, how the rhythm was of the two first measures of the Symphony in C minor, (Beethoven's?) He hesi-tated with the answer longer than usual; but at last he began:

* When I visited him in May, 1853, I found him lying on the sofa, reading a book. Asking him what it was, he answered with emphasis: "Don't you know about the spiritual manifestations?" "Well, well," I said, smilingly. But then his eyes, usually half-closed, became large and ghastly, and with a mysterious expression he almost whispered, in a slow manner: "The tables know every thing." When I saw this fearful seriousness, I acquiesced in his strange opinion. Then he called in his second daughter, and commenced to experiment with her, upon a small table. The whole scene frightened me very much.—Author of the Biography.

but first a little slowly. But when I told him that the tempo was quicker, he hastened to heat the right time. I also asked him whether he could tell me the number of which I thought? He said, quite right, "Three!" All of us were filled with astonishment." And also, under April 29th: "We have repeated our experiments; nothing but wonders!"

At this time he suffered also occasionally from delusions of hearing, by saying that he heard a certain tone, which in reality nobody but he could hear. One of his acquaintances meeting him in a public place one night, at Dusseldorf, saw him putting down the newspaper, exclaiming: "I cannot read any longer; I hear continually, A." However, as these symptoms went off again, no particular notice was taken of them.

That Schumann suffered constantly, may be seen from a letter he wrote in July, 1853, in which he said: "I have not got back my full strength, and have to avoid all greater works of a fatiguing character." It was for this reason that he could only partly share the conducting the musical festival at Dusseldorf, 1853, by leading only the first concert (in which he had once more a decided triumph with his Symphony in D minor) and two numbers on the third day.

The end of the year 1853 brought for Schumann two events of joy, the last he had in his life. The first refers to his acquaintance with Johannes Brahms, whom he introduced in the columns of his former newspaper, Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, as the musical Messiah of the coming age; and the second was his journey with his wife through Holland, which, according to all the statements in the papers, as well as of eye-witnesses, was like a "triumphal procession."

At the end of December, Schumann returned from this journey to Dusseldorf, 1853, where that fearful event soon happened which took him forever away from the world and from Art. With exception of a short excursion to Hanover, Schumann lived very retired in the months of January and February, 1854, the last time which he spent with his family. Besides the inditing of the Gesammelte Schriften, which he prepared for publication, he occupied himself with a literary work which he called, "Garden of Poets." The leading idea was to collect every thing which had been said by the principal poets of all ages about music. He had contemplated this work in former years, and for this purpose also collected the sayings of Jean Paul and Shakspeare. He was about to continue the work with regard to the Bible, and the Greek and Latin classics, when the old symptoms of his disease appeared with renewed vehemence, and rose to such a height as to darken his intellect forever.

First the old delusions of hearing came back. Schumann thought a tone was pursuing him constantly, and which developed itself by and by into harmonies and entire compositions. At last he heard also voices of spirits, which spoke to him sometimes mildly, occasionally in a tone of reproach, and which during the last fortnight of his stay at Dusseldorf took every night's rest from him. One night he suddenly left his bed, and asked for a light, saying that Schubert and Mendelssohn had sent him a theme, which he had to write down immediately; which he did, in spite of all the remonstrances of his wife. Upon this theme he even composed five variations for piano-forte, during his last sickness. Then suddenly he wanted to go to a medical asylum, to be entirely with a doctor; for "I can not get cured at home," he said, with full conviction. In such a moment he ordered a carriage, arranged his papers, his compositions, and made himself ready to leave. He saw quite clearly what was the matter with him; and especially when he felt approaching scenes of excitement, he begged to stay away from them.

His wife tried constantly to draw away his mind from the phantoms of his imagination; but as soon as she succeeded to do so with one, another made its appearance. He also repeatedly exclaimed that he was a sinner, and did not deserve the love of the people. And so it went on until at last the anguish of his soul drove him to despair.

It was February 27th, 1854, when about noon Schumann received the visit of his doctor, Mr. Hasenclever, and his brother artist, Albert Dietrich. They sat down together. During the conversation Schumann left the room without saying a word. They thought he would return; but when a long time had elapsed, his wife went to look for him. He could not be found in the house. The friends hurried into the street to find him—in vain. He had quietly, without his hat, gone to the bridge of the Rhine, and tried, through a plunge into the river, to free himself from his life of torment. Some boatmen present rowed after him, and took him out of the water. They said afterwards, that Schumann begged them earnestly to let him die, and that he made a second trial to plunge into the water. His life was saved, but what a life! Passers-by recognized the master, and took care of his removal to his home. His wife, herself greatly suffering, was fortunately prevented from seeing him. A second medical attendant was called, for his case became so dangerous that he had to be constantly watched.

Then at last he was removed near Bonn, to the care of Dr. Richarz, at Enderick. Here he staid until the latter part of July, 1856. During this time he received, with the consent of his doctor, the visits of Bettina, Arnim, Joachim, and Brahms, which, however, had to be avoided at last, because they were always followed by a state of great excitement. With his wife he was for some time in correspondence; she did not see him except just before his death, which was about four o'clock in the afternoon of July 29th, 1856.—N. Y. Musical Review.

From My Diary. No. 5.

April 28.—A typographical error in the notice of the Concert at Holliston, makes me say, speaking of the choir there, that no number of their voices can make a full, round volume of tone. Thin—thin voices—gentlemen;—it was the statement of a general fact, not a special "cut."

The trouble is—and it is one which I notice almost everywhere, and which is the result of the style of tunes now in vogue—that most of our choirs sing in a sort of a sentimental, nasal, half-whining manner, as if they could not sustain a note above B or C.—Whereas they should sing solid chorals and slow flowing melodies, which of themselves would bring out the voice. The same person who calls her companion an eighth of a mile away across the fields in firm, full tone upon E or F, will just hint at a note on D in the thinnest, flimsiest voice imaginable, when she undertakes to sing.

Let her get some chorals by Bach and practice them, and learn to hold a long breath, and sing with force and vigor.

April 30.—I cut the following from the Report of the School Committee of the town of Holliston, in this State: Messrs. O. B. Bullard, S. G. Burnap, and A. N. Miller.

Music in the School-room.—Nearly every teacher employed the past year had some knowledge of music, and introduced singing into the school-room. This is a healthy exercise for youth, and where proper attention is given to the mode of practice, tends to improve the voice for reading and speaking. This should be a general exercise for all the scholars who wish to join in it, and not as in some instances we noticed, where a few of the best singers only were selected out to do all the singing. We noticed that teachers frequently selected music for their pupils which was too difficult, and beyond the capacity of the majority to learn. But the worst evil connected with the singing in our schools, for a few years past, has been the formation of a corrupt taste in the pupils, by introducing negro-melodies and hackneyed street songs, and permitting every music-book agent who comes along, to peddle his trash in the school-room. The effect of learning such music in the school-room, is to destroy the pupils' taste for music as a science. And we find that in proportion to the number, there are fewer youth who now acquire, or have any desire to acquire, a knowledge of the elements of music, than there were five or ten years since. Music should be taught in our public schools as a science, and not used wholly as an amusement for the scholars. Every grammar and district school-room should be furnished with a music blackboard; that the teacher may have an opportunity whenever time will permit, of introducing general elementary exercises, which would be valuable to the pupils as a discipline of the mind. If no other object was sought. We would suggest to the next school committee, that they prescribe the singing books to be used, in their list of text-books. Among the teachers who have been the more successful and judicious in teaching their pupils to sing during the past year, we would name the teacher of the Primary School No. 4, and the teacher of the Intermediate School No. 8. In these schools nearly every scholar learned to sing.

This appears to me to contain sound doctrine and gives one a very favorable impression of the gentlemen who compose the committee.

Whether music should be taught as a "science" exactly, in common schools, I am not prepared to say; but that every pupil, whose ears are not defective to sounds, as some eyes are to colors, should before reaching the age of twelve years be able to read common tunes as easily as the words set to them, I have long been convinced. The mere reading of simple music is as easy a thing as to learn the reading of articulate speech. Let some half a dozen things be firmly fixed in the memory—the letters of the staff, the use of the clefs and signatures, and the comparative duration of notes and rests—which might certainly be effected with far less labor than the four simple rules of arithmetic, and then nothing but practice even under ordinary teachers is necessary, to enable the pupil to go on without let or hindrance as far as his opportunities and capacity allow. But unluckily I generally find that just these things are neglected, and the time of teacher and pupil is taken up in learning songs and feeble choruses by rote, to sing at the school examination. Why not omit the cardinal rules of arithmetic, and teach the pupils a set of problems by rote, in proportion, interest, and fractions, to show off upon, before the school committee?

What great difficulty hinders any teacher from drawing eleven parallel lines upon the blackboard, and having the pupils learn to distinguish lines and spaces by the letters of the alphabet? The lowest one shall be G, and of course the highest will be F. Would it be a difficult thing then for the teacher to make the pupil comprehend that, when music is written upon the lower five lines and spaces, it is for deep men's voices, and then these lines are designated by the F, or bass cleff, and when upon the upper five, that they are distinguished by the G cleff, and the music is for high voices?

Under every system of instruction lies the practice of the scales as the chief corner stone. Now, what difficulty is there in showing the pupil that so far as his singing of simple tunes is concerned, the signatures at the beginning of them are mere indications of pitch, and are used to tell him upon what letter is the One or Do, of the scale? Let the list of signatures be learned by him as he would learn a lesson in punctuation, grammar or arithmetic. It is a good exercise of the memory. And now for aught I can see, you can begin with regular practice in singing simple tunes of equal rhythm. Were I a teacher, while I should not neglect the regular processes of the musical gospel according to Pestalozzi, I should certainly have a lesson at regular intervals in the "old fashioned way of teaching" just indicated!

April 30.—What is the use of printing the results of long-continued studies and researches? Of trying to correct errors in history, especially in such small matters as questions relating to Art?

For instance, the authorship of the celebrated tune which we call "Old Hundred," has been a mooted question since Hawkins and Burney wrote, but all trustworthy authorities agree that it was in print as early as 1561–2. It has been the subject of discussion in the Harmonicon, and other musical periodicals, until recently many articles have appeared upon it in the London Notes and Queries. Rev. Mr. Havergal has written a history of it which has reached the second edition, and he shows it to have been in print as early as 1660. I have in two or three communications to Dwight's Journal of Music stated that I have seen the tune in a psalter of 1559, and more recently an Englishman announces (see Dwight's Journal a few months since) that he has it in one of 1556. Yet, after all this, the Boston Journal of this morning gravely gives us this item:

"A correspondent of the Athenæum thinks he has at last found the author of 'Old Hundred.' This has been a vexed question for years. He claims the authorship for one J. Dowland or Howland, who was born in 1562, and died in 1615."

All Dowland did was to harmonize it for Ravenscroft, when the tune had already been in use half a century.

May 3.—A friend has handed me a slip from the Boston Journal, containing a notice of a monument recently erected in Mount Auburn Cemetery, to Miss E. W. Bruce, of Cambridgeport, who was placed there last autumn. The following description is copied from it:

The monument consists of a plinth, base, die and cap, the whole forming a small Grecian Temple, about five feet in height, and of pure classic form. In front of the die is a deep niche, in which is inserted a tablet of statuary marble; on this tablet is sculptured, in bas relief, a figure symbolizing the Genius of Music playing on the lyre, with the face turned heavenward as if in the act of devotion. A mass of drapery falls in rich and graceful folds over it. It is a thing of great beauty of soul rather than of sense, and forms the principal object of the monument.

Miss Bruce was one of the rarest instances of highly refined taste, and great artistic culture, gained with no more advantages than are within the reach of us all here at home, that I have known. The instinctive love of the beautiful was in her case very strong, and gave her an unerring perception of the true, whether in painting, sculpture, literature or music. Her studies, however, were devoted to the last, and though it was adopted as a profession, and each day brought its wearying round of the teacher's duties, her interest and delight in the divine art never flagged. Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Chopin,—their works were her delight and constant study—her standards of comparison; and yet she was so catholic in taste, that whatever was good of its kind, the simplest song, or the most profound orchestral work, found in her ready appreciation, and just acknowledgement of its merit. Her facility in reading music at sight was very uncommon, and during the years that I knew her, I never saw her at fault but once, and that was—of all things in the world—upon an arrangement of Handel's overture to the "Messiah."

It was an old arrangement of the last century, and so very much opposed to the present style, that, to her infinite amusement, she was forced to stop after a few bars, to study out the means of reproducing with her skilful fingers, the thin looking score before her. In a moment she caught the secret and henceforth there was no difficulty.

No member of the musical association, to which for several years she belonged, will ever forget the perfect ease with which she played our accompaniments, or how much her steadiness in the time and rhythm conduced to our success in the cantatas, choruses, and other music, which was studied.

But she began young, studied with judicious teachers, and laid a solid foundation, so that afterwards every step was forward. She had nothing to unlearn. While acquiring and perfecting her technical knowledge of the piano-forte, she at the same time neglected no opportunity to add to her knowledge of musical literature; to gain higher and broader views of the art; to penetrate into the very heart of music. I had the pleasure of first calling her attention to the musical essays in the Harbinger, and remember well the intense delight with which she read them. It was not more what she knew of music, than what she knew about it, that made her superior. She was indeed a rare proof of the value of general musical culture to the teacher. She was one, who showed her love of the beautiful in everything. Not only in art and literature; it was equally visible in her love of flowers and her enjoyment of fine scenery.

Sometimes she expressed her feelings in composition, but from a rare modesty—in her case too great—none but her intimate friends ever heard her own music, either vocal or for the piano-forte.

All who knew Elizabeth Bruce will rejoice to learn that the respect and love of friends for her, has been shown in the neat and appropriate monument above described, and will agree that they are few; who, engaged constantly in the laborious profession of teaching, have attained so high a culture in their art, or by their decease have left so great a vacancy in the circle in which they moved.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 8, 1858.

Music in New York.

From our Correspondent.

On Friday of last week, I attended a matinée (in so far private as it had not been advertised, and the tickets were sold by private circulation) given by a Mr. von BREUNING. I was curious to know whether this gentleman stood in any connection with Beethoven's Breunings—but could not gain any satisfactory information on that point. All that I could learn about him was that he had been an amateur—had occupied some official position at the Court of Würtemberg, I think, but, having, for some reason, emigrated to this country, wished to give lessons, and took this method of making himself known. His playing, without being remarkable in any way, gave token of a thorough understanding of music, and of steady practice and study. He gave us transcriptions of his own of the March from the Prophète and that from Tannhäuser (the latter for two pianos, one of which was played by Mr. SCHARFENBERG); a Concert Waltz, also by himself, and the first movement of a Trio by Fesca, with Messrs. THOMAS and BERGMANN. The remainder of the programme was divided between a Signor ALAIMO, Mme. JOHANSEN, and, the que of the whole, VIEUXTEMPS. This latter played, nothing of great value, a fantasia or Ernani, and Variations on "Willie we have missed you,"—but how did he play these! He turns everything to gold by his touch. The little simple popular air, which had always seemed common-place before, acquired plaintive pathos under his hands which might immortalize it. Of Signor Alaimo the least said the better. I could not understand why he should sing in public, or, indeed, in private either. Mme. Johansen being indisposed, CARADORI appeared in her place at very short notice, and sang an aria from Torquato Tasso very finely.

On Saturday was our last Philharmonic. The "poor fiddlers" did indeed "have a hard time of it" that day—and it was surprising how they could play as well as they did in the evening. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, a composition by Schumann, and the Tannhäuser Overture were the orchestral pieces. Of the first and third I can tell you nothing new; you know them better than I do. I wish, however, that you could have heard how magnificent the Tannhäuser sounded in the amphitheatre. It came up to us there in a perfect ocean of sound. Schumann's composition, though called an Overture, was, in fact, a short Symphony, consisting of three movements, an Overture, Scherzo, and Finale. I liked it much—finding it full of freshness and sprightliness, with some quite new instrumental effects, and original combinations. It fell rather dead upon the audience, however. The soloists were Mr. COOPER, the violinist, and Miss MILNER, (or rather, as it is said, Mrs. Cooper.) The latter was hoarse, and sang an indifferent English song instead of the Non mi dir, from "Don Giovanni." She also sang in a duet by Pacini, for voice and violin. Mr. Cooper, whom I heard for the first time, played very beautifully a Concerto by Spohr. He has an exceedingly pure and tender stroke, and very great skill and power of expression; one cannot mistake the artist in him, even though he is not quite a Vieuxtemps. The difference was obvious in one respect. The composition which he played was, like many of Spohr's, very dry and heavy, and rather drew Mr. Cooper, with all his excellencies, down to its level. With Vieuxtemps the contrary would have been the case. He would have raised the music to his level, and by infusing a spirit of his own into it, (without, however, sacrificing the characteristics of the composer) would have given it the interest it lacked.

Miss BRAINERD gave a concert at Dodworth's this week, which, though the programme as a whole did not promise much, gave me a great deal of pleasure, because it was in most respects so thoroughly successful. The audience was numerous and select, the fair bénéficiaire in excellent voice and looks, and her assistants evidently desirous of doing their best. I could only have wished that Mr. APTOMMAS's harp had been in better tune in the first piece, and that he had altogether a better idea of harmony and composition. I enclose the programme:

1. Aria, "Roberto Devereux," Donizetti; Mr. W. H. Cooke. 2. Solo—Harp, Favorite Melodies, Aptommas; Mr. Aptommas. 3. "Angels ever bright and fair," Handel; Miss Brainerd. 4. Grand Fantasia, "Ernani," Satter; Gustav Satter. 5. Aria, "De miei dolenti spiriti," Verdi; Mr. Cooke. 6. Song of the Page, Meyerbeer; Miss Brainerd. 7. Cavatina, "D'Amor sull'ali rosee," (Trovatore,) Verdi; Miss Brainerd. 8. Solo—Harp, Grand Fantasia, Aptommas; Mr. Aptommas. 9. Ballad, "Say my heart can this be love," words by Watson, music by Wallace; Miss Brainerd. 10. Solo—Piano, a "Etude in Ab," b "Les belles de New York," Valse, Satter; Mr. Satter. 11. Song, "The Serenade," Schubert; Mr. Cooke. 12. Ballad, "The Harp that once through Tara's halls," Moore; Miss Brainerd.

Miss Brainerd succeeded best, I think, in the two Italian arias; Handel's exquisite song, which suited her voice admirably, dragged a little. Both the song by Wallace, which is hardly interesting enough for a concert piece, and Moore's beautiful melody was sung very well; the latter with a simplicity that proved Miss Brainerd to have the right feeling for such music. It is by no means an easy task to sing a Volkstied well. Mr. SATER astonished his audience, as usual; and was naturally encored both times. I, for one, liked his second pieces better than the first ones, for after No. 4, he gave us the charming little Minuet from Mozart's E flat Symphony, and after No. 10, a beautiful transcription of Weber's "last Waltz." One of the most enjoyable features of the evening was the singing of Mr. COOKE. This young gentleman has an exceedingly sweet, pure tenor voice, and knows how to manage it. He sings, too, with great earnestness and simplicity. Good tenors are so rare now-a-days, that the advent of a new one must be hailed with joy. Mr. Cooke, with a very little more experience, will rank among the first of our native singers. A wag-gish friend even suggested the possibility of his appearing some day on the stage, with his name Italianized to Signor Cooki(e)!

On Saturday we enjoyed a privilege which has been yours twice already; we heard FORMES in "Elijah." I am sorry to say, however, that this same privilege did not seem to be adequately appreciated by our public, for the Academy was not by any means full. Yet the ardor of the singers did not seem at all damped by this circumstance, but rather increased. The choruses were remarkably good—for the Harmonic Society—and manifested a very uncommon degree of spirit. And what can I say of FORMES, but subscribe entirely to your high eulogium of his rendering of the Prophet's part. He was often out of tune, it is true; but as you say, his many other excellencies make one forget that defect. How completely he merges himself in his part—what awful seriousness in his denunciation—what touching pathos in "It is enough!" Truly, it was a great performance, such as leaves its impression for a life-time. Madame D'ANGRI stands next in the ranks. In her two arias she was wonderful. Particularly in "Woe unto them." In "O, rest in the Lord," there was perhaps not quite enough of the simple, trusting spirit of submission which the words and music so thoroughly express. I am sorry to say, however, that she rather marred the "Angel Trio" by falling somewhat out of time. Miss MILNER took the Soprano in the first part, and Madame CARADORI in the second, while the Tenor was divided in the same way, between Messrs. PERRING and SIMPSON. The voices of the two ladies are both rather unsympathetic, and not suited to music so expressive as that of "Elijah;" the tenors were happier in this respect. Mr. Simpson, particularly, has a very beautiful voice, sweet, yet powerful, and perfectly clear. He sings, too, with a great deal of feeling, only occasionally not quite in time. Altogether, though the performance was by no means perfect, it was sufficiently free from fault to give me very great enjoyment.

Musard's Concerts will continue nightly. For this week two new attractions are held out. "Formes as a Concert-singer" (i. e. in two songs per night), and the "GOTHAM QUADRILLE," of which I subjoin the analysis:

GOTHAM:
OR THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH QUADRILLE,
On popular American airs,
WITH BRILLIANT SOLOS AND VARIATIONS, concluding with a COMIC POTPOURRI, comprising the following selections:
Introduction—"Star Spangled Banner," "Willie we have missed you," Quadrille.
1st Figure—"Ellen Bayne," "Yankee Doodle."
2d Figure—"We'll have a little dance to-night, boys."
3d Figure—"Oh, my love is a sailor."
4th Figure—"Jenny with the light brown hair."
5th Figure—"Kiss me quick," "Willie we have missed you."
The Quadrille will conclude with a grand finale, called the Five Sets, on the most popular airs; followed by the ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH POTPOURRI, in which will be introduced the following airs: "You will Remember Me," (Bohemian Girl); "Lucy Long," march, (Le Prophet); Chorus, (Norma); "Cachuca," with castagnettes; "Dipsacatore," (violinello); "Prima Donna waltz," (trumpet); "On Yonder Rock Reclining," (Fra Diavolo); "Carnival of Venice," (Bride Polka); "Sontag Polka," Choral; "Huguenots," (opheleide); "Il Balen," (Trovatore); "Bobbing Around," "Arkansas Traveller," (flageolet); "Love Not," (march); "Highland Fling," "Oh, Susannah," "Grace, Robert," (cornet); "Kiss me Quick," "Cattle Show Quadrille," "Anvil Chorus," (Trovatore); "Express Train Gallop," "Death March," (Saul); Quartet, (Lucia di Lammermoor); "Jim Crow," "St. Patrick's Day," "Home, Sweet Home." To conclude with "Yankee Doodle."

One would think that Formes might feel rather ashamed of his company. On Saturday a "Grand Presentation Matinée" will take place, "at which every lady will be presented with a copy of the Express Train Gallop, arranged for the Piano." What an inducement! Surely, "Humbug is great, and Ullman is his prophet!" This same Ullman, however, does not succeed as well in making himself popular in other ways as by the attractions he holds out to the public. I give you an instance, which I have from the best authority. It has always been the rule, since the Philharmonic Society has leased the Academy from Ullman, that their rent for each concert should be paid in the intermission. Last Saturday they were informed that the rent must be paid before the opening of the doors, and not by check, but in cash. This was found rather inconvenient, but the Treasurer nevertheless managed to be at the Academy in good time with the money in his pocket. As he had ladies with him, he could not leave them to go to the back door, but the Impresario, appearing to take it for granted that the money would not be forthcoming, kept the doors firmly closed, and a great portion of the audience shivering before them in the cold damp night, until nearly a quarter of eight, when he probably could no longer resist the conviction that he was not going to be cheated. Various complaints of the delay subsequently appeared in the dailies, but they were all directed against the Philharmonic Society, and as none of them has been answered, it is but just that the true circumstances of the case should be known.

Beauties of the Italian Opera.

We speak of the Italian Opera as here administered. We mean the would-be institution, not the art; its management and not its music. Opera in this country is not an institution, but a speculation; and though the speculators, first and last, have given us some really high and memorable pleasures, and many are indebted to them for a new sense of harmony and beauty, still it is too plain that they have looked upon us as a gullible and simple race, and humbugged us to their heart's content. The system has been beautifully illustrated during the past week in Philadelphia. That city prided itself upon its patronage of Opera; it doted upon the Opera; it built a superb Academy a year ago, wherein it inaugurated a "good time coming"—an eternal summer—of Italian Opera, with brilliant ovations, extolling Gazzaniga to the skies and crowning her their lyric Queen, enjoying over an hundred performances during the year, glorifying Max—"our Max," and our Opera Company, and welcoming them eagerly back from Havana this Spring for another round of triumphs. A brief flush, and the novelty of the thing was gone; disappointment, thin houses; and on Saturday night the grand Italian Opera season came to a sudden and disgraceful end. Max, "glorious Max," the handsome, the "Napoleonic" Max ingloriously fled! The Bulletin explains the matter thus:

It has been a season of disappointments, broken promises and failures, with only a few redeeming features on which the public can look back with satisfaction. One of these was the appearance of Signor Ronconi, and another was the production of William Tell. It was a treat to see Ronconi, even though he does sing dreadfully out of tune; and it was a treat to hear William Tell, even though it was badly performed. On the other side of the account there is a great deal to say; first, was the unpleasant quarrel with Signor Tagliafico, and the loss of that excellent artist, and his wife—the best and most useful of second ladies that has sung in this country. The places of neither of these members of the company have been adequately filled since their departure. Next we had a repetition of old operas, of which the public had grown weary, especially as they had been promised new operas. The only fresh pieces brought out were William Tell, Don Pasquale and Maria di Rohan, the first having been presented in a slovenly, imperfect manner, and with an inadequate cast; the second requiring no great preparation, as there is but one chorus, and the burden of the piece rested on Mme. Lagrange and Signor Ronconi, and the third being still easier of production. There were promises made of The Huguenots, Le Prophète, L'Etoile du Nord, and other great works, not one of which was ever fulfilled. The public were disappointed, also, in having few opportunities of hearing Mme. Gazzaniga, who was sent off with a few others to sing in smaller cities. There were quarrels inside and outside of the opera house; complaints of failures to pay salaries to artists, &c. On Thursday evening, after some day-light scenes of which report speaks, but which we do not choose to mention, the leader of the orchestra, Sig. Torriani, placed there by Mr. Maretzek, deserted his post after the first act of La Favorita, in the evident expectation that the opera, in which Mme. Gazzaniga and Signor Brignoli were singing, would have to be stopped. This design failed, as another person was got for the post and the opera was finished satisfactorily. On Saturday evening, when this Signor Torriani showed himself in the vestibule of the Academy, he was driven out, amid the jeers of one or two hundred gentlemen who discovered him. There was some talk of pursuing the same course with Mr. Maretzek, if he had remained in the house.

Such was the fifth act of Italian Opera in Philadelphia. It was followed (or preceded) by a farce, which came off in the same Academy of Music, under the title of "Grand Musical Festival," given in the name of the Pennsylvania "Musical Institute," at which all the Italian Opera singers sang, by way of prelude to a grand lottery distribution of prizes—$2,000 worth of musical instruments—among the purchasers of tickets to the entertainment. As we have been speaking of musical speculations, as opposed to musical Art, we may fitly conclude with this sublime example of the art of humbug. This high-sounding "Musical Institute," it seems, is simply a lottery, got up by a music-dealer, Mr. E. L. Walker, for the readier disposal of his stock in trade. By some strange process the legislature of Pennsylvania were persuaded to regard the scheme as an educational institution, and granted it (or him) an act of incorporation, whereby an annual lottery, or "Gift Concert," for the private interest of an individual, but gilded over with the fiction of an educational and public object, goes on with the sanction of the State! Everybody knows this; there is no concealment; we simply state the facts; they certainly require no comment.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We are now ready to supply orders for Bound Volumes of the last year of the Journal of Music, as well as the earlier volumes. . . . We heartily rejoice in the announcement of what is but an act of justice on the part of the musical public of Boston, a Complimentary Concert to Mr. AUGUST FRIES, before he leaves us to reside in Europe. Who has claims upon us, if not he who for nine years has so steadfastly and so ably persisted in the long thankless task of creating an audience for classical chamber music? . . . Mr. CARL GAERTNER informs us that he, too, is going to Europe (shall we lose all our best violinists—few enough at best?) and that he will give a concert on the 22d inst., in the Music Hall, assisted by Mrs. LONG, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. CARL HAUSE, and an orchestra under ZERRAHN. . . . Among hallad singers and song writers, who have enjoyed popularity in this country, no one seems to sustain himself so long and so fresh as Mr. DEMPSTER. Our publishers, who are his publishers (see advertising columns), can vouch for that. His songs are always in demand, and he still makes his singing circuits, year after year, from State to State, with all the regularity of the U. S. Courts. Just now we hear of him gathering his own charmed circles in Utica and Buffalo, and other cities of the Empire State. . . . Musical "Conventions" are early in the field this season. We read of one on the 6th ult., at Ann Arbor, Michigan, conducted by Mr. C. M. CADY; another at Washington, which soared above all "sectional" distinctions, rejoicing in the name of "National," "American," or what not, Mr. BRADBURY being the presiding genius and patriot. Another has been held, apparently with great success, in Bridgton, N. J., under the well-known teacher of this city, Mr. B. F. BAKER. The class assembled and the local press are warm in his praises. It is true that these "Conventions" are contrivances, too often, to sell new music-books; yet we believe that they have done much good; they have excited interest in music where there was none before, discussions of the best mode of teaching, &c., and mingled with much trash, have generally given thousands of people a hearing of much better music than they would otherwise have heard; and even set them to practising choruses from the "Messiah," &c.

The Chevalier SIGISMUND NEUKOMM, composer of the oratorio of "David," &c., died at Paris on the 3d of April, at the age of eighty-one. . . . GUSTAV SATTER ("the most eminent of European pianists" [1], according to a Philadelphia paper), and Mme. JOHANNSEN, announce their first concert in that city. The Philadelphia Harmonic Society gave their last concert this week, with selections from the "Creation" and "Elijah," overture to "Tell," airs and choruses from Linda, Robert, Masaniello, &c.

It were worth the journey to hear Don Giovanni performed with such a cast as is said to be in contemplation at the Royal Italian Opera, London. MARIO, for a novelty, is to take Don Giovanni; TAMBERLIK, Don Ottavio; GRISI, Donna Anna; BOSIO (!) Zerlina; MARAI, Donna Elvira; FORMES, Leporello; RONCONI, Masetto; and TAGLIAFICO, the Commandant. . . . TAMBERLIK, the tenor, has made his debut at the Grand Opera in Rossini's Otello, and has taken Paris by assault with a C sharp in alt, as Duprez did before him with his C natural (or Ut de poitrine), in "Tell." The safe delivery of such a note seems more to the Parisians than all the music of those operas. A foreign paper says: "In stead of saying 'Rossini's Gillaume Tell,' it has been the habit among elevated Parisians to say, 'Rossini's Ut de poitrine;' it will now become equally the vogue, instead of 'Rossini's Otello,' to say 'Rossini's Ut dièse.'"

LONDON.—The first of a series of six concerts was given early last month by the Vocal Association under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The programme was purely Mendelssohn.

The Opera season at her Majesty's Theatre opened on the 13th ult., with the Huguenots. Mr. Lumley is proverbial for good luck in finding singers just at the critical moment. This time it is not clear that he has found another Lind; but his new German soprano, Mlle. Titien, created a new sensation in the part of Valentine. Her success was immense. The other principals were Sigs. Belletti, Aldighieri, Giuglini, Vialetti, Mlle. Ortolani, and a new contralto, Mme. Lucioni Landi, (not destined, it is thought, to eclipse Alboni or Didiée).

Mr. Gye, announces that he will open the Royal Italian Opera on the 15th of May. His company will be one of the strongest ever collected. It will include Grisi, Bosio, Marai, and Victoria Balfe, sopranos; Didiée, contralto; Mario, Tamberlik, Neri Beraldi, and Gardoni, tenors; Ronconi, Polononi, and Graziani, baritones; Formes, Tagliafico, and Zelger, basses.

The first Philharmonic Concert of the season was given April 12. The Programme included two Symphonies: Mozart's in D, and Beethoven's in A; two Concertos: Bennett's for piano, in F minor, played by Mr. W. G. Cusins, and F. David's for violin, in E, played by Mr. Sainton; two overtures: Athalie and Freyschütz; and arias by Mozart, Stradella and Rossini, sung by Castellani and Miss Dolby. Sterndale Bennett was conductor.

OIL PICTURES.

In the third chapter of the fourth volume of "Modern Painters," Mr. Ruskin, in treating of the relation of color to form, uses the following words: "If color be introduced at all, it is necessary that, whatever else may be wrong, that should be right; just as, though the music of a song may not be so essential to its influence as the meaning of the words, yet if the music be given at all, it must be right, or its discord will spoil the words; and it would be better, of the two, that the words should be indistinct, than the notes false. Hence, as I have said elsewhere, the business of a painter is to paint. If he cannot color, he is no painter, though he may do every thing else."

Now, in what the absolute right of color consists, I shall shirk the labor and responsibility of determining at present; but will offer as an approximate definition: a use which constitutes it an integral, nobly expressive and indispensable element in the painter's Art.

Bearing in mind the simple axiom "that the business of a painter is to paint"—to use color rightly, within the meaning of the definition above given, this exhibition as a whole does not embody a large amount of genuine Art. The want of good color is indeed its characteristic deficiency.

Of Color that is non-essential, of agreeable color wrongly used, of crude, harsh, and repulsive color there is no lack; but the truly noble power of color finds few interpreters. Technically, a want of solidity and texture, and the artistic want of a high imaginative or clear power of color, in the examples of the old School, are quite sufficient to confirm our received impressions concerning it—whilst the prevailing dryness, unhealthy coldness of the flesh tones, and want of true freshness and geniality in the color of some of the (so-called) Pre-Raphaelites, are qualities certainly calculated to excite some distrust of their influence as representatives of the new school. Were it not for the water colors and a few of the oil paintings, I should hesitate about applying to these pictures a principle of criticism perfectly applicable to our own.

In the Feejee Islands tattooing is an expression of the highest Art instinct. What to us seems barbarous and ugly, to the native, is beautiful and true Art; and but for the exceptions noticed, I should incline to consider whatever in the color of this exhibition seems harsh and discordant to us, as peculiar to the English ideal of excellence and only properly to be judged by it. These exceptions however establish the æsthetic affinities existing between the English people and our own, and I here appeal to them to give currency to what, but for them, might seem ill-considered and unjust. Let us follow the pictures in the general order of their merit, beginning at the lowest.

Nos. 132, 146, 153, 158, 159, 165, and 175, form a group of what may be comprehensively termed "non-sense" pictures — pictures of very little value to their respective painters or the public, and a disgrace to the Exhibition. Nos. 131, 137, 140, 142, 168 and 174, effectually conceal their agreeableness of subject or skillful drawing by color that is either expressionless or repulsive. The figures, in "The First Ride," No. 95 — "Children crossing the Brook," 196, are pleasantly grouped and contain considerable richness of color, perhaps somewhat enhanced in value by the expressionless back ground of the one and the positively offensive character of the other. Nos. 86, 97 and 164, are three pictures by Wm. Davis, mainly noticeable from their peculiar manipulation and confused expression of purpose, albeit the gray evening sky and flush of reflected light in the distance of No. 97, are very purely felt and effectively wrought.

In the "Fern Case," No. 89, Wm. Gale exhibits a nice sense of expression, very careful drawing and modelling, nearly neutralized in their effect by the offensive flesh-tones and generally inharmonious color. It would seem unnecessary that the author of the sunny little "Wood-Gatherer," No. 109, should have rendered such color as abounds in the "Fern Case" and No. 131. "A Hastings Fishing Boat," No. 87, by John Thorpe, is a quiet English coast scene, simply arranged and characterized by a delicate feeling for color and breadth of effect. In No. 99 the delicacy sinks to vapidness.

No. 176, "An Old Mill," is a rich, suggestive subject, freely drawn and basely colored. With only an average excellence in color this picture would form one of the small loadstones of the Exhibition.

"The Nest," No. 96, is a very successful realization of the Artist's perception of form and power of color. Under the limitation of an imperfect sense of the subtle gradations of color this is very complete — wrought in love, I doubt not, and approximately true; it is also clear, clean and agreeable. The refinement of line and drowsiness of atmosphere in the "Siesta," No. 102, successfully struggle through a veil of color which is not true enough to be agreeable, nor false enough to be repulsive.

"White Cliff," No. 134, contains a very happy rendering of picturesque cloud-forms and warm vapory sun-light — and but for the weak conventionalism of the foreground and a little crudeness in the sky tones, Mr. Gray would have furnished us with a good picture. The "Old English Market Town," 139, affords a clear and unpretentious statement of "things as they really are" at "Hexham," the locality of this scene. It is a misfortune to the young lady sitting at the window, that she should have lived so unpicturesquely ugly, and a still greater one that Mr. Scott should have found her there just at the time he wanted to commence his picture. With this exception, the arrangement is exceedingly good and well treated. What with its solidity, directness and simplicity of rendering, and withal a pervading sense of a cheerful, homely beauty, this is one of the sterling pictures.

In the "Mistletoe Bough," No. 160, the simple pathos of the familiar story of Ginevra finds no adequate expression. The Ginevra of this picture is merely a "lay figure," employed to display an elaborate costume, and in this capacity does very good service. The background, drapery, and other accessories, evincing a more than average perception of color, need only a modification of their hardness to render them quite admirable.

Amongst the pleasant pictures by Edmund Eagles, "The Mother's Treasure," No. 121, and "The Thread of Life," are good examples of what artists learn to do at Rome. The recipe by which pictures are made in the modern Italian school appears to be as infallible as the one followed in the family of "Mr. Dusseldorf." It would be curious to know how broad an immortality the figures in these pictures have secured in the exercise of their vocation as professional models to the artists residing at Rome; as also whether each one serves exclusively in a peculiar line of character or commands the entire range of dramatic expression. In meaninglessness of conception Mr. Eagles has not deviated from the practice of the school. He has given us some pretty tableaux however, and made picturesqueness of costume the material out of which he has wrought a full, warm and rich tone of color. If we are to have "costume" pictures, these furnish good types of excellence, both in design and execution, and would well repay the study of some of the other exhibitors who, with a more pretentious purpose, reach a less worthy result. The color is solid, always agreeable, and the best of its kind in the exhibition.

MESOS.

A Letter about Florence.

BARBERINO, (TUSCANY,) MARCH 25, 1858. — Would you not like to have a little harmless enthoosy-moosy about Florence? That charming city, the home of Galileo, Michael Angelo, the Venus de Medici, Niobe and La Mia Cara Padrona? I feel convinced that nothing would you swallow with more angelic docility than a little harmless enthoosy-moosy about dear delightful Florence.

The greatest difficulty is to know where to begin; there is so much to admire that I am fairly distracted with the contending claims of the different churches, the various palaces, the picture galleries, the gardens and the suburbs; and were it not for the Campanile, which is something so unique that it at once attracts attention, even amid all these splendors, I should really be at a loss.

The first few weeks I was in Florence I went every day to the Campanile to feast my eyes upon Giotto's wondrous work; for, though somewhat altered by succeeding architects, the plan was his, and he is fairly entitled to the credit. You can scarcely conceive the exquisite beauty of this tower, clothed as it is in its rich garb of vari-colored marble. And then but a few steps from this, are others of the most famous Art wonders of Florence — the well known bronze doors by Ghiberti, that lead into the Baptistery (or Church as it also is) of San Giovanni.

Do not dread that I am going to attempt a description of these objects, familiar already to every one, from engravings and books of travels. I am only indulging in a little enthoosy-moosy, you know, and mean only to allude to them; yet I must speak a little of these doors. They are, in spite of their high appreciation by Michael Angelo, somewhat decried by modern artists, who think that Ghiberti in his relievos attempted too much and intruded upon the domain of painting, instead of confining himself solely to the legitimate effects of sculpture. Westmacott, the sculptor, in some lectures, he has just delivered in London, explains the defects of the work so plainly and forcibly, that I will quote his remarks:

"The error in these compositions," says Westmacott, "is that they are arranged on the principles of Painting and not of Sculpture. They exhibit a variety of planes, groups of foreground figures, other groups and objects retiring in the background, and the whole intermingled with landscape, mountains, trees, cattle and other objects. You will at once perceive how much interest is lost by the confusion caused by the crowding of so many small parts together; and next how each portion of the composition is injured by the overpowering force of the part or object near it, especially in the foreground figures. The effects produced by the attempts to represent miles of distance by distinct objects in several planes, when the whole distance from the foreground to the remotest perspective is scarcely an inch, are most anomalous and unsatisfactory. In Painting, where there is no difference at all in surface, between foreground and background, no disappointment or dissatisfaction is felt, because the painter can supply the illusion of atmosphere by color; but in Sculpture, trees cast their dark shadows against the clouds; figures reduced in size with the view of making them appear more distant, are, for want of atmosphere, as distinct and clear as foreground objects; and though they may be intended to be represented as at miles off, they may and indeed do throw their shadows on and over the objects nearest to the front plane of the composition."

Whenever I stand before these gates, I cannot help thinking of the mighty procession of great men, headed by Michael Angelo, who have marched before them and given them their meed of admiration. Artists, sculptors, architects and poets have all admired the gates of Ghiberti, and the Campanile of Giotto. As when before the Dying Gladiator and the Apollo Belvidere you think that here, not many years ago stood Byron, so before these works of Florentine Art, the mind recalls that glorious company of mighty men who, each in their turn, have stood before these wondrous doors. Yet the last time I visited them I could raise little enthoosy-moosy, because of the unpoetic objects by which they were surrounded. You know that the Place in front of the Cathedral and Baptistery is given over to hucksters of every kind. The steps of the Cathedral, which bears Brunelleschi's wondrous dome, accommodates vast mass meetings of earthen pots, — the Campanile of Giotto is surrounded by vendors of old brass — second-hand bedsteads most do congregate about the Baptistery, and I actually had to force a passage, wading ankle deep in gridirons, to approach — those doors so marvellously wrought

That they might serve to be the gates of Heaven.

Just to think of the Uffizii Gallery, and to remember that many long years will elapse before I see it again, is enough of itself to set me crazy. There is the Tribuna, that marvellous chamber that contains so many gems of Art! I will say nothing of the Venus de Medici, or of the Venuses of Titian; every body knows what they are, and for my part they did not afford me near as much pleasure as one comparatively unnoticed picture of Guercino — a sleeping Endymion. It represents nothing but a boy sitting against a rock, with his head supported by his arm. His eyes are closed. A staff leans against the rock, and were it not for the crescent moon above, he would be taken for a St. John, rather than an Endymion. But such a beautiful face! It is of the kind that Guercino alone can paint. Of course my words can give you no idea of its angelic beauty, and I can only say that it is equal to the boy face of Guercino's San Sebastian at the Capitol in Rome. If you have never seen that either, I can do nothing further to make you comprehend the beauty of this Endymion, and my advice is for you to sell all your goods and chattels, and go right away to Florence. If you can't afford to ride in the Diligence or rail-car, walk! run, crawl — get there some way — I don't care how — only get there, and then go right to the Tribuna and tell me whether you have ever seen a more lovely picture than the Endymion of Guercino.

Now I hold it to be an undeniable fact, that the easiest thing in the world for a traveller to write about is a picture-gallery, and nothing offers such a temptation to the scribbling tourist as the Uffizii. A traveller who will visit one of these glorious galleries and not write about it, is a miracle of abstemiousness. Your genuine scribbling tourist, although he knows nothing at all about paintings, will never let such an opportunity pass without indulging in a series of wise and owlish criticisms, and the less he knows upon the subject, the more he will write, and the more the folks who read will be pleased with his remarks, and when they lay down the book or paper will say, like Sir Leicester Dedlock, "The man that wrote that article has a well-balanced mind." So, if so many people who know nothing of the subject may scrawl about paintings, why may not I? And why may not some poor deluded creature read my remarks and give me too, the credit of having a well-balanced mind?

There is the St. John of Rafael in the Tribuna; but of that I shall not speak; nor of the Holy Family of Michael Angelo. I would like to dilate a little about the Madonna and child of Correggio, but a more fitting tribute to its merits than any I could frame, is in the fact, that at present there are over three hundred applications registered from different artists for permission to copy it!

If one wants a contrast from this lovely little picture, he can find it by stepping into the next room and examining that awful Head of Medusa by Caravaggio. It is in every respect a startling production. Instead of being painted on an ordinary plane of canvass, it appears upon a convex, almost hemispherical surface, making the subject stand out the more vividly. The mouth is open, as if you could hear the shriek of desperate agony; the eyes are awful with their look of malice and revenge, as yet unweakened by the horrors of death. It is such a picture that you dream about it at night. It is a picture that haunts you. Vasari tells a story of some artist who painted a picture in a church at Perugia, in which he introduced the devil, and he called up before his mind such a vivid idea of Satan, that the evil spirit he himself had conjured overcame him, and he went crazy, haunted by the dreadful picture he himself had painted. This Medusa is capable of producing such an effect.

Then there is the better known Medusa's Head, by Leonardo da Vinci, with its cold slimy snakes, that make you dread to approach it, and with the toads and lizards and other reptiles creeping about. But there is a great difference between the Medusa of Da Vinci and that of Caravaggio. In the former, it is a dead relic of past horrors—in the latter it is still gifted with life, though but a bodiless head; it actually seems too wicked to die.

Then, from these frightful objects what a relief to turn to the beautiful little cabinet pictures of Albano. I remember a lovely one—a Repose on the Flight into Egypt. Angels have accompanied the Holy Family, and as they rest, one is offering flowers to the Infant Jesus—another is flying with a water-jug under his arm to fill it at a neighboring spring, while three little cherubs are hovering above. The cherubs of Albano are perfect, and in none of his works do they appear more lovely than in one principal picture, which at once arrests the attention of the visitor. It is a circular picture, and represents a Christ-child, arrayed in simple drapery, standing with his hands upraised and his face upturned, as if praying for strength to fulfil his mighty destiny of suffering. Little angels and cherubs are floating around through the air. Some with their tiny strength are vainly trying to push down a cross that, rooted in the ground, resists their efforts; others are examining the instruments of "His Passion;" one is looking with sympathizing grief and wonder at the nails—one is grasping the hammer—one upholding the spear—one has the scourge—while another, hovering above, upholds the crown of thorns over the head of the Christ-child, on whom the Heavenly Father is looking with love and compassion.

* * * *

During my stay at Florence, I went to Fiesolè, where Galileo gazed at the stars. I was especially induced to make this visit by having once heard a powerful and interesting account of it given by an acquaintance at a "little music" and tea conversazione. It was a vivid description and I envied the writer who had enjoyed the reality, until one day I learned from his own lips that he had never been there! Then I became pensive at the thought of the duplicity of mankind, and might have become a hypochondriac, had I not been consoled by remembering that after all, this was but another argument in favor of my well-known and stupendous theory, viz, namely, to wit: that every living human creature is more or less of a humbug, and generally more. Nevertheless I had a delightful visit to Fiesolè, and enjoyed especially the view from the little mountain city of the Campagna of Florence, the same view which Rogers so beautifully describes:

—let us from the top of Fiesolè,
Whence Galileo's glass by night observed
The phases of the moon, look round below
On Arno's vale, where the dove-colored steer
Is ploughing up and down among the vines,
While many a careless note is flung around
Filling the air with sweetness,—and on thee,
Beautiful Florence, all within thy walls.
Thy groves and gardens, pinnacles and towers
Drawn to our feet.

To make an instantaneous leap over any required amount of time or space is one of the undeniable prerogatives of novelists, and people afflicted with enthoosy-moosy. So you will at once accompany me as I fly from the heights of Fiesolè and alight in the Cascine.

Of course you now what the Cascine is. You are perfectly aware that it is the fashionable resort of all Florence every fair afternoon, and that it extends for miles along the Arno; but still if you have never been there you can form little idea of its exquisite beauty. Long drives on the smoothest of roads, embowered in trees, offer every inducement to those who wish to ride, while the pedestrian finds a still greater delight in strolling along the wide path that skirts the river's bank. There is always a perpetual verdure in the Cascine, for even in mid winter, when the trees are denuded of leaves, the creeping vines that flourish at that season, and that cover their trunks and their lower boughs with the emerald drapery, quite make up the deficiency. Then the sunsets from the Cascine! Ah! how glorious they are! I have seen a great many sunsets,—I have seen the sun set from the Pincian Hill of Rome, over the Calton Hill of Edinburgh,—behind the mighty banks of the Saguenay, and behind the mountains of New Hampshire, but never have I seen more richly glorious sunsets than from the Cascine of Florence. On the opposite side of the Arno are long rows of poplars, at this season denuded of foliage, and their long slender trunks seem like the bars of some enormous cage, behind which the captive sun is slowly dying. What a pleasure it is at that sweet hour, to stroll away from the gay crowds that throng the most frequented part of the Cascine, and wander along the river's bank, listen to the ringing of the convent bell, and yield oneself entirely to the mild, pensive influence of the scene. That poet, who has so sweetly sung of Italy, Rogers, beautifully describes such an hour and such a scene:

But lo! the sun is setting; earth and sky
One blaze of glory—what we see but now
As tho' it were not, tho' it had not been!
He lingers yet; and, lessening to a point,
Shines like the eye of Heaven; then withdraws!
And from the zenith to the utmost skirts,
All is celestial red! the hour is come
When they that sail along the distant seas
Languish for home, and they that in the morn
Said to sweet friends, "farewell," melt as at parting;
When, just gone forth, the pilgrim, if he hears
As now we hear it—echoing round the hill,
The bell that seems to mourn the dying day,
Slackens his pace and sighs, and those he loved,
Loves more than ever.

Well, at last I have left Florence—perhaps, forever—and though I meant to say something about my poor dear Casa Padrona, I will let it pass and dream awhile about this loved and lost Florence.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal.

- Silver Spring Pebbles. Song and Chorus. L. O. Emerson. 25
Full of Pathos. The poetry by G. M. Dove, Esq.
- Bonny Jem of Aberdeen. Scotch song. 25
Pretty, simple and taking; just the kind of song to make a "hit" at a Concert.
- The Happy Hour of Meeting. Song. Donizetti. 25
An inspiring song in the Tempo of a Polacca, thoroughly operatic in style.
- Sweet Spring. Ballad. Wrighton. 25
A good song with which to greet the joyous season. Pretty and fresh.
- Spirit Voice of Bell Brandon. J. B. Beardslee. 25
This is an answer and companion to the popular song of "Bell Brandon," and, once known, will appear to the friends of the latter an indispensable sequel.
- Jessie's Dream, or the Relief of Lucknow. J. Blockley. 40
The fancy of the composer seems to have been taken so much with this dramatic story, that one illustration of his able pen did not satisfy him. This version is of a more dramatic turn than the other, being interspersed with Highland Marches as interludes, indicating the advance of the stout friends of the brave lass. 40,000 copies of the English edition have been sold.

Instrumental Music for Piano.

- Return of Spring. Mazurka. Whittemore. 25
A very melodious Little Mazurka, which will prove a welcome addition to the library of the lovers of light music. Rather easy.
- Fife Polka. Jullien. 25
Excellent for the Ball-room.
- Good Bye, Sweetheart. Quick March. Rimbault. 30
A very fine March of but moderate difficulty. In the Trio, "Home, Sweet Home" is introduced with charming effect.

For Brass Bands.

- Sultana Polka, by D'Albert. Arranged by Burditt. 1.00
This is the Polka now in vogue. It makes a splendid Quick March as well as a highly pleasing Concert or Serenading piece. The arrangement needs no recommendation. It will be remembered, that Mr. Burditt is the arranger of that fine series of pieces for Brass Bands, printed on cards, called, "Ditson's Brass Band Music," and as such is favorably known to almost every Brass Band in the country.

Books.

- WESTERN BELL, (THE). A collection of Glee's, Quartets, and Choruses. By Edward A. Perkins and Frederick H. Pease.

An advertisement of this new and elegant volume of vocal music will be found in this number of the "Journal." Few books, if any, of this class have emanated from the American press, which we can so fully and honestly recommend to the musical amateur. The charge that has been often, and with good reason, brought against collections of Glee and Choruses, that they were merely old matter in a new form, will never arise in judgment upon this, for it bears on every page that fresh and original look that will commend it to the favor of all who are seeking for something new in this direction. It is not a new collection of Glee's but a collection of new Glee's, the poetry and music, for the most part having been written expressly for the work, and never before published. Its typography and binding are an advance on previous Glee Books—the former being the result of new type, and the latter exceedingly neat and tasty. A handsomer book in its general appearance, or a more meritorious one in its contents has not appeared for a century past and may not for some time to come.

- GOLDEN HARP (THE). A collection of Hymns, Tunes, and Choruses, for the use of Sabbath Schools, Social Gatherings, Pic-nics, and the Home Circle. By L. O. Emerson, author of the "Golden Wreath," &c., &c. Price, 25

Upwards of Thirty Thousand Copies of the "Golden Wreath" have been sold since its introduction to the public about fifteen months since. This unusually large sale has been on account of the great number, variety, and popularity of the pieces it contains for Public Schools and the Home Circle, and the peculiar adaptation of its lessons and exercises to the wants of teachers and scholars. The present work is designed to occupy another field, and to furnish for religious instruction and exercise equally as excellent a compilation of words and music as is supplied by the former for secular use. The special attention of Clergymen, Sabbath School Superintendents, Teachers and Parents of all denominations will command for the "Golden Harp" but one opinion in regard to it as the result of an admirable plan well carried out.

The Sanctus.

From the German of E. T. A. HOFFMANN.

THE Doctor thoughtfully shook his head. "So," said the Chapel-master, impetuously, as he sprang from the seat, "Bettina's catarrh is actually to prove serious?"

The Doctor tapped the floor three or four times quite softly, with his Spanish cane, took out his snuff box and replaced it without sniffing; looked upward fixedly as if counting the rosettes on the curtain, and coughed harshly, without speaking a word.

Then burst forth the Chapel-master, half beside himself, for he understood this pantomime of the Doctor, as clearly as if he had uttered in living words:—A bad, bad case—I know not how to counsel or advise. I am as completely frustrated in my attempts as that Doctor in Gil Blas of Santillana.

"Speak it out plainly!" cried he, angrily. "Do you mean to say that this simple hoarseness, which Bettina brought upon herself by the careless manner in which she wrapped her shawl around her, as she left the church, is to cost the young girl her life?"

"Not exactly," said the Doctor, while he again took out his snuff box, this time actually sniffing; "but the probability is that during her whole life she will never sing another note."

The Chapel-master clenched both hands in his hair, till the powder flew all around him, and ran up and down the room crying, as if mad:

"Never sing again? never sing again? Bettina never sing again? Give up all her magnificent canzonets—her wonderful Boleros and Seguidillas, that stream from her lips like sounding flower fragrance? Never again hear from her a pious Agnus or consoling Benedictus? Oh! oh! no Miserere, that purified my soul from every earthly strain, from all wicked thoughts, and opened upon me a whole rich world of pure spiritual themes? You lie! Doctor, you lie! Satan tempts you to deceive me. The church organist, who has felt for me the most bitter envy, since I brought out that astonishing Qui tollis, which has delighted the world, has bribed you to this. You seek to plunge me in despair, that I may throw my new mass into the fire; but if he thought the plan would succeed, you shall find to the contrary. Here—here I swear it, Bettina's solo (and he struck the marble table till every thing on it rattled,) shall be as magnificent as ever; she shall sing again her high notes, as clear as a bell."

The Chapel-master seized his hat and was going out, but the Doctor held him back, saying, in a soft, low voice: "I honor your praiseworthy enthusiasm, most esteemed friend, but I really do not exaggerate the case, neither do I know the organist, and this is simply the fact. Since Bettina sang the solos in the Gloria and Credo, in the mass, in the Catholic Church, she has been troubled with the self-same hoarseness, and has even at times lost her voice still more, so defying both my art and me, that, as I said before, I fear she will never sing again."

"Well, then," said the Chapel-master, resigning himself to his despair, "give her opium—opium, and continue to give it to her until she sinks gently in the arms of death; then will she sing no more, for she will live no more. She lives only when she sings; she exists but in song. Most worthy Doctor, do me the favor to poison her—the sooner the better. I have connections in the criminal college; I studied with the President, in Halle; he was a great bugler—we blew together the Bizinien, in the night time, with an obligato chorus of little dogs and cats chiming in. No harm shall happen to you on account of this honorable murder; but poison her—poison her."

"He," said the Doctor, interrupting the sputtering Chapel-master, "is already advanced in years and has worn his hair powdered for a long time, and though distinguished for music, concerning this matter would be a coward. Such a sinful murder and death-blow is not so lightly spoken of. But sit down quietly in this comfortable arm-chair, and listen to what I have to say to you."

The Chapel-master answered in a whining voice: "What shall I hear now?" at the same time, however, taking the seat.

"Bettina's case," continued the Doctor, "is indeed singular and remarkable. In speaking, she has the full use of her organs; one can hardly think it a common disease of the throat, for she can give out very clearly some musical tones; but the moment she attempts a high note, an incomprehensible something seizes her, which, though neither sticking, pricking, nor scratching, nor anything else which is affirmative, proves a diseased principle, so that every attempted tone, besides being impure and thick, is short and husky, and suddenly vanishes. Bettina herself compares her situation to that of one in a dream, who, with the fullest conviction of power to fly, vainly strives to move at all. This morbid, negative condition mocks my art, and renders all the usual remedies unavailing. The foe that I have to encounter, like a bodiless apparition, evades all my blows. In that point, Chapel-master, you are right, for Bettina's whole existence is in song; one can only think of this little bird of Paradise as singing. It is through her imagination, which continually incites her, that her song, and with it herself, is sinking away; and I am very nearly convinced, that her ill health is owing to this continued mental excitement, which renders my art useless. She is, as she acknowledges, of a very sensitive nature, and I have thought, for this month past, like a ship-wrecked person, who now snatches at that splinter, now at this, and grasping at every means, yet after a while becomes dismayed, that Bettina's whole illness is more psychical than physical."

"Right, Doctor," broke in the wandering Enthusiast, who all this time had been sitting silently in the corner, rubbing his hands together. "This once you have hit the right point, most excellent physician! Bettina's diseased state is the physical effect of a spiritual cause, but on that account all the worse and more dangerous. I, I alone, gentlemen, can explain it all to you."

"What shall I hear now?" again said the Chapel-master, in the same whining voice as before; and the Doctor drew his chair nearer to the Enthusiast, and gazed upon him with a singular smile on his face. The wandering Enthusiast glanced upward, and commenced, without looking at the Doctor or Chapel-master.

"Chapel-master, I have seen a many-colored butterfly who had engaged himself between the strings of your double clavichord. As the little creature fluttered delightedly up and down, he struck with his bright winglets now the upper, now the lower strings, which breathed so softly, so gently, that only the acutest and most accustomed ear could distinguish the tone and accord, till at last the fragile thing appeared to swim in the oscillations, as on soft heaving waves, which seemed to be produced by him. But it happened, that a more strongly touched string vibrated, as if irritated by the wings of the merry flutterer, so that wounded, it scattered around its variegated flower dust. Yet still the butterfly continued to flit about, with its joyous murmur and song, till, the string wounding it more and more sharply, it at length silently sank into the aperture of the sounding board."

"What would you have that say to me?" asked the Chapel-master.

"Fiat applicatio, dear sir," said the Doctor.

"I did not intend a special application," said the Enthusiast. "I actually heard the above-mentioned butterfly play upon the Chapel-master's clavichord. I only wished to convey in general an idea that then came to me, and so tolerably introduce what I would say of Bettina's illness. You know the whole, but look at it as an allegory written in the Album of a wandering virtuoso. It seems to me as if nature had surrounded us with a clavichord of a thousand strings, upon whose strings we play, believing its tones and chords to be voluntarily produced, and are often wounded to death without knowing that an unharmoniously touched string has given us the fatal blow."

"Very obscure!" said the Chapel-master.

"Oh!" cried the Doctor, laughing, "only patience. He will sit upon his hobby-horse, and take a gallop through the world of forebodings, dreams, spiritual influences, sympathies, idiosyncracies, &c., till he arrives at the station of magnetism, where he will dismount and take breakfast."

"Peace, peace, my wise Doctor," said the wandering Enthusiast. "Revile not things that you, struggle against them as you will, must yet acknowledge with humility, and highly respect. Have you not yourself said that Bettina's illness was produced by a spiritual cause—or, rather, is only a spiritual disease?"

"But what has Bettina to do with the unfortunate butterfly?" broke in the Doctor.

"If one," continued the Enthusiast, "would attempt to sift it, dividing all to a nicety, weighing each little grain, it would be a labor that would extend itself most tediously. Let the butterfly rest in the Chapel-master's clavichord. And besides, say yourself, Chapel-master, is it not a genuine misfortune that most holy music has become an integral part of our conversation? This glorious gift will be dragged down into common, every-day life. Instead of dwelling, as before, in the holy distance, even in the wondrous Heaven-realm, tones and melodies have strayed down to us, till we have the whole matter fairly by the hand, and know exactly how many cups of tea the Soprano, how many glasses of wine the Bass must drink, in order to come to the necessary exaltation. I know well that it aids a club, who, seized with the true spirit of music, practise together with earnest devotion. But each miserable, ornamented, overloaded, . . . Pshaw! I will not vex myself. When I was here last year, Bettina was exactly in the same condition. She was, as one may say, bewitched—she could do nothing without tea. It became a necessary ingredient of a Spanish romance, an Italian canzonet, or even the little French love-song, Souvent l'amour, &c., which she so often sang. I feared, indeed, that the poor child would drown herself and her glorious talent in the sea of tea-water that she poured down. It happened not so; but the catastrophe draws near."

"What catastrophe?" cried, at once, the Doctor and the Chapel-master.

"See, dear sir," continued the Enthusiast, "the poor Bettina is entirely, as one may say, enchanted, or bewitched; and, hard as it is for me to confess it, I acknowledge that I—I alone, am the wizard who has accomplished this bad work; and now, like a dabbler in magic, cannot undo what I have done."

"Nonsense! nonsense! and we sit here, with the utmost patience, and allow ourselves to be mystified by the irony of this miscreant," exclaimed the Doctor, springing up.

"To the Devil with you!" cried the Doctor. "The catastrophe! the catastrophe!"

"Quietly, gentlemen, quietly," said the Enthusiast. "Now comes a matter of fact, that I can vouch for, holding my witchcraft as a jest, notwithstanding, which sometimes falls heavily on my heart—that I, unacquainted with Bettina, without wish or intention, may have exercised over her this power, by means of spiritual influences. In the manner of a conductor, I mean, as in the electric circle, where the shock passes from one to the other, without any volition of their own."

"Heyday!" cried the Doctor, "see how the hobby-horse bears away its gallant rider."

"But the story, the story," said the Doctor.

"You have already mentioned, Chapel-master," continued the Enthusiast, "that Bettina, the last time she lost her voice, had been singing in the Catholic Church. You remembered, that this happened on Easter day, last year. You were dressed in your dark robes of honor, and led that glorious mass of Haydn's in D flat. A young, gracefully dressed maiden sang the Soprano, and yet did not sing it wholly; near her stood Bettina, who, with a wonderfully strong, full voice, poured forth the Solo. You know that I myself sang the Tenor. The Sanctus had commenced. A thrill of the deepest devotion vibrated through me. A disturbance behind me caused me suddenly to turn round, and I saw, to my great astonishment, Bettina seeking to press through the rows of musicians and singers, to leave the choir. 'Are you going?' asked I. 'It is high time,' she replied very kindly, 'that I should repair to the church of —, where I have promised to sing in a cantata, and I must also practise two duets before noon, that I must execute this evening, one at the tea-party at —, and the other at the little supper at —. Shall you be there! There will be two choruses from Handel's 'Messiah,' and the first Finale to 'Figaro's Wedding.'"

"As we spoke, the full accord of the Sanctus sounded forth, and the frankincense rolled in blue clouds through the roof of the church. 'Know you not,' said I, 'that it is sinful? that one does not go unpunished, who leaves the church during the Sanctus? You will never sing again in the church.' I said it in joke, and knew not how savagely my words sounded. She turned pale and left the church in silence. From that moment she lost her voice."

During all this time, the Doctor sat with his chin resting on the head of his cane. He remained silent, but the Chapel-master exclaimed, "Wonderful indeed! very wonderful!"

"Indeed," continued the Enthusiast, "at that time I had no especial meaning in my words, and I did not connect Bettina's loss of voice with the occurrence in the church in the slightest degree. But now, since I returned here, and learned from you, Doctor, that Bettina had ever since suffered from this miserable illness, it at once reminded me of a story which I read many years ago in an old book, which I will relate to you, for it is a graceful and touching tale."

"Tell it," cried the Chapel-master; "one may find a good subject for a fine opera therein."

"Do you know, Chapel-master," said the Doctor, "if you can set dreams, forebodings, and magnetic cases, to music, you may be greatly helped, for so the story will turn out."

Without waiting for the Chapel-master to answer, the wandering Enthusiast cleared his throat, and with loud voice began:

"The camp of Ferdinand and Isabella of Arragon spread itself out to a vast extent before the walls of Granada."

"Lord of Heaven and Earth!" burst forth the Doctor, interrupting the story-teller—"beginning there it would not end for nine days and nine nights, and I must sit here and let my patients suffer. To the devil with your Moorish tale! I have read Gonsalvo of Cordova and listened to Bettina's Seguidillas—but this Basta—all that it's fit for, is . . . Adieu."

The Doctor quickly sprang out at the door, but the Chapel-master remained quietly sitting, whilst he said:

"It will be a tale about the wars of the Moors and Spaniards, as I observe; about which I have languished to compose something. Wars, tumults, romances, processions, cymbals, chorals, drums, and kettle-drums—ah, yes, kettle-drums—these can all be introduced. Go on, most worthy Enthusiast; who knows what valuable seed-corn this wished for story may cast into my mind, and what giant flowers may spring therefrom?"

"You are now Chapel-master," answered the Enthusiast. "It would be too much like the opera, thence it would happen that rational people, whom the music would affect like a strong dram, though one now and then might enjoy it in small doses, as a cordial, would pronounce you mad. But I will tell it you, and you may fearlessly act upon it at your pleasure—occasionally throwing in accords."

The writer feels himself obliged, before copying the story of the Enthusiast, to say to the worthy reader, that for brevity's sake, when he would point out where the Chapel-master comes in, with his accords, instead of writing—"Here speaks the Chapel-master," he will simply say—The Chapel-master.

"The camp of Ferdinand and Isabella of Arragon spread itself out to a vast extent before the walls of Granada. Vainly hoping for succor, and daily shut in more and more closely, the faint-hearted Boabdil was discouraged. He was bitterly hated by the people, who in mockery called him the Little King, and found only a momentary confidence in offerings of the most bloodthirsty cruelty. Ever in the degree in which cowardice and despair seized on the inhabitants and army of Granada, faith in victory and delight in battle filled the Spanish camp. There was no need of attack. Ferdinand contented himself with besieging the walls, and repulsing the attacks of the besieged. These little skirmishes appeared more like joyous tournaments, than severe battles; and after them they collected the dead, and celebrated their decease, with all the pageantry of the church service, as if for holy martyrs. Isabella lived retired in the camp, where she had caused to be erected, in the midst, a high wooden building, with many towers, from the summit of which waved the banner of the cross. It was arranged within as a monastery and a church, where the Benedictine nuns daily held divine service. The Queen with her followers, accompanied by her riders, came each morning to hear the mass which the confessor read, and the nuns sang together in the choir. It happened one morning that Isabella noticed a voice, that, with wonderful bell-like clearness, drowned all the others. The song was listened to, as the desponding warbler listens to the nightingale, who, Princess of the woods, surpassed all the other tribes. And there was something so foreign in the pronunciation, so peculiar in the whole style, that it was evident the singer was unaccustomed to church music, and perhaps now sang in a mass for the first time in her life. Isabella seemed greatly surprised, and observed that her followers were seized with the same astonishment. She at once anticipated that some strange adventure was going on, for the brave General Aguillar, who had joined her train, caught her eye. Kneeling in the oratory, his eyes were fixed upon the choir, with an expression of most fervent, intense aspiration. As the mass was ended, Isabella went to the chamber of Donna Maria, the Prioress, and inquired about the strange singer. 'Will you, O Queen,' said Donna Maria, 'call to mind that for a month past, whilst Don Aguillar has sought to overthrow the outworks and conquer Granada, that the walls, surrounded by a magnificent terrace, have served as a place of pleasure. Each night the wanton song of the heathen, from that enticing syren voice, sounded over into our camp, and Don Aguillar was the more zealous, therefore, to destroy this nest of sin. Already were the works taken, already were the women, imprisoned during the battle, carried away, when an unexpected reinforcement, notwithstanding a brave defence, overpowered him, and drove him back into the camp. The enemy ventured not to follow him; therefore the prisoners and all the rich booty remained his. Among the female prisoners, there was one, whose inconsolable grief, whose despair, excited the attention of Don Aguillar.

"He approached the veiled one, with friendly words, but in her grief she had no speech but music. She took a cithern, suspended by a golden band from her neck, and played thereon a romance that moaned in profound sighs, heart-rending tones, the separation from the beloved, from all life's joys. Aguillar, deeply impressed by the wonderful tones, concluded to send back the prisoner to Granada. She prostrated herself before him, whilst she threw back her veil. Aguillar cried out, 'Art thou not Zulema, the light of song in Granada?' It was indeed Zulema, whom Aguillar had seen when Ambassador at Boabdil's Court, whose wonderful music had sunk deep in his breast. 'I give you your freedom,' said the General. But the worthy father Agostino Sanchez, who marched forward, cross in hand, exclaimed, 'Rememberest thou, my lord, that when thou settest this prisoner free, thou doest her great injustice; for thou returnest her to idolatry, when, perhaps, with us the grace of God may enlighten her, and she may be received into the bosom of the Mother Church.' Aguillar answered, 'she shall remain with us a month, and then, if the Spirit of the Lord prevails not with her, she shall return to Granada.' And so it happened, O! Queen, that Zulema was received by us into the Convent. At first she yielded entirely to her inconsolable grief; but soon wild and mournful music was heard, and then heart-touching romances, which filled the whole convent, and over all, the outgushing of her clear, bell-like voice. It happened one night, that we sang together in the church, after midnight, the wonderfully beautiful Ora, which that high master of song, Ferrera, had taught. In the bright light I observed Zulema standing in the open door-way of the choir, quiet and thoughtful, gazing upon us with earnest look. As we in couples left the choir, Zulema knelt and sang before an image of the Virgin. Since that day she has sung no romances, but remained still in inward contemplation. Soon she sought to recall, upon her deep voiced cithern, the chorals which we sang in the church, and then would sing them in a low, gentle voice, seeking to remember the words of our hymns, and pronouncing them with strange beauty in her foreign tongue. I marked well that the spirit of the Lord, in mild, confiding tones, spoke to her in music; and that her heart was open to His grace. Therefore I sent to her the sister Emanuela, mistress of the choir, that she might fan the glimmering torch to a flame; and thus it happened, that in holy song the faith of the Church has been enkindled in her. Zulema has not yet been received through holy baptism into the bosom of the Church; but we shall permit her to join our choir, and so devote her wonderful voice to the glory of religion.' The Queen now understood what passed in Aguillar's mind, when he yielded to Father Agostino's remonstrance, and did not send Zulema back to Granada, but placed her in the convent, and rejoiced greatly at her conversion to the true faith. In a few days, Zulema was baptized, and took the name of Julia. The Queen herself, the Marquis of Cadiz, Henry of Gusman, and the Generals Mendoza and Villena, were the witnesses of this holy act.

An Ancient Song:

Recently discovered and modernized by a member of the Percy Society, and now first made public.

I.

I know a little impresario,
And a multum in parvo is he.
If you ever should meet him, prepare ye, oh,
To behold "the industrious flea."
Sing heigh, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
Sing ho, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
For he's rough and he's bluff, and he's ever so tough,
And if that's not enough,
He's a most astonishingly cool man, O!

II.

His friends they call him a Napoleon,*
And he reigns over musical Gotham.
His wisdom and wit they reckon solely on—
His enemies—he's sure to overthrow them.
Sing heigh, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
Sing ho, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
For he's shy and he's sly, and he's ever so spry,
And he's got such an eye;
He's a most astonishingly cool man, O!

III.

He walks in the glittering Academy,
And he watches the fine people enter.
And he mutters—"These gay crowds foreshadow me
That mine is no profitless venture."
Sing heigh, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
Sing ho, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
For he smirks and he jerks, and he's full of his quirks,
And his wise head he perks;
He's a most astonishingly cool man, O!

IV.

When business falls off, he seizes his pen,
And comes out with a stunning bulletin.
Then he stands like a crafty old fox in his den,
To watch for the cash and to pull it in.
Sing heigh, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
Sing ho, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
For he winks and he blinks, as he hears the sweet chinks,
And complacently thinks
He's a most astonishingly cool man, O!

V.

He laughs at the ninnies who rush to and fro
In the mazes of musical factions,
For he knows very well how to manage it so
As to profit by all their mad actions.
Sing heigh, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
Sing ho, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
For his foes he can pose, so he turns up his nose,
And every way shows,
He's a most astonishingly cool man, O!

VI.

So he prospers and thrives with his operas gay,
And his concerts so fashionable;
And he ne'er finds himself—what'er he may say—
To make out his cash unahle.
Sing heigh, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
Sing ho, my jolly jolly Yule-man, O!
For he knows all the throws, and just how the wind blows,
And with it he goes—
He's a most astonishingly cool man, O!

* The antiquity of the song is so great that some portions are very difficult to decipher. Thus it is very nearly impossible to determine whether this line terminates "a Napoleon," or "an Apollyon."

† There is some doubt about the orthography of this word. "Yule" is an ancient term for a festival day, more especially Christmas. It is supposed that "Yule-man" signifies, in this case, one who has to do with festivals and shows. In one or two places in the manuscript it is spelt "Ule-man," and in others "Ullman." It has been deemed best, however, to adopt a uniform style.

Halévy's New Opera, "La Magicienne."

Correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune.

PARIS, MARCH 21, 1858. — Halévy has given us his new opera, after six months' rehearsals—changes innumerable—forty thousand dollars of expenditure—(such are the conditions precedent to the execution of a grand opera; it is no wonder they appear only once in two years!) We have had a surfeit of "properties;" tastes of hell and glimpses of hell—genii, spirits, naiads, syrens, butterflies, gnomes, salamanders, devils, pages, hinds, swains, nobles, vassals, heralds, chessmen, feudal castles and gothic cathedrals—brimstone and electric light—nude girls and vested priests—rivers and lakes—moonlight nights and amber sunrises—the "Child's Own Book" and the "Arabian Nights" rolled into five hours—in fine, forty thousand dollars of "properties;" for that is all—the music is but the Vauxhall slice of ham between two great hunches of bread; it is the mere pretext, the "talking of guns," which introduces a fairy piece from the Porte Saint Martin to the Grand Opera. It is evident that the new managers of the Opera are homeopaths of music, and relegate the old-fashioned allopathic mode of giving little scenery and much music to the Italian opera. They hold with the manager M. Hector Berlioz recently described; him who said,

"The best music is that which in opera spoils nothing."

"I must, however, analyze the "book" (which is by M. de Saint Georges) for you. The title of the opera is La Magicienne, and although the "book" is not an adaptation of the old legend of Melusina, it is founded upon it. According to the legend, Melusina married Raimondin, Count de Forêt, one of the founders of the family of Lusignan. She possessed great beauty and fascinating grace, but during the night she was half woman and half serpent. In their marriage contract was a clause providing that the husband should be satisfied to love his wife only during the day, but that he should never see her at night. The indiscreet husband, however, did not keep his promises, and he saw her during the transformation; she gave a terrible scream and never appeared more. When the curtain rises on the new opera, it discovers the young Countess Blanche de Poitou in the hall of her castle, surrounded by her ladies and servants. Her betrothed, René, who had long been absent on a crusade, is about returning, for the crusade is ended. A mysterious stranger, who has entered to crave hospitality, tells her that he met René encamped in a neighboring forest. The second scene shows us (and it is beautifully gotten up) this forest lighted up by one of those Neapolitan moons which are indeed "but daylight sick." Fairies and genii sport in their unhallowed games, for there is Melusina's, the Magician's, court. René is seen sleeping under a small tent. Melusina, who has fallen in love with him, in love like the panther "who strikes his claws into his female's loins when in the transports of his love," bends over the sleeper and sends him a dream in which he sees her in all her brilliant beauty. His heart thrills at the sight. Blanche fades away from his memory, and Melusina occupies the heart she once possessed. He wakes, and the sprites fade away into thin air.

The stage represents in the second act a subterranean hall in Lusignan's castle, in the Oriental style, and adorned in a rich cabalistic manner, befitting Melusina's residence. She is seen consulting an old black art manuscript. Melusina was seduced by Stello, a famous necromancer, who revealed to her a portion of his infernal science, but retaining enough to enable him to exercise an absolute power over her. She is tired of this slavery, and ashamed of the love she had for a moment for Stello, and pores over the book to procure some secret mode of breaking his spell. She is interrupted by the opening of the mazy wall—Stello enters, and the wall closes again. He knows her love for René, and threatens her with his torments if she does not abandon it. She flies away while he is menacing her. Now we see René in the castle of Blanche's father; the latter presents René to everybody as his son-in-law; his return is celebrated by dances, in the midst of which meek priests enter, bearing a tripod filled with burning incense, and followed by a veiled woman, who is called the Samnian sybil, but who is in reality Melusina. She comes to prevent the marriage of René and Blanche: "Your bride deceives you," says she to him; "meet me at midnight in the castle garden and you shall see with your own eyes."

"In the third act Melusina and René meet in the garden; he recognizes in her the beauty of his dreams, and swears eternal fidelity to her if she proves Blanche false. "Look!" says she. He looks and sees a handsome page singing under Blanche's windows; the magician raises a phantom which appears on the balcony, makes signs to the page, throws him a bouquet; it seems Blanche, and René believes; while the open window of a chapel discloses to the spectator the real Blanche on her knees at prayer, praying for her own René, while he takes Melusina's land and swears love to her.

Day breaks. A troop of peasants appear bearing a May-pole; they erect it and dance rustic measures around it. Blanche and René are left together; he reproaches her for her frailty in unmeasured terms, when her father enters and sees her kneeling with disheveled hair at René's feet; the latter openly accuses her. Blanche, fearing her father's anger for René, confesses her guilt, and declares her intention of retiring to a convent. Melusina, who is afraid that René will relent at the sight of all this grief, causes a violent tempest and carries him off amid terrible peals of thunder, vivid flashes of lightning and the hissing of fast falling rain.

The fourth act opens with the palace of Melusina, which is resplendent with light and precious stones, and golden plate. René has forgotten Blanche. But Stello bursts through these palace rocks, which close behind him; René asks who is this intruder; they exchange bitter words and draw their swords, but René's sword drops from his hand (what is ordinary steel to a magician's wand?) and Stello spares his life that he may tell him his new mistress is Melusina, that Blanche is pure, that his senses were juggled by the perfidious Melusina when he took a phantom for his true-love, that at day-break Melusina assumes a form beyond expression horrible; as he speaks the sun rises, a greenish light like the color which mantles the loathsome, stagnant pool, or the livery of the frog, steals over her. René curses her, myriads of devils rise on all sides to join in his malediction.

A picturesque valley appears with the fifth act; it is filled with ruined altars, crumbling, ivy-crowned abbeys and venerable convent walls. Blanche appears, followed by her servants. Melusina enters; she is a repentant woman, and seeks Blanche to obtain her pardon for all the wrongs she had done her. Blanche refuses to pardon her, but hearing that the now undeceived René still loves her, she determines to abandon her resolution of entering the convent.—Melusina in her despair turns her mind to the cloister, but here Stello appears, and claims her as hell's property; Blanche retires, praying for Melusina as she goes into the convent where her father and René await her. Trumpets are heard in the bowels of the earth, and on every side spring from the firm soil demons and imps, who strive to drag Melusina down to their bottomless pit. The prayers of René, Blanche and her father are heard in the convent praying for Melusina. The damned gnash their teeth and wail in agony at being so foiled; Melusina cries "I believe! I am a Christian!" Hell's pensioners retire in dismay, buried in a convulsion of nature which, amid loud peals of thunder and the quaking of the earth and lurid flames, swallows them up; while in the distance a beautiful landscape, bathed in soft light, appears; a village procession advances to meet Blanche and René. On the other side Melusina expires in the arms of an abbess, the heavens open, a radiant cross is seen, angels fly up and down in the effulgence which pours from the realms of bliss, and Melusina's soul ascends to heaven.

Mr. Berlioz says: "The leading qualities of the score of La Magicienne are strength and grandeur. It contains none of those combinations which require from the auditor a sort of laborious analysis, which is always fatiguing. All is clear and simple." M. Fiorentino expresses a still more favorable opinion: "The author of La Juive, la Reine de Chypre, Charles VI., and so many other profound and popular operas, has written a master score. The last act is, everybody agrees, a chef d'œuvre; M. Halévy has never been more happily inspired."

While the opinions of judges are so favorable they also hold that it is impossible to execute this opera in any theatre except the two or three grand opera houses of Europe. M. Halévy—like every other composer who writes for the grand opera—has been obliged to cut his piece a great deal to please the "property man" and the ballet master, and the chances are, the residuum of music will not please, unless framed in as much carved gold as when it first appeared.

GAMMA.

(From Punch.)

The German Liszt Confederation.

There seems to be in the continental papers a grand Germanic confederation to praise Liszt. It is toujours Liszt, as with the Ghost in Hamlet. It is the rule, apparently, with all Teutonic editors, if there happens to be a crack, or a small cranny, in their paper, that wants filling up, to dab in, invariably, a bit of Liszt. This prevalence of the same commodity, that German editors resort to as often as their wits are woolgathering, reminds one of an invalid's room. The constant look, and monotonous sound of the thing begins to weary one.

However, we are not indisposed to believe all the magnificent things that are being perpetually dinged in honor of this wonderful Kapellmeister. On the contrary, we are most anxious to open our ears wide to every stunning peal of praise that his followers are daily ringing in commemoration of his victorious merits. It is one glorious privilege, attached to the happy fact of being a musician, that the homage addressed to him is always of the most superlative kind. There are no pigmies in the art; they are all giants. What a musician of the most gigantic proportions is Wagner! what a Titan of music is Liszt! The old Titans, we believe, tried to take Heaven by means of ladders. But these stupendous Titans of the fiddle and the piano-forte are in the habit of running up monster scales to Heaven, and bringing down with them on the tips of their fingers all the melody and music that is stored there in the keeping of the angels. At least, this is what their mad pupils tell you, and what we are consequently bound to believe. The Future, too, sings to them, years in advance of other mortals; and so quick are they of hearing, that, like Fine-ear, who was a member of Fortunio's celebrated band, they have only to put their ears to the ground, and they will hear sounds such as no one else can hear. In this way, they listen to operas ten, fifteen, fifty years before the rest of the world; but it pains us to state that these favored giants, with their oreilles in a future world, are rather apt to get angry, because the world is weak enough to prefer good music of the present day to bad music that would be popular half-a-century hence. When we are fifty years older, perhaps we shall know better.

We will now take up again the golden thread that we had dropped for a few sentences, of our great admiration for Liszt. To prove how credulous we are in his noble favor, and only too ready to believe every incredible thing that is drivelled about him, we have written, and with no small amount of pleasure, the following startling paragraphs, all of which bear record to his surpassing genius. We present them cordially to the German editors, and they are at liberty to use every one of them:—

"Liszt wears out a piano every day. If it were not for his colossal fortune, he would not be able to do this."

"At the coronation of the Emperor of Russia, Alexander walked before Liszt; the gifted young composer was so hurt at this, that he got up instantly and left the church. He has never forgiven the insult to the present day."

"It is a libel to say that Liszt's hair is two yards long. It is true that it is of such a length that, on state occasions, a beautiful young Gräfin walks with conscious pride behind him, and is enabled to hold it up, as a page does the train of a lady's dress. The fact is that, not being able to endure the cuisson of the hair-cutter's scissors, he does not have his hair cut oftener than once every fifteen years. The effect of that operation on his sensitive nature is such that he cries for weeks afterwards. However, if his hair is a yard and a half long, it is to the full as much as it is; but then when I saw it, it was only in its sixth year."

"To show how nice he is in his distinctions, he calls himself the Raphael of music, and Wagner the Michael Angelo."

"He will not endure the slightest affront paid to his art. One day the Grand Duke of Grosshunderhoshen accidentally put his hat upon the lid of his piano. It was his cherished piano—the one that he would allow no one to touch but himself. Instantly Liszt seized hold of the recreant chapeau, and with a frenzy that almost made his long hair stand bolt upright he flung it out of window. The next day he had the piano (it was made of sandal-wood, ornamented with turquoises, and standing on spiral legs of malachite) chopped up for fagots for the poor. Notwithstanding the most abject apologies, he would never permit the Grand Duke to enter into his presence again."

"As a proof of the wonderful spell he exercises over all listeners, we may mention the following well-authenticated fact: One night he was playing on the balcony of the Goldene Gans at Prague. An immense crowd was collected below—all Prague, in fact. With the greatest good-nature, he played for several hours, though the weather was intensely cold. The mob seemed never to tire of listening to him. What was the lamentable consequence? The next morning, three peasants, nineteen market-women, a Field-Marshal, and a dog, were found frozen to death on the spot! Since then, not all the entreaties in the world will ever induce Liszt to play for more than half-an-hour at a time."

Liszt's influence over the fair sex is too well known to be doubted by any one. Ladies have disguised themselves as water-carriers, as porters, even as chimney-sweeps, to gain admission into his divine presence. Sometimes he is obliged to have the police pull the women away from his house, before he has been able to get in at the street door. On each finger, Liszt has a valuable ring—each ring was the gift of an empress, a queen, or a crowned princess. He will not take any more rings now. He will give as many as you like—but he's too proud to receive an obligation from any one. It was from Berlioz, we think, that he once took a pot of beer; but the Grand Dowager Duchess Fylybithijijiskoi, had to go on her knees to get Liszt to accept of her a pearl that was almost as big as a swan's egg! It was valued at several thousands of pounds, but imprudently he sat upon it one day, and smashed it! He has an immense box of love-letters: they are from countesses, washerwomen, poetesses, little school-pupils, actresses, even from beggar-girls. Appreciating the spirit that dictates the homage of them all, he has deigned to receive billets-doux from the poorest, or the highest, or the most degraded! Well, before Liszt sits down to compose, he dips his hands into this trunk full of letters, and allows them to remain there for at least half-an-hour, steeped up to his elbows, in the electric current of the tender epistles. He says it permeates his fingers to the very tips with the purest inspiration! He calls it his Fountain of Jouvence—his Egeria of love."

"Liszt has made more money, perhaps, than any one else in the world. To show what little value he places upon wealth, he has been known to throw big handfuls of gold into the pit of the Opera. It has been calculated that if all the princely sums he has received in exchange for the exercise of his sublime talents, were changed into gold Napoleons, and placed side by side, that they would make an auriferous pavement round the circumference of the globe more than sufficiently wide to allow a couple of Saloon Omnibuses to drive about upon it. Change the same enormous sums into £5 bank notes, and you could paste the Wall of China all over with them, and in addition, have several park-palings to spare. It is certainly stupendous!"

We have scarcely done laughing at the humor of the above, when we receive the following report about the great pianist, which possibly is quite as much an invention of the enemy:

LISZT A MONK.—A year ago it was reported that the great pianist, Liszt, had become a monk; but the report proved untrue. We find it now repeated circumstantially. The Lloyd of Pesth, in one of its latest issues, contains a paragraph which the Philadelphia Bulletin translates as follows:

"The celebrated pianist, Francis Liszt, was last Sunday solemnly received into the brotherhood of the Order of St. Francis d'Assises, at Pesth. A mass was said at noon in the church of the Franciscan Fathers, and then Becker's vocal mass was performed by the members of a singing society and others, admirers of Liszt. After the mass, those attending it repaired to the refectory, where Liszt, wearing the Portuguese Order of Christ, entered and took a place of honor reserved for him, after which a prayer was offered. A priest of the Order then presented Liszt the document of reception, from the Provincial Father at Presburg, and made him an address in Latin, in which he spoke of the new brother's great merits as an artist and a man. After several addresses by different church dignitaries, by Baron Augustus, Vice President of the government of Buda, and others, the ceremony was followed by a dinner."

Tamberlik's Debut in Paris.

Correspondence of the Boston Traveller.

PARIS, April 8.—We have had the appearance of M. Tamberlik before a Paris audience. He trembled, believe it, when he saw that many-headed monster, the public, filling the Italian Opera house, for he was afraid that his reputation might receive a blow which would wound it for many a long day. Success hangs by so slight a thread! An indigestion, an importunate dun, a scolding wife, the cloudy sky; who can number all the gossamer lines on which fame hangs? No wonder the veteran trembled, for who could vaticinate the humor of that audience, disposed to be critical, easier to offend than to please, (what can please the palled, whose most exquisite sensation is the consciousness of being not offended!) The theatre was crammed, for who knew the issue of that evening, and what a pleasure it would have been to be able to say, I was there! I saw that Tamberlik, of such boasted fame at London, St. Petersburg, Rio, fail, signally fail, prove worse than our third-rate tenors. The curtain rose, and M. Tamberlik appeared, trembling like an aspen leaf. Grisi was there too, but (oh, for the taste of a Paris audience!) The whole object of the curiosity of the evening, was to know if he could give the ut dieze (or re bemol); if he failed in this note, he would have been hissed, though he had been perfect in every other particular. So the first act went off lamely enough; M. Tamberlik was greatly applauded. Mme. Grisi (who was furious in consequence of mistakes Emilia made) sang and acted admirably.

Between this and the next act, the late comers poured into their places, afraid they were after the ut. Has he given it? Not yet. Thank Heaven, I pay a hundred francs for my seat to-night, and I was afraid I might miss that note rarer than a black swan, the ut de poitrine. Ut de poitrine, Monsieur! why that is what Duprez gave in his palmy days, while Tamberlik give an ut dieze. Hush! hush! gentlemen, if you please, say another person, he is going to give an admirable re. You could have heard a pin drop as the curtain rose on the second act. The audience seemed changed to marble statues. The duo between Iago (Corsi) and Otello (Tamberlik) was listened to with breathless curiosity, which soon became impatience, when the audience found the note so long in coming. Nobody breathed, afraid lest his respiration might make him lose the note. Here is the famous stretta, whispered the old opera goers. Tamberlik sang with poignant grief and ferocious vengeance:

Morro ma vendicato,

Si dipo lei morro.

But he gave no do!! He came near being hissed . . . but absorbed in his part, sure of himself, he advanced to the footlights, and beginning his phrase with tenfold energy and fury he gave the famous ut dieze—no scream—no doubtful forced sound—but a full, round, equal, silvery, irreproachably accurate and of rare power. The opera house shook to its foundations, the orchestra and pit rose and cheered. The boxes applauded. You remember to have seen Webster in Faneuil Hall: "If those pictures could speak . . . I do hear them speak!" and Boston hurrah itself hoarse! Such was the scene the other night at the Italian Opera after Tamberlik gave his ut dieze.

A novel musical instrument, called a Key Harp, is attracting attention. Its external construction is nearly like that of a piano, with a similar arrangement of keys and pedals, but its musical principle is entirely different. The mystery of the invention is understood to consist in the adjustment of tuning forks of various pitches (answering to the keys) over cavities of sonorous metal, which, if struck, would give out corresponding sounds. The tuning forks are vibrated by strokes of the keys, and the result is a sweet, mellow tone, very much like that of a music-box or a harp. If the volume of the sound can be doubled (which it is claimed can be done by an additional mechanical contrivance) the Key Harp may yet share household honors with the piano.

Musical Correspondence.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., MAY 11.—The first Concert of the "Brooklyn Harmonic Society" comes off to-morrow night at the Polytechnic Institute, and the Rehearsals so far angrar well for the success of the very excellent programme, which is as follows:

PART I.

1. Symphony in C, Beethoven.
2. Forest Birding, Air for Soprano, Horn Obligato, Lachner.

Miss Marie Elina Couran.

3. Terzetto from Titus, Mozart.
5. Oberon's Magic Horn, Fantasia for Piano-forte, with Orchestral accompaniment by Hummel.

1. Allegro energico; 2. Larghetto cantabile; 3. Tempo di Marcia; 4. Tempesto di Mare (Tempest on the sea); 5. Allegretto con moto.

Mr. John Suckert.

PART II.

5. Overture—Magic Flute, Mozart.
6. Easter Morning Cantata, Neukomm.

Much praise is due Mr. Prox, for the energy and perseverance he has given to the best interest of this new Society and other matters connected with the promotion and growth of a good, healthy, and genuine musical taste among us. Miss COURAN, the Soprano soloist of the Society, possesses an excellent voice and sings with much feeling and taste.

With close application and careful study under good teachers, Miss Couran will rank among our best Concert singers.

The "Brooklyn Philharmonic Society" propose giving, in conjunction with the Horticultural Society, a Floral and Musical entertainment at the Athenæum, about the first of June.

The particulars I cannot give you as they are not yet decided upon. It is designed however to be an unique and elegant affair, combining the highest enjoyment of the loveliest and purest products of nature, with the greatest and noblest production of Art.

Madame Rumour says we are to have Opera at the Academy again in New York next week, with GAZANIGA as principal attraction. The Philadelphia company at Burton's are meeting with fair success. LAGRANGE and RONCONI are the proprietors as well as the principal attraction. I prefer not to speak of Ronconi till I have seen him in "Il Barbiere," on Wednesday, when he plays Figaro. In the meantime I would commend to the attention of your readers, the characteristic but admirable notice in the Tribune of this morning, by Mr. Fry, of Signior Ronconi, and the performance last night at Burton's of Elisir d'Amore. It is much to be regretted that Mr. Fry so seldom gives us notices of this kind both of the artists and the operas performed.

The MUSARD Concerts are a very bad failure. The whole thing has fallen flat. The audiences are never large, and sometimes they are quite meagre.

The enthusiasm was never above blood-heat and often down at Zero. Mons. Musard is always intensely graceful, never in earnest, for fear it might be vulgar. The ladies think him "such a love of a man," and Mons. thinks the "American poobleck don't know good mooseek."

Mr. Ullmann is losing money every night. This is really too bad, for the Concerts are certainly well worth attending. Mr. Ullman must come out with another "card to the public." Give us a little more "grape" and "canister," Mr. Ullman; there's nothing like it.

We are to have this week, "Two Sacred Oratorios (under the immediate patronage of the most distinguished clergymen of New York and Brooklyn)."

What a sad and deplorable state of things, when our "most distinguished clergymen" allow themselves to be used in countenancing the production of such heathenish works as those by Handel, Haydn and Mendelssohn! BELLINI.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 5. — RONCONI is unquestionably the most versatile actor on the lyric stage. His Dr. Dulcamara, in L'Elisir d'Amore, was a perfect masterpiece of comic delineation,—the most laughter-provoking, quaint, and life-like picture of the charlatan imaginable. The elegant audience, which generally regards an open display of risibility to be a sure index of an unsophisticated mind, was forced, nolens volens, into constant paroxysms of mirth by the vagaries of this Burton of the lyric boards. We have never known even an approximation to him.

The Opera season closed with LA GRANGE's benefit, last Saturday evening. It came to a most unpleasant termination. Pecuniary difficulties, intrigues, plots and counterplots, quarrels, and many other concomitant features of this peculiar and sensitive institution hurried it to a finale somewhat premature. The chef d'Orchestre and a subaltern of his had rendered themselves obnoxious to a large body of the regular habitués of the Opera house; to such an extent, in fact, that the promenaders of the lobby hissed and hooted the twain from the precincts, on Saturday night. All this created a vast deal of excitement, during which disclosures of the most extraordinary character, with regard to the management of the internal economy of the Academy, sped through the saloon and streets of the city, upon the wings of rumor. How well authenticated these were I know not; but, if true, they would furnish sufficient intrigue for a "yellow-kivered" novel. GAZZANIGA was to have been rejoiced by a monster complimentary benefit on Monday night last, but the cruel Fates, or rather the complicated troubles at Broad and Locust, have cheated her out of the high honor, the wreaths, and the profits.

SATTER announces his first Concert for next Tuesday evening, at the Musical Fund Hall. He comes to Philadelphia at a most inauspicious moment, when a long Opera season has drawn heavily upon the exchequer of individual connoisseurs, and when the fond mamma and her aspiring daughter, deeming the winter season over, commence to direct their whole thoughts upon the coming watering-place dissipation. His audiences may prove sufficiently select, appreciative, and enthusiastic, but they can scarcely be remunerative. Still, Mme. JOHANNSEN, his cantatrice, may draw the Germans forth.

The Harmonia Sacred Music Society announces its final Concert of the season for to-morrow night (9th inst.) A most excellent programme, (comprising choruses from the "Elijah" and the "Creation," together with many fine sacred and secular Solos) has been prepared. This popular society has contributed greatly to the dissemination of a taste for classical music here. "High Art" seems to be its watchword; and although, in a desire to please all of its subscribers, light ballads and other works, not strictly up to an elevated standard, are allowed to appear upon its programmes, still infinite credit is due to its persevering efforts to render the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and other kindred spirits, appreciated by the masses at large.

The soprano of to-morrow night is to be Mrs. EMILY REED (a Bostonian, I believe) who has been here for some time, and who recently acquitted herself nobly in a performance of the "Creation" by our Handel and Haydn Society. MANRICO.

MILAN, APRIL 18. — I have recently been poking about — excuse the inelegance of the term, but it is so eminently expressive of my style of travelling — I have been poking about a part of Italy not often visited by travelers — the Adriatic coast. I have made a discovery, to wit, that this Oriental side of Italy is the most musical part of this land of song.

In the course of my pokings, I visited a number of curious old towns, among them Rimini, where they have a theatre that surpasses anything in even Paris itself. It was only erected last year, is replete with all the modern improvements, and, as a piece of architecture, is a handsome embellishment to the interesting old town. The architect is immortalized by having his name placed in large letters over the portal, accompanied with a complimentary Latin inscription. When the theatre was finished, Verdi was engaged to write an opera for the opening night, and in response to the call, the enchanter waved his wand, and forth came that poor, mis-shapen thing, Aroldo. In a previous letter I mentioned that this opera was first produced in Parma; but it appears I was wrong, and as the error is one of such colossal importance, I hasten to make a retraction. Verdi wrote Aroldo "to order," for the splendid new theatre of Rimini, which, though a village of but about 12,000 inhabitants, possesses a finer opera house than Boston, with all its musical taste, can boast of.

Having written his opera and personally presided at its production at Rimini, the good people of the place, and the city authorities and everybody else put their heads together, and besides paying the lucky Verdi handsomely for Aroldo, they decided to compliment him with a special testimonial of their regard. So a number of handsome lithograph portraits of the Maestro were struck off with a suitable inscription beneath, stating the circumstances of the case, and copies of this portrait may be found in almost every shop window on the Adriatic coast, from Ravenna to Ancona. This is a frequent compliment in Italy. When a Prima Donna has a benefit, her admirers have a portrait printed of the lady, with some such inscription as this: "To the egregious and talented Signora So and So, on the occasion of her benefit at such a place. An humble testimonial of regard from admiring friends." Then follows the date.

At Pesaro, which you know perfectly well is on the Adriatic coast, about 25 miles from Rimini, was born ROSSINI, and I therefore looked about this lively and good-sized town with special interest. It is not a very agreeable place. It has no railroads and no steamboats, and it is no wonder that Rossini deserts it for the more genial Paris. In fact he decidedly snubs his birthplace, and has not visited it for some time. I must say that he enjoys at Pesaro the unenviable reputation of being rich and stingy. A number of his relatives still live there, engaged in various pursuits. In his youth he was wild and wanted to go to sea. However he became a composer and thus immortal, for which interesting and novel information I am indebted to the landlord of the inn I stopped at.

Yet after all, Rossini is the greatest man Pesaro ever brought forth, and the Pesarese are perfectly well aware of it. A few years ago they placed his statue in the public square, where you may now behold him grasping the inevitable roll of music and looking upwards as if struck with a sudden idea. There are few, if any musicians, who have been so fortunate as Rossini. All over the civilized world he is spoken of with the most enthusiastic admiration. At Paris his society is courted by the most intelligent and aristocratic classes, and it would be the same in whatever country he lived. He gets the credit of saying a great many more clever things than he really does say, and newspaper folks are continually making him the hero of apocryphal anecdotes. Yet, at the same time, in the midst of all his popularity, it may be fairly asked whether he has not already seen its decline — whether his music is not already more talked about than listened to.

The fact is my hawk eye has been scanning with acute attention the operatic campaign in Italy for the past six months, and only two of Rossini's numerous operas have been in that time produced in all this country — that is, if I may depend upon the faithfulness of said hawk eye. His Otello was produced in some little town, the name of which I now forget, while his Barbiere was the chief attraction of the musical season at Rome. The latter opera seems to be immortal, but it is the only one of Rossini's numerous works that is now really popular here. William Tell has been hitherto a great favorite in Milan, but this last season it only drew thin, unpaying houses to La Scala. The Gazza Ladra, both the French and Italian musical press unite in condemning as utterly old fogeyish and as an opera which, having lived an honorable and respectable existence, should now be allowed to quietly depart this life. I think there can be no doubt that the genuine popularity of Rossini's music is on the wane in Italy at least — though if such glorious works as Tell and Semiramide do not enjoy a hundred years of healthy life, what operatic music can?

At the same time Bellini seems to be as popular as ever. Not only are the three favorites, Norma, Puritani, and Sonnambula, still frequently produced, but his other operas, not so well known in America — Pirata, Montecchi e Capuletti, and La Straniera — are also occasionally produced. Last night I heard at the theatre Santa Radegonda, in this city, his Beatrice di Tenda, a lovely little opera, worthy of the composer of Sonnambula.

There is at present a rising composer in Italy, who promises to become a star of the first magnitude. It is FERRARI, whose opera, L'ultimi giorni di Suli, has had a success, which is however quite eclipsed by the great enthusiasm created by his new work, Pipele. This Pipele is a comic opera, full of life and spirit, and abounding in striking melodies. There is a burlesque oath scene, which seems to be a musical parody upon the grand oath-scene in William Tell. There is a drunken scene which nightly draws an encore, though perhaps more on account of the acting than the music. There is a grand trio for male voices, with any amount of brilliant airs for the prima donna, concluding with a spirited bravura finale à la Mazurka. This opera is now meeting with great success all over Italy, and it is very probable it will cross the water and be heard ere long in America.

La Scala is closed at present, and I was disappointed in not being able to get a glimpse at the interior of this famous theatre. The owners of La Scala also have a smaller theatre here, La Cannobina, which serves as a substitute for the larger, the latter being open only in winter. At the Cannobina the operas for the spring season are Rossini's Barbiere, and Bellini's Sonnambula. There will be this spring three opera houses open in Milan.

TROVATOR.

FLORENCE, APRIL 15. — Compared with the frequent opportunities of listening to good music which you enjoy in Boston, we temporary Florentines are but poorly situated. Nevertheless, now and then a matinee, or a soirée, private or public, enables us to realize that there is other than Verdi's music in the world, and that Beethoven and his compeers are not unsubstantial realities, formed of the "stuff which dreams are made of." Of this class were two evening concerts given by "Il maestro MAGLIONI, (a well-known composer, and piano-forte teacher here), at the first of which we had the C minor Trio of Beethoven, very well played by MANETTI, CASORTI and SBOGLI. Manetti, with a slightly too Italian tendency to the seeking of expression by such illegitimate means as "ad libitum" rallentandos and accelerandos afford, has a feeling for classical music, a good pianist. Casorti is a pupil of De Beriot, and resident at Turin; while Sholei is the best violoncellist in Florence; a first rate player for expression and execution, and conversant with the works of the great masters. We had some very good singing at this and the second soirée, and at both pleasing compositions for Piano, Harmonium and strings of Maglioni's, entitled "Serenade," "Hymn to Flora," &c., &c., somewhat too full of Italian cadences and climaxes to suit a Germanized ear. Maglioni's best work is a Cantata, called "Manfred," which judging from inspection of the printed Piano and Voice score, is of no ordinary merit. At his second soirée he produced with Chorus, Meyerbeer's new Pater Noster, which being very well sung, and a striking composition, produced great effect, and was encored. At the house of GIORACCHINI, (the Violin Professor at the Accademia delle Belle Arti) we have had matinées of even a higher quality. At the second one, which took place a week ago, the Signora SACERDOTE played Mendelssohn's D minor Trio with Gioracchini and Sholei, admirably well—and afterwards Weber's G minor Trio for Piano, Flute, and 'Cello. We had also the first movement of a Concerto by De Beriot, for two Violins, in which the parts were tripled, by Gioracchini and five of his scholars—their unity of style, bowing and execution showed what a very excellent master Gioracchini must be to have such pupils in the difficult art of Violin playing. At the first matinée the 3d Trio of Mayseider was very well played, and the Abbate FEDERIGHT, an excellent Baritone singer, sang among other things, Schubert's "Adieu," (which is not Schubert's, I am aware) with great effect.

The crowning glory of our musical performances took place last week under the direction of Maestro SNOLEI, the father of the Violoncellist, at the Accademia delle Belle Arti. It consisted of Marcello's magnificent version of the 50th Psalm, a Miserere for Alto, Tenor, Bass, and Chorus, one of the noblest compositions it has ever been my lot to listen to. Once before I had the pleasure of hearing one of Marcello's Psalms, at the Paris Conservatoire: I cieli immensi narrano la Gloria d'Iddio. I have also frequently examined the printed collection of his works, and now that the opportunity has been again offered to me of listening to one of these truly Handel-like compositions, my previous impressions have been strengthened, and I can only wonder that Choral Societies do not more frequently address themselves to this unexplored mine of beauty and grandeur. Excepting in the works of Handel, I know nothing in music, judging from a single hearing, that can at all compare with the Chorus upon the words of the 18th verse: L'immensa tua pietà deh fa che splende, Signor, sopra Sionne, onde le mure rieggiam di Gerusalemme innalzarsi. Remember, too, that there were no Violins or wind instruments in the Orchestra, which was formed of 12 Altos, 4 Cellos, and 4 Double Basses, and in the Chorus about 30 Contraltos—9 youths of both sexes, about 20 Tenors and 30 Basses; and yet our modern masters with all the resources of orchestration, and vast bodies of voices and instruments at their command, cannot, and do not approach the majesty and dignity and seeming body of true sonority which Marcello attained with such comparatively feeble means. It occurred to me a few evenings since, as I sat with my fingers in my ears, behind a Brass Band who were thundering forth Verdi at the Pergola, that Torture by Sound had been forgotten by the Inquisition, and neglected by Dante in his enumeration of the sufferings of the wicked in the Inferno.

How intense such sufferings may be, I had full opportunity of imagining during the quarter of an hour which preceded the entrance of a celebrated Improvisatrice upon the stage—a certain Signora MILLA, who astonished and delighted a very large audience for two hours and a half by her wonderful facility in improvising upon given subjects. No matter whether the audience furnished her with rhymes for a sonnet, or left her free to find her lines as she saw fit, she poured forth with equal readiness verse after verse, seeming like one possessed by a spirit, pacing the stage, rapt in thought; with fixed eyes, and hurried pantomime; now grasping, now losing the thread, and then when the moment came uttering her stanzas with great eloquence and without the slightest hesitation. But I have wandered far from Marcello and the Soirée given by the so called "Society for the Study of Classical Music," which that evening numbered its 241st performance. No tickets are sold, and so secretly do they carry on their praise-worthy exertions in the production of good music, that of many persons whom I knew in Florence, old residents here, and eager to hear good music, not one had ever heard of the existence of such a society or the fact that such Concerts ever took place. The Concert concluded with the 2d Trio of Mayseider beautifully played by Sholei, his sister, and a violinist named BRUNI—and the O Salutaris of Rossini, for four voices, which was extremely well sung, without accompaniment. The Florentines evidently have a passion for Mayseider, who serves as a sort of middle ground and resting place, between Italian and German music, sufficiently "cantabile" to make them feel at home.

Some weeks ago, a Mass by a Florentine Maestro named MABELLINI was performed by the Philharmonic Society. This I did not hear, having supposed it to be an evening ahead of what it turned out to be, a morning performance. I was assured, however, by a competent judge that I did not lose a great deal. The Philharmonic is an almost dead, and rapidly expiring body. Concerts are rarely given, and the standard of selection for programme of performances becomes every year poorer. An effort was lately made by the brother of Maestro BIAGI, leader of the Pergola Orchestra, to obtain subscribers for a series of Classical Chamber Concerts, at which the best Florentine Artists should perform, and the whole be conducted on the most economical principles, in regard to cheapness of admission, but so little interest was excited in the undertaking, that it speedily fell through. The materials for a good Orchestra are abundant in Florence, and interest in, and knowledge of, the best music is shown in the conversation of many artists with whom I have conversed here. But the public is uneducated, and cares not to be musically instructed, so that it is probable the musicians will be left as now, to earn their livelihood by giving lessons, and wearing out their real appreciation of good music by nightly performances of Verdi's operas at the theatres. That Verdi's reign is nearly over, may be predicated from the total failure of his last three or four operas in the principal cities of Italy. During the spring season we are promised "William Tell" at the Pergola, and a better "troupe." Certainly it could hardly be worse than that which sang during the Carnival.

I should not forget to mention the performances of the sisters, FERRI—violinists of great talent, who gave some ten or twelve concerts at the Opera House. Both excellent artists; the younger plays with remarkable power and purity of tone; her executive skill is of the highest kind. Like the Milanollo's, these talented sisters will doubtless gain a world-wide reputation. Among the distinguished musicians of Florence is a certain Maestro GIORGETTI, admirable violinist, and composer of some very beautiful quartets I am assured. He is a paralytic, and having lost the use of his limbs never leaves his chamber, so that I know him only by his reputation. There is also a German, Maestro KRATZ, who gives soirées at which his pupils perform; he being a well known piano-forte teacher.

One of the best players of Chopin I have ever heard is a celebrated amateur pianist, a lady long resident in Paris, where her husband held a high diplomatic position. She has great powers of execution and exquisite delicacy of touch. Some years since, she played Mendelssohn's Piano-forte Concerto at a concert given for the benefit of the poor, and, I am told, with great effect.

In the last number of the "Armonia," a very good musical journal published twice a month in Florence, I see it announced that Sig. Sholei's Society for the study of classical music, is rehearsing the celebrated mass, "Aeterna Christi," and the O Salutaris of Palestrina. "These two scores," says the Armonia, "have been given to the Society by his Excellency the Duke S. Clemente, one of the few noblemen in Florence who patronize and promote music."

The Society has been in existence now about six years. Its members pay two pauls a month; meet for practice once a week, and propose to give at least four public performances a year. P.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Conclusion of the beautiful Duet for Soprani, with Chorus: "I waited for the Lord," from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

Complimentary Concert to August Fries.

Illness balked our strong desire and purpose to be present at the Concert given by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, Tuesday evening, by way of a Farewell to their esteemed leader, who for nine years has so ably borne the first violin in the long list of classical Quartets and Quintets, of which we owe our knowledge to the Club, and who therefore will ever be associated with many of our purest and most edifying pleasures. The evening was most stormy, but the Chickering saloon was full of music-lovers, eager to express their gratitude to Mr. FRIES, as well as to secure the last feast for this season of choice chamber music. We did not need to be told that it proved an occasion of great interest. All speak highly of the performance, which gave fine opportunity to listen once more to FRIES's violin in favorite strains in which it used to be peculiarly impressive; and the programme was capital, as follows:

1. Quintet in C, op. 29, Beethoven.
Allegro Moderato—Adagio.
2. Aria from Le nozze di Figaro—"Porgi amor," Mozart.
Mrs. J. H. Long.
3. Kreutzer Sonata, for Piano and Violin, in A, op. 47, Beethoven.
Messrs. Parker and A. Fries.
4. Meditation on Bach's Prelude in C, with Violin obligato, (by request,) Gounod.
August Fries.
5. Recitative and Aria from "Omano," L. H. Southard.
Mrs. J. H. Long.
6. Ottetto for four Violins, two Altos and two Violoncellos, in E flat, op. 20, Mendelssohn.

We would fain have heard once more that Octet of Mendelssohn, which we believe was never played but once before in Boston. We still remember the vigorous, strongly-wrought Allegro, with its bold theme springing through wide intervals and peremptory octaves; and especially the fairy flutter of the Scherzo, one of the happiest yields of that vein of his young peculiar fancy.

And so August Fries goes from us, — not over-strong in bodily health, after so many years of concert-giving and no little drudging to maintain a position wherefrom to labor as an artist in the cause of high and noble music, — to a new home in Norway, where the musician's services are not forgotten in the rendering, and where there is some forethought for the artist's comfort in the future. When will that reasonable state of things exist here? We wish him plenty of occupation — not too much — and such as suits his taste, with due appreciation and reward, with length of days and happiness. The Club, meanwhile, has lived too long and too well to die, and doubtless will find one to fill the old leader's place acceptably, and give for years to come these Chamber Concerts which they have taught us to feel to be a necessity, as well as a luxury. We have not forgotten our design of giving a list of the fine Quartets, Quintets, Trios, &c., which this Club has first and last brought to our ears, — perhaps the worthy Secretary of the Club will help us.

THE BOARD OF MUSIC TRADE.—We have been desired to call the attention of publishers, and others interested, to the annual meeting of the Board, which will take place at Cincinnati on the second of June. It promises to be an unusually interesting gathering of the craft. For some time have the Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis members been engaged in active preparations to return the hospitalities extended to them by their Eastern brethren, who are anticipating a rare pleasure in this first meeting of the Board west of the Alleghanies. The Louisville members have offered their services as escort on a general excursion to the Mammoth Cave. Who would not be a music publisher! Should they take composers with them (as is not unlikely), what a harvest of unsunned inspirations we shall have! What Mammoth Cave songs and fantasias, what Torch-light Tone-pictures, "Star Chamber" waltzes and Stalactite polkas, what Blind Fish Reveries and Meditations!

This association was formed a few years since for mutual protection and better unity of operation among those engaged in this country in the now formidably large business of music publishing. It establishes a unitary scale of prices, generally lower than the public were before accustomed to; and it prevents unwise and unnecessary reprinting upon one another, so that a publisher is no longer discouraged from reprinting any sterling work by the fear of rival editions. So we (the musical public) get access to many good things, which otherwise the fears begot of competition would have kept from us, deterring all from publishing.

In these ways the association has proved extremely beneficial, and has done away with much of the asperity that commonly exists between rivals in trade. Mr. Horace Waters, the last who took stand in opposition to the Board, has abandoned his "reduced prices," and applied for admission as a member.

An "Association of Music Teachers" (of the Western and South Western States),—a sort of league for fancied mutual protection against music-publishers—is to meet in the same city at about the same time, and it is confidently hoped the difficulties between the two bodies will be amicably settled.

Musical Chit-Chat.

This evening the old BRIGADE BAND of Boston give a concert in the Music Hall, in which they will appear both as a Reed Band of twenty-five instruments, and a Brass Band of eighteen. Their selections will be of the right kind, proper band music, marches and quicksteps, with some operatic arrangements; and the well known skill of this oldest band in the Union (with what ravished sense we used to follow them when we were a boy—before this vulgar and degenerate age of brass!) gives earnest of a fine concert of its kind. We rejoice to see other Bands following the example of the Germania in this good direction of a return to clarinets and oboes, and bassoons and French-horns: but pray take care to have enough of them, for this noisy, bullying and unregenerate Sax family requires a deal of softening and subduing, if not snubbing into utter silence sometimes. . . . Mrs. HARWOOD has been singing with éclat in a couple of Concerts given at Portland by Mr. KOTZSCHMAR. . . . Mrs. J. H. LONG offers her services as a teacher of singing. She has the art herself, in an eminent degree, and judging from the zeal and the intelligence she always shows, the art also we doubt not of imparting art. . . . Many of our readers are familiar with the beautiful editions of THALBERG's Fantasias, Etudes, Barcaroles, &c., published by our worthy neighbors, Messrs. Russell & Fuller (late Russell & Richardson); here is a pleasant note they have received from the composer:

NEW YORK, APRIL 28, 1858.

GENTLEMEN—I accept with pleasure the copy of your beautifully bound edition of my Piano arrangements. I find them to be very correctly scored, and equal, if not superior, in all respects, to any yet published, either in the United States or Europe.

Yours, Very Respectfully,
Messrs. Russell & Richardson, Boston.

S. THALBERG.

A fragment of the wreck of the late Philadelphia troupe, headed by RONCONI and LAGRANGE, are giving three performances this week at Burton's in New York, assisted by TIBERINI, COLETTI, &c. The first piece was L'Élixir d'Anore; the second Il Barbieri. The Courier and Enquirer says: "Ronconi's Dr. Dulcamara was as real and consistent a creation as ever came from the pencil of a painter or the pen of a dramatic poet." Ronconi sails for Europe on the 19th;—and we shall not see "the first of lyric actors!" . . . At the New York Academy they have had a Musard "Mendelssohn night," and performances of the "Messiah" and "Elijah," (for the benefit of the clergy, &c., during Anniversary week), by the Harmonia Society, with D'ANGRAI, FORMES, &c. . . . In Philadelphia, Mme. GAZZANIGA, justly a great favorite, had a complimentary benefit concert at the Academy on Wednesday evening; Mr. SATTER gave his first concert on Tuesday at the Musical Fund Hall; and the Handel and Haydn Society, on the same night, at their last concert, gave Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," choruses from the "Messiah," glees, solos, and the overtures to Ruy Blas and Felsenmühle. (Our Philadelphia letter, with interesting account of the Harmonia Society, unfortunately, is just too late for this week—but it will keep.)

CARL GAERTNER gives a Concert in the Music Hall, next Saturday evening, previous to his departure for Europe. He will be aided by a full orchestra, conducted by ZERRAHN, and by Mrs. LONG and Mr. ADAMS, vocalists. Mr. G. himself will play two violin Concertos with orchestra, viz.: Beethoven's in D, and Hummel's in A. . . . Mr. G. W. STRATTON, who has done so much to create a taste for the higher kind of music in Manchester, N. H., and whose talents as a composer, conductor of orchestras, teacher of piano, &c., are highly esteemed, has made arrangements to give lessons two days in the week in Boston (see card in another column). Mr. S. is an earnest and industrious musician, and his services are worth seeking.

Handel's "Messiah" was performed on April 12th and May 4th at St. Joseph's Cathedral, Buffalo, N. Y. for the benefit of the Magdalen Asylum. . . . ALFRED JAEHL, in his capacity of Court pianist, at Hanover, played last month in the last two Symphony concerts given by the Ducal Chapel at Brunswick. In the first, he played Weber's Concertstück, and a couple of salon pieces of his own; in the second a Concerto by Mendelssohn, two of his own transcriptions, and a Waltz by Chopin. He caused great enthusiasm and was presented by the Chapel with a laurel crown.

In Chicago two sets of orchestral Concerts have been going on, and both well patronized. One is Mrs. MOZART's, with the great Western Band (!) as orchestra, on Saturday afternoons; the other Wednesday afternoons, by JULIUS UNGER's Orchestra, with Mrs. BOSTWICK as vocalist. This "fast" young Western city, too, has caught the contagion (merely cutaneous) of "Old Folks' Concerts," in which some of the "first citizens" sing "Coronation," "Lenox," &c., in "scoop-shovel bonnets, wigs and knee buckles," for the benefit of certain industrial schools. The Chicago "Musical Union" are to perform the "Creation" about the middle of this month, aided by Mesdames Bostwick and Mozart, and an orchestra. The Opera Alessandro Stradella was lately given in the same city, to a full house, under the direction of Julius Unger; the Church Record can only say of it that "some parts were no worse than others." . . . The "Messiah" is said to have been creditably performed by a local society in Davenport, Iowa, Mr. and Mrs. Mozart singing the principal solos.

BETTINA VON ARNIM, who has been ill all winter, is recovering her strength. Her youngest daughter, Gisela, has just published several tragedies, one of which, "Michael Angelo," is said to be very fine. She is said to combine the talents of both parents. . . . Mozart's early opera, "Belmont and Costanza" (Entführung aus dem Serail) has been produced, as a novelty, at the Royal Opera in Berlin. Our informant, who was present, writes that this opera is so different from its author's late works, that one learns by it to know Mozart from a wholly new side. The whole flows on with wondrous grace and witchery, brilliant as a many-colored butterfly. A young Englishwoman sings finely in it." The same writer speaks of Liszt as sitting quietly in Weimar, but says not a word of his having joined the Franciscan order, as the newspapers report.

JEAN BAPTISTE CRAMER, the oldest of contemporary pianists and composers for the piano, died at London, April 9th, at the advanced age of eighty-eight. He was a German, but came to England at a very early age, and accomplished the greater part of his artistic career in London, where his lessons were more in request than those of any other professor. Joseph Haydn was among his early friends. No composer has written more copiously for the piano-forte than Cramer.

Mlle. COLSON, the popular prima donna of the French opera at New Orleans, has been engaged for a year by Mr. Strakosch, and will appear next season in Italian opera, together with the basso, JUNCA. . . . Mr. STRAKOSCH, accompanied by Mlle. FREZZOLINI, Mme. STRAKOSCH, and one or two other singers, has been giving operatic representations at St. Louis, with a piano for orchestra and no chorus. They are now in Chicago.

The Athenæum Exhibition.

III. OIL PICTURES. (CONTINUED).

The "Long Engagement," No. 178, is a queer compound of good feeling and bad judgment. The ugliness of the picture is, I doubt not, a part of the artist's conception.

Believing that the expression of the drying up of hope and the "sickening of the heart" consequent upon a too long engagement, would be enforced in the lines of the face by the addition of analogous qualities of color, he has perfectly embodied his belief. The general result is, that its only real merit, subtlety of expression, passes for naught.

"Nuggets," 179, by Mrs. Anderson, is a very happy rendering of a child at play out of doors, without the usual accompaniments of artificial arrangement and insipidity of expression. But for a breaking off in the background and a want of aerial gradation, the unity of this picture would be quite complete. As it is, in clearness of drawing, delicacy of expression, truth of color and play of sunlight, it is noticeable amongst its fellows and is a real "nugget."

"Sketches of Character," Nos. 188 and 189, are two heads in grey tints, by James Hayllar, evincing a remarkable feeling for lines of character, and a general power of form, which are less effectively displayed in the more elaborate works numbered 122 and 187. The suggestiveness of the sketches fills a higher place than the realization of the larger pictures.

"An English Village Church," No. 112, by A. McCallum, occupies a medium position between the savorless generalization of the Old and the intense realization of the New School. Of solidity, truth and refinement of color there is a little lack, and yet it combines in more than the usual degree merit in all these. Its marked excellence consists in a genial representation of the external aspect of Nature by simple and unaffected imitation. Its companion, No. 115, is much less meritorious.

The clownish dissimulation of "Bottom enacting Pyramus, No. 197, is a very suggestive reflex of the strange humor which Shakspeare has made to constitute a generic part of the beautiful Midsummer Night's Dream. The dyspeptic looking Hamlet, No. 198, does not reach the rank of a respectable walking gentleman, and is manifestly weak enough to meet Goethe's idea, that, "Shakspeare's intention was to exhibit the effects of a great action, imposed as a duty upon a mind too feeble for its accomplishment. As here presented, Osric is almost the better man, albeit he is a fop in the very essence. This character Mr. Marks has rightly understood and admirably rendered, although with an exaggeration of the facial expression which weakens the conception, and carries it close upon the borders of caricature. In exuberant richness, solid force, and unobtrusive rendering of color, these pictures evidence rare powers of perception and genuine realization.

The collection contains but three portraits in color, neither of which is a complete example of what a good portrait should be. No. 166, by John Robertson, is broadly treated, freely and forcibly drawn, well modelled and unaffected in expression. It has a negative merit in the general tone of color, but is afflicted by the prevailing hardness, and lacks beauty and truth of texture in the flesh.

The portrait of Hiram Powers, No. 135, by H. W. Phillips, like the preceding, is admirably, though more delicately drawn, and with its direct, genial earnestness of expression, refinement and agreeableness of tone, and approximate excellence in the flesh quality, forms one of the good features of the exhibition. In No. 120, Mr. Phillips presents us with a masked portrait of "Charles Kean as Louis XI," which, as is usual in such essays, combines a diluted expression of each, but embodies the integrity of neither character: at least, such, in view of its merely theatrical intenseness and utter want of true dramatic force, is the testimony of the picture.

In No. 94, James Sant exhibits a duplicate head of his favorite type, made familiar to us through the engravings of the infant "Samuel," "Early Dawn," &c., Replete with sweet aspirations and feminine delicacy, the face is a pleasant one to see and is drawn with marked knowledge and refinement of touch. A feeling for harmonious combinations in subdued tones of color, lends a charm to the picture, which the already too familiar and ubiquitous hardness constantly denies.

"Bywell Tower," No. 125, by James Peel, displays considerable knowledge of effect and power of execution, surrendered to the service of false generalization and muddy impurity.

That men having hearts to love or eyes to see nature, can thus wilfully distort their vision and debase their love, involves a problem that it would be difficult to solve. The expression of light, and near approach to tenderness of color in some parts of the sky, only serve to render more conspicuous the deliberate falseness with which the body of the picture is painted.

"The Hypæthral Temple," No. 129½, by Frank Dillon, is painted with breadth and force, and marked solidity in the architecture. From a clear, permeable sky, the light spreads itself over the distance, slants through the open areas of the temple, and glistens along the fallen blocks of stone in the foreground, with a glowing flash that but few other pictures here equal. There is a tendency to generalization in the shadow running down the slope near the Temple, and a noticeable petrification in the trees and figures. But better stony flesh in these accessories, than fleshy stone in the shoulder of a mountain. Again, let us thank Mr. Dillon for solidity and light.

"Black Agnes," No. 150, is a specimen of the mock-heroic class, in which a want of real motive endeavors to conceal itself in the attitudinized expression of an assumed one.

In No. 172, Charles Lucy presents some admirably painted draperies, with historical accessories in the form of the "Royal Captives of Carisbrooke." In No. 155, he offers us an illustration of Tennyson's "Dora," telling the story sincerely, and with considerable power. The chief merit of the picture, however, lies in its solidity and clear strength of color.

The dull monotony of the color throughout the lower part of "The Wood Yard," No. 104, unrelied by a single touch of reflected light from the glowing sky, nearly neutralizes the great breadth with which it is painted, as also the effect it was intended to represent. In the "Monarch Oak," No. 150½, Mr. Anthony displays the same breadth of treatment with greater variety and strength of color, and power of effect. The foliage of the tree lacks care in drawing and truth of color, and the whole tree is wanting in that noble dignity of expression which, it would seem, should especially characterize such a "Monarch." In the color-massing of the ferns in the fore-ground, and in leading the eye along over their bending tops out into the flecky light of the middle distance, he evinces a mastery of the means of Art, which is doubtless often more successfully exercised than in either of these pictures.

The "Last Supper," No. 149, furnishes an example of the lamentable mistake men make in thinking that an illustration of a scriptural subject necessarily constitutes a religious picture. The knowledge of form and power of expression evinced in this picture, would be quite adequate for the limning of "Shakespeare and his friends," but I can scarcely conceive of its exciting the religious sympathy, or warming the faith of the most impressible of devotees.

John Cross, No. 141, buries the "Princes in the Tower of London," amidst a goodly array of bodies with well drawn legs and arms, encased in garments of a pleasing hue, and all grouped about with a most histrionic force and beauty of effect. When will artists learn to heed the fact, that, by their directness and simplicity of narrative, their sympathy with or conception of a story is gauged?

No. 101, by J. Linnell, is another of the pseudo-religious pictures which attracts you by its partial beauty of color and dexterous manipulation, and tires you in less time than it takes to become fairly introduced to a genuine work of Art.

"The Bowlers," No. 151, by George Harvey, is a very spirited representation of field sport. Genially conceived, and drawn with much nerve and truth of action, it would prove a very attractive picture but for its hardness, (a nearly constant quantity in the collection), and the dreary waste of unmeaning color that is extended over the entire scene.

Inversely to their superficial areas, would form a nearly reliable formula by which to determine the pleasure-yielding power of the works in this Exhibition.

"Installation of Capt. Rock," No. 124, by D. MacLise, is full of material, so arranged that the less shall be greater, and the greater, less. Unity of purpose in such a crowd is hardly to be expected, and yet without it, the picture glistens with points that serve only to dull each other.

"Mountain Scenery," No. 117, by J. W. Oakes, forms one of the most noticeable features in the central room. Catching your eye with its sparkling, glittering spray, it leads you up over the frolicking rapids and tiny leaps of a pure mountain stream—tangles you awhile in its eddies and then leads off again to the hills. Intercepted in your flight by a thicket of wood that stands across the stream, you raise your eyes and meet—not the grim, gray walls of the mountain slopes exposed in all their rugged, massive grandeur, or softened and subdued by curving waves of solemn green and gray, flowing from crest to crest—nor yet a filmy veil of God's pure ether floating there in tenderest blue—nothing of this—nothing of anything that nature loves or is, but you are left to wander about amongst hills without substance or beauty, under a sky more solid than the hills, and reeking with a crude dissonance of color that shuts out the light and drives you back to the stream. The drawing of this picture is vigorous throughout, parts of it painted with rare knowledge and beauty, and even the distance has a remote suggestiveness of natural subtleties of color which the grasp of form and hue shown in the rendering of the water, foreground rocks, and tufts of herbage, should have made real and true; as here presented however, it is only suggestiveness, and that, very remote. Its fellow, No. 123, has all the crudity without the merit of this, and is upon the whole flippant, false, and repulsive.

In the next article I shall endeavor to present the leading characteristics of the old and new Schools as embodied in this collection. MESOS.

NOTE.—For "absolute right of color" in the beginning of the second paragraph of last week's article, read absolutely right use, &c.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

The Prayer of the Orphan, (La prece dell' Orfana.) Mercadante. 30

This is the last and justly most celebrated number of the well known little Cyclos of Romanes, called "A Summer at Sorrento," in which the genius of Mercadante, enlivened by the charms of that Paradise on earth, outstrips stars of far greater magnitude. All lovers of Italian song will bid a fair welcome to this Romanza, finely rendered into English by Mr. Barker.

The Herd-Bells. Duet. F. Gumbert. 25

The first of a series of eight duets, written especially for little folks, quite easy and very pleasing, although not at all common-place. The want of compositions of just this kind has long been felt.

Down among the Lilies. Trio for female voices. Glover. 50

In Glover's best vein, with solos for each of the three voices. Particularly recommended to the attention of Teachers in Seminaries.

Sunday, Pearl of Days. W. West. 25

The Soldiers' Dream of Home. Perkins. 25

A touching subject treated with feeling and skill.

Out in the Cold. Emerson. 25

A narrative of the stern conflict between the poor and unhouse-d little beggar-child, and stern, grim king winter, kindling a fire of sympathy in every hearer's heart.

Be Merry to Night. Cherry. 25

Lively and sprightly. An excellent Song in a gay company.

Instrumental Music for Piano.

Reverie. Coria. 30

Dreams of serene bliss. Smooth flow of ideas, without agitation; great eloquence in form and expression. It requires some skill to perform it well, but will repay the pains taken.

When the Swallows Homeward Fly. Arranged for four hands. Mullen. 30

A simple transcription, which confines itself to the melody, throwing in only such alterations as must serve to hold out the melody itself more prominent.

Overture, William Tell, for four performers on two Pianos. Arranged by G. M. Schmidt. 1.75

This fascinating and brilliant Overture of the celebrated "Maestro," which pleases every taste, no matter whether classical or profane, is here adapted with admirable skill and propriety to the resources of two Pianos and four pairs of skilful hands. Hardly a better piece could be selected for an Exhibition than this Overture with its mysterious opening, the storm following, the Swiss melodies, so happily arranged and varied, and after all this, the sparkling, dashing finale.

Ever be Happy. Rondo. Le Ducque. 25

Country Charms. Rondo. Le Ducque. 25

Merry Cotton Field. Rondo. Le Ducque. 25

Instructive Rondos for pupils in the second or third Quarter.

Virginia Galop. Busch. 25

Flint Harmonia Club Polka. Mrs. Reed. 25

Fairy Bird Polka. C. H. Mitchell, Jr. 25

Kiss Polka. Jullien. 25

Night Bell Galop. D'Albert. 10

A fresh supply of Dance Music; good and not difficult.

CALLCOTT'S MUSICAL GRAMMAR. In four Parts. I. Notation; II. Melody; III. Harmony; IV. Rhythm. By Dr. J. W. Callcott. Cloth, 75

This is a new edition of one of the most valuable and indispensable companions to teachers and scholars extant. Several years since a number of publications made their appearance in this country, having for their object, the refinement of the public taste as it was related to the science of music. Of these none has had a more universal influence than this Musical Grammar. The general character which it has sustained for correctness among the best judges, and the high estimation in which it continues to be held, has induced the publisher to present a new and improved edition. He has been careful to preserve its original accuracy, by obtaining a careful revision and examination of the work by a gentleman eminent for judgment and taste in the science in which it treats. The author has endeavored to present in a small volume the leading principles of practical music. From the analogy which exists between music and language, the author has presumed to adopt a classification first suggested by the German theorists. An examination of the book will convince any one of its great value to all persons who would thoroughly and scientifically cultivate a musical taste.

La Cantatrice.

By day, at a high oak desk I stand,
And trace in a ledger line by line;
But at five o'clock yon dial's hand
Opens the cage wherein I pine;
And as faintly the stroke from the belfry peals
Down through the thunder of hoofs and wheels,
I wonder if ever a monarch feels
Such royal joy as mine!

Beatrice is dressed and her carriage waits;
I know she has heard that signal-chime;
And my strong heart leaps and palpitates,
As lightly the winding stair I climb
To her fragrant room, where the winter's gloom
Is changed by the heliotrope's perfume,
And the curtained sunset's crimson bloom,
To love's own summer prime.

She meets me there, so strangely fair
That my soul aches with a happy pain;—
A pressure, a touch of her true lips, such
As a seraph might give and take again;
A hurried whisper, "Adieu! adieu!
They wait for me while I stay for you!"
And a parting smile of her blue eyes through
The glimmering carriage-pane.

Then thoughts of the past come crowding fast
On a blissful track of love and sighs;—
Oh, well I toiled, and these poor hands soiled,
That her song might bloom in Italian skies!—
The pains and fears of those lonely years,
The nights of longing and hope and tears,—
Her heart's sweet debt, and the long arrears
Of love in those faithful eyes!

O night! be friendly to her and me!—
To box and pit and gallery swarm
The expectant throngs;—I am there to see;—
And now she is bending her radiant form
To the clapping crowd;—I am thrilled and proud;
My dim eyes look through a misty cloud,
And my joy mounts up on the plaudits loud,
Like a sea-bird on a storm!

She has waved her hand; the noisy rush
Of applause sinks down; and silverly
Her voice glides forth on the quivering hush,
Like the white-robed moon on a tremulous sea!
And wherever her shining influence calls,
I swing on the billow that swells and falls,—
I know no more,—till the very walls
Seem shouting with jubilee!

Oh, little she cares for the fop who airs
His glove and glass, or the gay array
Of fans and perfumes, of jewels and plumes,
Where wealth and pleasure have met to pay
Their nightly homage to her sweet song;
But over the bravas clear and strong,
Over all the flaunting and fluttering throng,
She smiles my soul away!

Why am I happy? why am I proud?
Oh, can it be true she is all my own?—
I make my way through the ignorant crowd;
I know, I know where my love hath flown.
Again we meet; I am here at her feet,
And with kindling kisses and promises sweet,
Her glowing, victorious lips repeat
That they sing for me alone!

The Sanctus.

From the German of E. T. A. HOFFMANN.

(Concluded.)

One would have believed that Julia's song would ever have risen higher and truer, in proclaiming the glory of her faith; and so it actually happened for a short time. But soon Emanuela remarked that Julia often departed from the choral, in a strange manner, intermingling foreign tones. Often suddenly would break the hollow sound of a deep voiced cithern through the choir. The tone was like the resounding of the storm, rushing through its strings. Then Julia would become restless, and it frequently happened that she would introduce a Moorish word into the Latin hymn. Emanuela warned the novice steadfastly to withstand the foe; but inconsiderately Julia heeded this not, and to the anguish of the Sisters, often sang, when even the earnest, holy chorals of the old Ferrera were sounding, light Moorish love songs to the cithern, which she had newly attuned. —Wonderfully sounded then the tones of the cithern, that often rushed through the choir high and sharp, similar to the shrill whistling of the little Moorish flute."

THE CHAPEL-MASTER. "Flauti piccoli—The octave flute. But, dear sir, there is yet nothing, really nothing for the Opera. No exposition, and that is the main point,—though the deep and high voice of the cithern has touched me. Do you not believe that the Devil is a Tenor? He is as false as the Devil, and therefore does everything that is falsetto."

THE ENTHUSIAST. "God in Heaven! you grow wittier every day, Chapel-master. But you are right. Leave to the devilish principle all over-high, unnatural whistlings, pipings, &c. But to return to the tale, that grows ever more difficult to me, for I run the danger every moment of jumping away at the very right point."

"It happened one day that the Queen, accompanied by the noble generals of the camp, went towards the church, to hear the mass, as usual. A miserable tattered beggar lay by the gate, whom the halberdiers sought to remove, but he half raised himself, then threw himself down, howling, so near the Queen that he touched her in his fall. Aguillar sprang angrily before her and kicked the beggar from her path, who turned, and half raising his body cried: 'Trample on the snake,—trample on the snake, and he will sting you, it may be, to death;' then touching the strings of his cithern, which was concealed beneath his rags, it sent forth a shrill, wailing, piping sound, that seized all with an unearthly terror, and drove them back. The halberdiers removed the loathsome apparition, saying: 'The wretch is a prisoner, a frantic Moor, who by his mad jokes and his wonderful cithern-playing amuses the soldiers in the camp.' The Queen went on, and the mass began. The sisters in the choir sounded the Sanctus, but as Julia with powerful voice burst forth: Pleni sunt caeli gloria tua, there wailed through the church a shrill tone from the cithern, and Julia suddenly closing the book sought to leave the choir."

"What would'st thou do?" asked Emanuela. "Oh," said Julia, "hearest thou not the mighty tone of the Master? there by him, with him, must I sing!" and she turned towards the door, but Emanuela spoke with deep, earnest, haughty voice:

"Sinner, wouldst thou profane the service of the Lord, that thou takest his praise upon thy lips, whilst worldly thoughts are in thy heart? Wouldst thou fly from hence? Broken is the power of song in thee; silent are the wonderful tones in thy breast, which the Lord enkindled in thee."

"At Emanuela's words, as struck by lightning, Julia sank to the floor."

"As the nuns were assembled at night time, to sing the Ora, a thick smoke suddenly filled the whole church. Soon the flames hissed and crackled through the walls of the wing of the building, and reached the convent. With much difficulty the nuns succeeded in saving their lives. Trumpets and horns pealed through the camp, arousing the soldiers from their first sleep; General Aguillar, with singed hair and half-burnt clothes, left the convent where he had vainly sought to rescue the missing Julia, of whom no trace could be found. The soldiers fruitlessly combated against the fire, which, upheaving itself higher and higher, and spreading far and wide, seized upon all within its reach, and in a short time the whole of Isabella's rich, beautiful camp lay in ashes. The Moors, in full confidence that the misfortunes of the Christians would give them the victory, ventured with a considerable force upon an attack. But never was there more brilliant repulse than that by the Spaniards, who, led on by the triumphant tones of the trumpets, returned crowned with victory to their fortifications, where Queen Isabella ascended the throne which had been erected in the open air, and gave orders that on the site of the burnt camp, a new city should at once be built, thus showing to the Moors in Granada that the siege would never be raised."

THE CHAPEL-MASTER. "If one were only permitted to introduce spiritual subjects into the Theatre Already have I brought myself into difficulty with the dear public, for introducing here and there a bit of choral; else would this Julia be no bad part. What do you think of the double style, in which they can intermingle, first the romance, then church music? Some charming little Moorish and Spanish songs I have already prepared; also the besieging march of the Spaniards, which is not bad, and I have contrived to melo-dramatize the commandment of the Queen; but how to arrange the whole together, Heaven only knows! But go on with the story. We must hear again from Julia; it is to be hoped that she was not burnt."

THE ENTHUSIAST. "Did you know, Chapel-master, that that city which the Spaniards, though envied by the Moors, built in twenty-one days, is still standing, and is called Santa Fe? But whilst I turn upon you such an unceasing flood of words, I am losing the solemn tone, which alone befits so solemn a subject. I wish you would play to us from Palestrina's Responsories, that now lies open upon the desk of the Piano."

The Chapel-master complied with his request, and when he had finished, the Enthusiast went on:

"The Moors did not cease to annoy the Spaniards, in manifold ways, during the building of the city; despair drove them to acts of astonishing boldness, and the contest went on more earnestly than ever. One day, Aguillar, with the Spanish out-posts, attacked a Moorish squadron, and drove them back to the walls of Granada. He turned back with his troops, and halting near the first fortification, in a myrtle wood, sent on his followers, and resigned himself to his earnest thoughts and sad recollections. Julia stood living before his mind's eye. Often, during the battle, had he heard her voice resounding; now complaining, now lamenting, and, even at this very moment, it seemed to him that there rustled a strange song—half Moorish love tale, half Christian church music—through the dark myrtles. Then there rushed suddenly forward a Moorish rider, in silver armor, on a light Arabian steed, into the wood, and immediately there whistled a spear close to Aguillar's head. He sprang with drawn sword upon his foe, as the second spear flew, and remained plunged deep in his horse's breast, who, smarting with pain and anguish, reared himself on high, so that Aguillar, to avoid a heavy fall, was obliged to swing himself quickly from his side. The Moor raised himself, and struck with his crescent blade at Aguillar's uncovered head. But he dexterously parried this death blow, and returned it so powerfully, that the Moor barely saved himself, as he almost fell from the horse. In the same moment he pressed his horse close upon Aguillar, so that he could not give a second blow, and rising, drew his dagger; but before he could plunge it into his enemy, Aguillar, with great strength, had seized him, drawn him from his horse, and dashed him ringing to the ground. He knelt upon the Moor's breast, and, grasping with his left hand his right arm so forcibly, that he remained motionless, drew his dagger. Already had he raised his arm to plunge it in the Moor's throat, when he sighed out deeply, 'Zulema!'—Chilled to a statue, Aguillar had no power to fulfil his intention.

"Wretch!" exclaimed he, 'what name did you utter?'

"Strike!" cried the Moor, 'you kill one who has sworn death and destruction to you. Yes! know, treacherous Christian, know that it is Hichem, the last of the race of Alhamar, from whom you stole Zulema. Know that that tattered beggar, who with the demeanor of a maniac, sneaked around in your camp, was Hichem. Know that I succeeded, in that gloomy prison, in which you consigned me to the light of my own thoughts, to set it on fire, to set it on fire, and to rescue Zulema.'

"Zulema—Julia lives!" cried Aguillar.

"Then laughed out the Moor, shrilly, in fiend-like scorn—'Yes, she lives; but your bloody, thorn-crowned idol has with execrable magic surrounded her, and all the fragrant, glowing bloom of life is enveloped in the pall of the frantic women, that you call the brides of your deity. Know that all music in her breast, breathed upon by the poisonous breath of the Saminus, is dead. All the pleasure of life is gone from me, with Zulema's sweet songs; therefore kill me—kill me, that I may take no revenge on you. You have already robbed me of more than life.' Aguillar relaxed his hold upon Hichem, and raised himself slowly, taking up his sword from the ground. 'Hichem,' said he, 'Zulema, that in holy baptism has taken the name of Julia, became my captive in honorable, open warfare. Enlightened by the grace of God, she renounced Mahomet's contemptible service, and what you, traitorous Moor, call the bad magic of an idol, was a temptation of the devil, which she could not withstand. Do you call Zulema your beloved! so is Julia, converted to the true faith, the mistress of my thoughts and of my heart; and for the glory of the true faith will I meet you in open battle. Choose your own weapon, and meet me according to your own custom.'

"Quickly Hichem seized his sword and target, and when Aguillar released his hold, he staggered back, roaring aloud, then threw himself upon his horse, which had remained standing near him, and sprang away at a full gallop—Aguillar knew not how to understand it, but in a moment the worthy old man, Agostino Sanchez, stood behind him and said with a smile, 'Did I frighten Hichem, or the Lord who dwells in me, and whose love he scorns?'

"Aguillar repeated to him all that he had heard concerning Julia, and they both recalled the prophetic words of Emannela, as Julia, seduced by Hichem's cithern, all devotion dying within her, left the church during the Sanctus."

THE CHAPEL-MASTER.—"I think no more about the opera, but how shall I set to music the conflict between the Moorish Hichem, in his silver armor, and the General Aguillar. How can one make them sally forth better than Mozart has done it in Don Giovanni? You know, however, in the first place . . ."

THE WANDERING ENTHUSIAST.—"Silence, Chapel-master. I must now bring this long tale to a close. Still, various things occurred, and it is necessary to collect all your thoughts; the more so that I still think of Bettina, who puzzles me not a little. I cannot escape from the thought that she has heard my Spanish tale, and it seems to me as if she must be listening outside of that door. This thought, however, must be all pure fancy. But to go on:

"Continually beaten in all the skirmishes; pressed by daily, hourly increasing famine, the Moors at last found themselves necessitated to capitulate; and in festive pomp, amid the thunder of the artillery, Ferdinand and Isabella marched into Granada. The priests had consecrated the great mosque as a cathedral, and thither marched the troops, to thank the God of Hosts, in the devout Te Deum laudamus of the solemn mass, for the glorious victory over the followers of Mahomet, the false prophet. It is impossible to tell the difficulty of suppressing the ever newly outbursting rage of the Moors, and to restrain the divisions of troops, who from the darkest streets skilfully attacked the already excited procession, as it wound along the main road. As Aguillar, at the head of a division of foot, marched along the highway, toward the cathedral, where the mass had already commenced, he felt himself suddenly wounded in the left shoulder by an arrow. At the same moment a band of Moors started from a dusky arcade, and attacked the Christians with despairing rage. Hichem, at the head, rushed upon Aguillar, who, but slightly hurt, hardly felt the pain of his wound, and dextrously parried the powerful blow, at the same time striking Hichem dead at his feet. The Spaniards pressed frantically on the treacherous Moors, who soon fled, shrieking, and took shelter in a stone building, whose doors they quickly closed. The Spaniards stormed the house, and they rained arrows upon them from the windows. Aguillar ordered firebrands thrown in upon them. Already the flames streamed from the roof, when, above the thunder of the artillery, a wonderful voice sounded from the burning building, Sanctus—Sanctus Dominus, Deus Sabaoth. 'Julia! Julia!' cried Aguillar, in inconsolable anguish. At this moment the door opened, and Julia, in the dress of the Benedictine nuns, stepped forth, singing with strong voice, Sanctus—Sanctus Dominus, Deus Sabaoth! Behind her followed the Moors, in a bending attitude, with their hands crossed upon their breasts. The Spaniards, astonished, fell back, and between their ranks Julia marched on with the Moors towards the cathedral, singing as she went, Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini. Involuntarily, as when an angel descends from Heaven to announce the blessings of the Lord, all the people bowed the knee. Stepping quickly, with eyes directed to Heaven, Julia stood before the high altar, between Ferdinand and Isabella, singing the mass, and performing the holy ceremonies with fervent devotion. As the last sound of the Dona nobis pacem died out, Julia sank lifeless in the arms of the Queen. All the Moors who followed her, converted to the true faith, were baptized that very day."

As the Enthusiast ended his tale, the Doctor entered with much bustle, striking his cane upon the floor, and crying angrily: "There you still sit, telling your mad, fantastic stories, without regard to those in the vicinity, and making people sick."

"Tell me what has happened, my dear sir," cried the Chapel-master, quite terrified.

"I understand it perfectly," said the Enthusiast, very composedly. "It is nothing more nor less than that Bettina has heard our conversation. She went into the cabinet there, and knows all."

"You have," sputtered the Doctor, "by your lying tale, you frantic Enthusiast, poisoned her sensitive mind—ruined her with your foolish trash; but I will be even with you for this deed."

"Honored Doctor," said the Enthusiast to the enraged man, "you grow warm, and do not think that Bettina's mental disease demands a mental remedy, and that perhaps my story . . ."

"Enough, enough," replied the Doctor, very temperately. "I already know what you would say."

"It is good for nothing for an opera, but it produced some strange sounding accords." So murmured the Chapel-master, whilst he seized his hat, and his friends followed.

When, three months after, the wandering Enthusiast, who had cured Bettina, who, with magnificently clear voice, had sung Pergolesi's Stabat Mater, (though not in a church, but in a large sized room,) full of joy and ecstatic rapture, kissed her hand, she said: "You are not quite a wizard, but sometimes of a nature a little perverse."

"Like all enthusiasts," added the Chapel-master.

John Cramer.

(From the London Athenæum, April 24.)

The longevity of musicians has been anew brought before us this week:—since we must register the death of JOHN BAPTIST CRAMER, aged eighty-nine. It is twenty years or more since he took public leave of professional life. He was one of the Manheim Cramers—a family well known in the annals of music—was born in the Rhine town, which then had a considerable musical importance—came early to England, where his father was in high repute as a violin-player—completed under Clementi the piano-forte studies which he had begun under Benser and Schröter—profited by the science of Abel—travelled the Continent for some few years as a show pianist in request—and about the year 1791 fixed himself in London; thenceforward chiefly devoting his time and talent to this country. It is not too much to say that during a large portion of Cramer's residence here he was idolized for certain qualities in his playing—for smoothness of touch and elegance of finger—to a degree beyond what seems to us just,—since his delicacy and taste were not accompanied by that animation which is required to rescue music, let it be ever so sweet and tender, from insipidity. Hence, from the moment when the incomparable hands of Hummel were heard on a piano in England, unprejudiced persons became aware that he possessed the beauty which had been claimed for John Cramer, and, in addition, masterly solidity and fluency of execution. The amount of music published by John Cramer during his long life was enormous—a large portion of it in the strictest forms of composition. More than a hundred Sonatas bear his signature; several Concertos, &c.; besides these, a huge mass of lighter and ephemeral music, flung out for the profit of shops and the use of schools, and of classical works, edited with an amount of license which seems now inconceivable in one vaunted to be so impeccable as a purist.* But of all this vast heap of music, much of which was correctly made, one work alone remains, and, we fancy, will remain; we allude to the well-known "Piano forte Studies;" which no more recent productions of the kind have superseded, and through which (as through a gate) every pianist has gone at some stage of his career. Of this we were reminded the last time we ever heard Cramer play. On the occasion of M. Liszt's first visit to England, a party had been arranged to bring together the veteran and the "young lion." Before the latter appeared, John Cramer, whose charity to his successors was but slender, moved to and fro in the room, dropping all manner of smooth little sarcasms, in that "good-old-times" tone of conscious virtue, which is the easiest form of criticism. When the new-comer entered, all crowded round him to ask him to play.—Cramer among the most honeyed and complimentary of the crowd. "Yes," said M. Liszt; "I will play a duet with you." Down the two sat to Hummel's four-handed Sonata in A flat. Anything more excellent than the manner with which M. Liszt, as secondo, subdued his force and assimilated his style to that of his partner we never heard. When the duet was done, M. Liszt must play alone. This he did—but how?—for an hour he played, and by memory, one study of John Cramer's after another,—with a force, a delicacy, and a purity of style, not to be surpassed. Never was ungenerous old man more gracefully rebuked; because the rebuke was unconsciously administered by its giver. Till very lately, John Cramer might be seen at most concerts, sitting in somewhat cynical judgment on the doings of a younger generation, talking, as from Olympus, of former wholesome days,—days when the Symphony of Beethoven in B flat was denounced, at its trial by our Philharmonic orchestra, as something too shocking for ears pure and polite to endure! To complete the picture, we may add, that John Cramer is said to have been a handsome man in his youth—that his manners had the polish of one conversant with good society—and that, as was only just, his long life of professional exertions had secured him a modest competency, in the enjoyment of which he grew old.

* Though the matter has been already adverted to in the Athenæum, we must here again instance John Cramer's editions of Mozart's pianoforte Concertos. In these every grace which might have been thrown out for once, but which ought to have been varied ad infinitum by every competent grace-player,—are coolly incorporated with the text, without word or sign to tell which was Cramer, which was Mozart. Yet he long passed for a model in all matters of tradition and observance.

(From the London Musical World, April 24.)

John Cramer died on the evening of Friday the 16th instant, and was interred at Brompton Cemetery, on the morning of Thursday last. He had reached the advanced age of eighty-eight, and till within a year or two of his decease was in all the vigor of health and the fullest enjoyment of his faculties.

Cramer was a celebrity both of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In early youth he had attained the highest rank as a pianist, and his fame spread everywhere. In the course of his long career he was esteemed a worthy rival and associate of Clementi, Woelfl, Steibelt, John Field, Dussek, Hummel, Ferdinand Ries, Moscheles, and other eminent "virtuosi"* who made the age in which they lived, and wrote and played, an age as famous for pianists as the Byronic age for poets. From Clementi's counsels, and the study and practice of Clementi's works, Cramer derived that faultless mechanism for which he was distinguished. His peculiar style of playing (especially in the performance of adagios) may, however, be traced to Dussek, who was his model in composition. Certainly, a greater genius than Clementi, Dussek, nevertheless, was not to be compared with the renowned Italian as a musician of acquirement; and it was easier to imitate Dussek's strongly defined manner than Clementi's marvellous ingenuity. Although one of the most prolific composers that ever lived, Cramer was by no means learned. The number of his published works is prodigious, and still more remarkable the fact that they are now almost all forgotten. The reason of this is evident. Not one of them bears the stamp of genius. Cramer had no genius; he possessed that extraordinary faculty which is so often mistaken for genius at first sight, but which is as remote from it as mere oratorical fluency from the godlike gift of poesy. Those who have access to his works can verify by reference the truth of our assertion. They were made for the hour. His concertos and sonatas—in short, his important compositions without exception—examined from the point at which musical taste has now arrived, are like ancient dresses and decorations, that may have shone and sparkled in their day, but are now worn and faded, and if handled at all roughly will fall to pieces. A concerto of Cramer can no more bear looking at in the present time than a quartet of his historically illustrious patron, Prince Ferdinand of Prussia, whose death, by the way, inspired the genial Dussek with an effusion of such deep feeling, and glowingly imaginative beauty, as could never at any time have proceeded from Cramer.†

Cramer passed the greater part of his life in England, but his fame, both as a pianist and composer for the piano-forte, was European. He was acquainted with almost all the contemporary celebrities. The date of his birth is interesting, from the fact that Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were all living—Haydn in the prime of life, Mozart, a very young man, already in the vigor of production, Beethoven, the future giant, in his cradle. Cramer knew Haydn intimately, and frequently profited by his advice. It may, therefore, be said of him that he was nursed in the lap of music. How it was that in such a nursery the boy grew up to be little better than a first-class virtuoso, it is not for us to say. Suffice it, Cramer was a meteor, dazzling in its course, but, once departed, lost in utter darkness—

"Drunk up by thirsty nothing."

But let us be just. One work of Cramer's is, in all probability, destined to immortal honors. His Studio per il Piano (famously known as Cramer's Studies) is the most valuable bequest in its way that was ever made to the world of pianists. Professors and amateurs have alike profited by the study of this admirable guide, and will continue to profit by it so long as the pianoforte holds its place among musical instruments. In the face of similar works from some of the greatest of composers, it continues to maintain its rank and has every chance of going down to posterity with the Clavier bien Tempéré of John Sebastian Bach, and the Gradus ad Parnassum of Clementi, with which, although of course it can bear no comparison in a certain elevated sense, it has an evident affinity. Just as the fugues of Clementi, Bach, and Handel form the mind, the exercises of Cramer train the fingers of the student. But this is not all the praise to which the Studio is entitled. It consists of beautiful and finely written music from end to end; and upon this one production must rest the future fame of Jean Baptiste Cramer.

The Chevalier Neukomm.

(From the London Athenæum, April 17.)

Adopting the significance given to the word by Douglass Jerrold, Music has lost few "men of character" more peculiar than the Chevalier Sigismund Neukomm,—who died in Paris the other day, at the patriarchal age of eighty—in appearance even older. He was a Salzburger by birth,—was carefully educated by his father,—was taught much that he knew of music, first by Michael Haydn, afterwards by the greater Joseph, who treated him with almost paternal kindness. Early in life, at the age when so many a genius in his art has been struggling for bread and opportunity, he seemed tranquilly to enter on the field of occupation for which he was best fitted. For some years he held musical appointments in Russia,—afterwards he became domiciled with that Archimage of statecraft, M. Talleyrand. While thus situated he composed a Requiem for Louis Seize, which was performed at the Congress of Vienna. Later he figured in the society of the Duke of Luxembourg, at the court of Don Pedro in the Brazils. There he remained for some four years, and on returning to the Old World, made "the Grand Tour," as it used to be called,—lighting some thirty years since on England. In this country he took an instant root and gained a transient popularity which it is now curious to recall. His Oratorio, "Mount Sinai," (produced at a festival at Derby),—his "David," written for Birmingham,—his Psalms, his sacred music and his pieces for the organ,—poured out with a correct fluency which became almost oppressive,—have all passed into the shadow from which there is small chance of their being recalled. If his English Songs, which he wrote by fifties, (for every voice, for every singer, for every principal instrumentalist to accompany) be somewhat better recollected,—it must be because in a large number of them he had the good fortune to be associated with our delightful and genial lyric poet known as Barry Cornwall. We hardly know such a mass of well made music in which there are so few bars that deserve to live. What is published, however, bears a small proportion to what was produced. The ebbing of the tide of popularity did not seem to discourage the Chevalier Neukomm, nor to slacken the sinews of his industry. He continued to write and to accumulate manuscript till a very late period of his life. It will not surprise us if we hear that he has also left literary memoirs. The portrait will be musically complete if we add that the Chevalier was fond of playing on the organ,—though in no respect extraordinary in point of fancy or of execution. Nor do his compositions for that instrument rise to any high amount of value, though they are grave and respectable.

As a man of the world—parcel diplomate, parcel man of science, parcel Nestor to a younger generation—the Chevalier Neukomm had a place of his own in society. For, in spite of a gentle selfishness, under which every one conversant with him suffered, he maintained during the last thirty years a home of many homes in the houses of distinguished and gifted people belonging to many different worlds—passing from one to another—tarrying as long (and sometimes it was very long) as it pleased him, with a steady suavity, against which it was hard to protest. Wherever he came, hours must be altered—habits adopted to gratify him—some system of diet or of doctoring must be practised as he preached it:—yet his company was admitted to be a recompense for such exactions. He was found equable and pleasant as a household companion, if not striking as a talker,—he was thought instructive by women, affable by children. He avoided rather than sought the society of artists—kept aloof from the interests of the world from which he had drawn his full share of praise and glory—and quietly demeaned himself, as though, his own participation in its bustle being ended, there was nothing left in it to care for. As regards ease and companionship in the decline of life, his object was thoroughly accomplished,—but he cannot be numbered among the musicians or the men who will be largely missed or deeply regretted now that his round of mortal visits has ended.

Ronconi in New York.

(From the Courier and Enquirer.)

Italian Opera.—Burton's theatre was not so well filled as it should have been last evening, on occasion of the first appearance of Signor RONCONI. But the audience was appreciative and was well interspersed with persons of some distinction, although it could hardly be called either fashionable or brilliant. The task of criticism upon the performance is a brief one: for the opera L'Elisir d'Amore is known by heart to all opera goers, and of Madame DE LA GRANGE and Signor TIBERINI there is nothing new to be said. The former looked very well last evening, and acted charmingly; but her singing was hardly worthy of her reputation. As to Signor Ronconi, he is an artist from crown to sole, and his power is, and evidently has ever been, far more in his mental than in his vocal faculties. Not that his voice is gone, or was always poor. It never could have been a great voice, it is true; but report among critical people has underrated him in this regard. We were prepared to find the wreck of a third-rate organ, we found one of the second rank in tolerable preservation. It lacks power when heard with the orchestra and against another voice in loud passages; but alone it is sonorous, and of more agreeable quality than buffo voices usually are. But it is chiefly in impersonation and in expression that Ronconi is great. His Dr. Dulcamara was as real and consistent a creation as ever came from the pencil of a painter or the pen of a dramatic poet. It is impossible that Signor Ronconi can be an intellectually vulgar man; and yet every movement of his body expressed intellectual vulgarity. The low cunning and grovelling humor by which the charlatan imposes upon the ignorant peasant, and keeps him in a merry, receptive mood could not be better assumed than by this eminent artist. All was done, too, with a quiet mastery of art and instinctive knowledge of the "not too much," which marks skill of the highest order. The picture was finished to the minutest detail; even the walking and the snuff-taking had its own peculiar character; and humor lurked in the slightest inflections of the voice. The performance was a very fine one, and was well received.

(From the Tribune, May 11.)

For reasons not necessary to analyze, the Italian Comic Opera has never been popular in this country. Our people, who exhibit at present a distaste amounting almost to dislike for spoken tragedy in its severest form, without the interjection of comedy, have—by what seems an illogical contrariety—an admiration for serious or tragic opera of the Italian school. Accordingly, to call together an audience of full remun-nerating size to hear an Italian comic opera is almost an impossibility, such is the indifference for that school of art. Only the reputation of Signor Ronconi attracted the moderately good house of last night. If not great as to numbers, it was instinctively ready to enjoy the actor, being composed largely of connoisseurs.

To judge properly of an Italian actor representing an Italian character of real life, we should for the nonce make Italians of ourselves. We must take into consideration the superior vivacity of the people—their rapid face play—their numerous gesticulations—their southern vehemence. If added to this, the eccentricities of the person portrayed heighten these traits, we must all the more remember that southern fire is not northern phlegm. This is a general rule for safe criticism. But the powers of the actor may be so great as to cause the spectator to forget latitude and longitude, temperament and nationality, in the intense vividness and truthfulness of his portraiture. We know nothing here of the Quack Doctor ambulant as he flourishes, and above all as he flourished in Europe. The great Baron Spolascio has (or had) an office, and his rig and turnout were simply anti-genuine and out of place. But in Europe, where the peasantry of certain countries believe in any nonsense, and the greater the nonsense the more intense the belief, as a matter of course—the Quack Doctor is an enormous fact. His wagon or gig, and his horse or donkey; his liveried assistant; his big drum and trumpet; his pitch-plasters, tooth-tweezers, love-potions and miracle-mongers, are all displayed in the open air. In some of the "old-women's remedies" he has, unquestionably, skill, which the simple logic of his customers applies to all his professions and pretensions.

To say that Signor Ronconi was in every detail the head of that school of quack-doctors on the stage, is saying very little. The supreme merit of his action was that he caused the spectator to overlook the speciality of the character in the splendid histrionic resources, the comic universalism he exhibited at every turn. His costume was sufficiently charlatanism but not over-pronounced; his representation vulgar, but not impertinently so; his triumphant aside chucklings over his success; his facial discharges of fun, in which every muscle was harmonious Italian jocularity—are all studies. His voice is worn and hard, and yet, by the force of his method, which is perfection, he manages it, and in some mere hints of the mock-heroic he gave a faint impression of his graver powers. His enunciation of the most rapid phraseology, as to distinctness and meaning, cannot be surpassed. Great as are his powers, he leaves the impression of much greater things unexpressed. His force is genius and not talent—it is a spring and not a reservoir. If he repeat a passage under an encore he varies it so as to give a new painting; and one feels sure that he could go on doing so doing without detriment to the effect. What constitutes the greatest wonder in regard to Ronconi is, that he has a voice rasping and ungracious, a figure not commanding, a face not handsome; an eye not dark or mysterious; and yet notwithstanding, in addition to all this in comedy, he is the Edmund Kean among his countrymen in the lyrical tragedy. The mobility of the face is simply intensified; the quality of the electrical man simply altered; and the smile becomes the tear. By the same rule all the most passionate dramatic writers in plays or out of them are the wittiest.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The new Theatre at Covent Garden, under Mr. Gye's management, was announced to open May 15, with Les Huguenots. The list of artists is the same as last year, with the addition of the tenor, Tamberlik, who is to sing in Zampa. Other pieces mentioned as forthcoming are: Don Giovanni, with Mario, tenor, as the Don—for which there has been precedent in the cases of Garcia, Donzelli, Braham, if not other tenors—, Mercadante's Giamento, and Flotow's Martha.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The Athenæum of April 24, says:

"Three representations of 'Les Huguenots' have strengthened our conviction of the excellence of the upper notes of Mlle. Titiens' voice. Altogether, it may be described as ringing with the voices of Mesdames Jenny Ney and Stöckl Heinefetter; a stout soprano, able to abide 'tear' as well as 'wear' on its top notes. The lower register holds out less bravely, and the lady on acquaintance proves more remarkable as a voice than as a singer; familiarity with her public having developed certain tricks of style, which do not stand in stead of vocal completeness. Among the latter are the disposition to speak (not to sing), recitative, to which a greater predecessor, Madame Schroeder-Devrient, could never reconcile us, and a large amount of make-believe execution. The new lady attempts to shake without commanding a shake; and though she executes one scale-passage effectively—the descent from C in all in her duet with Marcel—elsewhere, in place of real execution, she exhibits the same sort of evasion as vexes us in the singing of Herr Fornes and Herr Reichardt, and which (in fact) amounts to the German idea of "how to get through." So did not formerly—so do not now—the great singers slog. But Mlle. Titiens has time enough before her to add to her accomplishments what she has not, and to correct what is amiss.—On Tuesday, Mlle. Piccolomini appeared as Norina in Don Pasquale. The house was thinly attended. The lady did her best to warm her audience,—forced her voice,—thus sung considerably out of tune,—and dashed through the part with a vehement animation, which told of a struggle to maintain a declining popularity. Had any one about her understood her position, this need not have been. Of Signor Rossi's Don Pasquale—of any one's Don Pasquale—we will not speak in the year of Lahlache's death. Let us turn to something more welcome—to M. Belart's real success as Ernesto. He is a thorough, honest musical artist; sings in tune—in time—attacks his note to the second—and legitimately carries his public by a manly fervor and reality, which are full of relish.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The last opera produced here has been "Lucrezia Borgia," in which Madame Enderssohn, a lady, we believe more familiar with the concert-room than the stage, has made her appearance as Lucrezia. Of her acting, we cannot yet say much in praise, but her voice is so full, and her style so well adapted to the lyric boards, that we believe she may find it her interest to pursue the path into which she has diverged. Her singing is indicative of great natural powers, that only require a little judicious training to be largely developed. Miss Fanny Huddart was the Orsini, and gave the famous Brindisi with great heartiness and spirit. Mr. Borani steadily upheld the minor importance of Alphonso, and Mr. Millard perseveringly reduced Gennaro to the smallest possible pretensions. This gentleman is not likely to attain any prominent position as the tenor of the lyric stage, though he may prove of advantage to the concert-room.—Times, April 25.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The first of the seventh season took place, April 19, in the new St. James's Hall, which building, it is now said, owes its origin to the founder and supporters of the New Philharmonic. The programme was as follows:

Overture (Egmont), Beethoven.
Duet, "If such thy will" (Mount of Olives), Madame Borchardt and Mr. Tennant, Beethoven.
Concerto, in E flat, pianoforte and Orchestra—Allegro—Andante—Rondo Allegro—Miss Arabella Goddard, Beethoven.
Aria, "Ah, qual furor" (Fidelio), Madame Castellan, Beethoven.
Symphony in C minor, Allegro con Brio—Andante—Scherzo, March Finale, Beethoven.

Overture (Freischütz), Weber.
Aria, "Della Rosa" (Bianca e Faliero), Madame Castellan, Rossini.
Aria, "Oh, quelle nuit," "Le moindre bruit" (Le Domino Noir), Madame Borchardt, Auber.
Aria, "O luce di quest'anima," Madame Castellan, Donizetti.
Overture (Masaniello), Auber.

The Times says the vocal performances were not brilliant; but the instrumental parts are highly praised, especially Miss Goddard's playing of the Concerto. The orchestra, of sixty performers, was conducted by Dr. Wyld, who is now considered to represent the "Society" in his own person.

ORATORIO. Handel's "Samson" was performed, April 21st, by Mr. Hullah's First Upper Singing School.

The principal singers were Miss Banks, Miss Fanny Rowland, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. Evans, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Thomas. The singing was not all first-rate. Miss Palmer spoils a nice talent by exaggeration of style and forcing the lower notes. Mr. Sims Reeves sang as grandly as ever, and created an immense effect in "Why does the God of Israel sleep?"—one of his very finest efforts—and in the duet, "Go, coward, go," with Mr. Thomas. The last-named gentleman was loudly and universally applauded in the air, "Honor and arms." The Hall was crowded in every part.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The directors have issued their summer prospectus—a "document of portentous significance, replete with a variety of promises."

"The season opens on the first of May, with a grand musical, floricultural, and artistical display. A series of monster concerts follows, and the public is called upon to be joyful for great choral demonstrations of National School Children, combinations of choirs, on a large scale, from remote provinces, gigantic entertainments by the children of the Tonic Sol-Fa Association, Titanic performances of the Handel Metropolitan Festival Chorus, with all the means and appliances of the Sacred Harmonic Society, first-class concerts, vocal and instrumental, under the direction of Mr. Manns, others by Mr. Henry Leslie's choir and the celebrated band of the Garde Nationale of Paris, three Grand Horticultural and Floricultural Fêtes, two Shows of Poultry," &c., &c.

The people hear a great deal of good music, mixed up with what is hacknied and indifferent, at the Saturday Crystal Palace Concerts. Here are some of the programmes:

April 3.
Overture, "Coriolan," Beethoven.
Aria, "Non piu andrai," Mr. Thomas; Mozart.
Concerto Dramatique, Violin, M. Reményi; Spohr.
Aria, "Batti, batti," Madame Castellan; Mozart.
Symphony in D: Haydn.
Song, "The tribute of a tear," Mr. Thomas; Loder.
Aria, "Ah, non erodea," Madame Castellan; Bellini.
Violin Solo, "Carneval de Venise," M. Reményi.
Overture, "The Siege of Rochelle," Balfe.

April 10.
Overture, "Die Vestalton," Spontini.
Cavatina (Donna Carlotta), Madlle. Ventaldi; Mercadante.
Fantasia, piano-forte (on a German melody), Herr Theodore Mauss.
Recitative and aria, "Dove Sono," Madame Castellan; Mozart.
Symphony, No. 6 (Pastoral); Beethoven.
Rataplan, Madlle. Ventaldi; Malibran.
Solo, flute "Blue bells of Scotland," Mr. Svendsen; Arzt.
Aria, "O luce di quest'anima," Madame Castellan; Donizetti.
Gipsy March, "Preciosa," Weber.

April 17.
Overture (Demetrius); Cusins.
Scene, "Non Temer," Madame Borchardt; Mozart.
Introduction and Rondo, piano-forte, "Le Retour à Londres," Mr. W. G. Cusins; Hummel.
Scene, "Ah, si, ben mio," Mr. George Perren; Verdi.
Symphony in C (Jupiter); Mozart.
Air, "Ah, quelle nuit," Madame Borchardt; Auber.
Piano-forte solo, Fantasia Etude, "Perles d'Ecume," Mr. W. G. Cusins; Kullak.
Ballad, "In this old chair," Mr. George Perren; Balfe.
Overture (Ruy Blas); Mendelssohn.

COLOGNE. The eighth Gesellschafts-Concert took place in the large Gürzenich room, on Tuesday, the 23d of March, 1858. The programme was as follows:

1. Spontini, overture to Olympia; 2. B. Klein, alto aria from the oratorio of David (sung by a female amateur); 3. L. Spohr, 7th concerto for the violin in E minor, executed by Herr Otto von Königsloew; 4. F. Hiller, "O, weint um sie," from Byron, for alto solo, chorus and orchestra.
5. L. van Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; 6. Nocturno for the violin, by Ernst; 7. Tarantella for the violin, by Vieuxtemps (Herr O. von Königsloew); 8. C. M. von Weber, Overture to Der Freischütz.

VIENNA.—On the 22d and 23d March, Liszt's solemn mass was performed, in the Redouten-Saal, under the direction of the author, by the chorus and orchestra of the Imperial Opera house and a great number of the pupils of the Conservatory. Some of his very warm admirers offered him, during his stay here, a conductor's desk of chased silver. This handsome piece of furniture does not weigh less than 75 kilograms, and is a real masterpiece of finished workmanship. According to a computation, which we have every reason to believe exact, it is worth more than 15,000 francs. M. Roger is still pursuing his successful career at the Kärnthner-Theater. The following are a few particulars, but little known, concerning the early life of this celebrated singer. M. Roger held a completely subordinate position in a commercial establishment. He was received in the house of a lady, a widow, of a certain age, who, having heard him sing, was struck by his voice and advised him to take lessons, which might enable him to procure an engagement as chorister at the Opera. As Roger was not able to afford, out of his moderate salary, the necessary twenty francs a month, the widow advanced them, and, after a certain period, the young virtuoso was engaged as a chorister. After migrating, without any marked success, to the Opéra-Comique, he returned to the theatre at which he had first appeared, and it was not long, thanks to his talent and a proper feeling of ambition, before he obtained the first place. Out of gratitude, he married the widow, who was the cause of his elevation, and who, treating him more as her child than her husband, fakes the most touching care of him. Roger has been heard and admired in most of the capitals of Europe, and, though the Paris Opera-house may, perhaps, be rather too large for his voice, is greatly esteemed and liked, especially by the ladies.—Humorist.

(From La France Musicale, March 27.)

NAPLES.—Since the month of October, when the winter season commenced, the following operas have been played in succession:—I Lombardi, Il Trovatore, Violetta, La Traviata, Matilde di Turenna (Les Vêpres), Lionello, Rigoletto, Luisa Miller, and I Due Foscari. The amount received for these works, compared with that received for the Vestale, I Puritani, and Linda, is an eloquent testimony of the preference evinced by the public for Verdi's compositions.

The management of the theatre here, wishing to give the illustrious composer a mark of their gratitude, have brought an action to recover special damages from him. Why? Because he would not write an opera to a fearfully mutilated libretto.

Signor Jacovacci (the manager of the theatre at Rome) was here for three days, during which period he was clever enough to come to terms with Signor Verdi about a new opera. The composer signed the engagement, on condition that Fraschini, the tenor, and a contralto should be engaged. Signor Jacovacci engaged Fraschini the same day, and then set out for a contralto. By this time he must have found one. This is a good reason for our managers. Rome has chiselled them out of the composer and their best artist. Long deliberations and longer correspondence were required to engage Signor Verdi at Naples. To engage him for Rome, Signor Jacovacci needed only five minutes and a signature at the bottom of a letter. Luckily, the public protest loudly against such faults on the part of managers.

While on the subject, I cannot pass over in silence the brilliant ovation offered to Verdi, a few days since, by the pupils of the Conservatory of Music. His Royal Highness the Prince of Syracuse having expressed a desire to hear some pieces of classical music well executed, the pupils of the college performed, under Mercadante's direction, Beethoven's symphony in E flat, and Mozart's Zauberflöte. The audience consisted of our most distinguished musicians and of members of the most fashionable circles. The performance was irreproachable.—After the above selection, the overtures to Stifelio and the Vêpres Siciliennes were played. At the conclusion of the concert, Verdi visited the archives of the Conservatory, the Chevalier Florimo, the keeper of them, doing the honors. The illustrious visitor examined successively the manuscripts of the most celebrated composers, and, among them, those of Scarlatti, Cimarosa, Piccini, Jomelli, Paisiello, &c. On his arrival at the Conservatory he was received by the principal professors of the school. The pupils greeted him with a triple round of cheers. Signor Mercadante went to meet him, and the pupils again cheered the two celebrated composers.

The Athenæum Exhibition.

IV. OIL PICTURES. (CONTINUED).

The various efforts made to engraft the "grand style" of Italian Art upon English stock during the latter half of the last century, were succeeded by a result whose influence has been perpetuated to the present day. Previous to the time of Reynolds, English Art, (in painting) had no recognized existence. For two hundred years before, men of "taste" in England, of whatever rank, virtually anticipating the idea of "British incapacity for Arts," as subsequently promulgated by Winckelman and others, had been content to measure their interest in Art by the importation and employment of inferior Dutch and Italian painters, and the nearly utter neglect of all those whose misfortune it was to be native-born. Regarding painting as only a higher class of decorative upholstery, it is not strange that practical skill should have been sought in those countries, where natural aptitude seemed to be an inheritance, and the principles of working were thoroughly understood.

Holbein, Vandyke, and a few others, form notable exceptions to the mean average ability of these importations, and George the Second's subscription of one guinea to Hogarth's print of the "March to Finchley," is not unfairly illustrative of the kind of patronage which was extended to the native artists of that period.

Meantime, the purpose and power of demonstrating the fact that Art could be produced on English soil and by English hands, was gradually maturing, and ultimately found utterance in Reynolds and his contemporaries.

The Art they sought to secure a recognition of, was not indigenuous however. England must be planted with an exotic. Her native shrubs were coarse growing plants and must be exterminated. Artists must lend themselves to the propagation of the noble tree from over the sea.

The government and the people of England were only called upon to acknowledge and encourage the ability of England to supply her own Art needs, and, since these needs, howsoever palpable, were purely extrinsic, and could be fed without impairing the dignity and solidity of the state, this appeal, so strongly urged, was readily responded to.

True, at that time England had nothing to express which required the medium of "great" Art to give it voice. Her life was devoted to the formation of political states and the consolidation of wealth; yet, as an accompaniment and proof of the highest civilization, patronage of Art was necessary, and there seems to have been a peculiar fitness in offering to a commercial people, as a bait for their countenance and support, the establishment of that Art which had shed such lustre over the commercial renown of Italy.

In considering this subject of adoption and acclimation, however, some fatal errors were committed—errors natural and inevitable to the "common sense" of the English mind, which, Emerson says, consists in a "perception of all the conditions of our earthly existence, of laws that can be stated, and of laws that cannot be stated, or that are learned only by practice in which allowance for friction is made."

Proceeding by induction, Mr. Reynolds and his fellows sought to analyze the causes which had conducted to the perfect ripening of this perfect fruit of Italian Art.

In rendering their decision, due allowance was made for the diffusion of Art culture in Italy, and the fostering care of munificent patrons. Beyond, there was the ennobling influence of lofty and sublime subjects, which, together with the patronage, (itself a sufficient incentive to great efforts,) was deemed an adequate cause to the production of these transcendent results.

The true significance of the Art whose spirit itself created, and was not created by, the long line of noble worshippers that moved in one unbroken column from Cimabue to Raphael—the Art that was born out of the great religious heart of the age, and grew into divinest stature whilst accomplishing its appointed mission, and, when its work was finished—the highest spiritual reach attained—died utterly out, never again to be revived save by that power which first called it into being,—the great Catholic Art; whose mighty pulse had quickened with the religious devotion of three centuries, was not rightly understood by those men who thought to renew its life in the cold Protestant heart of England.

Religious enthusiasm as a motor in Italian Art, was not indeed entirely overlooked; but it was so slightly valued that its non-existence in England was not considered as a radical defect in the condition necessary to ensure success in the proposed transference.

Regarding the subject mainly from the stand-point of "common sense," Art was merely a superinduction upon civilization, the worth of which, as an exponent of the highest social and political culture, could not be overrated, but which, as a manifestation of the essential individual, or national life, deserved little consideration in the polity of a commonwealth. Its real value then, lay in its form of expression, rather than in the idea expressed. Hence, the scions to be engrafted upon the stock of English civilization and "common sense," were to be cut from the decadence of Art, when power of thought and intensity of feeling were superseded by technical skill, rather than from its culmination, in which perfect knowledge was lost in its spiritual sublimity.

Had there been any real need of noble Art in England, it might have been supplied without drawing upon Italy for inspiration. The heart that cries in strong yearning answers itself. Hogarth had a mission and he performed it, quite in his own, self-asserting way. He stood nearly alone however. There was no path leading to him, and beyond, is untrodden grass. Doubtless his work was so completely done, he needs no follower.

Had there been a real want, Art would have sprung up to give itself utterance. It might have been feeble, and homely, but integrity would have made it strong, and beauty would have been born unto it out of the soul of faith.

The want expressed was purely external however, and it naturally sought artificial means of supply. The stock chosen for the experiment of inoculation, was young, and full of life.

The "Royal Academy"—then only a few years from the seed, and destined to bear the representative fruit of English Art,—was headed in, and the imported scion inserted. With very little care the graft "set," and English Art thenceforward had a "local habitation and a name."

Occasionally the native stock threw out new buds below the point of inoculation, which, thriving, bore fruit that smelt of English soil. It was not in the "grand style," however, nor did it often secure the endorsement of the "Academy" seal.

A new climate and new treatment wrought a marked change in the quality of the engrafted Art. The difference between its native and adopted conditions, was too great to allow a preservation of other than the most superficial characteristics; yet this Art, such as it was, however we name it, pure or hybrid, during many years was presumed to represent the highest Art culture possible to England.

Suppose then, retracing our steps, we superinduce the meretricious seventeenth century art of Italy upon honest, fact-loving England, to meet a demand which escapes inspection because, to the apprehension of English "common sense," it has nothing to do with truth or morals—a demand created solely by a thirst for culture and the power which comes of it—add thereto a large quota of that universal cleverness which is said to characterize the true son of Albion; and the result is the "Old School" of English Art; its leading characteristics, pretentiousness, superficialness, falseness, and an ostentatious cleverness which seeks to cover all its defects.

Follow down the stream of patronage—English truth unwittingly aiding and abetting English lies, until the national "common sense" revolts, and, demanding truth for truth in all things else, finds it a condition that can also be met in Art, and you have the motive which underlies the Art of the "New School"—its leading characteristic—uncompromising fidelity to truth.

Now, since it is written, that "everything English is a fusion of distant and antagonistic elements"—that England is a "country of extremes," and that "nothing can be praised in it without damning exceptions, and nothing denounced without salvos of praise," I shall take further occasion to mark the just exceptions to the general ruling of this article, and award the due measure of praise in some additional detailed criticisms which I propose to make.

MESOS.

From My Diary. No. 7.

May 17. I hear a sad piece of news from Berlin, that S. W. Dehn (pronounced Dane) is dead!

He received a university education, I think, at Leipzig, and studied Law, but like so many thus educated in Germany he afterwards devoted himself to music. His student life fell in the era when duelling was so much in vogue, and a wound in the arm, received in a duel, put an end to his pianoforte playing, after which he made the violoncello his instrument. For many years he played in the orchestra, I think I have heard him say, both in Leipzig and Berlin.

One day speaking of some point in the score of Don Juan, he remarked that he had played in seventy five performances of that work. He was also for several years one of the directors of the famous "Dom Choir" at Berlin, and much of the perfection of that remarkable choir of boys and men is due to the training he gave it in the music of the old Italian church composers. Fifteen or twenty years ago he was appointed Librarian of the musical department of the Royal Library, with the title of Professor, a place for which he was qualified to the very highest degree.

Dehn's knowledge of musical bibliography was altogether beyond that of any other man living, not excepting Fétis of Brussels, or Becker of Leipzig. He had a special love for it, had charge of the finest musical library in the world, and had travelled extensively through central and southern Europe, at the expense of the Prussian government, for the express object of collecting music and musical works, of historical or artistic value. His articles in the "Cæcilia," the last half dozen volumes of which he edited, prove his immense and minute erudition. For many years Fétis has been in correspondence with him, and the new edition of the "Biographies des Musiciens" will owe much, very much, to the communications of Dehn.

He had an extraordinary memory and was the living encyclopædia for all of us, who used to frequent the Royal Library. One day a gentleman came in and asked whether the "Herr Professor" could direct him to some passage in a work, which had escaped his memory, but which he (Dehn) had shown him some fifteen years before. He then related the substance of the extract as he recollected it.

Dehn thought a moment. "I think," said he, "you will find it in a small thin octavo on that shelf, (pointing up) and about such a page—naming it—at the top of the page; but I have never opened the book since that time. Let me see." He climbed the steps to the shelf indicated, took down the book, opened it to the page—and there was the passage! He was one of the very first of living contrapuntists, and his knowledge of the old Italian and German church composers was wonderful. He had read more of Bach's works than any man living and had made it a special object for many years to make the collection in the Royal Library complete. But, although a Bachist in the extreme, Rossini was the hero of this century to him, after Beethoven. He knew Rossini personally and some of his reminiscences of him I sent long ago to Dwight's Journal.

Several of the first of the rising musicians of Germany have been his pupils. Rubinstein, for instance, and one, now in St. Petersburg—whose name has escaped me,—but who has struck out a path of his own in vocal composition as original, perhaps, as Schubert himself. His pupils, of whom I knew several, idolized him. He made them do their own work. He gave an hour to them in the morning at his house, and they might come every morning if they chose. He said but little to them about their exercises, but a word from him was often better than a lecture from another man. His course with them was similar to that of Albrechtsberger, as illustrated in the work known as "Beethoven's Studies." "Come down to the Library," he would say, "and I will give you something to copy." You would see sometimes half a dozen young men employed at the table, one copying a fugue by Bach, another a movement of a trio by Beethoven, a third something from Mozart, and so on. As soon as possible he set his pupils upon canon and fugue—for if they once had mastered those the rest was easy, if they had ideas—if not, why waste their time upon music? A pupil hands in his fugue; he has perhaps introduced a pet idea and thinks wonders of it. Dehn, as Channing used to do to our college themes—glances over the exercises and draw his pencil through the pet idea, with the enquiry possibly, "what is all that for?"

He was short, abrupt and most plainly spoken in his address; overflowing with anecdote, and possessed of the keenest sense of the ridiculous. Sometimes when in the humor for talking, every pen would be laid aside and the large room of the library would ring with shouts of laughter, as he heaped anecdote upon anecdote of the men whom he had known in his younger days and whose names stand high in musical history—men who knowing only music, naturally enough presented queer and grotesque phases of character away from it.

His contempt for the "music of the future" equalled that of Chorley himself, and was based upon a profound knowledge of the art through all its modern developments. Of all men whom I have happened to meet at home and abroad Professor Dehn has impressed me most by the vast extent and the minute accuracy of his knowledge upon all musical topics.

His manual of harmony and counterpoint, judging from my own limited knowledge of the subject, and from what the students of music in Berlin used to tell me, is the best yet written. Besides this he published a translation of a work upon Orlando Lasso, enriched by notes and additions, which make it a model for works of the kind.

Dehn was a tall, finely formed, rather large man, with a decidedly handsome face, and the kindest smile! He must have been about sixty-two years of age. He leaves a wife much younger than himself, and two children, a son and a daughter some ten or twelve years of age.

He was a most valuable acquaintance to me and it will be a sad day indeed, when I enter that library again and find a stranger at his desk!

A number of Vienna authors and artists gave a dinner to the Nestor of Austrian poets, Herr Castelli, — on his seventy-eighth birthday, on the 2d of March. All the partakers appeared in the peasant costume of the different provinces of Austria; and the table-music, — in keeping with the characters of a peasant meeting, — consisted solely in performances on the national instrument of the Cither.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 22, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — To-day, by way of variety, we give a couple of the famous Part-Songs, by Mendelssohn. They are leaves from the entire book full of the same, published by Messrs. Ditson & Co., with the German words translated by our townsman, Mr. J. C. D. PARKER. There can be no pleasanter practice for Glee Clubs, Singing societies, Liedertafel, &c.; and the social musical example of the Germans must be followed more and more in our own country. The first selection is for mixed voices, a bright and joyous thing, full of birds and the exhilaration of the woods. It should be studied till it goes with perfect ease, precision, lightness, and almost sings itself; it is by no means easy to sing as it should be sung. The Serenade is for male voices only, easy enough to sing "after a fashion," but very difficult to sing well; the choir that shall fully master it, will be master of the highest art in singing, that of the pure, sustained, perfectly blended cantabile style.

So far we have given enough of Mendelssohn to satisfy even our London Mentor. Next week we shall commence a beautiful piece by Franz Schubert, for four female voices.

Music in the Public Schools.

In the report of the doings of our School Committee, in the papers last week, we notice the adoption of the following order:

Ordered. That for this year the usual school festival at Faneuil Hall be suspended, and in place thereof that there be given at the Music Hall, on the day of the exhibitions of the grammar schools, a musical exhibition by the members of the public schools, in connection with the ceremony of the introduction of the medal scholars to the Mayor, addresses and the presentation of bouquets, and that a committee of five be appointed to make the necessary arrangements therefor.

So far so good. The annual "scramble" (as it has been called) in Faneuil Hall on medal day is virtually transformed for this year into a musical festival. It will take place in the latter part of July. We notice further in the same report that a proposition to establish an annual musical festival, to consist of singing by the older pupils of the grammar schools, was tabled — we trust only for the present. Should next July's experiment succeed, as under proper management it may, it will be found worth repeating year after year upon a larger scale and more matured plan; it naturally will pass into an institution. And there are several reasons why we hope it may.

To be sure, our past experience of musical school exhibitions has been dreary and unprofitable. Spare us from more such attempts as we have heard at children's singing en masse by the thousand! We had a specimen when Thalberg played to the children, and the children sought to return the compliment by shouting and drawing through a hacknied melody. This certainly is not the thing we want, nor what is contemplated by the movers of this measure. The time, too, is short for preparing any thing much better. Yet something better can, and we have reason to believe, will be done. Let anyone read an account of the Charity Children's Anniversary, at St. Paul's, in London (Berlioz witnessed and described it — see Vol. VII. page 146 of this Journal,) and he will see what good results are possible from a right, unitary training of multitudes of young voices to sing in unison.

In the first place there should be unity of method in the singing exercises throughout all the schools. The best plan should be found and uniformly practised. To train separate masses of children in twenty different schools so that they shall sing even the plainest chant or choral well when brought together, is to train them thoroughly and truly; the discipline must be exact as clock-work in each separate body, or they can never chime together as a whole. Therefore, we look upon this earnest attempt to prepare the children for the festival in question, as a measure naturally involving and necessitating the adoption of some real, bonâ fide, unitary mode of teaching the first rudiments of vocal music in our schools. Of course the first experiment can but be most imperfect; it will be unfair to expect too much from it; but it is placed in such hands, that we know the best use will be made of such poor opportunity as is afforded. Much depends on right selection of the pieces to be sung. Away with trivial, infantile, sentimental and mock-patriotic songs. Something simple, solemn, slow, appropriate to a thousand voices — some grand old chants or chorals, something religious and yet strong and cheerful, sung in sustained full tones, that swell up grandly from a multitude, — and not light, sing-song measures, without time or measure — is obviously the true material for such exercises. Then let the great organ fill the pauses, let a master hand conduct the whole, and we may get something somewhat suggestive of the sublime, instead of the ridiculous.

Besides, the practice of such tunes, of long, sustained, open notes, does really train both voice and ear, and lays the true foundation of the power of singing.

We believe in having music taught in all our schools. We cannot go as far as some, who would have music taught there as a science. A child's mind should not be burdened with indigestible abstractions; for facts and applications it has natural appetite and aptitude, but not for rules and principles. Colburn's First Lessons in Arithmetic taught us the true secret here. A child may learn music, learn to sing, without learning the musical science. Let him learn the names of the notes, the intervals of the scale, &c., and how to read a simple piece; but this is not the science, it is only the A B C of music; a brief convenient routine, which one learns as he does the names of the streets and how to find his way about in them. The great thing is to form the ear, to exercise the voice, to cultivate the inborn sense of rhythm, tune and harmony, and make all more or less susceptible to the refining, elevating influence of music, and able in some slight and simple way to lend a voice in its production. This may be done, in some schools has been done, for all; special aptitude of course is limited to few, and will need special culture.

Now singing lessons were introduced into the public schools of Boston twenty years ago; and stated hours have been devoted to them ever since. Public opinion has not to be converted to the favoring of music in the schools. For twenty years it has existed there; it is an institution. But what a feeble, half-alive and heterogeneous institution for the most part it is! How the thing is trifled with! Mere routine, pastime (although that is better than nothing), and no real teaching! What want of method and of unity among teachers! If we are agreed to have music recognized and taught at all, is it not best to have it taught in earnest? If a thing is worth doing, is it not worth doing well? It never will and never can be done well until there shall be one method and one mind presiding over all the music teaching in the schools. There should be one inspiring and controlling genius in the matter; one competent, live man, who has it in him, who has enthusiasm, knowledge, tact and power of influencing others; and for him it should be an office of dignity and trust, publicly valued as we value all high functions, to infuse true life and order into what it now is but a joke to call the musical department of our public schools. As tending, remotely, but, if rightly managed, surely, to this end, we hail the proposed school festival with satisfaction, and deem it worthy of more notice than we are here able to bestow upon it.

CONCERT OF THE BOSTON BRIGADE BAND.—

This oldest of our military bands, originally organized as a Reed Band in 1821, but converted to the noisier fashion of the Brass Bands in 1849, returned last Saturday evening for the first time publicly to the good old style, much to the delight of as many people as the Music Hall could hold. We confess we really enjoyed the first part of the entertainment.—It was a pleasure we have not had from bands for many years, to hear a couple of those inspiring old quicksteps by Walsch, so much in vogue some twenty years ago, with such a faithful reproduction of the old impression of the Band, that did so delight and stimulate the musical sense of Boston boys in that day. Those marches had more music and more metal in them, after all, than the mongrel operatic affairs now-a-days arranged for brass. They sounded finely; the brass instruments, full numerous enough, were carefully subdued and blended richly with the half-dozen clarinets, the bassoons, the four French horns and octave flute. Such a band is not intolerable in the Music Hall, and is capable of some rich and delicate effects. Auber's military Overture to Le Serment, an overture well suited to such instruments, was quite clearly, nicely rendered for the opening piece. There was also a medley of Scotch Airs, cleverly strung together by Mr. BURDITT, which was rapturously encored.

We did not stay to hear the all-brass portion of the programme, the waltzes, Galopades, &c., nor the Potpourri descriptive of a battle. Such claptrap is indeed too childish, and a degradation of the art of music. But what we did hear was enough to satisfy us of the complete success of this experiment of a return to the reed band system, and warrant pleasant expectations of summer evening promenade concerts, which will have something of the refined charm of music, and not merely minister to a barbarian love of noise,—music for civilized humanity, and not for mere gamins or rowdies.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Mr. CARL GAERTNER, one of the ablest violinists who has lived among us, and whom, in our present poverty in that sort of talent, we can ill afford to lose, gives his farewell concert in the Music Hall, this evening. Mr. G., with small remuneration, has provided many feasts of classical music for the music-lovers of Boston, and should not go away from us without some token that his talent and his labors are appreciated. He offers us to-night an orchestra, led by ZERRAEN, accompanied by which he will play Beethoven's grand Concerto for the violin, and a Fantasia by Vieuxtemps. Mr. HAUSE will play Hummel's Piano Concerto in A; Mrs. LONG will sing the scena from the Freyschütz; and Mr. ADAMS will sing an Italian patriotic song, composed for Orsini. Indeed the second part of the programme appears to be wholly patriotic.

Among the passengers for Europe by the Europa from this port on Wednesday, were Mme. DE LAGRANGE and Sig. RONCONI; so all the rumors of an opera company including them to open next week at the Boston Theatre, are at fault. Of Lagrange the Courier des Etats Unis says:

Engagements come after her here, and M. Galeotti has crossed the ocean to make offers to her that resemble the wedding gifts of a fairy's god-child. It is easily seen, from the terms of the contract, that it relates to a country where diamonds are raised. What other country, indeed, than Brazil would give her prima donna sixty thousand dollars a year, travelling expenses for ten persons, the use of a furnished country house outside the gates of Rio Janeiro, including the service of the stables, liveries, &c., and all guaranteed by the government? And fifty thousand francs paid in advance at Paris! and no more Ullman to submit to! Rio Janeiro is far off, it may be said; but then $120,000 in two years, without counting the chances of more!

There is rumor of the importation to this country next Fall of Lumley's entire London Company—not by Ullman, but by Hammer!

In Philadelphia, SATTER and Mme. JOHANSEN have given four concerts, productive of few dollars, but a most exuberant crop of newspaper eulogiums. Mme. GAZZANIGA's benefit at the Academy of Music was a splendid tribute. Parts of Lucrezia, Traviata and Favorita were performed; the orchestra was the "Germanic," led by CARL SENTZ. Sig. AMODIO also had a benefit on Monday; Gazzaniga, Brignoli, &c., assisting. The Philadelphia papers are full of one CHARLES GRONE, who, it seems, has composed his Opus 1,000 (!), in honor of which a banquet has been given him by his publishers, Messrs. Lee and Walker, and Beck & Lawton. He is evidently a man whom publishers delight in.

Deaths of musical notorieties abound in Europe these last weeks. Besides those of CRAMER and NEUKOMM, and Professor DEHN, of Berlin, noticed in preceding columns, we read that CARL VAN BEETHOVEN, nephew and heir of the great composer, died at Vienna about the middle of April; and also in the same city, a well-known musician and publisher, whose name is much associated with that of Beethoven, ANTON DIABELLI. He composed the so-called Diabelli waltz, which served Beethoven for a theme for thirty-three variations, which together form one of the most original, imaginative and masterly of his piano works. . . . Among the recent arrivals of musical artists in London we notice those of JOACHIM, the violinist, engaged for the new Philharmonic Concerts; Mme. SZARDY (WILHELMINA CLAUS), the pianist; Mme. GASSIER, and Mlle. VICTOIRE BALFE, who was to sing in Dublin. . . . OLE BULL is reported at Vienna, intending to give some concerts there. . . . THALBERG and VIEUXTEMPS seem to have a wonderful faculty of developing strange eloquence in musical critics who live in the remote outskirts of music-dom. We gave a curious leaf from their experience in the South West. They have been more recently in Canada, and the Courier culls for us the following rare hits from a Toronto paper:

"As usual, Thalberg was gigantic in harmonies, and superb in originality. His Fantasia on themes from 'Masaniello' was absolutely overpowering. Nothing could exceed his execution or equal his pathos. . . . Like that of Dante, every heart appeared undone by the golden shower of his fingers. Strong men wept at his 'prayer,' and were foolish enough to smile at their own weakness when he moved off into the Allegro Moderato. In his dolce passages he held a nightingale in his right hand, and an Eolian Harp in his left, while his fortissimos were harmonious thunders hurled about him in every direction."

Now Vieuxtemps, your turn! "When he commenced his performance the theme was going on smoothly, but how beautifully was it accompanied. Now a trio—now a quartet, and all enveloped in an exquisite tremolo that quickened your pulses till the sensation became almost agonizing. His Fantasia, from 'Lucia' was entrancing. The 'Fra Pece' has never been outdone in the world, and never can be so long as there are only four strings on the violin. His impassioned rendering of the dying scene made it as palpable to our senses as if we had the whole Opera before us. Every cadence, every modulation, every accelerando, every delicious note was sung instead of played, and those who were conversant with the libretto felt the whole power of his genius overshadowing them. His harmonies were little diamond points that actually glittered before you, and the sweep of his bow won from every part of the instrument he touched, such a stream of melody, or such a torrent of harmony, as to totally sweep you away."

Musical Correspondence.

MILAN, APRIL 18.—Under La Scala is the famous music establishment of RICORDI, the great music-monopolist of Italy. He owns almost all the popular modern operas, and enjoys in Italy at least, the exclusive right of their publication. His store is quite a museum of artistic portraits; for almost every opera singer in Italy has a lithograph of himself, either paid for by himself or his admirers. Mr. Carlo Jacopi, of New York, figures among the goodly company. In looking over the list of Ricordi's publications, I was struck with the great number of operas that have been produced and published, and yet whose names are utterly unknown in the United States. One of the most fecund of Italian composers, MERCADANTE, is only known to us by name, for few opera-goers in America can say they have ever heard any of his works. PACINI, is another grand composer, who deserves to be made familiar to an American audience; his Elisa Velasco, of which I have spoken in a previous letter, is an opera that could not be otherwise than successful, and I noticed on the list nearly a dozen others, from the same pen. As to VERDI, the number of his operas, of which we do not even know the names, is perfectly amazing, and it is the same with Donizetti. Then there are the two Riccis, who enjoy a certain popularity, and there are many other unknown composers, who have not yet obtained fame and probably never will. For instance, how many of your readers are familiar with the music of Fontana, Foroni, Gabrielli, Galli, Malipiero, Pappalardo, Pedrotti, Pistilli, Puzone, Sanelli, Schober-lechner, Speranza, Vera, Altavilla, Aspa, Baroni, Bona, Boniforti, Butera, Buzzzi, Buzzola, Cagnoli, Capecciatro, Coccia, Coppola, Corbi and Fioravanti? Yet every individual here mentioned has written a half a dozen operas at least, and the majority of them may be found in the immense stock of Ricordi. I might go on for a column with other names of the unknown musicians of Italy.

In one of the musical papers here, I noticed the other day amid the list of artisti disponibili, the name of ANNA DE LA GRANGE, who will, in June, return from America. If this be true, you are about to lose a prima donna, who, it is no exaggeration to say, has obtained in the United States a more general and solid popularity than any other that has visited our country.

I understand that almost every musical artist of note in Italy is looking forward to a pilgrimage to America. I was a short time ago, in my pokings on the Adriatic coast, at a little town called Fano, whence comes GIUGLINI, the popular tenor of Lumley's troupe; there I heard that this excellent tenor had sailed or was on the point of sailing for America, and his friends in Fano were expecting him to return to Italy staggering under the weight of gold and precious stones he was to collect in the American El Dorado. By the way Lumley is in Italy, doing what I have been doing—poking about—only his pokings have a more definite object than mine. He is hunting up rare musical novelties,—great tenors and wondrous sopranos, who have hitherto been wasting their sweetness upon the desert air of the provincial towns of Italy; it was in a similar foray that he discovered that great musical nugget, GIUGLINI, who owes to the London manager the opportunity of being heard in a northern capital, and thus obtaining the fame he now enjoys.

The musical people here entertain the most exaggerated notions about the prospect offered for opera singers in the United States, though they are singularly apt to confound New York with Buenos Ayres, and Rio Janeiro, and the city of Cuba—these places having a European fame for their devotion to Italian music. At the same time, the Italians (of course I do not include the traveled and better educated classes) seem to think that in America, as we are not accustomed to the best of music, any second-rate prima donna has only to open her mouth there, to be pelted with gold dollars and diamond bracelets. It was under the influence of some such delusion that a kind Italian friend suggested to me the propriety of espousing some handsome young comprimaria, and taking her to America, where she would make my fortune and her own by singing to the natives, who in accordance with their usual custom would immediately shower her with gold. With that striking prudence and sagacity which I so frequently manifest, I at once remarked, that perhaps there would be some difficulty in finding such a valuable lady. "Not at all, caro mio," replied my friend, "every woman in Italy can sing a little, and as there are just eight times as many women as men in the country, any young man, especially a stranger from America, can get eight wives, at least, if he wants them." Those are the very identical Mormonish and heathenish words of my good friend, as translated with singular fidelity, from the original Italian, by Trovator.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 11.—The Concert of the Harmonia Sacred Music Society, last week, proved a perfect godsend to those who, conscientiously opposed to the Italian Opera, have languished for a musical entertainment ever since the Lyric performances at the Academy rendered it precarious to risk a plain Concert.

The Harmonia rejoices in the prestige of a long established name, an energetically managed business department, and an excellent corps of amateur choristers and soloists. Its Concerts have been assiduously (perhaps hitherto detrimentally to the interests of its exchequer) directed to the dissemination of high-art compositions, merely inserting in its programmes operatic and balladic trifles, at times, in order to appease the grumbling legion which demands Stephen Glover or Verdi.

Some years since its department of active, performing members was very extended and imposing, comprising within its limits many of the best amateurs and Professors of the city. Other societies, however, sprang into existence, and the Harmonia lost quite a number of its vocalists, who clustered around another nucleus and formed the present Handel and Haydn. Nevertheless, its energies have remained unimpaired, malgré its wasting physique, and its rehearsals are rigorously, punctually, and artistically accomplished, each week.

LEOPOLD MEIGNEN, Mus. Doct., Societatis Harmonie gratia, conducts this association with signal ability. His musical and literary attainments are of a very high order, both having been permanently established, one year since, by the triumphant production of an oratorio, "the Deluge," which, in its main features, conclusively proved that a Frenchman may attain to classic distinction after all.

MICHAEL H. CROSS, the Organist of the Society, is endowed with brilliant talents, and as a Concert-Organ performer stands the peer of the proudest names in the country. Seat him before the noble instrument with a request for "Wm. Tell," the "Crown Diamonds," or, if you prefer it, a Fugue from Bach; and you will not fail to marvel at the fine orchestral effects, the brilliancy of execution, and the steadfastness of tone, which your request has evoked. But this accomplished concert-performer assumes a different guise in the sanctuary. His voluntaries lack the ideal, and his accompaniments are boisterous.

Mrs. EMILY REED, a Bostonian, I believe, generally "leads off" upon the bills as the principal Soprano at present. Her voice is a pure soprano, of considerable compass, and a fair degree of power, which, however, frequently appears to disadvantage through incorrect intonation, howbeit that her uniform appreciation of subject and strict regard to time evince unmistakable evidence of close application.

Some of the finest choruses from the "Elijah" and the "Creation" graced the programme of last week, and were enthusiastically received by the intellectual audience assembled, in spite of a serious drawback to their striking effects, in the lack of an adequate corps of basses. Eh! bien—Mendelssohn and Haydn were not present; and the public here is not super-critical.

A novelty of this entertainment consisted in the debut of a youthful Soprano. Verily she flashed upon us like a dazzling meteor! Her voice, what with immense power, extraordinary compass, and singular purity, warmed into new enthusiasm an audience which the length of the programme had driven into somewhat of listlessness. Mark me, most worthy Journal, that lady (anonymous by request of her doting friends) must make a wide spread sensation.

A few words concerning the German Orchestra, and then adieu. The Germanians perform every Saturday afternoon, Overtures, Symphonies, and Strauss Waltzes before an immense array of crinoline belles, who "most do congregate" at the Musical Fund Hall at the hour appointed, and there drink in the inspirations of the great maestros for 12½ cents; to say nothing of the opportunity thus afforded for displaying spring bonnets, straw-colored kids, and the latest importations of Levy & Co. SENTZ, whilom drummer in ordinary to the quondam "Germania," and now leader of the orchestra above mentioned, directs the movements of this body of musicians with fascinating grace and judicious ability. His popularity with the fair frequenters of these fashionable rehearsals (Ullman would dub them Matinées) is unbounded. Sentz, à la Toots, patronizes eminent but "doothid expentthif" tailors. These Germania Rehearsals, as they are termed, have become a fixed institution with us.

SATTER gave his introductory concert last night. Circumstances prevented me from hearing him; but he is represented to have taken the city by storm. I shall hear him to-morrow night. Au Revoir!

MANRICO.

CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 12.—We had the "Creation" last evening. The "Musical Union" numbered on this occasion about ninety singers, and was supported by the "Great Western Band." Mrs. BOSTWICK and Mrs. MOZART were the soloists. The Tenor and Bass parts were sung by members of the Society. Mr. LUMBARD has a beautiful and rich bass voice, and though he has not much style, his performance was very acceptable. The tenor was rather weak. The Chorus was well balanced but wanted training. It was, however, the first attempt of this Society at a large work. Our materials are very good, much better than you would expect to find in Chicago. But their Conductor—!!!—alas! is a country singing school teacher. We enjoyed quietly a very capital joke. The gas remained turned down when the audience was gathering, and was to be turned on at the word light in the opening chorus. This was the great idea of the Conductor. The leader of the Band, a thorough musician, however, got hold of the secret and ordered his band not to commence at all until the gas was turned on. So on the stage they come. All is ready. The Conductor gives a sign and is about to commence his first beat, when the players inform him they cannot see. Conductor tries again. Orchestra can't see. Conductor, very much disappointed, gives order to turn on the gas. Light. Performance begins. All sensible people delighted at seeing this trickery defeated.

The audience filled the hall to overflowing, and the Concert will soon be repeated. A. M.

BANGOR, ME., APRIL 30.—The "Choral Society" of our city, gave a Concert on Fast Day evening, which we think worthy a brief chronicling in your admirable paper. Their programme was a selection of solos, tunes, trios, choruses, &c., from Haydn's "Creation," which has been their study during the past winter. These were all rendered in a manner highly creditable to the society, and gratifying to their audience.

To instance a few of the more prominent individual performances: those beautiful solos, "The Marvellous work" and "With verdure clad," were very happily rendered by Mrs. FORBES and Mrs. CARRELL, respectively. "Rolling in foaming billows," was given in noble style by Mr. WARREN, and "In splendor bright," by Mr. BURBANK. Mr. J. W. MERRILL sang the favorite air, "Now vanish before the holy beams," with remarkable distinctness of enunciation, and discriminating taste and skill. Mrs. BROWN sang in several trios, sustaining a long and difficult soprano with entire success. "The Lord is great," was given in splendid style, by this lady with Messrs. Merrill and Warren (three members of the admirable Quartet Choir of St. John's Episcopal Church in this city), as well as "On thee each living soul awaits," where she sang with Messrs. Guild and Wilder. Mr. Wilder and Mrs. Crowell gave the Duet "Graceful consort," very brilliantly.

The choruses throughout indicate careful training on the part of the choir, and were very effective. The organ was well played, though not a superior instrument, by Mr. TRACY.

We rejoice in the existence of this society, and its influence over the musical development of our city. Its aims are high, and its spirit a noble one.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Unhappy Love, (L'amor funesto). Donizetti. 30
Donizetti's celebrated Baritone Song, which has proved a taking concert piece many a time. Our Boston concert-goers of last winter can bear testimony to this. It is a lovely Romanza for a fine voice, either Baritone or Mezzo Soprano. The English version is by Th. T. Barker.

Winnie Bell. Song and Chorus. Upton. 25
Light and melodious, with a good and effective chorus. Of quite a popular cast. Will find hosts of friends.

I've got a Little Bible. Sunday School Song. S. B. Ball. 25
A nice little ballad for the young, even for the very young. This ought to become a household melody.

Love's Letter Box. Song. Wrighton. 50
This is a charming song, by the composer of "The Dearest Spot on Earth to me is Home." The title-page is adorned by a beautiful colored lithograph, representing a dark-eyed young beauty, who just slips a small envelope into an aperture, which a solemn, old oak tree opportunely offers for a "Lover's Letter-box."

The Longest Day will have an End. Song. Anne Ticknor. 25
This Song of the popular English authoress will prove quite a treasure to those, who, in expectation of good things to come on the morrow, complain of "Long, long weary days."

Instrumental Music for Piano.

La Traviata (Revue melodique), for two performers. Beyer. 60
An excellent Four hand Arrangement of all the Principal Melodies in this Opera, in the form of a Fantasia. Of medium difficulty.

Spinnlied. Impromptu. Littloff. 50
A pleasant Melody, in the style of those impressive "people's airs," which Mendelssohn and others have already so happily imitated, sustained by the left hand, while the right keeps up a constant whirl of Arpeggio passages, imitating the noise of a spinning-wheel, when in rapid motion. This piece of the eminent young composer, whom the fastidious Parisians have made the lion of the musical season, and whose works have been introduced into this country by the genial interpretation of Madame Graever Johnson, must become a favorite with good players.

Musard's Grand March. Ingraham. 25
Hymeneal March. G. D. Smith. 25
Polka de Grand. Baldwin. 35
Surprise Party Polka. Avery. 25
Pretty and pleasing in their line. Neither of them offers any difficulty to a player of common ability.

For Brass Bands.

Shells of Ocean and Silver Lake Waltz, arranged for a Brass Band of fourteen or a less number of instruments by Burditt. 1.00
This is a new number of "Ditson's Band Music," printed neatly on cards.

Books.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, with symphonies and accompaniments, by Sir John Stevenson, and characteristic words by Thomas Moore. With a portrait. Price, $1.50; in cloth, $2.50; cloth, full gilt, $3.00.

In a very neat, convenient, and durable form we have in this volume the fine old Melodies of Ireland wedded to the charming ballads which have, more than any other of his works, immortalized the name of Moore, and made it a familiar household word throughout the civilized world. There has been, and always will be, a peculiar charm about the music and the poetry of this work, and though the expression in reference to a new book, has become somewhat hackneyed that "no library is complete without it," we may venture to say, that, used in connection with this elegant edition of "Moore's Melodies," it will come to each of our readers as a very truthful declaration. There are many editions of these Melodies published in this country, but this is the only one in which the words are accompanied by the music, and here we may mention that with Moore's words and the music were one. "So intimately," says an English writer, "were they united in his mind, that the sight of the songs crowded together in one volume unaccompanied by music notes inflicted upon him positive pain."

To the Moon.

From GOETHE.

Fillest hill and vale again,
Still, with softening light !
Loosest from the world's cold chain
All my soul to-night !

Spreadest round me, far and nigh,
Soothingly, thy smile ;
For thee, as from friendship's eye,
Sorrow shrinks the while.

Every echo thrills my heart—
Glad and gloomy mood,
Joy and sorrow both have part
In my solitude.

River, river, glide along !
I am sad, alas !
Fleeting things are love and song—
Even so they pass !

I have had and I have lost
What I long for yet ;
Ah ! why will we, to our cost,
Simple joys forget ?

River, river, glide along,
Without stop or stay !
Murmur, whisper to my song
In melodious play,—

Whether on a winter's night
Rise thy swollen floods,
Or in spring thou hast delight
Watering the young buds.

Happy he, who, hating none,
Leaves the world's dull noise,
And, with trusty friend alone,
Quietly enjoys

What, forever unexpressed,
Hid from common sight,
Through the mazes of the breast
Softly steals by night !

Musical Orthodoxy.

From the German of Mme. JOHANNA KINKEL.

"Better after all not try to learn the F minor Sonata," said Ida, rising wearily from the piano-forte, and after a pause adding: "In fact it does go well enough, and my old master, severe as he was, would have been satisfied with it. What I still feel to be wanting in my performance of it, I fear will not be brought out by farther practice. The incomprehensible fantastic element, which pervades the first Allegro, the desperate dalliance with agony in the Adagio, this laughter upon the verge of destruction in the finale, all this I expressed better at first. But while I have been laboring to polish the rapid passages, and have acquired a smoother and more elegant execution, I have become unable to return again to the grand style. I play the Sonata now with great precision, but quite without soul,—and this is fatal."

"But you take up everything with a too pedantic severity," answered an old lady, who sat listening on the sofa, "and labor to infuse into the music what no human being could detect in the hearing."

The pianist had early been left an orphan, and had found a home with certain distant relatives. A wise guardian had appropriated the greater portion of her small fortune to the cultivation of her uncommon talents for music. She was now of age and independent, and had spent what remained in the purchase of an Erard grand piano-forte. Hardly so much had been left as sufficed to pay her expenses to the place which she had chosen for her future abode, and to set up her exceedingly simple house-keeping there.

She had no wish to engage in travelling and concert giving, her musical tastes being too strongly opposed to those of the public; nor could her retiring disposition have borne the thousand little discouragements, which no one can escape, who, unknowing and unknown, seeks this mode of gaining a subsistence among strangers. She chose rather to labor for the means of living as a music teacher in some large town, hoping, while bearing the cross of lesson-giving to beginners, to gain sufficient to enable her to reach that high place in Art, which was not possible in the small, retired place which was her home.

At present she was the guest of a friend of her deceased mother. The old lady was the wife of Bailiff Werl in Waldheim, a small town in a narrow valley, about an hour's walk from the capital. Here she was to remain until she should find a suitable place of abode and a few pupils in the city. Frau Werl kindly went to town with her daily to make the needful visits and inquiries, and took thereby, unluckily a great many useless steps.

Her reception by most of her fellow-musicians was forbidding, or at least seemed so to Ida. Having from childhood been accustomed to unrestrained intercourse with relatives and friends, the manners and forms of the great city appeared to her indescribably cold, and the brevity, with which musical notabilities replied to her inquiries, positively frightened her. Most comforted her with: "Things would go well enough by-and-by, if she could only wait until people discovered what she could do;" but nobody troubled himself to aid her in showing what she could do, although in her case everything depended upon its being done as soon as possible.

Not far from the Waldheim bailiff's house was the villa of Count Selvar, which he occupied every year from opening spring until the storms of November. The Bailiff and his wife were always welcome there, and the Count never met them without urging them to come more frequently; for Frau Werl visited there only when the bad weather cut off the constant stream of visitors from the higher classes, who, during the summer months, filled the saloons and the garden. For the sake of Ida, however, she now overcame her repugnance to fashionable society. At the villa music was a passion, and should the family once become interested in Ida, she would almost of necessity be introduced into the first families of the city.

Frau Werl explained her plan and warned Ida by all means to play none of Sebastian Bach's fugues, as that would spoil everything.

"Why should I not do my very best?" said Ida. "I know of nothing which so keeps alive the attention as a fugue. I can only compare the movement of the parts to the everlasting courses of the stars. The strange embellishments so interwoven with each other in the preludes, on the other hand, remind me of the curious mosses and mosaics which I have sometimes seen."

Frau Werl described to the young Bach-enthusiast her own experience of the musical taste of the higher classes, and was in the end fortunate enough to persuade her to practice anew certain of the compositions of Hummel and Carl Maria von Weber, which may very well be said to form the boundary lines between the learned and trivial styles in music. About the hour of tea she went over with Ida. "The company to-day is at the end of the garden under the new tent," said the servant.

"That is also one of the fancies of the Count," said Frau Werl, as they passed down the garden, "to be always laying out new pleasure-grounds; and it must be confessed that he has a good deal of taste."

Ida had never seen so delightful a spot as this, where the elegant and fanciful were well combined. Small fruit and flower gardens, and promenades regularly laid out, had always been her abhorrence,—the wild forest the only place in which she could walk with pleasure. Here, for the first time, the rich poetry of the world of plants, carefully arranged in picturesque groups, met her eye. The snow-white and beautifully proportioned villa was projected against a background of lofty dark green lindens. From the hall on the garden side one stepped into a broad circle of aloes and orange trees in blossom. The park, spreading full a mile on either side of a small brook, extended to the village, which appeared to be a part of the domain.

Ida and her protectress passed along through arcades of clematis and wild vine, by beautiful beds of flowers, fountains and groups of flowering shrubs, to the tent, where a company of gentlemen and ladies were apparently too much engrossed in their light conversation, to heed the modest figures of the approaching strangers. The Count was at the time in a distant part of the garden, doing the honors to another group of his visitors. His sister, who received them, gave the elder lady a place by her side and entered politely into conversation with Ida, but upon the approach of each new carriage was obliged to leave them; and thus they were seldom free from that oppressive feeling—loneliness in a crowd. True, the lady of the house was thoughtful enough to turn to them as often as possible, but all had a claim upon her attention. No others present would condescend to trouble themselves about persons evidently lower in the social scale than the circles in which they moved. Friend talked with friend, and acquaintance with acquaintance, but no one took notice of the two women, who, after half an hour's talk with each other upon the beauty of the scene around them, embraced the first favorable opportunity to retire.

Again in the garden, Ida breathed freely once more, and was upon the point of expressing her determination never to breathe that close and oppressive atmosphere again, when a man, whom she took for the head gardener, hastily crossed a bridge directly before them, without however happening to notice the two women. He wore a cool summer dress of gray stuff and a large straw hat pressed deeply down over his brow.

"What a striking and beautiful face is that!" said Ida, "I thought such were only to be seen in museums of antiquities, not in actual life."

"Oh, that is the Count," said Frau Werl, laughing: "Well he is indeed an antique, if he does dress like a young, romantic painter."

To Ida's utter astonishment she learned that the gentleman, who she supposed had hardly passed his fortieth year, was at least eight-and-fifty. He was one of those rare instances of lasting manly beauty, which even in age can exert a magic influence. Though in youth slender and thin to a remarkable degree, he, as he advanced in years, had gained a fullness of person consistent with great strength, but which never passed beyond the limit of perfect proportion. His profile, with full Roman nose, gracefully rounded lips and slightly protruding chin, was truly majestic. Though deep blue or black eyes usually in age lose somewhat of their lustre, his, of a dark gray, had gained a sort of intellectual clearness, which gave to his glance a quality peculiarly fascinating and irresistible.

"What an immeasurable advantage is a beautiful face," sighed Ida. "I give this man full credit for an appreciation of all that is good and beautiful, simply because he looks so intellectual. — Were I beautiful or had I anything at all imposing in my appearance or manners, surely some one in that circle, which I have just left with such a feeling of oppression, would have spoken to me; as it is, it has occurred to no one, that a soul dwells behind this pale face, in this uninviting form."

Some days later came a friendly invitation to the Werls and their guest to spend a quiet evening with Count Selvar and his family.

"Thank God, it rains," said Frau Werl, "there will be no one there!"

And so it proved. No one came except the married daughter of the Count and her husband. The Bailiff, a jovial old fellow, whose company Selvar highly relished, made the Count acquainted with Ida's situation and wishes, while she was deep in a discussion of the merits of Bellini and Donizetti, with the young Countess. Like most aristocratic ladies, the latter loved these two composers beyond all bounds, considering everything from their pens magnifique, superbe, &c.

Ida on the other hand insisted upon great poverty of idea as characterizing the modern Italian style of composition. She spoke of their ever-recurring insipid melodies, sweet but without character, and equally unfitted for the expression of the highest rapture or the deepest anguish of the soul; of the piling up of instrumentation in passages meant to be forcible, which invariably prove to be affected and ridiculous, and show their nakedness, when parodied ever so slightly; of the monotonous march rhythm; of the harmony, which is always within the circle of two or three keys, as if in a tread mill, and of the utter nothingness of their accompaniments and interludes.

"And yet this music throws all the world into ecstasies," said the Countess: "people hear and sing it with delight day after day, while at an Oratorio by Bach or Handel, they go to sleep from very weariness."

"Whoever can weary of those masters," returned Ida, "to him I give no credit for any artistic sense and feeling. There is perhaps an indolence of thought in many persons of much real natural feeling for music, which entices them to give themselves up with half an ear and half their soul to the mere sensual gratification of a pleasing melody, without stopping to think whether it belong to the true and noble in Art. If you would once take the trouble, Madame Countess, to follow carefully each separate part in one of Bach's Fugues, or to study a Sonata by Beethoven so thoroughly as to feel its infinite depths, you could never again, after such a spiritual delight, turn back to that empty juggle with tones."

The Countess laughed and would like to know, why she should go through with a laborious course of study, when the lighter music, which she understood at once without difficulty, sounded just as pleasantly? "This may all be very well for the learned, who understand what you call counterpoint," added she. "We are contented with a melody, which lies upon the surface and is made no clearer by the bass and the middle parts. Artistic elaboration is only a disadvantage, since it renders the beautiful less apparent. It is certainly a proof of a finer taste, that the Italians compose in a style so elegant and simple."

The Count at this moment hinted that the company would derive more pleasure from music itself than from discussions upon it, and offered Ida his arm to conduct her to the piano-forte. She chose Hummel's fantasia in E, a piece, which stands upon the farthest limit of that territory, which a performer familiar with Sebastian Bach never leaves, and which on the other hand abounds in beauties sufficient to attract even a Bellini fanatic.

Ida's peculiar excellence as a pianist was in the great variety of light and shade, which she threw into her playing. If she occasionally found a rival, who surpassed her in mere mechanical execution, she was inimitable in the interest which she could throw into a piece of music, by the free unfolding of her own individual conception of it; now it seemed like a drama, now like a picture, and yet she never passed the limits of the composer's design. As she became excited, her fingers were winged, her cheeks flushed, her black eyes sparkled.

Selvar watched her closely during her performance and wondered at the change in those features, which had before seemed so ordinary. With great tact, he so worded the usual flatteries paid to a performer, that they seemed more like his opinion soberly addressed to the company, than mere compliments.

"Can your mouth sing like your fingers?" he asked.

"Singing is not my forte," said Ida, "though I delight in songs, whose texts appeal to my feelings; but I can execute them well only when I am alone; in presence of others it seems laying bare the secrets of the heart, to sing with expression.

"That is a very unartist-like feeling. I should not have thought it of you."

After much hesitation, which in her case arose from real modesty, Ida sang in a full, deep contralto voice several beautiful popular songs of various nations, which were new to the company. Selvar was thoroughly charmed; and his natural enthusiasm, not calmed in the least by the lapse of years, led him into expressions of delight, which had their full effect upon the singer. The fire of her soul, hitherto hidden, broke forth in songs, now tender, now joyous, now despondent, now playful, and flash after flash of various sentiment aroused the remains of similar emotions in the heart of her listener. Inexhaustible was her store of, insatiable his appetite for her songs. In time the rest of the company were surfeited. At first they had joined in the desire for more; then withdrew from the cabinet in which the piano-forte stood, into the next room, to chat without disturbing the music. There the lamps were lighted. But the Count forbade lights in the music-room, as a hindrance to the pure influence of song. The moon alone glanced in at the open window, which looked out upon the garden, through the branches of orange trees, and the gentle sounds of the waterfall came lightly dashing, splashing to the ever delicious and magical song of Goethe:

"Füllest wieder Busch und Thal Still mit Nebelglanz." *

Ida at last arose, fearing that Frau Werl might chide her for withdrawing too much from the company. As she passed through the door the Count suddenly seized her hand, pressed it to his heart, called her "a dear, precious friend," and told her in flattering terms, how she had conjured up the most delicious dreams out of the chaos of the past, and that to her voice seemed to be given a magical power over his soul, which he could not explain.

At the supper table Ida was absent-minded and ill at ease. Her thoughts seemed to her too feeble and worthless to be addressed to him. Her wit and humor deserted her, when she looked up into his piercing eyes and beheld them fastened upon her with deep and earnest expression. From her childhood Ida's intercourse had been only with very common-place people, her guardian and music teacher the only exceptions. The young men of her native place were mostly merchant's clerks or were fitting themselves to become agriculturists. As she now called to remembrance the few who had once seemed to her men of higher cultivation, and in whose company she had found pleasure, men whose attentions had even excited some slight emotion in her breast, she felt humbled and ashamed at her want of perception. How graceful was every motion, how calm the deliberate tones of this really cultivated and refined man; with what a strange feeling of reverence was she impressed by his air of native dignity!

And this man of royal presence had pressed her hand to his heart — had called her his dear and precious friend. He felt drawn toward her as she to him; so she at last believed, with feelings of mingled awe and delight. Utterly inexperienced in the arts of dissembling, it did not occur to her to hide her feelings. At home she was taciturn, oftentimes sitting long silent, and looking vacantly towards the white house; but when the Count appeared her face would flush, and her agitation rise to the point of trembling, when he called upon her. Frau Werl soon saw through her and set herself zealously at work to cure her of such an unnatural piece of folly, for such appeared to her the passion of a young girl for a man, who, with whatever profusion of amiable qualities, was fast drawing near to old age.

She told Ida a multitude of love stories, of which he, according to common report, had been the hero, both during the life of the Countess and after her decease, and warned her against attaching too much value to his attentions, and thus exposing herself to ridicule. Her ever recurring topic at their meals, in which the Bailiff joined her, though perhaps less harshly, was, "Selvar is a male coquette, and all the more dangerous because he is himself susceptible. But his passion lasts only until he has made a deep and lasting impression; then, his vanity being satisfied, he is once more just as coldly polite and complimentary as before. And what is there which does not attract him? Beauty, talents, elegance, unaffected simplicity—in short, whatever is remarkable. That which exerts the most lasting influence upon him is a cool, witty, acute understanding. When he is surrounded by companions who do not call out his higher qualities, it is not unusual with him to condescend to pay special attention to talent in a calico dress."

Of all this Ida naturally believed not one word and saw in it only the evidence of some private end on the part of her friends. In fact, the picture was hardly as true as it was well meant. There was heart in that passion for the lofty and intellectual, even down to external graces and accomplishments, which moved Selvar in his intercourse with women. True, there was a spice of vanity with a fashionable disregard to consequences among the motives of his conduct, but this was not all, nor were his engaging qualities mere external show.

Truth about Music and Musicians.

ON MODERN GERMAN OPERA MUSIC.

Translated from the German by SABILLA NOVELLO.

I must now answer you on a subject mentioned in your first letter,—the melancholy fact, that in Germany, at the present epoch, so many operas are written which appear, only to disappear.

Were a statistic register to be laid before us of the prodigious mortality among new-born operas in Germany, we should be seized with piteous horror. Has the musical climate of Germany deteriorated, or do composers but bring forth weaklings into existence?

I must declare myself without reserve, to be of the latter opinion, and will at once indicate to you four causes why no opera can succeed, until these be obviated. The first of these causes is, that many of our present composers, especially the most gifted of them, pay no attention to Schiller's maxim: "He who has satisfied his own times, has lived for all times." They forget or ignore that they should, above everything, write for their contemporaries—they anticipate futurity and hope for fame by creating for posterity, and by establishing a "music of the future" (for the PRESENT!!!). Many of these gentlemen, notwithstanding the intelligence they possess, cannot perceive that they attempt that in which it is impossible they should succeed; for, allowing that a period should arrive, in which operas like theirs might really please, it is evident that they cannot please at present, as we do not exist in futurity, and are not ripe for enjoyments ultimately possible.

We desire not and cannot prevent our composers beatifying posterity with their music, but it were surely expedient that those who compose for "the future" should let their "operas for the future" rest quietly in their desks until rescued thence by posterity; thus they would save themselves the trouble of fretting at the ignorant public "of the present," and save this same public from much weariness. And then, what are the composers to do, who will exist in the future? Shall they, too, write, not for their own times, but for a further future? Or do those gentlemen who rave about the "opera of the future," believe that nothing better than these, their works, can possibly arise! Notwithstanding the large portion of vanity possessed by some, I cannot imagine them capable of such insanity.

A remarkable fact is, that precisely those individuals who dream about the opera as it should be and must be in the future, are always zealous politicians, and constantly use such phrases as: "We should live, heart and hand, for the present time," and "We should well understand the prevalent spirit of the age," &c. They therefore sin doubly,—firstly in acting contrary to their own words, and secondly in not satisfying the musical requirements of their own times. Succeeding ages will take care of themselves, and he who has created a beauteous work will please posterity as well as contemporaries.

A second cause is the want of good opera texts. Earlier opera-composers required less care in the choice of a libretto, because, if the music pleased, a public was very indulgent as to the faults of its text; in later days, an audience is much more exacting on this point, especially since some French poets have produced excellent opera texts. So much is this the case, that success is more likely to attend an opera with good text but indifferent music, than an opera with bad text and good music. Besides the desire for good opera texts, public taste now also expects more from singers, since some of these, such as Wild and Schröder-Devrient, who were distinguished dramatic artists, gave proof that good singing and great acting might well be combined. Formerly, the poor, dear German public suffered any wooden, awkward fellow to succeed on the stage had he but a fine voice; now, however, a composer must consider the acting powers of each singer. Lortzing once refused a capital libretto (Donna Diana), because he believed that no singers could be found who could act it! (See the biography of Düringer.)

These increased pretensions on the part of the public have greatly increased the difficulties of an already onerous task,—that of writing a good opera text,—and this especially to our Germans, who, as a rule, possess more talent for lyric than for dramatic poetry, while the contrary is the case with French authors.

In addition to this want of dramatic talent, most German authors are utterly ignorant of the rules by which a drama should be governed. Therefore, they fantastically write down their pieces; they do not calculate effect with due consideration, without which, no well-organized, developed, and impressive work can be produced.

Even a gigantic genius like Shakespeare might not create a drama without careful calculation, study, and rumination. It would be far more easy to create a piece by intellectual calculation without innate lyrical talent than vice-versa. Examine our dramatic literature, and you will readily find confirmations of this assertion, without my pointing them out by name. The history of literature shows us that all truly great dramatists tested their plots a thousand fold, as great generals have pondered their plans of battle, or great chess-players their stratagems. And lastly, we know that all French dramatic writers zealously study the technicalities of their art, which our authors, with utter misprision of duty, treat with contempt, or even consider a defect.

A third cause is, that our modern German composers give too little consideration, in their operas, to singers, and to the art of song; and, on the contrary, employ a singer only as an instrument,—nay, not even as a solo-instrument, but as a ripieno member of the orchestra. The natural result of this perversity is, that, in the first place, all singers view such operas with displeasure and repugnance, for which they cannot be blamed; why should they undertake the difficult task of learning a long part, when they can foresee that they will receive no acknowledgement from the public in reward of their trouble? Whence should they derive ardor, when an audience sits before them, cold, indifferent, or even disgusted?

The public does not enter a theatre merely for the sake of a composer and his caprices. It requires not only to hear music, or to be entertained by dramatic action; it seeks also the eximious charm which lies in expressive song. Why does the Italian opera hold its place in every country? What was, and is, the irresistible attraction it exerts over the public?

Song, in the first place, and then the comprehensible melodies which the Italians, wisely enough, never disdain.

Our modern German composers, on the contrary, despise singers; they despise the public longing for beautiful, pre-eminent melody, and thus they are justly recompensed when, in their turn, they are despised by the public, and their operas gain no success.

Look through the scores of our masters—Weigl, Winter, Mozart, Weber;—they wrote for singers, and for the public. Reckon the arias, scenas, &c., &c., out of different operas, which are oftentimes executed at concerts, or sung in public and private meetings,—they are the most melodious. Count up the operas which singers perform by preference,—in which they produce their greatest effect,—and which they therefore select as their Star-performance (Gastrollen) characters;—they are those in which song is prevailing,—in which singers may display to advantage their voice and vocal art.

Let all those desist from operatic composition who are incapable of writing such (Gastrollen) parts, or who cannot create a melody which shall find its way to street-organs. Yes, however strange this axiom may sound, I maintain its truth; and this brings me to a fourth cause, perhaps the most important one, why our operas so seldom succeed. Existing German composers have no perception of simple, popular melody: they will not, or cannot create such. And yet, without contradiction, simple melody, completely entrusted to song, should be and ever remain the pre-eminent element of operatic music.

Melody may be constructed, and has been constructed, in three different manners.

1stly.—The declamation of words by a performer may be imitated by heightening and lowering vocal tones,—by retarding or hurrying their progression in conjunction with certain syllables or words,—and by observing the different duration of pauses indicated by punctuation in the text. Melody, constructed on these principles, will be conscientiously adapted to its words, but readily becomes stiff and dry, and, in reality, is only a musical and regularly measured declamation of a poem.

2ndly.—Single syllables, words, or verses, may be less taken into consideration than the sense thereof, and the sentiment expressed through them; the poet is not followed minutely line for line, but the whole musical piece represents the whole poem.

3rdly.—The only aim may be, to caress the ear, little or no importance being attached to words, sense, or character in a piece; the care of rendering such a vocal work expressive and pleasing being incumbent entirely on a singer.

In the first-named manner of forming melody, intellect is conspicuously active.

The third manner is often employed by modern Italians and French,—but no one can wonder that this leads to a display of the most unnatural contradiction and the most outrageous incompatibility; sorrowful, conflicting, or wild passions being portrayed in dance-rhythms: yet these lovely melodies enchant the ear with sweet magic tones, and meet with approval from those who desire melody only,—those who either cannot rightly judge whether music express what, in such circumstances, it should express, or who blind themselves on this point, and merely desire to luxuriate in the rich flow of a tonal stream.

Only the second manner of constructing melody, in which intellect and feeling are active in combination, will always remain the best and most worthy of Art. Mozart, in this, serves as an unsurpassed model; his melodies fulfil all the conditions which may and ought to be exacted, and they please both uninitiated and initiated, for they are at once true, beautiful, and intelligible,—they are to poetry what color is to drawing.

In most of our modern German operas, we too often merely hear a medley of tones, instead of a connected melody; for even when our present composers produce a melody, they seldom give it entirely to the voice-part, but dismember it, and take portions of it out of the singer's mouth, as it were, and entrust these scraps to instruments; besides this, they overcharge a melody with harmony and modulation,—accompany almost every note by a different chord,—modulate into a fresh key in each bar,—and thus, especially if depicting simple sentiments, sin against true expression, destroy artistic unity, and confuse the perceptions of their listeners.

When they really entrust a voice-part with an entire melody, they overwhelm and suffocate it by full accompaniment of instrumental masses, which they construct above or beneath it. We should, with justice, laugh at any painter who should paint sunlight or bright moonlight, and then cover the whole landscape with thick, dark colors; but similar folly is too constantly committed by our modern opera composers; they daub their melodies with thick tone-color until they disappear. It is nothing uncommon for an aria, for instance, which excites little or no effect when performed in its opera, to please when accompanied on the pianoforte. This is easily explained. —the melody is then relieved of its superfluous instrumentation, and gains its appropriate importance.

Furthermore, the moderns construct too small melodies,—unconnected melodious sentences,—undeveloped melody-seeds. A continuous melody of eight bars duration appears to them a too "habitual" creation,—a too clear and simple—abomination. And as to writing a second section, to give symmetry to the whole!—if ever they be visited by melodious inspiration, they quickly shake it from them, in order to plunge again into their scientific hurly-burly. Verily they are infanticides; for no sooner have they been delivered of a melody, than they strangle or smother it. They resemble, not the nightingale, but the stormy petrel, who feels most at ease amidst howling winds and roaring waves.

On this account, they entrust all expression of violent passion to their darling orchestra, which, under their spiritual direction, storms and rages, puffs and blows, roars and surges, until the voice of a singer is completely overpowered and drowned;—we hear him no longer,—we merely see how he desperately strides about the stage, and, like a speaker on the hustings, strainingly endeavors to gain a hearing above the wild noise of assembled multitudes. Singers are now no longer enabled to produce those powerful, exciting and pathetic effects, which the varied human voice is capable of affording in passionate situations. A whole host of horns, trumpets, trombones, drums, kettle-drums, piccolo-flutes, &c., &c., are arrayed in the battle-field against him.

Many of my readers have doubtless heard the great Schröder-Devrient in Fidelio, and remember the prison-scene, in which, while the orchestra remains dead-silent, she thunders forth: "First kill my wife!" Every one who has heard this will feel a thrill at even the recollection of the extraordinary emotion these few words called forth in his soul. Notwithstanding, however, that such convincing facts stand before them, our moderns believe that they forward the "progress" of operatic composition by trying to depict strong passions in their perverse fashion.

In operatic music, passion can only be faithfully and appropriately expressed by the human voice. I will admit that, in order to support or to add to effect, an orchestra may burst forth during the pauses in song, but must subdue its thunders whenever the human voice sings. Unfortunately, no opera composer has thoroughly attended to this law,—not even Mozart, at all times.

I could quote many wondrously beautiful examples, besides the one already mentioned, in which highest passion is expressed by the voice, while orchestral power is subdued; for instance, the song of Simon and his brothers, in the first act of Méhul's Joseph in Egypt,—in which Simon utters his remorse and despair while his brothers endeavor to tranquilize and console him.

In addition to all that I have already adduced, modern opera-composers do not understand how to characterize persons and situations. We generally hear, in new operas, not the personæ of the piece, but the vanity and errors of the composer. For each piece they employ the same instrumentation (almost always the full orchestra), the same rhythms, the same harmonies, &c., &c. A painter who introduces all colors into every picture, and into each part of his picture, is at best a dauber, but no artist. If our moderns would only examine the opera-scores of our great Mozart! In them, each part is different from all others, and individually characteristic,—a self-contained, living impersonation. Let them, above all, study the Zauberflöte, in order to learn the means by which a true musician can elevate each personage into—a character!

OPERA MANAGEMENT IN ITALY.—The London Musical World is publishing a series of articles from its Milan Correspondent on "The Theatres in Italy," from which we take the following:

It is, in the first place, necessary to state that all the engagements for the theatres in Italy are made by a set of men who swarm in the capital cities, and are called agenti teatrali. These "theatrical agents," with few exceptions, are the "footpads" upon the artists' road. With regard to male singers, they sell engagements to the highest bidder in the shape of "commission," independent of fitness or ability, which keeps the poor, and perhaps more talented, singer out of the field. The female artist, it is notorious (and these gentlemen make no secret of the "mysteries" of their profession), too commonly purchases the honor of being on Mr. A. or Mr. B.'s list by sacrifices that shall be nameless.

An Italian impresario is generally a jack-of-all-trades,—now an hotel-keeper, now a pastry-cook, now a bankrupt, now starting up again, and exclaiming, like Tate Wilkinson to Tony Lebrun the actor, "Cus-a-God, Tony, I'm a manager!" Sometimes he is a man of little judgment, but no money; at others with a little money, but no judgment. In the first case, he borrows the "needful" of some friend, who is a "damn'd unconscionable dog," and charges him awful interest, keeping him completely under his thumb; in the second, he is sure to be surrounded by a set of intriguing charlatans connected with the theatre, who, under the pretext of devotion to his interests, swindle him right and left, and when his means are exhausted, shake him off, and call him "asino!" A practice prevails in Italy when an impresario takes a theatre, great or small, of "going round with the hat"—the contributors to the "hat" being for the most part the same persons from season to season. These chiefly consist of respectable tradesmen or persons in the city or town who are fond of music, and form the only intelligent and honest part of the "direction" of the theatre; for as such their contribution entitles them to be considered. They are entitled "Socios." Thus we have Manager No. 1, Mr. Impresario, in his own person; Managers No. 2, the Socios; and Managers No. 3, the "Direction," or, as it is designated in several theatres, "the Noble Direction!" This improper power behind the throne—the more improper because irresponsible—is a fatal stumbling-block in the progress of the lyric art, and highly injurious to the interests of the honorable artists, as well as ruinous to managers. "The Noble Direction" is omnipotent. The operas to be performed, the singers to be engaged, must eventually meet with its high and mighty approval. Its members are the Solons—the Meccenasas (I feel tempted to write the Midases) of the theatres.

And of what materials, you will naturally ask, is this enlightened body composed! In the first place, of such of the aristocracy as hold shares or interest in the theatre; next, of some of the Government officials (the theatres in Italy being under their surveillance); and, lastly, of two or three conceited "dilettanti." The first rarely take an active part, and are to be commended for their good sense; the second are generally passive, except on important occasions; but the last are always thrusting themselves forward, as if to prove that "a little learning is a dangerous thing." The period for the exercise of this despotic power is generally reserved for the gran prova (last rehearsal), when, according to the unwholesome regulations of Italian theatres, the direction may "protest" any of the artists; and against such decision neither manager nor artist has any appeal. Thus, if the manager has engaged a singer who does not how down and worship Mr. Director, or has refused to engage the prima donna of his recommendation (and the "actives" have always some "chère amie" at hand)—no matter the talent of the artist—no matter however satisfied the manager and disinterested judges may be of their ability—the moment for the gratification of vanity, spite, or malevolence has arrived, and the singer is "protested"; the theatre must be closed until another singer is "up" in the part, and if the "protested" artist be a débütante, or even young in the profession, a serious, a fatal, an irrecoverable blow is inflicted. We well know that the ability of judging may exist separately from the power of execution. An amateur may not be an artist, though an artist should always be an amateur; and it therefore behoves the dilettanti to exhibit some show of modesty—some evidence of education—when they take upon themselves to issue fiat against professional artists, the result of which may be to deprive them of their means of support, and to blast their prospects of fame and emolument, for which they have anxiously laboured during years of laborious study.

OPERA IN NEW ORLEANS.—The Picayune of May 16, after alluding to the financial gloom of the past season, thus proceeds to tell how well the French Opera has weathered the storm:

Such was the prestige with which M. Boudousquie opened the Orleans opera season of 1857-8. He will doubtless, long remember it. With the resolution which alone achieves success under such circumstances, he persevered. Further trials fell upon him, through sickness in his company. These, too, he combated. And now, at the close of the season, thanks to the soundness of the basis on which our commerce and financial business stand, to the elasticity of character which is so marked an attribute of our community, and to his judicious management, he is able to look back upon his course and to contemplate its result with decided satisfaction, with far more than he could have reasonably expected at the outset, if not with all that we might wish him.

His company was one of which New Orleans has occasion to be proud. In M^{me} Colson and M^{lle} Bourgeois he presented two artistes of high merit, in both lyric and dramatic phases. Throughout the season they have been admired with enthusiasm, and at its close retire with every mark of appreciation that a generous public has known how to confer upon them. And they have been well supported by a company, a choir, an orchestra, and scenic accessories, fully worthy of them and of the world-wide reputation of the Orleans theatre.

The great variety of operas which have been given during the season is worthy of especial note. What that is excellent has it not comprised? We have had the chefs d'œuvres of all the greatest masters. "La Juive," "Robert le Diable," "Les Huguenots," "Le Trovatore," "La Favorite," "Le Prophète," "Ernani," "Guillaume Tell," "Charles VI.," "Si J'Étais Roi," "Les Mousquetaires," "Les Diamants de la Couronne," "Jaguarita," "La Fille du Regiment," "Les Amours du Diable," "Le Caïd," "Le Tableau Parlant," "L'Italienne en Alger," and others, all given, too, to the complete satisfaction of large and critical audiences.

In addition to these we have had the Frezzolini concerts, which were among the prime features of the season, and the numerous and always well received vaudevilles and other pieces of an excellent company.

For such success as this, M. Boudousquie, it will not be questioned, merits all commendation, and we have pleasure, for our part, in according it to him. The subscribers to the support of his enterprise have been honorably and handsomely considered, and the general public afforded a bounteousness and excellence of entertainment which must have equalled all desires. The result will, of course, be the continuance of that patronage and appreciation of the Orleans theatre which it has ever stood alone in commanding throughout the continent.

M. Boudousquie will soon leave on his usual annual trip to Europe, to secure for next season such artistes as will again charm and edify, inspire and cultivate us.

Music Among the Blind.

We take the following from the Tribune's report of the anniversary exhibition of the New York Institution for the Blind, which took place last week:

"There were about 150 pupils on the stage, of whom about 80 were males. They were arranged on the stage in tiers, the youngest in the back-ground. The young women were, for the most part, attired in white and blue, and presented an appearance of uniformity in costume that was not discoverable on the part of the young men. The band, composed of fifteen blind boys, occupied one corner of the stage, and on one corner was a large pile of brooms, baskets, mats and other utilitarian products of the industry of the pupils of the institution. The teachers, of whom are eleven blind graduates of the school, occupied the front rows. Probably three quarters of the audience were ladies, and many went away, being utterly unable to obtain seats in any part of the house.

The exercises began with an introductory piece by the band. The performances of these musicians, which were interspersed throughout the exercises, were most creditable and excited much laudatory comment in the auditory. The course of musical instruction given, is thorough, and is especially insisted on in the case of all who develop the slightest talent in that direction. It is esteemed by those most familiar with the education of the blind, that the study of music is, of all others, calculated to afford them the purest and most intense gratification.

There is little in its pursuit to remind them of their great misfortunes, and it is not only a great solace to all who make any proficiency in it, but in many cases it has proved a means of obtaining a comfortable livelihood, where special excellence has been attained. So all the pupils study music, and there are now 64 of them under instruction in vocal music, 83 are practising piano-forte music, and the 15 youths before mentioned, who compose the band, have regular instruction in the art of blending the harsh voices of the clarionets, bugles, horns, drums and other curious inventions, into a "concert of sweet sounds." More than $1,400 dollars have been expended during the last twelve months in the Musical department, for salaries of teachers, musical instruments, &c., and the attainment of the scholars, as yesterday shown, are proof unquestionable that the money has been well invested. There were a number of solos, duets and choruses sung by the vocal proficient, admirably and with applause.

From My Diary. No. 8.

MAY 9th. — Reading a German paper over "a' bissel Käs," and a "Seidel," I find an anecdote of which this is the substance:

Scene. Hall of the Gewandhaus at Leipzig.

Dramatis personæ. Excitable gentleman and a very sober, phlegmatic individual.

Occasion. Concert by Clara Schumann.

Excitable gentleman becomes almost beside himself in his rapture, and is "fidgetted" to the extremity of endurance by the phlegmatic individual, who hears Clara S. play piece after piece cold as an icicle.

Ex't Gent. (Who after a splendid performance of a piece by Chopin, can endure it no longer). I say, Sir, do you not like her playing?

Phleg. Ind. Why, yes, I like it very well.

Ex't Gent. Why the devil, then, Sir, don't you applaud?

Phleg. Ind. I—? Applaud? Oh, I am her husband.

Note. (By J. Yellowplush). Phancy that man's pheelinks.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 29, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—We commence to-day a Psalm; The Lord is my Shepherd, for four female voices, by FRANZ SCHUBERT. It will occupy ten pages. Music in three and four parts for soprano and contralto voices is a desideratum, especially in female seminaries; and the want has been too commonly supplied with easy, sentimental trash, for lack of better. Here is a more difficult, but a profoundly beautiful composition, which will reward study; one of the innumerable works left to the world, in all forms,—for church, for orchestra, for the opera, for the piano, &c., besides the hundreds of wonderful songs and ballads by which he is chiefly known, by perhaps the greatest musical genius, after Beethoven, of this century. Schubert died in 1828, before he had attained his thirty-second year!

The Psalm may be sung by one or many voices on each part. It is also available for four men's voices (two tenors and two basses); although it would be better, in that case, to transpose it a half-tone lower. It was so sung at a recent sacred concert by the German "Orpheus," in this city.

Madame Johanna Kinkel.

The interesting tale of musical life, commenced on our first page, will naturally awaken a desire to know something of the author; which will be gratified by perusing the following letter from the translator, in whom the reader will recognize an old friend.

MY DEAR DWIGHT.—In one of the early volumes of 'Dickens's Household Words' there is a sketch of Prof. Kinkel of Bonn, which no doubt many of your subscribers have read. He was Lecturer in the university of that city upon Art in the Middle Ages, and drew, perhaps, larger audiences than any other of the professors. In the spring of 1849 he became compromised in one of the attempted revolutionary movements, went up the Rhine to Baden, joined in the insurrection there, was taken prisoner by the Russians, condemned to hard labor in prison for life, and finally shut up in the prison at Spandau, near Berlin. Charles Schurz, who last fall was republican candidate for the office of Lieut. Governor of Wisconsin, at the risk of his life, succeeded in freeing Kinkel from his confinement and they escaped to England.

When I first went to Germany, in 1849, I resided at Bonn. I reached that city, just after Kinkel's flight to Baden, and very soon after my arrival had the good fortune to become acquainted with his wife, who spoke English well, and who felt a particular interest in all Americans at that period of revolutionary feeling in Europe.

Madame Kinkel is a woman of uncommon powers of mind, energetic, persevering, courageous, of very high culture and full of poetry and love for Art. She was the daughter of the principal—for more than fifty years—of the Gymnasium at Bonn, devoted herself to music, and after a very unfortunate marriage at Cologne, which resulted in a separation and divorce, she returned to her father's house, and devoted herself to teaching the piano-forte as a profession. She was both a very uncommon player, technically considered, and a very thorough musician scientifically.

She was so highly recommended by Mendelssohn in England, that in several cases English families came to Bonn to reside, that the daughters might have the benefit of her instructions.

While living thus very retired and devoting herself to the duties of her profession, Kinkel became professor, and made her acquaintance at a literary club. The acquaintance ripened into friendship, the friendship into love, unconsciously on both sides. The incident which revealed their feelings to themselves and to each other would be laughed at, if introduced in a "Brown paper" as the catastrophe of a story—true, nevertheless.

The professor and the lady were crossing the Rhine one evening, when suddenly a steamboat came sweeping round, and, owing to some mistake or want of care on the part of their oarsman, struck the small boat in which they were and overset it. It was dark, the current of the "rushing Rhine" was very swift at that point, and the chances were nearly all against their rescue. At that moment of imminent peril, they clasped each other, a kiss told all, and they sank. Kinkel was a powerful swimmer, and as they arose to the surface, the small boat happily was within his reach, and they escaped, afterwards to marry and live happily, as the stories have it; and, excepting the three or four years of agony consequent upon the part he took in the attempts at revolution in 1848-9, they have lived so ever since.

The sketch in Household Words pictures their condition during the happy years they spent together in Clemensruhe, — an old palace of the Electors at Cologne, just back of Bonn, now the college of Natural History.

In 1849, after Kinkel's departure to Baden, his wife edited the Bonner Zeitung, a liberal paper, established by her husband, devoted to the interests and elevation of the laboring classes. She is a fine writer, reminding me both in her editorial writings and in her tales and sketches of our Mrs. Child. Her mental characteristics appear to me very similar. At all events, she has labored for the popular cause in Germany as Mrs. Child has, in the cause of the slave here, and I feel in reading the works of both, as I felt in hearing them converse, that the same spirit rules two minds of singular resemblance.

During those happy days at Clemensruhe, Mrs. Kinkel labored energetically in the cause of music. You will find in one of the last volumes of the Leipziger Musikalische Zeitung,—I think that for 1847—a notice of a concert in Bonn, at which a choir of young ladies appeared under her direction, who had been instructed by her.

In the first volume of your Journal of Music there is a humorous sketch translated from a volume of tales and sketches written partly by the Professor, partly by her.

I send you with this, another, which I have long thought worth translating, not so much perhaps for the sake of "the story," which has nothing particularly "thrilling" to recommend it, but because of its exquisitely natural pictures of life in Germany, of its conversations upon musical topics, and of the great amount of matter drawn from the authoress's own experience.

In all that relates to the piano-forte Mrs. Kinkel has a right to speak with authority. When her husband was in Berlin, as member of the national parliament, she was invited to give a concert, which she did with extraordinary success, and was recognized in that musical capital as one of the great female pianists. Subsequent events, however, of a political nature destroyed her prospects at home, at the same time drawing her attention from Art.

My greatest treat, during my stay in Bonn, in 1849, was listening to her performance of Beethoven's Sonatas. It was my first introduction to them as played by an adequate performer, and I felt then how few there are, who can join to their mere execution that high poetic conception of the soul within them, which makes them speak to the listener as no other music does. She asked me one day if there was any particular Sonata which I should choose to hear. I mentioned one—I forget which now—and her reply made a great impression upon me.

"So far as the mere execution of the score goes," said she, in substance, "I can play it; but for some time past I have been studying the Sonatas in order, and searching out their hidden meaning, their peculiarities of thought and expression, and have not yet come to that one. I should prefer therefore to play an earlier one,—one of those of which I have gained this kind of mastery."

Of all the women, whom I have heard play, she approaches nearest to Clara Schumann, in power and delicacy of touch, and in the faculty of making Beethoven talk to us through his works. Chopin, too, she plays exquisitely.

Soon after her husband's escape to England, she joined him with her beautiful children, where I saw them all apparently as happy as exiles can well be.

Her position in society has not been one to demand or allow of her becoming known as a public performer; though doubtless she might have made a name. She has published several compositions, but her mind was too much occupied with other things during the period of the revolutionary troubles, to allow her at that time to devote herself to art. Whether since her residence in England she has added to the list of her works, I am not informed.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club have happily secured Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZE for their leading violinist, in place of AUGUST FRIES, who is to sail for Europe in the Hamburg steamer from New York, on Tuesday next. Mr. Fries will pass a month or so in his native town in Holstein, before taking up his residence in Bergen, Norway. We had the somewhat melancholy pleasure of listening to the feeling tones of his violin, perhaps for the last time, a few evenings since, with a small farewell party of music-lovers, at a friend's house. The glorious old Quintet by Beethoven (in C), a Quartet by Mozart, and one of the Mendelssohn Trios (our host assisting as pianist), were played with an unction which the Club has rarely surpassed, and which only deepened the regret at losing August Fries. All will rejoice, however, that the Quintette Club will still hold together, and that so fine and gentlemanly an artist as Mr. Schultze is found to fill the place of leader. It certainly is a rare thing, and a pleasant one, at least in this country, for even so small a company of musicians to keep together for nine years. May the harmonious union still survive for nine times nine! Our list of classical works performed in Boston by this Club will be forthcoming, probably, next week.

We could not attend CARL GAERTNER's farewell concert, which drew, we understand, about six hundred people to the Music Hall. Mr. Gaertner played the first movement of Beethoven's violin Concerto, and Mr. HAUSE the first movement of the piano-forte Concerto in A, by Hummel. . . . The great festival of Pentecost was kept in the Catholic churches of this city last Sunday (Whitsunday). At the Cathedral in Franklin Street, Pontifical High Mass was celebrated by the Bishop of the Diocese. Haydn's first Mass, with orchestra, was finely executed by the cathedral choir, under the direction of Mr. Werner; also Cherubini's soprano solo, Ave Maria, and Neukomm's Veni Sancte Spiritus, in the intervals of the mass.

There are no sounds of music from New York; the concerts are over, and the operatic singing birds have flown away in all directions, or are silent. No more portentous Ullman manifestos in the newspapers; the Musard announcements have grown shorter and shorter—beautifully less by degrees—till they have ceased altogether. The rumor was that Musard was to be transplanted this week to Philadelphia. But what more encouragement there? The splendid and much talked of Academy of Music has come to a still stand; the opera has failed; the manager (Mr. Marshall) has resigned, and the only comfort of the chagrined enthusiasts, who were proclaiming Philadelphia the lyric centre of the world, lies in the fact that the same black cloud has settled down upon New York. . . . Herr FORMES sang in New York last week, at a Matinée Musicale, for the inauguration of the Nursery and Child's Hospital on Fifty-first street. . . . Signorina FELICITA VESTVALI has been singing in New Orleans. . . . THALBERG, VIEUXTEMPS, JULIANA MAY, and Mme. CARADORI gave concerts last week in Cleveland and Pittsburgh, and with Mme. D'ANGRI in Cincinnati.

There is a paragraph going the rounds about Beethoven's song, Adelaide, to the effect that this composition was saved for posterity by Herr Barth. singer in the Imperial Chapel. He chanced to call, one day, on Beethoven, and the latter gave him a paper, saying, "There, I wrote that to-day; there happens to be a fire in the stove, and in it shall go." Barth read the composition, and afterwards tried it over. Beethoven listened attentively, and then observed, "My dear old fellow, we will not burn it."

Our ever cheerful and obliging townsman, Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, late of the "Musical Exchange," who has been spending a season in Smyrna for his health, arrived home a few days since. His many friends will rejoice to learn that the change of climate has been beneficial and that he is confident of his recovery. . . . The New York "Mendelssohn Union" announce their third concert, for next Thursday evening at their Hall in the Cooper Institute. They will perform Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm: "Come, let us sing," and Rossini's Stabat Mater; the solos by members of the Society, to wit: Mrs. A. C. Crump, Miss M. E. Hawley, Mr. Perring, Mr. Werneke and Mr. H. Frost; pianist, Mr. H. Berge; and Conductor, Mr. G. W. Morgan, the distinguished organist.

A young American, who has been for some time enjoying the musical instructions of Prof. DEHN, of the Royal Library in Berlin, (to whose memory so warm a tribute was paid last week by our "Diarist,") sends us the following particulars of his decease:

"Prof. Dehn died on the 14th of April. He was fifty-eight years of age and in the full force of life; his death was most unexpected, the cause being apoplexy. The funeral took place on the 16th, and was attended by a large number of his friends and pupils. As the coffin was let down into the grave, two Chorals were sung by a fine choir, one by Bach: Jesus meine Zuversicht, and the other by Mendelssohn: Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath (here known as "The parting hour.") He is sincerely mourned by all who knew him, and his loss will be severely felt in the musical world, more especially by the musicians of Berlin; as he was a theorist of the sharpest insight, familiar with most of the music of all ages and all composers, and always ready with his advice to all who sought it."

The war against hand-organs which agitated our last Massachusetts Legislature, finds an echo in the British Parliament. Lord Westmeath has brought in a bill to punish any person "who shall within the limits of the Metropolitan Police District, or within the City of London, or the Liberties thereof, sound or play upon, or cause to be played upon, any barrel organ or hand organ, or any musical instrument whatsoever, in any thoroughfare, square, street, alley, arcade, or mews; but an exception is made in favor of bands in the service of the Sovereign."

It will be good news to the sons and friends of Harvard University, that a fine large Organ for the new Chapel has been contracted for, to be built in the most durable and thorough manner, by Messrs. Simmons & Willecox, of this city. The appropriation was liberal; but the Treasurer of the College, in giving the order, has exceeded it considerably upon his own responsibility, from a laudable desire to have the thing done as it should be. . . . Mr. CARL GAERTNER is soon to give a concert in Bangor, Me.

The Triennial Musical Festival at Birmingham, comes round this year. It will commence on Tuesday evening, Aug. 31, with Mendelssohn's "Elijah," written expressly for the Birmingham Festival of 1846. On Wednesday morning will be given M. Costa's oratorio of "Eli," written expressly for the last great festival. On Thursday, as usual the "Messiah," and on Friday morning, Henry Leslie's new oratorio, "Judith," composed for this occasion, will be brought out, under his own auspices. As this is only a short oratorio, the same morning will be occupied with Beethoven's grand "Mass" in C, and Mendelssohn's cantata, "Laude Sion." At the evening concert, in addition to the finest symphonies and overtures by the greatest masters there will be various novelties introduced, including Costa's new cantata, written on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal. Handel's serenata, "Acis and Galatea," with additional band parts, and re-arranged by M. Costa, will form a prominent feature of one of the evening concerts. The principal vocalists engaged, or likely to be engaged, are: Mme. C. Novello, Mme. Rudersoff, Mme. Caradori Allan, Mme. Viardot Garcia, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Giuglini, Herr Formes, Mr. Weiss, and Signor Belletti. Mr. Stimson will preside at the organ, and Signor Costa will conduct.

HEN MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The "great event" in expectation in the first week of this month was the wonderful novelty of Verdi's Trovatore, with Mlle. TITIENS (Titians, the English spell it) as Leonora, and ALBONI as Azucena. The German prima donna does not disappoint, as she goes on; witness the Times of May 2:

Each repetition of "The Huguenots" has strengthened and confirmed the opinions of the sanguine and the wavering, with regard to the exalted position in which Mlle. Titians is placed by her triumphant début amongst us. The more the extent of her powers and the really sterling quality of her claims upon general admiration are observed and acknowledged, the deeper becomes the impression that we have no mere ephemeral favorite of the hour to speak of, but one, who, year after year, will maintain that high rank among her sister vocalists that will compel her supremacy to be recognized, and who, with successive representations, will win new laurels from a public ever ready to do homage to a legitimate successor—happily, Art spurns all salic laws—to the throne belonging to the queen of song. There is no fear of her powers soon fading, for, as the novel-writers say when they take the census of their heroines, four-and-twenty summers only have passed over her head, and, already, with youth and freshness on her side, she has started on her career of fame. At once she has shot upwards to a sphere, where she shines a star of the first magnitude, and where her rays may be looked for through the telescope of futurity, to brighten many a night with scintillations of undiminished brilliancy. It is something pleasant to find, season after season, our early intimacy with a vocalist growing up into a sort of friendship across the footlights, which yields at every recurrence of our meeting a warmer and still more genial gratification. Just such a pleasure we look to Madlle. Titians to afford us for many enjoyable years to come, and as a particular favor—asked on behalf of the public at large—would only request that the intervals between the departures and the arrivals may be made as brief as possible. It would be injustice to Signor Giuglini, to omit acknowledgment of the manner in which, by his performance of Raoul, he has so ably seconded the exertions of the lady. His energy and passion are not confined merely to the vocal utterances of the character; but are entitled to be praised for their exposition histrionically. Were Meyerbeer himself to be the arbiter of the amount of credit to be awarded to the management, for the way in which this grand lyric tragedy has been brought forward, we have no fear of Mr. Lumley being dissatisfied with his decision.

The same critic says of the succeeding opera:

Since our last, Donizetti's pretty and popular opera of "La Figlia del Reggimento" has been played, with the vivacious PICCOLOMINI as the heroine, Maria, and her fresh and sparkling style is far better displayed in this than in the rôle of Norma, in which she made her début for the season. The vivandière has only had in Jenny Lind, a representative that could be compared with her. Signor BELLETTI sang the music of Sulpizio with marked character and expression, and the TONIO of Signor BELANT was a very commendable performance. He is steadily working his way into high favor.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The third concert was given on Friday evening, last week. On this occasion Mr. Benedict dispensed with an orchestra, but commenced, nevertheless, with Mendelssohn's Otello, very finely executed by eight accomplished players, with Mr. H. Blagrove leading, but not heard as distinctly as might have been desired by the admirers of Mendelssohn. The choir was assisted by the Vocal Union, and sang several glees and part-songs, among which the most favorably received was Mr. Benedict's Wreath, a most graceful and effective composition. Madame Castellan, Mlle. Finoli, Miss Messent, and Mr. Tennant were the vocalists.

The novelty of the evening was the violin performance of Mlle. Gabriele Wendheim, a young lady, who, whatever may be her capabilities, is ill-advised to exhibit them in public at present, since, in the mechanical part of her art, she has almost everything to learn.—Musical World, May 8.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The performance of Mendelssohn's music to Athalie, and Rossini's Stabat Mater, in conjunction, attracted one of the largest audiences we have seen at Exeter Hall. These two works together, so different in style and yet both so masterly, now constitute one of the most attractive entertainments of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The performance of Athalie on Wednesday evening was not perfect, though occasionally very grand—the overture and march of the Levites, for instance, being magnificently played. The solo singers were Madame Clara Novello, Miss F. Rowland, and Miss Dolby. In the Stabat Mater, the principal singers were, Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss. Mr. Reeves, in obedience to the vociferous demand of the audience, was compelled to repeat the air, "Cujus Animam," which he sang superbly. Generally speaking, the execution of Rossini's work left as much to be desired as that of Mendelssohn's.—Ibid.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The second concert, was chiefly interesting from its introducing Herr Joachim to a London audience after an absence of several years. When last amongst us he was quite a youth, and was then a most extraordinary executant. He has since labored diligently and earnestly, and now possesses a breadth of style, and a facility in the accomplishment of the greatest difficulties, which place him in the first rank of violinists. His performance of Beethoven's concerto on this occasion was a marvellous treat. His other piece, Tartini's Sonata in G minor, was an exhibition less artistic than extraordinary. The "Trillo" movement is stated to have been "communicated" to the composer by Scheitaa (Auld Hornie) in a dream, and it is therefore called the "Trillo del Diavolo."

The symphonies were Mendelssohn's Italian (composed for this society) and Beethoven's Pastoral, and they were most worthily rendered. The vocal music: was by Madame Castellan and Signor Belletti. The lady sang out of tune, as is now customary with her. The gentleman sang well and delightfully, as is his wont.—Mus. Gazette, May 1.

NEW PHILHARMONIC.—The second concert took place on Monday evening, in St. James's Hall. The programme was a good one, and not the less interesting from the fact of the first part being entirely devoted to Mozart, after the example set by M. Julien.

Overture, "Zauberflöte," Mozart.
Aria, "Parto mio ben," Miss Louisa Pyne; Mozart.
Concerto, in D major (No. 20) piano-forte, Signor Andreoli; Mozart.
Aria, "Vedrai carino," Miss Louisa Pyne; Mozart.
Symphony in E flat; Mozart.

Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven.
Air, with variations, "Sul margine d'un rio," Madame Lemmens Sherrington; Mozart.
Solo, piano-forte, Signor Andreoli.
Scena, "Preddi per me," Madame Lemmens Sherrington; De Beriot.
Overture, (Ruler of the Spirits) Weber.
Conductor—Dr. Wylde.

ELLA'S MUSICAL UNION.—The following was the programme of the second Matinée at St. James's Hall:

Quartet, D minor; Mozart.
Duet, B flat, Op. 45, piano-forte and violoncello; Mendelssohn.
Quintet, C major, Op. 29; Beethoven.
Song, "Des Schäfers Lied," with piano-forte and violoncello accompaniment; Meyerbeer.
Solo, violin. Chaconne; Bach.
Song, "Morgengruss;" Mendelssohn.
Solo, piano-forte; Fumagalli.
The executants were Herr Joachim, Herr Goffrie, Messrs. H. and R. Blagrove, Signor Piatti, Signor Andreoli, Herr Reichardt, and Herr W. Ganz.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Concert of the 17th ult., presented no very peculiar feature, if we may except a freak on the part of Madame Borchardt, who positively sat down at the piano-forte and accompanied herself in Mozart's "Non temer." With a good orchestra and conductor at hand, this was a piece of actual impertinence. The Symphony was Mozart's Jupiter, which was very well played, and the overtures were Demetrius (Cusius) and Mendelssohn's brilliant Ruy Blas. Mr. Cusius played Hummel's Rétour à Londres and Kullak's Perles d'Ecume, and Mr. George Perren sang Verdi's "Ah si ben mio," and "In this old chair."

After the concert Mr. James Coward performed a selection of music on the large organ.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD'S CONCERTS.—The enthusiasm of the London critics about this lady's playing of classical piano music does not in the least abate. The programme of her second soirée was remarkable for its historic interest, as follows:

Sonata duo in A, piano-forte and violoncello (Op. 32); W. S. Bennett.

Grand sonata in F, piano-forte, "Ne Plus Ultra;" Woelfl.

Preludia con fuga in A minor, piano-forte, à la Tarantella (by desire); J. S. Bach.

Grand sonata in A flat, piano-forte, "Plus Ultra" (Op. 71) Dussek.

Grand quartet in B minor, piano-forte, violin, viola, and violoncello; Mendelssohn.

The Musical Gazette (May 1) says of this concert:

The executants were Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, and Signor Piatti,—artists of different countries, yet affording a remarkable instance, by their magnificent playing, of the universality of the language of music. Their performance of Mendelssohn's quartet was exceedingly brilliant, and Dr. Bennett's duo was a great treat. The last movement of this sonata is a very fine specimen of writing, and is wonderfully effective. Of Miss Goddard's solos we preferred the sonata of Woelfl. Our preference was given on musical grounds; in point of execution it would be difficult to find anything approaching a fault with this extraordinary pianist, though we adhere to the opinion we had more than once expressed with regard to the excessive speed at which she takes many movements.

The sonata of Woelfl, pompously styled, "Ne plus ultra," under the idea that the extreme of difficulty had been reached, is remarkably beautiful. The difficulties—amongst which may be specified some desperately uncomfortable passages in thirds for both hands—though they in all probability occupy plenty of attention on the part of the executant, do not impress the auditor to so great an extent as might be imagined, the music being of the highest order. There is a breadth, dignity, and clearness about the allegro moderato (the second movement) that entitles it to a place amongst the greatest works of its class. The variations on "Life let us cherish," with which the sonata concludes, are not uniformly interesting, and one or two might be excised with advantage, but some of them are very elegantly written, and they are invariably musical, in spite of the technical difficulties with which they are made to bristle. A variation in the minor (arpeggios distributed between the hands) and an octave variation were splendidly played, and met with the most hearty applause. The former was a singular display of equality of touch, and the latter a remarkable exhibition of power and elasticity of wrist.

Dussek's sonata is, on the whole, not so calculated to please. Consummate musicianship is evident in the first two movements, but the remaining twain far surpass them in distinctness of theme and clearness of treatment. As to the title, or nickname, "Plus ultra," given to it by Dussek's publisher, simply because it was considered more difficult than Woelfl's "Ne plus," we deem it great nonsense. It reminds us of the opposition cobbler, who, seeing "Mens conscia recti" inscribed upon his rival's shop front, forthwith employed a painter to indicate that at his establishment both "Mens and womens conscia recti" could be obtained by a liberal and discerning public.

At the third (and last) soirée, Miss Goddard is to play Beethoven's op. 106. Talk of "Ne plus ultras!"

LEIPZIG.—The Gewandhaus Concerts of the season past furnish a rich list of artists and of works performed. Twenty-one Symphonies have been played, including 7 by Beethoven; 8 by Schumann; 2 each by Gade, Haydn, and Mozart; one each by Mendelssohn, Rietz, Schubert, Rubinstein, Würst. Of Overtures we find twenty-nine, viz.: 7 by Beethoven; 5 by Mendelssohn; 3 each by Cherubini and Weber; 2 each by Mozart, Reinecke and Rietz; 1 each by Bennett, Ehlert, Händel, Schumann, Spontini. To these add an orchestral work called "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," op. 52, by Schumann; the Scherze and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-Night's Dream;" and the following grand choral performances: the 95th Psalm by Mendelssohn; Finale from Loreley, and chorus: Verleih uns Frieden, by the same; the 137th Psalm, by Richter; Solos and Choruses from the "Messiah;" the oratorio "Jephtha and his Daughter," by Reintaler; Introduction and Finale from first act of Wagner's Lohengrin; Nachtgesang im Walde (night song in the forest), for men's voices, with accompaniment of four horns, by Schubert; Scene with chorus and aria from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice;" and the NINTH SYMPHONY OF BEETHOVEN.

The list includes seven new compositions performed for the first time, viz.: Reintaler's Oratorio, Jephtha und seine Toch- ter; Symphony, No. 6, in G minor, by Gade; Symphony in F minor, by Rubinstein; Symphony in D minor, by R. Würst; "Hafiz" Overture, by Louis Ehlert; Overture to the tragedy Sophonisbe, by Reimicke; 137th Psalm, by Richter.

Among the vocalists who have appeared are found the names of Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt, Pauline Viardot Garcia, Emilie Kroll from Dresden, Rosa Mandl, Jenny Meyer from Berlin, Ida Krüger from Schwerin, Marie Carl from Gotha, Caroline Lehmann from Copenhagen, Malvine Strahl and Francisca Würst from Berlin; Herr Krause from Berlin, Behr of Leipzig, Otto and Sabbath from the Domchor in Berlin.

In seven concerts there have been Piano-forte performances; Violin do. in eight concerts; Violoncello do. in four; and Clarinet, Oboe and Opheicled in one each. The following instrumental artists have appeared: Hans von Bülow, Louis Brassin, Otto Goldschmidt, E. Pauer, Fred. Breunung, Alfred Jaell, Fred. Laub, Fräulein Bordeny, Joseph Joachim, Antonio Bazzini, G. Haubold, Leop. Damrosch, R. Dreyschock, F. David, Alfred Piatti, F. Grützmacher, B. Landgraf, F. Diethe, V. Colosanti (Opheicledist). The "Singakademie," the "Pauliner Gesangverein" and the "Thomaner Chor," have united their forces to give effect to the choral performances.

The many friends of Herr Robert B. Papperitz, one of the professors in the Leipzig Conservatorium, will be pleased to know that the University of Jena has lately conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Mme. Viardot Garcia (Malibran's sister) seems to have excited as much enthusiasm in Leipzig as she did in Cologne. She has been singing at the Stadt Theatre in Il Barbiere, Le Prophète, La Sonnambula, Norma and Don Juan. The Theatre is always full at double prices. The Allgemeine Theater-Chronik says of her: "All that we can possibly imagine in the Art of singing, united with the highest intelligence, and the most poetic sentiment, can alone produce a Rosina like that of this celebrated and everywhere popular artist," and uses equally superlative language about her Fides.

COLOGNE.—The thirty-sixth Lower Rhenish Musical Festival was to be held here on Whit-Sunday and the two following days. The principal singers were Mmes. Krall and Jenny Meyer, Herren Schneider and Stepan. Sig. Sivori, Herreu Ferdinand Hiller, Franck and Breunung were to appear at the third, or Artists' Concert.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 25.—Ullman has been observed, within the past few days, threading the streets of this city, noiselessly, even as the serpent glides among the blades of grass in a country clover patch. Simultaneous with the advent of this wandering Jew, there have been perceptible in the ponderous bulk windows of certain hatters, Musard caps,—frightful slouches, which are offered to snobs at the very low price of 37½ cents. Thus Musard seems to be semi-officially announced. He comes without doubt, as usually, to make good in the Quaker City, the losses sustained in the soi-disant metropolis. Delusive expectation! We are not famous for a patronage of empiricism here, even though at times we good-naturedly resuscitate the fortunes of opera companies.

GAZZANIGA has sailed for Europe in order to fulfil a lucrative engagement in Madrid. She has borne with her the everlasting regrets of, and numerous substantial mementos from the young men in striped opera caps and lustrous patent leathers, who were wont to patronize the flower vendors liberally for her sake, who voted her "weally chawming" in Linda, and who now sigh pensively as they contemplate the hard marble features of her bust, which, by the way, might be taken for Juno, Calliope, Lucy Stone, or any other remarkable feminine,—so little does it liken unto the adored Gazzaniga.

One of our critics, he of the Pennsylvanian, a Lecompton, administration journal in this vicinity, has undertaken to pen an analytical critique upon the merits and demerits of this popular cantatrice, alleging that the interests of Art now demand that candid expression of opinion, which, if broached during her reign at the Opera House, would have constituted an act of ungallantry to her sex, and a positive detriment to her interests. He then "pitches" into medias res without further ado; but manages to be fog and cloud his article to such an extent with technical terms, that not six, forsooth, of the great unwashed, under-rified Democracy, who read that journal, would comprehend five lines of his critique.

Such words as portamento, messa, canto spianato, &c., must prove more unintelligible than Choctaw to that class of men, whose rarest accomplishment perhaps is a lusty cheer for President Buchanan.

The erudite critic of the Pennsylvanian in reality desires to depreciate Madame Gazzaniga in every particular, denying her even aught of sympathetic quality in voice,—the very feature upon which all other reviewers, and their followers, seemed unanimous, and which infused additional warmth into her impassioned style of acting. This is very wrong! Mme. Gazzaniga is probably the best Italian actress upon the lyric boards; and her voice, fresh, pure, flexible, and sufficiently powerful, has been unequalled in this country for its power of producing striking dramatic effects. The Pennsylvanian however was correct in rating her vocalization at an inferior standard.

Alexander Henry, our recently elected Mayor, has indignantly stamped his foot upon certain Sacred Concerts, which have for some time been in progress at the City Museum, a minor Theatre in Callowhill Street. These entertainments were in fact German theatricals, in which light farces, vaudevilles, operatic trifles, &c., were ingeniously sandwiched between oratorio choruses.

For a long time no obstacles were interposed to these irreverent proceedings; democratic officials wink in a singularly amiable and indulgent manner, when an immense array of votes may be jeopardized by a contrary course of action.

Presto! change; a new city government takes the reins, and the Germans find themselves doomed to chew the end of bitter disappointment, and to waste terrible anathemas over an imaginary infringement of their rights.

It remains to be seen, whether, as in the reign of Judge Conrad, the curbstone opera will also be abolished. I allude to the Italian Organ Grinder and his profession; for these, too, seem to flourish most successfully under democratic rule. Let the olive-complexioned interpreter of music to the million, and his monkey, take heed! Yesterday (Whitmonday) was a grand holiday with the Germans, who enjoyed it, as they alone are able, at Lemon Hill, with dances, gymnastics, and music, of course. Some of the Societies performed the second act of "L'Elisir d'Amore" under the branches of the noble oaks, which grace the banks of our romantic Schuylkill. Rivers of Lager Beer flowed upon this occasion; and the fun continued unabated unto a late hour. Doubtless, many of the participants, when they reached their domicils and thought of the labor and toil of the morrow, felt impelled to exclaim, "Sie transit gloria Monday."

MANRICO.

BERLIN, APRIL 30.—We live here now upon tradition. Of new things there is very little that is good or interesting; and that little our Court theatre keeps back from us. We might utterly despair, did not our Royal Kapellmeisters treat us regularly every season to a new Kapellmeister opera. We live here simply and solely still upon tradition; i. e. our old classical (and frequently unclassical) operas celebrate upon our stage the jubilees of their two or three hundredth performance—operas long since forgotten, often actually grown obsolete. Operas are hunted up, and our burning thirst is allayed by the narratives of our grey old reviewers, telling us how finely all these operas were presented in those days. This may be called living upon other people's recollections.

Even our performances of Chamber music grow continually more traditional and frosty, except that once in a while one of the heaven-storming "musicians of the Future," (represented here by HANS VON BUELOW, &c.,) hurls at our heads conceptions of Bach and Beethoven, such as cut short all desire for a repetition with the few minds that have kept themselves still pure and unsophisticated. Moreover concert-giving in Berlin, with but rare exceptions, has become a dear satisfaction. Only the very fewest undertakers cover their expenses; but whoever among them conceives the desperate idea of giving music with an orchestra, may sink deeper and deeper into debt year after year. At any rate I warn every one against the undertaking, who is not backed by one of the authorities; for amid the flood of charity concerts only those pay, which are given for a patriotic object; in such cases the police helps to dispose of tickets, and not a few take tickets simply that they may be thought patriotic. Never was this decline of our noble Art more sensibly felt than during this past winter of commercial panic. The shock was violent and universal. Whatever stood not on a firm foundation fell,—artistic no less than commercial enterprises—and much that was truly good withal, even before it had time to develop itself; for instance several musical schools, scarce founded, many singing societies, and so forth.

The last operatic representation of the past year was Cherubini's Wasserträger (Les Deux Journées), which since the year 1800 has remained the ornament of every opera repertoire. For the first time Frl. WIPPERN sang the Countess; the first Terzet was a model of purity and correctness; for the delivery of recitative and of impassioned passages this young and talented lady must moderate her exertion, if she would not impair the beauty of her fresh, natural, sonorous voice. Herr WOLFF was new in the part of Anton, which he gave very satisfactorily; and Frl. BALDAMUS, who appeared upon the stage for the first time, as the bridesmaid, showed a fine voice, as well as great timidity, in her little solo.

In Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, Frl. BAUR appeared as Alice in the place of Frl. Wippern. She executed her task with great certainty, like one accustomed to the stage, although the co-operation of the whole upper part of her body, the rocking and coquetting of her head, had an ungraceful and disturbing effect.

Frl. Wippern, on the contrary, affords the charm of womanly modesty and a wonderfully beautiful, sonorous voice, with an indescribable charm in the highest register. In the second act Isabella (Fran HERRENBURG-TUCZER) reigned almost exclusively. The embellishments flowed easily and naturally, the staccati light and bright, the trills as if from the throat of a nightingale. The agreeable impression was enhanced still more by the graceful bearing and movement of the singer. Herr HOFFMANN as Robert vividly reminded us of the necessity of engaging a tenor; he seems unable to cure himself of the habit of singing out of tune, by which the artistic Terzet a capella was disturbed. Herr SALOMON sang Bertram finely all through, only not quite demouiacal enough. The piece was mounted with right royal splendor. In the "Huguenots" the deficiencies of mise en scène were very prominent in the charming second act. Frau KOESTER began her triumphs as Valentine with the duet of the third act; Herr FORMES (Theodore) shared them with her; more moderation in the use of his fine vocal powers cannot be too often recommended to him. Herr RADWANE was highly clever in the part of Nevers, while Herr BOST fell far short of previous performances by Herr FRICKE.

The marriage of Prince Frederic William was celebrated by a festival prologue, a people's hymn, and Weber's Euryanthe. The performance of this noble work was pervaded by a truly festal unction; only disturbed by one passing dissonance caused by the wrong entrance of a trumpet on the stage. We prize this opera very highly, and its significant dramatic worth will rise in contrast with the so-called Zukunft's works ("music of the future") which lean more or less upon this. Its defects spring directly from Weber's plan of making all dramatically effective by every means, however extraordinary, that come to hand; to such means of effect he has sacrificed somewhat of his spontaneous feeling in some parts of this work. And these very parts are the most edifying and beautiful, when his originality breaks through in spite of all. Almost too great care is lavished upon tone-paintings; yet the woods are lovelier and greener in the Freysschütz, and love is tenderer and more fragrant in Oberon. Euryanthe herself stands out most beautiful as the darling figure of the composer; yet the other persons possess each a characteristic interest. The not very grateful part of Eglantine found in JOHANNA WAGNER, so long as she had not to wage a fruitless struggle with the highest register of the voice, a masterly dramatic impersonation, which was recognized with storms of applause. Frau KOESTER touched all by her sincerity and naturalness. Points of true lustre were her two arias, as well as the duet, in which, however, simple directness of feeling is sacrificed to effect. FORMES (THEO.) and KRAUSE were knightly figures. The latter was remarkably good in the great solo scene of Lysart. The royal Kapelle played with fire; the beauty of the bassoons, flutes and horns being especially noticeable.

Mozart's ever young opera, Belmont and Costanza (the "Seraglio"), was brought out, newly studied, after being withdrawn for fourteen years. A strangely settled popular belief regards this as the first opera of the master, whereas it is his fourteenth; but there is a naïve truth of feeling at the bottom of this belief; for as the preceding works were but experiments of a genial mental process working itself clear; as even in the earlier Idomeneo the objects of the Mozartean art stand unbound by any inward necessity, and the power of science is in conflict with free feeling, so in Belmont the most inspiring youthful freshness reigns decidedly, even although the desire to show a masterly dexterity in form occasionally, in his youthful exuberance, extends the quartet and the great aria of Costanza beyond measure. Since Mozart's genius first attained to perfect ripeness in this opera, so that he was capable of following it up with a Figaro and Don Juan, we may justly call it his first opera. And in fact we have mingled here a wonderful gift of dramatic comprehension with characteristic declamation; and it is interesting to follow Mozart's struggle to get free from the traditional, without ever quite succeeding. Yet the work still shines in the fullest luxuriance of youthful power, like the creation of a tender youthful feeling, such as an artist produces only once; and Weber is right when he says: "Of operas like Figaro and Don Juan the world was justified in expecting several from Mozart; but an Entführung aus dem Serail he could not with the best will write again." We have been too long accustomed to regard a first performance only as a general rehearsal, not to pardon the waverings of singers, choruses and orchestra. Our veteran singing master, ZIESCHKE, as Osmin, reminded us of earlier grand epochs and received well-deserved storms of applause. Herr WOLFF's comic humor predominates too much over his singing, whereby the splendid Moorish Romanza of Pedrillo suffered particularly. The high range of the female parts lay unfortunately beyond the compass of Mme. Koester and Frl. BAUR, and constrained them to the shrillest and most unpleasant exertions.

Auber's Fra Diavolo was produced here before a full house. The youthfully fresh work is executed with delicate strokes; all is fully rounded off, enclosed in characteristic national traits of a wild robber life. In the overture the trumpet solo wanted purity and finish, and we strangely missed the always effective tongued passages so finely executed by every military trumpeter. The introduction flowed by tamely, and the following numbers were without effect, and the curtain would have fallen mournfully upon the first act, had not the Kapelle kindled up in the finale. But we were compensated by the second act, thanks to the distinguished performance of Frau HERRENBURG-TUCZER. There was something really touching in the naïveté and innocence of the scene in Zerlina's chamber. And finally Herr FORMES warmed up and sang his last air admirably, although quite after the model of Roger. Herr KRUEGER, also, won applause by his finely sung romanza, and the scenically fine concluding act came to a satisfactory end.

More next week.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

- Lisella. Song. Italian and English words. Florino. 25
Mary Dolan. Ballad. McNaughton. 25
Simple and pleasing, with a merry, laughing tune to it, that speaks of happy times.
Faded Flowers. Song. Willing. 25
A song in the German style.
In dreams I see my mother. Song and chorus. G. F. Root. 25

The latest from the pen of this gifted and popular composer. The lovers of simple melody will find it difficult to show another song at once so unpretentious and fascinating.

- Bring the maid. Buffo Duet. "Rose of Castille." 60
This excellent Opera supplies an often felt want of concerted pieces for peculiar combinations of voices. There is in it a splendid Trio for male voices, a laughing Trio for mezzo-soprano and two baritones; and here we have a very effective comic Duet for two basses. All of these will, ere long, become standard pieces of the concert-room.

- I've oft been very near thee. Ballad. L. B. Wetherbee. 25

A parlor song, sentimental and melodious.

- Fly, Bird of Hope. German and English words. Kücken. 25
This is a lovely song, which fastens itself unavoidably upon the mind of the hearer; universally known and popular in Germany.

Instrumental Music for Piano.

- Coquette Polka of D'Albert, for Four Hands, by T. Bissell. 55

An arrangement of this favorite Polka for two players—intended for beginners.

- A little more Cider, too, for Four Hands, by T. Bissell. 25
Easy and well set.

- March in "Moise," for Flute and Piano, by R. Dressler. 25
Oh Nanny, for Flute and Piano. R. Dressler. 25

Both of these arrangements will be quite welcome to all amateur players.

- Surprise Party Polka. Avery. 26
A sprightly little Polka, evidently conceived in those good spirits, which surprisers and surprised ones cannot help arriving at, after the contents of baskets and pockets have been disposed of and the room been cleared of chairs and tables.

- Pétit Fantasy. Henry Schwing. 30
Introduction and two simple Variations and Finale, on a well known little German air. May be used with great advantage in the course of instruction.

- THE OPERATIC ALBUM: A collection of Music in Parts, for Ladies' voices, intended particularly for Seminars, High Schools, Musical Classes, and the Social Circle. By E. Ives, Jr. Price 67 cts.

This Collection is designed to supply a deficiency which must have been felt by all who are engaged in teaching Singing in Boarding Schools, Female Academies, or Ladies' Classes in any condition—viz: Music of an elevated character, concerted for Female voices, admitting of several voices on each part. This, too, has been a desideratum in the social circle, musical parties, &c.—for, while there is rarely one among amateurs who can perform a solo tolerably well, there are many who could join effectively in a chorus. This would, at least, give a pleasing variety to the performances of a private soirée; besides, it would allow those ladies, who possess too much of commendable delicacy to render themselves ridiculous by attempting to perform alone, to take an active part in the recreations of the party.

The pieces although, in general, composed as choruses for ladies, (cori di donne), that is, for an indefinite number of voices on each part, may be sung with pleasing effect if each part is sustained by only a single voice. And, although written for soprano or female voices, they may be sung by male voices alone, or by male and female voices combined. In the selections from Operas, and other musical compositions, the original music is given without mutilation. When the subject of the original libretto was such as to be considered destitute of interest when abstracted from the entire work, other words have been adapted—taking great pains that the sentiment should conform to the character of the music. The pieces, while making the best exercises for singing in parts, will be found the most beautiful of all musical compositions—the most of them in their line, perfect gems.

Musical Orthodoxy.

From the German of Mme. JOHANNA KINKEL.

The Bailiff availed himself of every possible pretext to refuse the now frequent invitations to the house of the Count, but it was not in his power to prevent Selvar calling so much the oftener, and seating himself with all the ease in the world by Ida at the piano-forte. Nor was it possible for Frau Werl always to perform the duty, as she considered it, of never leaving them alone, that, as she said, "the old roué might not completely turn the head of the inexperienced girl." He found but too many unguarded moments in which to kindle new sparks in the soul of Ida, and which in her loneliness she would cherish for days together.

Her first care now was to withdraw from the tyranny of her protectress, whose constant abuse of Selvar had become insupportable, and she expressed her determination to begin her career as teacher. She took rooms in the city, and, being now an object of interest in the fashionable world, on account of the well-known partiality of the Count for her, she had pupils at once from all quarters. And so began a new course of life, to which Ida found it exceedingly difficult to become reconciled. Every one possessed of musical talents above the average, who engages in teaching, must begin by passing through a period of doubt and despair. Those leisure hours formerly devoted to the study of the works of the great masters, were now filled by pupils for the most part without musical talent, who must needs stumble through difficult compositions far beyond their capacity. She found herself losing the power of persisting in that moderation and steady routine, which are all important to music teachers in restraining them from teaching more at a lesson, from a mistaken idea of duty, than the pupil can understand in the hour. But there was a deeper trouble; all her feelings were drawn in another direction, and she would become conscious of having allowed a pupil thoughtlessly to play on, while she in her day dreams was with her friends over yonder in Waldheim; then she would start conscience-stricken and try to make up for it by double attention and care. And in the midst of her toil to do this, her thoughts would again be far away from her duties. And so she would come home weary and worn, and throw herself upon the sofa, that she might think of him undisturbed. Then would awaken again the desire of study, and the few hours of day which remained she would devote with incredible zeal and perseverance to her improvement. But everything gave way, when she heard the carriage of the Count approach to take her to Waldheim. She had no power to refuse such invitations, although the acceptance of them always left a weight upon her soul.

Notwithstanding the terms upon which she now stood with her old protectress, she felt bound always to call upon her before going to the villa; and Frau Werl could not refrain from inflicting upon the young artist, who had withdrawn herself from her guardianship, a warning or a sarcasm, sufficient to embitter the whole evening. Ida seldom had the consolation of a private, confidential conversation with Selvar; the watchful eyes of the young Countess, his daughter, prevented this. The family of the Count were accustomed to his transient passions for this or that fashionable lady, and looked upon them as matters of no importance. But this case threatened serious results, inasmuch as his feelings were returned with all the strength of youthful passion. Anxiety on this account was however needless; for pleasing and flattering as little coquetties were to the Count, he was by no means at his ease when he thought of Ida's utter want of self-command and knowledge of the world. There was always danger of her betraying her feelings towards him in the presence of others, who would find in this a topic for the exercise of their wits, although he himself never passed the proper limit. He was therefore at all times sparing of expressions of affection, giving way to his impulses only when he was sure of having time sufficient to calm the excitement of Ida.

To this end music was the best means. Ida's soul panted for spiritual refreshing after bearing all day long with the ignorance or stupidity of her pupils. Her favorite songs had now become the language of love. Selvar felt it, when she in the enthusiasm of her song seemed struggling to lay her very soul at his feet. There was nothing frivolous in her playing with tones. Although she chose nothing but the very noblest which the art possesses in the passionate style, for the expression of her feelings, yet she seemed to add dignity and poetry to what she sang.

It came therefore like a thunder shock upon her when Selvar one day proposed to her to learn a set of variations by Herz upon a theme from Rossini, which he had heard at a concert, and which had quite captivated him.

The young Countess, noticing Ida's confusion, exclaimed: "People will at length become weary of this tiresome Beethoven, and your list of pieces would be greatly improved by a little variety."

Ida, with her usual abruptness, spoke out her contempt for the whole circle of variation-making, and declared that Herz's place was at the lowest grade of Art, and in fact, properly considered, he and his like were not worthy to be ranked with artists.

The Count undertook to soften her. "My friend," said he, "you are too extreme in your opinions. One should be just to all. I listen with delight to Beethoven, but Rossini gives me equal pleasure. You could do me no greater kindness, than for my gratification to study modern Italian music, with a zeal equal to that with which I have until now followed you through the labyrinth of the German classics."

Ida was for a moment at a loss; then asked:

"Is that not saying, 'if you will approve the bad, we will tolerate the good?'"

"The greatest talents lose in value, when the artist loses in discretion," exclaimed the young Countess angrily.

A look of displeasure from her father stopped her. Ida's remark had touched him also, but he chose to look upon it as arising from her want of social culture, long since forgiven in her—a failing which he hoped gradually, by his influence and example, to correct.

Ida's eyes filled with tears. Selvar invited her to a walk in the garden. The cool days of autumn had already come, and the yellow leaves which strewed the ground, reminded them of the near approach of the time, when the family usually returned to the city. The Count told Ida to consider his house there that of a father, at the same time pressing her arm to his breast with a tenderness somewhat beyond that of a father. Ida had already silently determined, as the strongest proof of affection in her power, to study the hated variations, however opposed such a sacrifice might be to her musical faith. She eased her conscience with the reflection: "Who knows whether this style of music has not its own magical power, which remains concealed from those only, who will not give themselves up to it with child-like faith and trust? I have never had the patience to play a piece of the kind to the end, always throwing them aside after the first page or two; a single affected, inflated passage has been sufficient to destroy the effect of a really pleasant melody—one which possibly was not quite without soul. Just so unjust have I been hitherto, in giving no man fashionably dressed credit for much intellect."

To this course of thought Selvar unconsciously added some remarks, which strengthened Ida in her tolerant resolutions. "You have often," said he, "proved to me in your beautiful enthusiasm, that your Gluck, Handel, and other idols, lay open to us in tones, the holiest feelings of the human breast—the highest destiny of mortal man. But how few are they who have had experience of the grand and sublime, or are capable even of understanding them! How far from the sphere of our sympathies is an Armida, an Alceste! These beings of the poetic world have hardly a point in common with us, and we must raise ourselves by force into a higher sphere of feeling, than is possible for us evening after evening at the tea-table. Shall we, men of fashionable life, with our pains and afflictions of the Salon, which in fact, often are not less than those caused by real calamity—shall we find no tolerance in supporting the Art, which is the expression of our sorrows? As cultivated manners and elegance of address prevent rude outbursts of passion, so Rossini and his school veil in brilliant roulades and divisions, their deeper expressions of woe, which unadorned might move us even to pain."

At home, Ida began the Variations, and in two days had fully proved how much easier it is to risk life for a beloved one, than to bear day after day the disgust and repugnance of such a labor; a sacrifice, of which he, for whom it is made with bleeding heart, has no conception.

While for the most part, musical works of real merit throw few merely technical difficulties in the way of the practised player, and he at once feels and enjoys the spirit which animates them, his enjoyment increasing with each repetition, precisely the opposite is true of the modern fashionable music. A superficial, trivial melody, which one instantly learns by rote, must be practised day after day with unwearying attention, because the absurd leaps and embellishments, which are thrown about it, must be brought out with lightning speed. One of the more difficult of those modern concert pieces will cost a virtuoso of the first rank a month of hard labor.

At the third variation, Ida gave up in despair. She sat at her pianoforte, shedding hot tears of vexation, at the vow she had made to conquer this task. Her few hours of leisure passed rapidly away, and little progress made in the rapidity or purity of her execution. This mere noise lay too far out of her sphere; she would rather have undertaken to play all Sebastian Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord" at sight.

Moreover she saw in the distance the danger impending, that this one demand upon her would not be all, but that the more perfectly she succeeded in this, so much the more pressing would be the call upon her for all the Rondo brilliants, Fantasias sur des Thèmes favoris, and the entire catalogue of perfumed music which loaded the shelves of Schott and Sons, at Mayence. Her faithful Erard Grand seemed profaned and, after first hurling Henri Herz into a corner, and then frightened at thus treating a gift from the beloved one, picking it up and laying it with a kiss gently upon the table, she opened the "Fantasie Chromatique" as an expiation of the sin. A thought suddenly occurred: "This sacrifice cannot be made, nor can it be demanded of me. If all my time were at my disposal, as formerly, I might give a few hours daily to this monster music, and recruit myself afterward with the best. But giving six lessons daily and spending most of my evenings at Waldheim, my mind would suffer if robbed of my few hours of leisure. He will be able to understand me, when I explain how this Henri Herz is wearing my very life out. The other request I can comply with, and learn the Italian operas."

She sent at once for a set of Bellini's arias, and undertook to sing them in the modern prima donna style. She could hardly help laughing at herself; it seemed so like trying on a masquerade dress.

"How can Selvar think that such caricatures really speak the language of love and grief! Such music is nothing but affectation and falsehood, and what else can one think of the fashionable woes of these salon butterflies, when they say, 'this is our language!' And Alceste, Iphigenia are no longer to be understood! What then is there which is forever and to all generations revealed, if not the sacred workings of parental, connubial and fraternal love, for which Gluck invented the truest and simplest language? The pride and resignation of Armida, do they not live anew in every heart in which, after long and doubtful struggle, the love of the beautiful gains the victory?"

"Ach, wer vertilgt ihn wohl von des Daseins Spur," began she, and soon became so absorbed in the part of Armida as not to hear the knock upon her door, and suddenly Selvar stood beside her. It was his first visit to her in her own rooms; but now that he was coming to town for the winter, he had come to offer her rooms in his own house, where, as he said, under the protection of his family, she could live more respectably, than so alone among strangers.

However delightful the thought to Ida of dwelling with him under one roof, however delicious the dream of more intimate relations with him—how or what was not clear to her—still she had an indefinite aversion to accepting anything at his hand, which could possibly be felt as a gift. The gifts of heart and mind she could return in kind; but how return the ostentatious hospitality of the rich, except by prostituting her talents in their Salons? For him would she gladly at all times exert her powers, when he felt wearied with the shallow pleasures of the world, hoping in her child-like innocence, and laboring, to draw him from the hollow world of fashion into the sacred temple of our higher nature, as music seemed to her.

After having decidedly refused Selvar's invitation, she unfolded clearly and distinctly all the thoughts which had been rising in her mind upon good and bad music during the day. She produced examples in turn from Gluck and Bellini, playing and singing them, and felt that now or never was the time to convince him. But instead of producing conviction, she changed the current of his feelings towards her, her persistence in a matter, which to him seemed by no means of such importance, striking him as in the highest degree unamiable. His understanding felt fully the force of the examples which she had produced in favor of her opinions and tastes, but he considered her position as completely one-sided, in granting to but a chosen few the merit of having lived up to the demands of real Art. Still more than by her inexhaustible fund of songs, had he been taken captive by the unrestrained affection, which flashed upon him from the dark eyes and the blushes of her youthful cheeks. For many long years he had awakened no such unaffected passion, and in the soul of a girl so innocent and pure. Now, that he found it impossible for her to make so small a sacrifice for him, one which he sought merely as a mark of politeness and friendship, he began to doubt the goodness of her disposition and her capacity for social culture. Secretly vexed, but with his usual politeness, he closed the interview, kissed her hand and departed, just as Frau Werl entered the door.

The preparations for the Count's return to the city had not escaped her, and she felt it her duty to warn her former charge once again of the double danger now impending.

"So, so," she began, "the Herr Count is already quite at home here."

"He has been here for the first time," returned Ida.

"Well, as you visit him daily, he need not trouble himself to come to you."

"You introduced me yourself to his sister," returned Ida, "and know that I owe my present position here entirely to his family; how can I do otherwise than offer a grateful heart to those who have treated me as their own child?"

"And who are taking just as much pains now to deprive you of this position. Do you think that scrupulous mothers will long employ you as teacher of their daughters, when your intimacy with Count Selvar has become the jest of fashionable circles?"

"How can any view with suspicion my relations with this truly paternal friend?"

"A fine paternal friend he, whose attentions to you are precisely those which he has paid to a long succession of actresses and coquettes before you."

"So it seems from your point of view. I however am convinced that his fine understanding would restrain him from more than the usual gallantries towards unworthy persons. As to myself I have long felt certain of his real sympathy."

"Now this just shows how you are blinded by your nonsensical passion—you profess to understand him better after a few months' acquaintance, than we who have had our eyes upon him half a lifetime. I am fully convinced that his vanity is engaged in an unwarrantable sport with your feelings."

"At this very moment he has given me a proof of the contrary," said Ida coldly.

"What," cried Frau Werl, eagerly, "has he really offered you his hand?"

Ida started and became pale and red by turns.

"God forbid! what an insane idea!" said she, pressing her hands to her eyes. "How can you utter such a word? The most distant thought of such a thing never entered my mind!"

"Ah, indeed! the same grand talk as ever! The only rational end of love is marriage. Except with that in view, any girl of ordinary prudence would put an end to the acquaintance before she had injured her reputation. But come, let us hear what your excellent, wise and paternal friend has been devising to-day for your advantage."

Ida with perfect freedom repeated Selvar's proposition, which Frau Werl received with a hearty laugh.

"This then is the great mark of esteem, which you have just had from him. I will spare you the recital of what the public would say, should you accept his proposition. But do you not see the selfishness of this on his part, in making you the family musicienne—to play the pianoforte, when dull visitors are present, and so fill up the chasms in the conversation; to amuse the family, when not disposed to go out; on birth days to set simple melodies to the verses of amateur poets, and to bring home the melodies of the new opera from the theatre, and sing them over at supper?"

"A man of Selvar's culture needs no such pastime. Besides, all that the city has of Art is at his command. What should induce him to choose me as the object of his favor, except the feelings of his own noble, benevolent heart?"

"And just herein is the danger, that a spark is actually kindled in his inflammable old heart. You have but a poor understanding of the advantages of your position, and cool his ardor by meeting him half-way, instead of fanning the flame. I ought to have had such a chance when I was young; I would have managed affairs quite differently. It is with Selvar as with most men. If we turn away from them, they pursue us; if they see our hearts warming toward them, theirs grow cold. As soon as you saw yourself becoming indispensable to the Count, you should have withdrawn from him, and especially have stayed away when his invitations were most urgent. And so at last the thought would have entered his mind: 'What should hinder me from making the evening of life as cheerful as possible!' and finally would have cast all other considerations to the winds in his desire to unite you to him forever. But now, what need is there of his bringing upon himself the dissatisfaction of his family and the ridicule of people of his own station, to win a heart, which, regardless of terms, throws itself at his feet?"

"What an utterly unworthy part you would have me play!" cried Ida with indignation. "You would then recommend to me as a virtue the very selfishness which you condemn in men! No, rather be despised, be the laughing-stock of the world, than coldly calculate in such a matter?"

"Judge as you will as to that; but in one point—your reputation—be on your guard. This is my last—and it is good advice."

"Ne Plus Ultra," and "Plus Ultra."

The greatest curiosity was excited at the recent soirée of Miss Arabella Goddard by the fact of Woelfl's Ne Plus Ultra and Dussek's Plus Ultra being both included in her programme. Each of these sonatas possesses extraordinary merit, and each is a genuine example of its composer's manner. The whole soul of Dussek (an enthusiastic musician if there ever was one) is evident, as we have more than once insisted, in the Plus Ultra, which is more crowded with perfectly original ideas than perhaps any other composition for piano-forte solus not included in the repertory of the unequalled Beethoven. The genius of Woelfl was of a less ardent and poetical turn. Nevertheless, he was a master, and the allegro of his sonata is as symmetrically planned and as skillfully carried out as though it had fallen from the pen of Mozart himself. The variations on "Life let us cherish," so unlike in character to what precedes them, demand a word or two of explanation.

In Woelfl's time (which was the early time of Beethoven—the time of Dussek and Steibelt, and our unfortunate English Pinto) there was a number of composers of the Abbé Gelinek and Von Esch tribe, who wrote piano-forte works for display with as little regard for true musical beauty as certain modern virtuosi who need not be designated by name. They enjoyed, too, like their successors, a degree of popularity far beyond their deserts, to the detriment of more earnest laborers in the field of art. Their compositions were on every piano-forte, and their influence was highly prejudicial to the taste of amateur performers, besides offering facilities for charlatans to exhibit their flimsy talent at the expense of their betters, who would neither stoop to write, nor consent to promulgate, such empty tours de force. Joseph Woelfl, one of the sturdiest upholders of music in its purity, was naturally among those most indignant at the progress made by players, composers, and teachers, whom he knew to be nothing better than impostors. Each fashionable professor paraded one or two airs with variations which, having composed himself and got into his fingers, he would force on the attention of his pupils. By these means the sonatas and other works of the great masters gradually became neglected; the music of Mozart, Clementi, and Dussek—still more that of Bach and Handel—went into disuse, and Steibelt himself, one of the sterling men of his time, began to minister to the fashion of the hour, and, gifted with just as much fluency as genius, rivalled the Von Eschs of the day, contrary to the real musical instincts of his nature. (At this period, Beethoven was producing his earlier compositions in rapid succession, and by the irresistible example of his piano-forte sonatas sustaining the good cause in another part of Europe.) Woelfl, in vain opposing the strong side of popular caprice, at last hit upon an expedient which he thought might somehow mend the matter, and help to bring about a better state of things. Inwardly conscious that he could write display-pieces with a great deal more facility than any of the pretenders who were fast destroying the taste for pure and healthy music, and perform them with an equal superiority, he resolved to give the fashionable world a test of his ability. His fame was European, and he enjoyed the most distinguished position as a teacher. Thus his influence was considerable, and he had only to feign adherence to the prevalent style to swamp all his competitors. The Ne Plus Ultra was the fruit of his new resolve. Unable, however, to yield so gracefully to the breeze as his suppler contemporary, Daniel Steibelt, our more vigorous and unbending musician began his new work with a stately adagio, followed by an allegro solidly built on those principles which are the foundation of art, and with which art itself must perish. Having thus proved that he was still Joseph Woelfl, he immediately set about the rest, which was at once to propitiate the false idol of the period and arrest the triumphs of its worshippers. A short andante, the air "Life let us cherish," and the variations constructed upon it, constituted the rest of the sonata.

These variations alone would show Woelfl to be a genius, since, though the offspring of a momentary caprice, they are a prophecy of Henry Herz, who formed his style upon them, and reproduced them in a hundred shapes, until he had exhausted all that could be squeezed out of them. When he abandoned the variations of Woelfl, Herz was no longer Herz, but one of the thousand phantoms of Sigismund Thalberg.

Well—the publisher of Woelfl's music, a bit of a dilettante himself, was terrified when he glanced at the manuscript. He might have exclaimed, "Awast!" and so have fore-shadowed a molecule of the cosmos of Dickens, as Woelfl had foreshadowed the entire cosmos of Herz. Not so lucky, however, as to immortalize himself by an interjection, all the publisher said was—"Why, who the deuce can play it?" "I will it blay," replied Woelfl, in Handelian English. "Yes, but you won't buy the copies. No one but yourself, or Dussek, can play the allegro—and I doubt if either of you can master the variations." Woelfl sat down to the instrument (a cracked old harpsichord) and convinced the worthy publisher of his error. Not only was he convinced, but enchanted. "But what shall we call it?" he inquired. "Call it NE PLUS ULTRA," said Woelfl, rubbing his hands with innate satisfaction. "Now shall we see if Herr Von Esch will more blay, or Herr Bomdembo* make de variation." And Ne plus Ultra was consigned to the hands of the publisher.

The effect produced by the new sonata, and especially by the variations, which (as Woelfl had suspected) were soon separated from the allegro, and published alone, was extraordinary. The work was eagerly bought, and, to the confusion of several professors of high repute, whose incompetency had previously escaped detection, was placed before them by their pupils, with a very urgent request to hear it played. All sorts of shifts and evasions were resorted to in order to avoid going through such an ordeal; but in vain. Woelfl performed the Ne Plus Ultra at a concert, and with such brilliant success, that it became the fashionable piece from that moment. Not only did he by these means obtain what he had contemplated, in the discomfiture of those shallow practitioners who had endeavored to depreciate his worth, but what he had not contemplated, the transfer of their pupils. True to his art, however, he would never consent to give lessons on the variations until the allegro had been studied. "Dat is good—" he would say—"it will help to digest de variation."

Dussek died in 1812. Plus Ultra was his 71st "opus." His last great work, L'Invocation, numbers Op. 77.

The Sonata Op. 71, in France, where it was originally published, bears the title of Le Retour à Paris. Just before it was sent to England, a Sonata by Woelfl had appeared, under the name of Ne Plus Ultra, intended to convey that difficulty could go no further; but Dussek's London publisher, judging that the Retour à Paris was even more difficult than Woelfl's Sonata, rechristened it Plus Ultra, with a dedication on the title page to Ne Plus Ultra.

Plus Ultra, however, is not merely difficult; it is a grand and imaginative composition, and one of the very few works produced at the commencement of the present century which foreshadowed the immensity of Beethoven.—London Musical World.

The Tenor.

From the Sunday Topic, (Philadelphia).

The Czars of Russia, the Sahibs of India, the King Bombas of Naples, or the Spielberg Emperors of Austria, all the most renowned tyrants of the world, are nothing, compared to the despot of the world of art and music, the tyrant Tenor. He reigns supreme. Managers give him any terms he wants, prima donnas smile at him, ladies fall in love with him, all men envy him and no opera can be sung without him. Substitutes for prima donnas, baritones and basses can be had, orchestras can be improvised, choruses gathered from all quarters, leaders even can be found, but stop the tenor's voice and all is up. The wheels and works of a clock are all in vain without a pendulum; the tenor is the pendulum that sets the opera in motion.

Your Italian tenor comes from no one knows where; some lazy scapegrace of a fellow who has slept in some corner all day out of the way of all work, and who lies all night under the vines singing to the stars in the blue vault above him. After he reaches celebrity an origin is made for him, parents arise, adventures are invented, and even ancestors looked up. But when he begins, he is nobody. He has a fine leg, a good broad chest, large rolling eyes—features so handsome that the imagination invests them with a mind, and a self complacency that nothing can destroy.

Behold him as he comes now, at the rehearsal. Every body has been waiting, everybody's aria has been wrested from its proper place, rehearsed and re-rehearsed. The call boy, even the niggeritore, (the prompter) has been sent to see what keeps the tenor.

The leader sits with suspended baton—the orchestra is ready charged to start, the chorus walks up and down, is assembled in gossiping, discontented groups, the prima donna laughs and talks with her admirers, slyly enjoying the discomfiture of the impresario who would not wait for her, and fined her when she staid at home to nurse her poodle. Now there is a gentle murmur behind the scenes, a few stray carpenters are seen at the wings, the niggeritore rushes down to his place and his partition, nodding significantly to the leader, the leader gives a silent curse and an audible sigh, there is a gentle rustling amongst the fiddlers and the flutes, and leisurely, blandly, with the air of unconscious innocence, the tenor is seen descending from the upper flat. The leader taps on the tin, crash goes the orchestra, and the ritornel (meant on the evening to receive the applause and allow the tenor to take his attitude,) is played emphatically through. The tenor mean-time stands silent and immovable, his hands in the pockets of his paletot, his eyes raised in contemplative mood to the light—his chandelier. When the orchestral part is through and the musicians sit with suspended bow, the leader, with up-lifted baton, the niggeritore pronounces with audible emphasis the Ocielo, which usually commences a tenor aria, the tenor draws his hands from his pockets and nodding to the leader says in the most appealing tone: "Non canto l'aria." (I cant sing the cavatina.) "Why the devil didn't he say that before," mutters the leader, and the prompter, as they turn over the leaves of this score. Why? What, a tenor give himself trouble! A tenor excite himself so far as to speak through a noisy orchestra. Cospetto! That is really absurd to think of. Finally when it is decided what he will sing, off starts the orchestra, down comes the basso, who ferociously begins after a blast of trumpets and a flourish of drums: "Il mio rivale," proceeding in a tremendous voice seconded by the orchestra and vigorously prompted by the niggeritore, to abuse the tenor in è flat. He gesticulates too, and stamps and looks tremendous. The tenor, however, nothing moved, keeps his hands in his pockets, his eyes fixed on the upper gallery and his back towards the basso. When he stops, the flutes and cornets, together with a pizzicato on the fiddles, aided by a never ending melancholy drawl on the violoncello, take up the melody, and a sort of murmuring like the chirping of some new fledged bird is heard to proceed from beneath the tenor's thick moustache. Then comes another hellow from the basso, an insane tutti prestissimo from the orchestra, a desperate outstretching of arm from the leader, a confused jabbering of "felicità, felicità," from the prompter and the basso, and the duet is rehearsed. In the finale the tenor never sings, he stands between the seconda donna and the baritone and watches curiously the puffing of the wind instruments, unconscious of all around him and as though his only mission then and there, were to study how they played.

Now comes the duet with the prima donna. She comes down gaily, joyously, smiling to the leader as she approaches. The tenor, at last, now draws one hand from his pocket and just touches his hat, to which salutation she replies by a sideways bow, and untying the strings of her bonnet, starts like a nightingale let loose. At every point she puts an extra flourish, which she knows the tenor cannot imitate; but he heeds her not, he hears her not; calmly and gently, ever murmuring as before, joins in. But stop! There comes a note so high, the muscles in the prima donna's throat swell out like cords beneath it. Now the tenor sings a piena voce that is his pet note; he gives it forth, he swells it, diminishes it, swells it again; the prima donna nearly chokes; the leader counts three bars instead of one, and makes spasmodic efforts with his baton; the tenor goes im-perturbably on, until he thinks the lungs, the patience, and temper of all around him are exhausted, when he gracefully sinks into an inaudible tonic. The prima donna turns away, and is enveloped in a cloud of baritones, basses, and admirers, who constitutionally hate the primo tenore, while the triumphant tenor, bearing his honors meekly, receives a gum-drop from the seconda donna, who, detecting the prima donna, has a violent enthusiasm for the grand primore.

Now comes the catastrophe of the opera. Everybody has got into the desired imbroglia, orchestra, chorus, basso, baritone are all working away at the tremendous dramatic tablan and orchestral concatenation; but the tenor, standing in the midst, has still his hands in his paletot pockets, still he murmurs on, whilst his large, languishing eyes, gazing curiously around, seem to wonder what the row's about. At last the prima donna, trembling, shrieking, stabbed by the baritone, cursed by the basso, falls into his arms. The tenor waking, as from slumber, struggles, totters, stammers, and as she catches at his shoulder not to fall, politely begs her pardon for standing in her way.

But the aria. Now everybody's gone, excepting the seconda donna; she lingers still. Won't the tenor rehearse it now? "Non posso" and he hems he's very tired—seconda donna brings a chair—he doesn't know how it begins—the prompter shouts "Mio bene." Then he doesn't recollect the notes—the leader passes him the score—the tenor hems again—then playfully, and to himself, he murmurs "Mio bene," upon which the fiddles take it up—the leader nods his head, and thinks they are all off at last—but the tenor sticks at "adorata imagine," and coughs, lets fall the score, and, followed by the gum drops and the pitying seconda donna, resumes the pocket of his paletot, declares the climate will destroy him, swears he's "giu di voce;" that his throat is sore, that his head aches, and that he's feverish, and so disappears. The leader bangs the baton on the desk; anathemas, both loud and deep, are perpetrated in every dialect of Italian, in every patois of German; the prompter shrugs his shoulders, and a rehearsal is summoned for to-morrow morning, expressly that the tenor may sing his aria, and show his power.

Gliding past the box office, pink-tinted notes, mysterious jewel cases, and bouquets are thrust into his hands. The moustache curls disdainfully, the tenor-lips murmur "queste povere donne," (these poor women,) and complacently he displays his correspondence to his satellites. Then he passes on, and may be seen wandering gently down the sunny side of the street, modestly pretending not to see the blushes and admiring eyes that follow his approach, nor understand the "Isn't he handsome?"—"Hasn't the sweet moustachios?"—"Ain't he got lovely eyes?" repeated aloud by deluded damsels, under the conviction that he don't speak English.

Your primo tenore, however, is not of an inflammable nature. Mozart was right not to make Don Giovanni a tenor; no Don Juan could ever have a tenor voice, his exploits would destroy it. Your tenor loves himself, loves his voice, takes care of it, nurses it, worships it. He receives presents, never gives them; allows himself to be admired, himself admiring no one. He is extravagant in dress alone, eschews all other expenses, and generally is rich. Self being his idol, he provides for the old age of the wonderful primo tenore as though it were another, not himself. He is not specially courageous, it would be such a pity to deprive the world of such a voice. He generally marries some woman a great deal older than himself, who adores him, flatters him, is his slave. He would hate a young and pretty wife, she would detract from the importance of a primo tenore. From the primo basso he shrinks as from a polar bear; he pities the baritone for not having a tenor voice, and hates the prima donna as one rival beauty does another. The tenor loves the tenor, and takes care of him; the public adore the tenor, and spoil him, so that between them, the happiest being, the most self-satisfied on earth, the most despot in the world, is the primo tenore of a modern Italian.

OPERA.

New Opera House at Covent Garden.

A London paper gives the following description of this new and splendid opera house, erected on the site of Covent Garden theatre, which, it will be recollected, was destroyed by fire some two years ago. The new house was expected to open on the 15th instant:

It is externally one huge structure nearly one hundred feet high, by one hundred and twenty-two feet broad, and no less than two hundred and forty feet long, about one fifth larger than the late theatre, and about the same size as the celebrated La Scala of Milan, hitherto the largest in the world. The four outer walls of the building are constructed on the cellular principle, which is now in different ways getting so much into vogue in works of great strength. Each wall is apparently about twenty-four feet thick, though it is in reality composed of two walls, the outer of three feet thickness and the inner two feet, with transverse walls also two feet thick at intervals of twenty feet apart, and running up between them from top to bottom. These, with wrought-iron tie rods holding both inner and outer walls together, give immense strength and lightness to the whole.

The roof is composed of nine great lattice girders of wrought iron, each of which is ninety feet long by eighteen inches broad, and nine feet six inches deep. These, each of them weighing eighteen tons, and equal to a dead strain of three hundred, are placed at intervals of twenty feet apart, and floored between at the bottom, while on them rests a ridge and furrow roof of glass and iron. Thus, between each pair of girders are spacious rooms ninety feet long by twenty wide, and about fourteen high, which are to be used as carpenters' workshops, storeroom, &c. To these girders will be bung the ornamental dome-shaped ceiling, which will be covered with traceries and mouldings in white and gold of the most elaborate design. The whole dome, a beautiful feature in Italian architecture, apparently rests on four arches—three forming the front and side galleries, and one over the proscenium. The latter has been constructed with special reference to its acoustic properties, and will be crossed with a network of gold tracery on a white ground, corresponding with the style of the ceiling. The painting room will be the largest in the world and will be supplied with machinery to roll the largest panorama canvas up or down, right or left.

The shape of the old building was like a horse shoe. The present one approaches more nearly the shape of the old Greek theatre, a perfect semi-circle with the sides prolonged. There are to be only three tiers of boxes—the pit, ground and upper tier, with thirty-six boxes in each, nine feet six inches high. They are to be hung with rose-colored silk, and the architectural features of the house will be enriched with the most massive decorations in white and gold. The Queen's box will be on the right hand side of the house, and will have a private entrance and staircase from Hart street, and a beautifully decorated ante-room attached to it. The Duke of Bedford has similar accommodations, on a more limited scale. The grand entrance is to be in Bow street, where, of course, there is a "colonnade, where tender beauty waiting for her coach protrudes her gloveless hand and feels the shower." This entrance forms a kind of basement story to the grand portico which rises over it, and from which the entrance porch is separated by a roof.

The Corinthian portico will be the finest ever built for any modern theatre. Its extreme width will be 82 feet, by 84 feet high. All its columns will be of solid stone, 37 feet high, by 3 feet 8 inches in diameter. Flaxham's exquisite sculptures were fortunately saved almost uninjured from the ruins of the old theatre, and these have been incorporated by Mr. Barry into the details of the new portico. The figures of Tragedy and Comedy will be placed in niches on either side, while the bas-reliefs representing ancient and modern dramatic art will be over the crush-room windows.

Partly in connection with the opera-house is hereafter to be built a grand floral arcade, 30 feet wide by 60 feet high, and 240 feet long, running along the entire length of the building, from Bow Street to Covent Garden. This building will be of glass and iron, light and elegant in form, appearance and decoration as suits the purpose for which it will be used, where only flowers will be sold. On the great nights of the operatic season this will be lighted up, and remain open as a promenade for the audience, two or three entrances being provided which will admit at once from the theatre to the arcade.

Joachim in London.

From the Times, May 1.

The reception accorded to Herr Joseph Joachim showed that the audience had not forgotten him, while his own performance proclaimed how well he deserved to be remembered. Beethoven's Concerto was the first piece Herr Joachim ever played in England (in 1844, at the Philharmonic Concerts, when only 13 years of age). He was then a boy of remarkable genius, of whom the musical world in general, and Mendelssohn, his friend and counsellor, in particular, prophesied extraordinary things. The boy has now ripened into the man, and all that was anticipated from his precocious talents has been realized. A grander, chaster, more consummate delivery of Beethoven's Concerto was probably never heard. Not a liberty was taken with the text, for Herr Joachim is one of those artists who lose sight of themselves in the master they are interpreting. Yet, not a point was overlooked; not a passage intended to be either subordinate or promised, but was made doubly effective by this conscientious adherence to the author. To a tone of rich quality and unwonted power Herr Joachim unites an unsurpassable mastery of the instrument and a command of expression apparently inexhaustible. But more than in his fine tone and faultless mechanism, more than in his large manner of phrasing, the exquisite finish with which he rounds off every period, and the secret he possesses so entirely of graduating the intensity of sound, real lovers of music delighted in the noble simplicity, the supreme disregard of egotistical display, with which Herr Joachim performed, from first to last, this masterpiece of one of the most genial, gifted, and thoroughly earnest of musicians. The general impression elicited was one of admiration for the beauties of the work—every one thought of Beethoven, and this was doubtless what his young and ardent disciple wished. But at the termination of each movement—and, above all, when the last note of the rondo had been played—a recognition of the incomparable merits of the performer vented itself in cheers and plaudits that appeared as if they would never cease. Herr Joachim was recalled with unanimity; and then the enthusiasm of his hearers was manifested with redoubled vehemence. Never was genuine desert hailed with more genuine sincerity. In the famous but somewhat monotonous jeu d'esprit of Tartini the same sterling qualities were remarkable in the executant. The same excitement, however, was not created—which merely proved that the Philharmonic audience were able to comprehend the difference between Beethoven and Tartini—between pure music, in short, and that which, assuming the name and attributes of music, is a mere pretext for the exhibition of manipulative ingenuity. The best part of Tartini's sonata is the theme. This is really melodious, and was played with exquisite feeling by Herr Joachim. The rest, including the trillo del Diavolo—which tradition affirms to have been communicated to the Italian violinist in a dream by no less a personage than his Satanic Majesty—although overloaded with difficulties only to be mastered by a "virtuoso" of the first rank, is far more mechanical than musical. We would rather have listened to Herr Joachim in a composition of his own.

From the Athenæum, May 1.

A grander example of violin playing was, probably, never presented in the Hanover Square Rooms than Herr Joachim's rendering of Beethoven's Concerto at the Second Philharmonic Concert on Monday. Surely there is nothing more superb in Concerto music than the opening Allegro,—but the amplitude of its melodies, and the excessive technical difficulty of its passages demand no common dignity of mind, certainty of finger, and perhaps, most of all, that rare gift—solidity in measurement of phrases—pertinence without affectation in accent, which one great artist in twenty does not possess. Thus calling to mind the great violinists who have successively treated Beethoven's Concerto as "a bow of Ulysses," we remember none who can be placed so high as Herr Joachim in his particular allegro. His cadenza, too, was more than usually masterly; elaborate, yet what a cadenza should be—freakish, and not as it is too often made, an exercise at heavier composition thrust in. He was received with deserved enthusiasm.

A Singular Mental Phenomenon.

Hector Berlioz, in a recent musical criticism makes the following curious statement:

"When I entered the concert-room I was the dupe of a singular illusion. Wienilawski was executing the first part of a grand concerto for the violin. Struck instantly by the beauty of the form of the piece, by the noble style and the scientific lucidity of the instrumentation, the adagio which followed raised my admiration to a still higher pitch, and I said to myself, 'Where in the deuce has this young fellow acquired such a talent of composition?' He writes like a master, like a great master. Really it is extraordinary. I don't understand it. Hang me I must not go up to the artist's dressing room to compliment him and shake him by the hand,—when all at once he gave the final theme, and I recognized Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin, which I have led more than once for Sivioli, at London, and which for the last half-hour I had been attributing to Wienilawski. A similar error would not always produce a similar result. Many people would be prone to look on a master-piece as detestable, if the master-piece, instead of bearing the name of its illustrious author, was attributed to an obscure composer. Others, and this occurs still more frequently, would become furious if it was proved to them that they had unconsciously applauded the work of a master to whom they had systematically declared war.

I had in my box, by the side of me, a young American musician who has just come from Naples, where, he told me, he had never heard Beethoven's name mentioned. This sonata (Beethoven's sonata for piano and violin, dedicated to Kreutzer,) made a strong impression on him, and astonished him exceedingly. The varied andante and the finale delighted him, ravished him. But on the other hand, after having listened with painful attention to the piece, he said to me, 'That is fine, isn't it? You think that fine?' 'Yes, indeed,' replied I, 'it is beautiful, grand, new, admirable in every respect.' 'Well I must confess to you I do not understand it.' He was both annoyed and ashamed to make this confession. This is a strange phenomenon, which may be observed in persons most happily endowed by nature, but whose musical education is incomplete. While they cannot possibly divine why some pieces are inaccessible to them, they do not understand them; that is, they do not appreciate the leading idea, nor its development, expression, accent, disposition, melodious beauty, harmonic richness nor coloring. They hear nothing; so far as those pieces are concerned, they are deaf. Nay, as they do not hear that which abounds in it, they often think they hear what is not in it. One of these people said, speaking of the theme of an adagio, that 'it was vague and covered by the accompaniment.' 'Do you like this song?' said I to him, after singing a phrase of slow melody. 'Oh! it is admirable, and of a perfect clearness of outline; that is the music for me.' 'See here—here is the score; do you recognize that adagio whose theme you found 'vague;' convince yourself my dear fellow, by your own eyes, that the accompaniments cannot cover it, since it is exhibited without accompaniment.' Another person reproached the composer of a song for marring the melody by a rude, hard, ill-prepared, misplaced modulation. 'You would oblige me very much,' replied the composer, 'if you would indicate to me the modulation you mean; here is the score—look for it, and point it out to me.' The amateur looked in vain; the piece was in E flat from one end to the other, and did not modulate.

"I instance here merely erroneous ideas produced by false impressions on impartial well-disposed auditors, desirous of liking and admiring what they hear. From these examples, some idea may be formed of the aberrations and hallucinations of prejudiced, spiteful, rancorous system-mongers. If these people were to be made to listen to perfect accord of re majore, and then to be told that the accord was from the score of a composer they dislike, 'Enough, enough. No more for God's sake. You make our ears bleed!' They are really madmen. I do not know whether in the arts belonging to drawing this race of maniacs has been discovered—men to whom red is green, white is black, black is white, rivers of water are flames of fire, trees houses, and they themselves Jupiter."

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of SCHUBERT'S Psalm: "The Lord is my Shepherd," for two Soprano and two Contralto voices.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club—Nine Years' Work.

We fulfil our promise of recording here a list of the Classical Chamber Compositions, by the best masters, which have been presented to Boston ears by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, during the nine years since the Club was organized. The record is significant, and must be valuable to the lovers of violin Quartet and Quintet music hereabouts for reference. It shows in fact, in a sort of tabular view, the history of the growing taste for this kind of music in our community. The love of such music is the surest index of a love of music pure and for itself; that is, of musical Art reduced to its essentials, relying on its intrinsic charm and virtue, devoid of all mere external tricks of effect,—music so constructed that, if there be not worth and beauty in the design, in the ideas themselves, there is nothing like orchestral coloring or mere power of mass, to cover up its nakedness or weakness. It cannot be supposed that the multitude anywhere or ever will appreciate such music. But Quartet parties in all musical communities form the selectest pleasures of the circles that are most musically cultivated. In our young, busy country such a taste is but of recent growth. In this city the nine years' concerts of the Quintette Club, stand (as we have said) for nearly its whole history; for, with the exception of the two courses of Chamber Concerts given under the patronage of the "Harvard Musical Association," in Mr. Chickering's ware-rooms, in the winters of 1844 and 1846, we remember very little of the sort, in public, prior to the first season of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

Our list includes only the performances of the Club in Boston, and in their public concerts, leaving out of the account their numerous concerts in the surrounding towns, and their frequent performances before private circles and in private houses.

As our object is to show how much of the famous gallery of masters in this department has been, as it were, lighted up for us and brought directly before us by the labors of the Club, we have been less particular about completeness in the latter portion of our list, which includes works by new or less important European names, and contributions by several of our own native or resident artists, members or close associates of the Club; yet we add what we can recall of these as matters of interest. To each work we add, as nearly as could be ascertained, the number of times that it has been performed. But it is to be considered that in these latter years many of the most important items of the list have also been brought repeatedly to our hearing by other parties, who have followed the example of the Quintette Club. We commence in the order of historical succession:

Musical Review.

Messrs. RUSSELL and FULLER send us a large pile of their freshest publications, among which, for the present, our attention is attracted to the following minor compositions for the piano:

1. Deux Marches, Op. 55, by FERDINAND HILLER. No. 1. Marcia Giocosa; No. 2, Marcia Scherzosa.
2. Serenade, Op. 20, by ANTOINE HEIZBERG; pp. 7.
3. Berçuse, Op. 38, by JULES EGGHARD; pp. 5.
4. Pensée Lugubre: Nocturne, Op. 50, by E. A. L. COOP; pp. 7.

1. Anything from the pen of Ferd. Hiller, consummate musician and artist as he is, if not in the high sense a creative genius, commands respect. The first of these little marches is charming; original and full of life and playful grace, as its name indicates. The second we do not like quite so well; it is scherso-ish rather in form than in spirit; yet it is graceful and pretty.

2. The other three names are entirely new to us. The Serenade is a sweet cantabile Andante, in A flat, six-eight measure, a very tender melody that sings itself almost to satiety, with a chaste, refined accompaniment.

3. Mr. Egghard's little Berçuse, or eradle song, is the gem of the collection, one of the loveliest and purest little morceaux that we have seen of late. The melody is beautiful, and seems spontaneously evolved from the slumbrous, dreamy chord figure of the accompaniment. It partakes of the refinement and delicacy, but not of the difficulty of Chopin's wonderful Berçuse.

4. Mr. Coop's Pensée Lugubre is lugubrious indeed. The principal theme, in B flat minor, which begins and ends the piece, is restless and despairing, not without interest as music. A more resigned sort of major subject, a kind of reed instrument episode, breaks the monotony of grief agreeably. The interest marks of expression are scattered along the page, such as addoloratissimo, con disperazione, &c.

Andante Elegique, for the Piano. Op. 45. By H. A. WOLLENHAUPT. pp. 14. (New York: C. Breusing.)

Here is a more elaborate effort; one of the cleverest and most graceful fruits of the modern virtuoso pianism, à la Thalberg, and really worthy to be compared with Thalberg. Without anything that appeals to us like genius, it yet breathes a fine musical feeling; the motive is clearly, consistently developed, and the piece abounds in delicate graces of detail and embellishment. It will add to the reputation which the author has already won by many efforts given to the world through the same publisher.

From recent publications of O. DITSON & Co., we pick, for the present, almost at a venture, these:

To Chloe in Sickness: One of Six Songs, to English and German words, by WILLIAM STERNDAL BENNETT. pp. 5. Bennett is the foremost of the class of Germanized English composers, who have followed, fascinated, in the shining path of Mendelssohn. These songs, written originally to German words, (a practice common at this day with many young English composers), and in German style, of accompaniment, &c., are among his earlier works. "To Chloe" is a song of wild and tender pathos, and great beauty; easily singable. The beauty, however, resides mainly in the piano part, which is quite easy.

Sur L'Océan: Terzettino for three equal female voices, by J. CONZONE. pp. 7. The well-known Exercises, Vocalisés, &c., by this master are models of pure, flowing, graceful Italian melody; and so is this Trio. It is, like operatic trios, woven of three individual melodic parts, with imitations, &c., and occasional solo or duet. Words French and English. A beautiful piece for young ladies' voices. It is one from a set of twenty-five pieces drawn from famous authors and arranged by Conzone, for three and four female voices, which will appear here in their turn.

The Reason Why: Ballad, by G. A. MACFARREN. A pretty trifle, bright, artistically conceived.

La Prece del Orfana. (The Prayer of the Orphan), Romanza, by MERCADATE: being one of "Wayside Flowers of France and Italy," translated and adapted by T. T. BARKER. A pleasing Italian melody, with considerable operatic pathos.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY held its forty-third annual meeting in Chickering's rooms last Monday evening. From the Advertiser and the Courier we glean the following account of the proceedings:

Thomas E. Chickering was unanimously elected a member of the Society.

John S. Farlow, Esq., chairman of the finance committee, read the Treasurer's annual report. The receipts for the year have amounted to $4595 20, and the expenditures to $5239 07, leaving a balance due to the Treasurer of $543 87. All bills have been paid, and there is now no claim against the society. The report was accepted.

The report of the Librarian was then presented. The library is in about the same condition as last year. The donation by the President of the full orchestral and vocal scores of "Israel in Egypt," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of praise," is acknowledged.

The Secretary then read his annual report. It gives an interesting account of the organization of the society and of some of its first concerts, and reviews the past season, showing a small profit therefrom.

The meeting then proceeded to ballot for a board of officers for the ensuing year, and the following list was elected:

President, Thomas E. Chickering; Vice-President, George Hews; Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Matthew S. Parker; Librarian, Edward Faxon; Directors, John S. Farlow, James P. Draper, Theron J. Dale, George H. Chickering, Oren J. Faxon, John A. Nowell, George Fisher, and H. L. Hazleton.

A committee of three was appointed to notify Mr. Chickering of his election.

A vote of thanks was passed to the late President, Charles F. Chickering, for his exertions and liberality on behalf of the society.

After the business of the evening had been transacted, some remarks were made by Mr. Alexander W. Thayer, urging the Society to take into consideration the propriety and expediency of commemorating the centennial anniversary of Handel's birth, which occurs next April, by a grand festival, worthy of such an occasion. Mr. Thayer also presented briefly the arguments which he has so often expressed earnestly and ably in print, showing what advantages would result from a combination of musical societies in this city for the purpose of securing a permanent adequate orchestral force, and how that end might probably be accomplished. His observations were listened to with interest, and will, it is to be hoped, help to bring about the desired effect.

Two more Military Band Concerts this week: on Wednesday HALL'S BRASS BAND appeared at the Music Hall, after the Protean fashion set by other bands, in the three forms of Brass Band, Reed Band, and Orchestra; they played Overtures, Quicksteps, Waltzes, Solos, &c., and had the vocal assistance of the popular contralto, Miss JENNIE TWICHELL. This evening the BRIGADE BAND play again in the same hall, offering a programme selected from the marches, quicksteps, melodies, &c., which were popular from thirty to fifty years ago.... We are sorry to learn that our accomplished soprano singer, Mrs. J. H. LONG, intends soon to leave us and make New York her place of residence. This lady gave a concert of vocal and instrumental music at Lyceum Hall, in Cambridge, last Wednesday evening, assisted by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with Mr. SCHULTZE for leader, and by Mr. B. J. LANG, the pianist.

Mr. AUGUST FRIES and Mr. FRANZ KIELBLOCK, one of the most intelligent musicians of our city, sailed in the Hamburg steamer, from New York, on Tuesday. The latter gentleman will return to his pupils here in the autumn. . . . Among the Americans registered in Paris during the last month we see the name of our sweet singer, Mrs. E. A. WENTWORTH. . . . Mme. de WILHORST has failed to obtain an operatic engagement in Europe; and another American prima donna, Miss WARD, (Mme. GUERRABELLA), after singing at two or three concerts in Paris, and giving one herself, became discouraged, and will soon return to the United States. . . . The LUCY ESCOTT opera troupe closed at the Limerick theatre, May 10, and proceeded thence to Cork, Plymouth, &c.

Mr. BARNUM announces that the great operatic project will be carried out, provided 800 season subscribers are obtained in New York at the economical little price of $5.00 per night, before the 10th of June,—"otherwise positively not." We are afraid it will be otherwise. The plan is to import Lumley's entire Opera and Ballet Troupe, consisting of one hundred and forty-eight persons, for forty-eight performances, to be given, one half in the New York Academy, and the rest in Philadelphia and Boston. The days of Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache and Grisi are gone; but Lumley has Milles, Titjens and Piccolomini and Sigs. Giuglini and Belart, and a danseuse, Mlle. Pocchini, who is said to "excel Taglioni in grace and Cerito in voluptuousness of form."

They have Opera again in New York, at the Academy. MARETZKE conducts; GAZZANIGA, BRIGNOLI, AMODIO and GASPARI are the singers. The course opened on Monday evening, with La Favorita, in which Gazzaniga was "great" in the last act, followed on Wednesday by La Traviata. . . . A meeting of "all the instrumental musicians in New York" is called to make arrangements for carrying out a project, already resolved upon, of a great Musical Festival this summer. What a noise there will be! . . . A concert was given this week by Dr. GUILMETTE, consisting of a new Cantata by Mr. GEORGE HENRY CURTIS, entitled the "Forest Melody," the words being selected from the poem of Bryant. . . . Mr. BRUNO WOLLENHAUPT, a brother of the pianist, has returned to New York, after some years of study under David, in Leipzig, and the eminent violinists in Paris; his violin-playing has been highly praised in Germany.

The Paris correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin speaks of two Lilliputian virtuosos, who will probably be brought to America:

The precocious little violinists, Jules and Juliette Delepière, the boy seven and the girl six years of age, are truly little marvels, and when we see these two mere babes—such little creatures, indeed, that in order to be seen they are placed on a table—performing with exquisite taste and extraordinary skill the most difficult pieces, we are tempted to believe them fairies. The little girl is by far the most wonderful and takes the lead evidently. She is not one of those old-visaged, old-talking young ones that are such terrible bores. When not playing she has the features, the voice, the grace of her age. When the instrument is placed in her hands there is a sudden change, the countenance loses its childish expression, the large dark eyes dilate, and this is no exaggeration, there is a look of inspiration in those intelligent features that is seen but in privileged beings, even among great artists. There is in the same family a little three-year-old chit that manifests the same predilection for art, though still too young to be taught theoretically. On inquiry of the father, who is a chef d'orchestre, as to why Juliette had been taught the violin instead of the piano, the reply was that it was the express choice of the child. Having heard a young girl play the violin, the little thing, then four years old, insisted with her father to be taught that instrument. Deeming it a baby's fancy, he placed his own in her hands, when, to his amazement, she handled it in the most masterly fashion, drawing sounds—not squeaky like those of a beginner, but sweet and melodious. It was then thought advisable to take advantage of the vocation so clearly proved. Juliette Delepière brings to mind the gifted young Milanolos who, in ten years, realized by their talent on the violin, a fortune of two million francs, which one sister only survives to enjoy.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, JUNE 1. — Musical matters in the Quaker City, during the past week, have been "flat, stale, and unprofitable." The "Handel and Haydn," and the "Harmonia Sacra (?) Music Societies," have given their farewell concerts, and are now engaged in rehearsing for the fall campaign. The first named society designs producing Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," some time during the coming winter.

Our favorite "Germania" gave their last public "Rehearsal" on Saturday afternoon, closing the season with the following programme:

1. Overture, Shipwreck of the Medusa: Reissiger.
2. Violoncello Solo, by Priester, a fantasia on a theme of Handel: Franchomme.
3. Waltz, Ideale: Lanner.
4. Allegretto, from 2nd Symphony in A: Beethoven.
5. Duo for Cornets: Mendelssohn.
6. Overture, Tannhäuser: Wagner.
7. Pickpocket Quadrilles: Cuzent.

Query, Why does the "miwwaculous" and adored SENTZ allow his patrons to go away under the awful impressions that may be suggested by the Pickpocket Quadrilles?

Wagner's Overture to Tannhäuser was performed for the second time in Philadelphia, it having been played here once, by the old "Germania," several years since.

The "dear public," whom it is difficult above all things to convince that Fidelio is a slight improvement on La Traviata, a surfeit of which we have barely survived, voted the Tannhäuser a "horrid bore." There is no disguising the fact, that we are totally unprepared for the "music of the future;" being so far behind that we may utterly despair of overtaking it; unless, indeed, Art will remain stationary for at least a century. It is, however, refreshing to note the growing taste, in our musical circles, for the works of the two greatest of the new composers, Wagner and Schumann; as well as for the defunct "old fogies," Beethoven and Mozart. All praise to the Germania for its fostering influence. Your talented townsman (?), GUSTAVE SATTER, has won golden opinions here. His rendition of the classical composers, and versatility of genius amount à merveille; notwithstanding the opinions of a few quasi critics to the contrary.

The Academy of Music opened on Monday evening, with MUSARD's large and magnificent orchestra, — consisting of two soloists, the balance resident musicians. In order to demonstrate the important difference between a French and American locomotive, as well as to consult "local truth," ("is mighty, &c.") he has had a machine constructed in this country, with which he produces as stunning effects as his predecessor, Jullien. Vive la Mustard! Vive la Humbug! Voilà tout. M.

BERLIN, APRIL 30. (Concluded from last week.) — For a gala performance, at the reception of the Princess Victoria, Spontini's Vestale was selected, a work full of geniality, running over with fancy, and, at the same time, of true feeling. True, the counterpoint and carriage of the voices are sometimes faulty; but this is atoned for by his noble melody and fullness of originality. In the instrumentation life, even excitement reigns; hence that powerful manning of the instruments, that rich figuring of the stringed orchestra, especially the violins, that frequent coming in of the wind instruments, employed in a singularly original and beautiful manner in the resolving sevenths at the approach of Licinius, when the resonance of the instruments has an effect upon the voice as if it lost itself in wide, ringing spaces. The character-drawing is based on that of Gluck, and there is a remarkable correspondence existing between Spontini's Julia, Amazily and Olympia on the one side, and his Licinius, Cortez and Cassander on the other. Mme. KOESTER sang the part of Julia in the lyrical moments admirably; only the elegiac expression in the aria of the third act was too weakly rendered. She is too romantic for Spontini's plastic quality, and in impassioned bursts one wants more energy of expression. But in Frl. WAGNER's High Priestess that plastic element was wonderfully manifest; and she produced a sublime and deep effect by her by-play even in scenes where she has almost no part in the dialogue. Her singing, too, except in the highest passages, was full of noble and worthy expression. Herr FORMES (Licinius) and KNAUSE (Cinna) sang their duet with a great deal of fire; the latter forced his voice too much. Herr FRICKE, as High Priest, made his fine organ tell with full effect. Kapellmeister TAUBERT's conducting was truly worthy of acknowledgement, but bears no comparison with Spontini's own.

With the aid of that intellectual artist, PAULINE VIARDOT GARCIA, was produced Rossini's "Barber of Seville," that work so sparkling and gushing with humor, created in the very champagne foam and effervescence of utmost exhilaration. Mme. Viardot's happy talent for this lively style of music also, presented an exceedingly stimulating and for the most part correct picture as a whole, although sometimes degenerating (for our German notion) into too eccentric forms of passion, while the applause that was given to the certainty and clearness with which she overcame all difficult passages and intervals, seemed as if it never would end. Herr WOLFF's voice, weak and thin, and more adapted to the parlando, nevertheless mastered his embellishments and trills with ease. In the voice of Herr KRATSE (Figaro) the requisite volubility was missed; his solo number was an incessant conflict with the tempo, which he was hardly able to follow. Herr BOST, as Bartolo, amused by his often too broad comedy.

On the 10th of March Der Freyschütz had its three hundredth representation on our stage — but without any parade, and indeed feebly cast. Much better was the Don Juan, which soon followed, in which Frl. TRIETSCH, especially, surprised all as Elvira, and, after the difficult aria, transported the house to a tempest of applause. She is now the freshest and most natural of our voices, although a habit of cutting off the single tones too short has an unpleasant effect and hinders a broad outpouring of the feeling. Frl. BAUER, on the contrary, as Zerlina, stands far below her charming predecessor, Mme. HERRENBURG. Although she evidently strove to satisfy, yet she has much to conquer in the way of pure intonation and distinct enunciation, and she ought above all, to cease indulging in arbitrary and not beautiful changes of the text, especially when they bring her into conflict with the orchestra. The chorus was much better than hitherto, its falling off being ascribable to poor pay and consequent discontent.

After an interval of eight years, Mehul's "Joseph in Egypt" has been revived. The composer, although neither a creator of a new direction, nor a reformer in the older school, yet occupies a place, an important place of his own, between Grétry and Gluck. Favored by the so-called Gallomania of the time in which he wrote, most of his operas penetrated into all the countries of Europe, and by their true and unaffected expression became favorites with the public. The music of "Joseph" breathes a truly patriarchal life, coupled with a sort of childlike piety. The passionate expression, as well as the sustaining of the characters, shows an affecting truth, great knowledge of the theatre, and clear perception of what is necessary to the whole. No superfluous sound tickles the ear, all works by truth, and the wise use of instruments shows the practised composer, who can reach such fine effects with such small means. His treatment of the song part is still higher to be prized, and it is only to be regretted, that the epic declamatory element (especially in the German translation) is out of correspondence with the almost too lyric music, at least of the two favorite couplet-romanzas. The ensembles and choruses are often highly effective and at the same time astonishingly simple in their contrapuntal structure; the choruses of the brothers, as well as the three-voiced morning hymn, introduced by trombones, and only supported by the trichord or the fundamental tone in the orchestra, until the male and female choruses unite in the simplest canon, are such as no deeply appreciative hearer ever can forget. The orchestra, kept throughout in a subordinate and merely accompanying position, rises to more importance only in the three overtures, of which the most exalted one in C minor, with its plastic ending in C major, has a value by itself. No means were spared to heighten the effect. The part of Joseph is suited at least as a whole to Herr KRÜGER; action and song were hearty, he spoke more distinctly than formerly, and it is to be hoped that he will also get rid of his unartist-like tremolo; in the second act a more affecting expression was to be wished. Frl. BALDAMUS, a pupil of Rellstab, and of the Opera Academy, gave the part of Benjamin; she invested it with a childlike charm and justified good hopes. Herr HOFFMANN gave Simeon with a well-thought and often touching expression; Herr FRICKE, Jacob, satisfactorily, in spite of the high range of the music. The choruses went well, only in the second finale the entrance of the soprano and tenors made disturbance. The Kapelle accompanied too passively; the passages in thirds in the fiery music of the third entr'acte were actually spoiled by the clarinets.

One of our weakest performances was that of the Orpheus, by Gluck. This grandly conceived work was dragged through in such a tame and unenergetic manner, that it would have utterly fallen through, had not the strong dramatic spirit of the WAGNER, as Orpheus, saved it. The Eurydice, in the hands of that useful soubrette actress, TRIETSCH — impossible to feel enthusiasm for such an Eurydice! And so too the most powerful passages in the choruses and orchestra were often completely at odds; the climaxes of the declamation (in which no one after Bach is so great, so true, so sure as Gluck), already weakened by the trivial translation, were nearly lost in the bungling delivery; above all, was the whole work lamed by an uncertainty of the ensemble, such as should only be possible in a first rehearsal. Besides all this, with an incomprehensible effrontery, choruses were inserted out of other operas, the soul-full and transporting Terzet in the third act was omitted, the tempi were altered, &c., &c. Such experiences make us feel as if in our distracted times all deep and sincere interest, all capacity for a deep, true comprehension of the classical were wanting; as if we knew nothing of such high and noble characters as Gluck has represented.

It remains to speak of the Oratorios, Symphony Concerts, &c. ff

V. OIL PICTURES. (CONTINUED.)

With a view to keeping vividly in mind the leading principle of criticism thus far and yet to be applied to the pictures of this collection, in resuming the special notices, I will re-state the essential part of the paragraph concerning the value of color in relation to form, which was quoted from Ruskin in the second article of this series, supplying an omission therein made; and will also add a few words from the same author, illustrating the power of rendering natural form, which is contained in a true knowledge, and power of natural color.

He says that, manifestly, "the business of a painter is to paint. If he can color, he is a painter, though he can do nothing else." Continuing, he writes, "but it is, in fact, impossible, if he can color, but that he should be able to do more; for a faithful study of color will always give power over form, though the most intense study of form will give no power over color. The man who can see all the greys, and reds, and purples in a peach, will paint the peach rightly round, and rightly altogether; but the man who has only studied its roundness, may not see its purples and greys, and if he does not, will never get it to look like a peach; so that great power over color is always a sign of large general Art-intellect."

That a painter should understand the right use of color, would seem to be a prime condition in his art, too palpable to require urging here; but when we consider that excellence in color is the rarest attainment in art, — so rare indeed, that all the great colorists who have ever lived are chiefly remembered as such, and could be named in a single breath, — we find ample grounds for the conclusion that painters have not always understood their business, nor allowed the claims of color, as an element of the first importance in Art, whenever it is introduced at all, to be fairly heard.

I shall therefore insist, that the man who has no true perception or control of color, or who uses it without loving or honoring it, and in utter disregard of the law of its harmonies, has clearly no right to use it at all; and in making other than a right use of it, does so at the peril of degrading or wholly concealing the real value which his work may otherwise possess. Such a man may be an artist, but he is obviously no painter.

But to proceed with the pictures. In the "Midwood Shade," No. 113, Mr. Redgrave presents a very successful treatment of a beautiful subject, simple in its character, and yet one that is rarely rendered with adequate truth of feeling, or power of expression. The woods furnish themes richly suggestive of sensational experiences that are nowhere to be met except in their deep shade or open glades, and it is much to be regretted that characteristic interpretations of them are so seldom attempted. Of the management of the one chosen by Mr. Redgrave, there is little but praise to be said. The sunny cheer pouring in a gentle stream of light from a tender, cloud-mottled sky, down into the shady heart of the scene through an opening in the tree tops; or trickling through the meshes of the leaves and shooting in golden veins across the cool, moist meadow; the noble trees rearing their tall, grey stems with solid dignity of bearing, decked in the rich garniture of lichens and mosses; the firm, delicate drawing of the foliage, revealing the method which nature delights to display even in her most mazy confusion, are so many simple tones, by a happy combination and arrangement of which Mr. Redgrave has produced one of the manifold delightful songs which may be sung of the woods. With a little more tenderness and true freshness of color in the greens, this picture would answer all the requirements of a complete picture; it is now the most truly beautiful landscape in the oil collection.

Nos. 116, 151½, and 154, by Edward Armitage, are characteristic examples of the kind of Art to which the Royal Academy has long stood as sponsor, and which has always received its warmest benedictions. An heroic or religious affectation in the choice of subject; a substitution of invention, or academic rules of composition for imaginative conception—demonstrating a want of true sympathy with the subject, or the feebleness of the artist—an inane subordination of particular to general facts, with a view to sustaining their assumed character of noble idealization; the rareness of great power, or refined perception of color; (since neither comes without integrity of purpose;) an obtrusive, trickish, "masterly" style of handling, are almost unfailing accompaniments of the art which had its birth in external pressure rather than in internal need, and which for one hundred years has been exultingly called the "high art" of England. There is so much to condemn and so little to admire in these pictures, that I will simply say, notwithstanding the large dramatic power shown in the "Sampson," they are the worst examples of their class in the exhibition.

Frederick Leighton exhibits three pictures, Nos. 127, 129, and 180, which also evince an unhealthy ambition in choice of theme, but in the treatment of which he displays an originality of conception and power of painting, that only increase our regret that he has not given his ability to the illustration of a more congenial class of subjects. I assume that this is not congenial—notwithstanding the fact of his selection—because it is nearly impossible that the modern mind can have any real cognate sympathies with the nature-worship of the Art-producing Greeks.

Our worship is necessarily pantheistic. We make no separate, personified embodiments of its different phases, as recognized and enjoyed by us; the indwelling spirit of the sea, is the same as that which haunts the woods and hills—one and universal; and in our warmest invocation we but breathe the simple word "Nature," and its echo reverberates throughout all space. We may take intellectual cognizance of the state of the Greek consciousness through the medium of its external manifestations, as in its mythology, art and literature; or, perhaps, arrive at a certain factitious communion with the Hellenic spirit, by some such diluent process of poetical superinduction as characterizes Keats's "Endymion"; but that perfect comprehension and absorption of its essence, necessary to a vital reproduction of its ideal embodiments, is well nigh impossible to us of the present day. The "Orpheus and Eurydice," No. 180, gives a promise of largeness of design, and power of individual characterization, which neither of Mr. Leighton's other works, painted at a later date, at all fulfils. Although essentially constructed upon the principles of modern harmony, we receive through its action some glimmering sense of feebly-struck Greek tetrachords with the immutable fates standing at either extreme.

As a conception, "Pan," No. 129, is fully equal in intellectual rapidity to the average standard of modern "classical ideals." The personified type of the universe, through Mr. Leighton's interpretation, becomes a fruit-sucking, jolly, good-natured rustic, who goes about tending sheep for a belly-full of fruit per day.

The "Venus and Cupid," No. 127, is another name possessing an intellectual significance amounting to zero. There is a long reach between the "Venus of Milo" and this of Mr. Leighton's, which is partially accounted for, perhaps, by the fact that the "Venus Pandemos" is the only one recognized in our modern mythology. As a theme for exercising his power of color, Mr. Leighton is right in choosing the flesh of a beautiful woman; but in thinking that, in order to re-produce the Greek, ideal Venus—perhaps the "Venus Urania"—it is only required to paint a pretty, insipid woman, without drapery, he is wholly wrong, and, considering the breadth of his artistic scope, deserves to be righted. Accept this picture, however, simply as a work of color, and, in this sense, no similar effort which has been exhibited here during many years, (speaking only from my own observation) bears any comparison with it.

In this latitude, such of us as have had no opportunities of foreign study, class the works of Stuart and Allston as types of the highest excellence in the qualities of true flesh painting. Mr. Leighton's "Venus" in no wise dims the beauty of these works, as, considering the very different key-tone of his flesh and the character of its modulations, he does not indeed fairly enter into competition with them; but he has here displayed a closeness of perception and a mastery of expression in this most difficult walk of art, which must ultimately give him a place among the "great colorists."

It is a satisfaction to be enabled to say, that this picture is not only the greatest work of color in the collection, but that it repays all our study, (as color,) and fully justifies our warmest admiration.

"Prince Henry assuming his Father's crown," No. 128, by J. C. Horsley, is another, and the last of the "heroic" class of art-embodiments contained in this department of the exhibition, and which, like the others of its kind, although in a less degree, exposes itself to attack by a palpable foreing of a feeble conception beyond its natural stature. Breadth of canvass will never supply a deficiency in breadth of ideas. The royal aspirations of the "Prince" could as well be expressed in an area of one square foot, as in this of twenty. The stretching of the noble heir into colossal stature in order that he may corporeally typify his intellectual ambition, is perfectly in accordance with the dominant principle of the "old school" theories, but does not engage any motive of genuine Art.

The "Prince" has a large, "rolling eye" but the "fine frenzy" which it betokens, would, in time, I think, prove too much for the frail body that supports it; which, at the waist, for want of solid painting, good modelling, and space in the background, looks as if it were crushed flat against the wall of the apartment.

The accessories are the real objects of interest, some of which are painted with rare skill; but this subordination of a weak expression of central ideas to a skilful, thoughtful rendering of unimportant details, is not the kind of subordination which should characterize "high art."

VOCAL BEAUTIES

OF THE

"ROSE OF CASTILLE."

This Opera was written for the performances of the "Pyne Opera Troupe," by HENRY BAFFE. It has been received with great favor throughout England, being performed with distinguished success at the recent marriage festivals of the Princess Royal. The following selections comprise nearly the whole work, and, as a whole, possess those qualities which have won for them considerable popularity in this country, and which will be greatly increased by the performance of the Opera in the United States, which will take place at an early day.

- | | |
|--|----|
| I'm but a simple peasant maid. | 20 |
| Convent Cell. | 20 |
| These two simple ballads possess much beauty, and will be found superior to previous operatic ballads of Baffe's composition. | |
| List to the gay Castanet. | 20 |
| Exuberant with the spirit of life and gaiety, the least difficult of the series. It is the first in the Opera and is sung Miss Susan Pyne. | |
| Yes, I'll obey. Scherzo. | 40 |
| Brilliant variations for the voice with highly effective echo passages; the bravura song of Miss Louisa Pyne. The whole to be accompanied ad libitum by a Chorus. | |
| Hark, the Clarion Sounding. | 30 |
| A martial song in Bolero time, written for Baritone voice in the Opera. Many will admire it more than Donizetti's celebrated "On to the Field." | |
| Her gentle voice express'd no guile. | 20 |
| 'Twas rank and form that tempted thee. | 20 |
| Really exquisite ballads in the style of that celebrated song, "Then you'll remember me," made universally popular by the charming execution of Mr. Harrison. | |
| Your pardon, Senors. | 60 |
| A charming duetino, as performed by Louisa and Susan Pyne. In the performance of the Opera this is a rapturously encored and is invariably looked for with eagerness. | |
| Though Fortune darkly o'er me frowns. | 20 |
| Written for a contralto or bass voice, and will, like the famous Romanza of the same composer, "The Heart bow'd down," find many admirers. | |
| The Muleteer's Song. | 20 |
| A characteristic song; lively, bold and adventurous, for tenor voice. | |
| Love's the greatest plague in life. | 20 |
| A humorous song, rather easy of performance. | |
| I'm not the queen. Laughing Trio. | 40 |
| Previous to this but one laughing Trio has been written, and this will be found to meet a most decided welcome among those who favor the unique in musical composition. | |
| O, were I queen of Spain. | 40 |
| A very brilliant and difficult song, with many delicately finished passages, which will make it a favorite concert piece with accomplished female vocalists. | |
| The Queen my presence doth require. | 75 |
| Duet for soprano and bass voices. | |
| Wine, wine, the magician thou art. | 75 |
| The celebrated bacchanal Trio, as executed by the principal male characters in the Opera. | |
| Keep thy heart for me. | 20 |
| Ah, far more than my crown. } | 25 |
| O happy, joyous day. } | 25 |
| Sung by Miss Louisa Pyne. | |
| Dost thou fear me? Duet. | 75 |
| A very fine duet, of highly dramatic coloring, for soprano and tenor, tasking both voices not a little, but hardly difficult to those versed in Italian Opera Music. | |
| O joyous happy day. Aria. | 40 |
| The song with which the Queen of Castille welcomes the day of her wedding. Louisa Pyne's Bravura Song in the opera. | |
| In every feature like the Queen. Quartet. | 65 |
| For soprano and three male voices, (baritone and two basses. | |

Musical Orthodoxy.

From the German of MINE. JOHANNA KINKEL.

With these words Frau Werl departed, leaving Ida in a state of exquisite mental anguish. For that evening she was incapable of thought or reflection. The rude assault upon her most sacred feelings had cast a shadow over the purity of her soul. A feeling of shame oppressed her, as if she, and not Frau Werl, had spoken of this marriage. The variations which she had vowed to let no other studies interrupt, were doubly loathsome; her favorite compositions could not comfort her, for they had been the cause of their strife; and, alas, the last refuge of her wounded heart!—to call up his image in her imagination and dream of him, was taken away from her. She had felt fully the coldness and formal politeness of his leave-taking that day. A barrier had been raised between them, and however gladly she would have seen him again, that she might tear it away, the cruel language of Frau Werl had made it impossible for her to enter Selvar's house without constraint and embarrassment.

Thus passed several days, until a note from the Count informed her that he was confined to the house by illness, and longed once more for her company. The next moment she was on her way to him. Finding several persons at the tea-table, she determined to be upon her guard and watch closely the feelings of the others toward her.

She could not deny to herself, that some among them glanced at each other, with contemptuous smiles, whenever her eye timidly and for a moment sought the face of the Count; that others drew back from her, politely indeed, but evidently enough to wound her feelings; that it cost the young Countess an effort to restrain within due limits her antipathy to a person, who seemed to lessen the space she occupied in her father's heart; and that—bitterest of all—he was evidently more fearful of laying himself open to ridicule than of wounding her feelings. And deeply it pained her, that he no longer was so fascinated with her, and so careless of all else, as during those first memorable evenings at Waldheim.

Every evening made the chasm between them wider, for Ida lost her vivacity by degrees, and became dull and gloomy in society. So her presence became rather a burden than a pleasure to the Count. At home she wept over the beautiful dream, never to return. At one moment she despaired of regaining Selvar's affection, and at another would cherish the hope of again finding the charm, which should again enkindle it. Sometimes she would vow never to see him more; then life would become a burden, and soon she would again yield to the attraction which brought her into his dangerous presence.

However strong her determination to appear joyous and at ease, she was sure to find herself watching with saddened heart for some, even the slightest mark of love, of the glow of passion from his mouth. But, alas for her! his eye remained ever clear and friendly, his voice mild and kind as that of a father, but it never trembled or faltered. Was Ida occasionally overpowered by recollections of the past, did some songs call tears into her eyes, the words of which Selvar had once tenderly to her ear alone repeated, as expressive of his feelings towards her,—he became at once coldly polite, and turned the conversation upon indifferent topics.

Her anguish consumed her. He was as irresistibly charming and loveable as ever to her, and she could not give up his society. That she no longer pleased him as formerly, appeared perfectly natural and she blamed him not. She felt the great change in herself; and was conscious, that a girl dispirited, broken by weeping and unable to rule herself, must of necessity be a tedious companion to such a man as the Count. Her professional duties became as wearying and wearing as the pangs of her unlucky affection. Formerly she had borne patiently with a succession of ear-splitting lessons, strengthened by the thought of the delightful evening, which was to reward the labors of the day. Now every false chord of her pupils grated with double harshness upon her excited nerves. In one of her lessons, during which a girl, utterly destitute of musical ear, persisted in striking with the right hand a major third to a minor chord in the left, it wrought her up, in her excited condition, to the thought of suicide. On her way home, she murmured to herself: "Why should one live, when she has nothing to look forward to from youth to age, but the constant hearing of false notes—and nothing else?"

And Selvar? He was conscious of having made a false step, in trusting to his power of freeing himself from a flirtation with a country-bred girl with the same ease as, for instance, one with the wife of the French Ambassador. How deeply the arrow had pierced her, with all the wealth of his experience in love affairs, he had no means of judging. He had supposed, that so soon as he himself had regained the proper limits, he should have no difficulty by a constant, kindly and soothing demeanor towards her, in reducing her strong passion to the measure of a sort of filial affection. That he, the old master, like the magician's apprentice, had raised a power he could not quell, made him almost angry with Ida, whose sad and melancholy looks he would gladly have escaped.

So passed the winter, and in March the Count's family returned to Waldheim. Selvar himself went upon a journey of some weeks with his daughter and her husband. His sister remained alone in the country to see to the improvements which he had undertaken in house and garden. She was an elderly woman, kind, amiable and motherly, and had most earnestly advised Ida to take a short vacation from her labors. Most of these weeks Ida spent at the villa, and felt her heart, though still suffering, lighter and herself refreshed. The good lady soothed her so gently, and probed the wound so kindly; she knew how to excuse, to admonish and to be silent, according to the necessity of the case. She had the rare talent to comfort without awakening false hopes and without destroying that last pleasure of those whose affections are misplaced,—the occasional sinking into dreamy revery.

Ida accompanied her through the wide-spread, lonely garden, in which still lay here and there patches of the winter's snow. To-day the first warm breath of the South refreshed her. A bunch of violets just blossomed met her eye, and like an electric shock came the thought: "From this moment must all, all be changed!"

What—was not that the carriage, which at this moment she heard entering the court? Yes—he returns! Her heart flamed again—she started towards the carriage, then restrained herself and held fast upon the arm of the old lady, to conquer her excitement, during their calmer greetings. A second carriage followed. From the first alighted the young Countess, who greeted Ida with a peculiar and slightly sarcastic smile, and then whispered a few words to her husband, who turned upon her a look of ironical curiosity. Selvar sprang from the other carriage, busy and lightly as a youth, and gave his hand to a beautiful woman some eight-and-twenty years of age, whom he presented to his sister as their guest. Then he welcomed Ida, and in a friendly tone added: "You owe me thanks; for I bring into your neighborhood the singer of our time, she, whom you have so often wished to hear. We were for a time in the same hotel, and I obtained a star engagement for her here; and for the present she will remain with us to rest from the labors of the winter. Here, Madame Fioretta," added he, turning to the stranger, "allow me to present to you a female Kapellmeister."

The songstress answered Ida's greeting very slightly and turned her discourse again immediately to the gentlemen. She had a full share of the ill-manners usual to the heroines of the theatre in their intercourse with women. She had eye and ear in company for men alone, and this, not merely because she expected to find a higher and deeper cultivation in them; not at all she conversed with the stupidest man rather than with the most refined and educated woman.

Madame Fioretta, after singing several scenes in which Ida accompanied, and at her request transposed at once into other keys, must have been convinced that hers was an artistic nature every way equal at least to herself.

Yet she deigned her no word, never appealed to her judgment, still less took any notice of it, when, in the stream of her discourse, Ida ventured upon an opinion, and suddenly abashed, left half her remark unspoken. With the exception of Ida all were delighted with the contest of wits, which Madame Fioretta at the table kept up with the Count, and which sparkled like fireworks. She was witty and possessed of both a cool heart and head. The Count could not conceal his pleasure in the lively and confident manner of the Italian, and Ida saw how night closed in before her eyes ever darker and gloomier, until at last came the hour which left her at liberty.

The next morning she could not be prevailed upon to remain; and at last the carriage was put at her disposal to convey her to the city. The Fioretta, who liked not to accompany herself, being in the habit of gesticulating when singing, joined seriously with the family in urgent invitations to Ida, to repeat her visits soon and often. She promised this and was disposed to force herself to do so, rather than admit to herself the real ground of her unwillingness to comply.

Filled with doubts as to the real state of her own heart, and almost incapable of connected thought, she was rambling outside the city the next afternoon, among the gardens and country seats, which were scattered along the road to Waldheim. It was already twilight when she came in sight of the lofty white house. In doubt whether to turn, she stood still for a time, then moved forward again, and so at length came out upon the bank of the brook, which separated her from the garden, at a spot where she could see the windows of the music room. These were all ablaze with lights; she could distinguish in the stillness of the night the well-known voices, and soon, after an unskilful prelude which betrayed the hand of the young Countess, began one of the Count's favorite airs from Rossini, which he had more than once in vain besought Ida to sing. Madame Fioretta's execution of it was enough to make one love the entire Italian school. The long, sustained tones of the Adagio, in the deepest register of her voice, trembled and swelled from the most delicious tenderness to most extraordinary power. Like the chime of a peal of crystal bells burst in the Rondo, and its close which lay in the highest Soprano, enabled the singer to unfold the full richness of her noble organ. There was no lofty soul in the performance, nothing but a sensuous enchantment, which, however, might for the moment well have dazzled and carried away the most vigorous 'classicist.'

Ida knew the state of Selvar's feelings at that moment as well as if she had been present; just what he would say, and the expression of face with which he would drink every tone from the singer's lips. She leaned upon the railing and let her tears fall into the brook. How gladly would she have plunged in herself! The water rippled merrily on, yonder she heard another ritornello — she could listen no longer; she turned hastily and hurried back through the darkness to the city.

At the close of an inexpressibly bitter night, with the first rays of the morning sun came the determination which at length saved her. She arose and made all necessary preparations for a journey — whither she knew not. Not until she had sent notes to her pupils dismissing them, and thus rendering a change of purpose impossible, did she open files of musical periodicals from various cities and select as her future abode that in which classical music was especially in vogue. The difficult task of visiting Waldheim could not be omitted. First, she took her leave of Frau Werl, who was good-hearted enough this time to refrain from all sarcastic remarks; expressing her fears, however, that Ida in a strange city, without recommendations and alone, would hardly meet success.

Handel and Haydn Society.

SECRETARY'S REPORT FOR 1858, (MAY 31.)

On the 30th of March, 1815, a meeting was held at Mr. Graupner's Hall, Franklin Street, in consequence of invitations issued, and signed by Gottlieb Graupner, Thos. Smith Webb, and Asa Peabody, in words as follows:

Boston, March 24, 1815.

"SIR:—You are requested to attend a meeting of the principal performers of Sacred Music, from the several choirs in town, on Thursday evening, the 30th inst., at 7 o'clock, at Mr. Graupner's Hall, Franklin Street, for the purpose of considering the expediency and practicability of forming a society to consist of a selection from the several choirs, for cultivating and improving a correct taste in the performance of Sacred Music; and also to introduce into more general practice the works of Handel, Haydn, and other eminent composers."

There were but sixteen persons present at the meeting; among whom, however, we find the names of several who have always acted a conspicuous part in the affairs of the Society, since its first formation; and who are still with us. John Dodd, and the two Parkers — one the father of our excellent organist at the present time, the other our much esteemed Treasurer — are, however, the only ones left us of that devoted band; though others soon united themselves, and are still among the most active of our members.

The names of forty-four are attached to the book of signatures, under the head of "original members;" while a large number were soon after added; so that by the close of the first year, the names of something over one hundred were appended to the list.

At the first meeting of this association, on the thirtieth of March, Matthew S. Parker was chosen clerk, and after some discussion as to the best course to be pursued in furtherance of the enterprise, a committee was chosen, consisting of Messrs. Webb, Peabody, Winchester, Withington, and S. H. Parker, for drafting regulations and framing a constitution for the government of the Society, when the name "Handel and Haydn Society" was adopted, and the regulations signed by thirty-one members, they being all that were present.

This, Gentlemen, was the origin of the Handel and Haydn Society; a meeting of which is this night convened for the forty-third annual choice of officers.

At the first choice of officers, which soon followed, Thomas Smith Webb was chosen President, and Matthew S. Parker, Secretary.

At a subsequent meeting — it having been stated by the President that money would be required to meet the necessary expenses incurred — a loan of three dollars from each person present was made; amounting to fifty-four dollars. Whether this money was ever refunded, does not appear.

The Society was then fairly launched; but she had little motive power, though frequent meetings were held through the summer for rehearsals; until Feb. 9, 1816, when an act of incorporation was obtained from the Legislature; Caleb Strong, Governor.

The first public performance of this Society took place at the Stone Chapel, on the evening of Christmas, Dec. 25, 1815, when selections from the "Creation," "Messiah," and other works of this class, were sung, closing with the Hallelujah Chorus. The performance was received with such favor and substantial encouragement, as to induce a repetition on the 18th of January following; and among other things of interest which transpired in connection with this concert, was a letter addressed to the Managers of the Boston Theatre, setting forth their intention of giving an Oratorio, (as it was termed), and requesting the Managers of the Theatre to close their house on that night, that the Society might have the benefit of an orchestra; but as some Star was to make his or her appearance on that evening, the request was not complied with. After, however, some negotiation, three gentlemen of the orchestra were allowed to leave; and it appears that that number constituted the entire orchestra for the concert.

This, then, is the early history of our much loved Society; and who is there among us, that does not look with pride on the evidence of our age, in the silvered heads of many of our associates. May they long remain among us, to share our labors and enjoyments!

Mr. President and Gentlemen, the season just closed has been a peculiar one, in consequence of the financial troubles which completely overshadowed the country, and seemed to threaten an association like ours with certain loss, whichever way we chose to turn. To meet for rehearsals only, was positive expense, for an organist and conductor, as well as a hall to meet in, were indispensable; and public performances offered small hope of realizing sufficient to meet expenses. To do nothing was entirely out of the question, for good reasons; so the rehearsals were commenced at about the usual time, and continued until Christmas, when the Society volunteered the performance of the "Messiah" for the charity fund of the Boston Provident Association.

Six other performances were given during the season, all of which were remunerative, through our connection with Mr. Ullman, and the celebrated artists of his troupe; so that, after commencing the season under the most disheartening circumstances that may well be conceived of; during the panic that then prevailed to such an extent as to threaten certain destruction to a large majority of kindred enterprises; we do not consider it as boasting to say, that we have passed through the season with credit to ourselves, and added something like five hundred dollars to our treasury, and with every bill paid.

We have had presented to us, by our late President, during the season, the entire Oratorios of "Israel in Egypt," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," both with orchestral parts; and have performed the latter, to the general acceptance of an appreciative public. "Elijah" has been given twice, the "Messiah" twice, and the "Creation" twice.

Our Society stands this day far in advance of all other similar associations in this country, as to proficiency in high Art, and for the general excellence of its performances; and if we are to believe the somewhat flattering assertions of those foreign artists who have, from time to time, been associated with us, we are but little, if any, inferior to those of Europe, and there are but one or two societies, even there, of greater age.

This Society has, from its first organization, labored to produce nothing but music of the highest order, and with what success its labors have been crowned, we have the most ample proof.

And now, gentlemen, it remains with you and our lady associates to say, whether we shall rest on our hard-earned laurels, and content ourselves with the high position which we have attained, or whether we shall press on to a higher state of Art culture, and a more intimate acquaintance with the works of the great masters.

There are rich mines of wealth yet unexplored by us, and let us, one and all, resolve to lend our undivided support to the new Government, now about to be chosen, in whatever may be thought by that Government to be for the best interests of the Society.

Opening of the New Opera House in London.

From the London Times of May 17th.

The grand event of the past week has been the long and anxiously-expected opening of the new theatre in Bow street, for the first performance of the 12th season of the Royal Italian Opera. This important ceremony took place on Saturday night. Up to the last few days it was very generally regarded as impossible to get the building ready for the accommodation of the public at the time announced; but "qui vent pent" was Mr. Gye's motto; and, not for the first time, he kept explicit faith. Early in the evening a line of private carriages and vehicles of humbler pretensions stretched uninterrupted from Leicester-square to Bow street. The streets adjacent to the theatre were crowded with lookers on, and these incidents, enhanced by sundry evidences of preparation to commemorate Her Majesty's birthday, which was publicly kept on Saturday, imparted a sort of festival air to the whole. The first aspect of the exterior of the theatre was by no means inviting. A great deal seemed wanting to encourage the belief that any representation would take place within its walls in less than an hour. But incredulity was quickly dissipated. The doors were thrown open at the appointed time, and the crowd rushed in. The pit and galleries were soon filled; but the boxes and stalls were approached more cautiously; and even when the performance began (at about 25 minutes to 9) not more than three-fourths of them were occupied. One by one, however, the authorized tenants claimed their rights; and before the first scene had terminated, the house was thronged by as brilliant an audience as ever assembled in a theatre.

The first view of the interior was somewhat disappointing. It did not seem so vast as had been anticipated. But the eye was deceived by the height of the ceiling, the comparative simplicity of the decorations, and the fact of there being only three grand tiers of boxes, in place of the four which constituted the old theatre. Little by little, as the eye familiarized itself with the scene, the proportions of the house appeared to widen; the great chandelier, suspended from the centre of the ceiling, seemed to recede further and further from the gaze of those in the area; and to the inhabitants of the pit the dimensions of the proscenium became gradually more capacious, till the conviction was at last realized that one of the largest and one of the most magnificent theatres in Europe had been erected within the amazingly brief period of six months.

The interval between 8 o'clock and the rising of the curtain was by no means an interval of dullness, since it was absorbed by an examination of everything worth notice, and scarcely half the topics thus suggested had been discussed, when applause, that grew rapidly into tumultuous cheering, announced the arrival of Mr. Costa, whose unexampled popularity as a conductor owes its first origin to his connection with our Italian operas. The cheering was repeated again and again, until the audience were exhausted, and another interval occurred. At length the wished for moment came. The short instrumental prelude which in the Huguenots usurps the place of overture at once satisfied connoisseurs that not only the chief of the orchestra but the men over whom he ruled were the same as formerly. It was a treat to hear this noble band of instrumentalists once again complete. About the acoustic properties of the new building, while already disposed to think highly, we shall reserve our opinion until further experience warrants us in advancing it without hesitation. When the curtain rose, and the hall of Count Nevers, with its lofty windows in the background, and its imaginary gardens outside, once more revealed itself, the audience again broke out into applause. There sat Signor Tagliafico, looking every inch a Count; while the piercing tones of Signor Soldi, the most zealous of tenors, ever and anon made themselves audible amid the clang and tumult of the orchestra. Soon an enthusiastic shout of recognition welcomed the approach of Raoul de Nangis, in whose familiar costume Signor Mario had not appeared since 1855, and whose apparition almost suggested the idea of the ghost of the Huguenot nobleman gliding from the ruins of old Covent-garden. The air, "Vergin divina" (with the viola accompaniment in the orchestra), given by Mario in his most expressive manner, set another point at rest which is now and then one of considerable anxiety at the beginning of the operatic "season;" Mario was "in good voice," as the phrase goes, and evidently intent upon singing his very best. Herr Formes (we presume) not having returned from America, M. Zelger took the part of Marcel, with which he is thoroughly conversant, since he personated the character in 1846, when the Huguenots was first produced in this country by the Brussels company at Drury-lane Theatre—one of the earliest undertakings of Mr. Delafield, to whom the public were indebted for its subsequent representation on the Italian boards. M. Zelger was warmly received, and his voice told well in the chorale, the subject of which Meyerbeer borrowed from the Lutheran collection, and Mendelssohn made the basis of his symphony of The Reformation. "Più, più," too, in which the furious Huguenot devotes the monks and their shrines to perdition, was heard with interest. Another sensation was created by the appearance of Mademoiselle Nantier Didiée, who, as Urbano, the Queen's page, received a hearty welcome, and sang the well-known "Nobil donna" with her accustomed cleverness. In the second scene of the first act, the painter's art is exhibited even to greater advantage than in the first. Mademoiselle

Marai, the Queen (announced by Mr. Pratten's admirable flute solo), robust as she has grown, had not been forgotten by the audience; but she and all else were speedily eclipsed when the great public favorite of . . . and twenty years was seen to descend into the garden from the broad flight of steps to the right. The Valentine of the occasion was hailed with that genuine British enthusiasm which a British audience has never withheld from Giulia Grisi, the still unrivalled quality of whose middle tones was made apparent in the first vocal phrase she had to utter. Then came the trio for female voices, in which, as usual, Madame Tagliafico took part; then the chorus and dance of bathers, which was not remarkable; then the air composed by Meyerbeer expressly for Alboni, "No, no, no," which Mademoiselle Nantier sings effectively, though not so effectively as Alboni; then the appearance of Raoul with the bandage over his eyes, and the duet with Margarite, which Mario, by voice and mien and action, endows with so chivalrous and romantic a character; and, lastly, the finale where the oath of allegiance is taken by Catholic and Huguenot, while Marcel mutters bigotry and hatred; where Raoul rejects the hand of Valentine, St. Bris and Nevers invoking vengeance; and the scheme by means of which Margarite de Valois hopes to bring about a reconciliation between the opposing parties falls to the ground. All these incidents were portrayed with the accustomed life and vigor.

The second (third) act did not commence so well, although the scene of the Pré aux Clercs was striking. The "Rataplan" might have gone more smoothly; nor did the ballet (somewhat lengthened) afford much amusement. To crown all, the Chief of the night watch sang the old French tune of the "couvre-feu" which seems to enjoy a traditional right to be out of tune—more out of tune than the audience could put up with. The rest, however, made amends. In the duet where Valentine reveals herself to Marcel, Grisi, (ever noted for redeeming the short-comings of others by additional efforts on her own part,) achieved one of her greatest successes. Her delivery of the phrase—was equal to any of her happiest moments. As if to emulate so good an example, Mario was magnificent in the duet septet, and gave the famous "Si, noi sprezziamo" in such a manner as to call forth an enthusiastic "encore," which Mr. Costa as prudently as obstinately resisted. The voice of Mario cannot stand such exertion with impunity, even with the aid of transposition. The remainder of the finale—including the quarrel between the Huguenots and Catholics, interrupted by the entrance of the Queen on horseback, the arrival of Nevers in a gorgeously constructed barge, filled with musicians, knights, pages, and ladies of honor, to take away Valentine and his bride, and the incidental festivities, contrasted with the fierce menaces of the hostile parties—was uniformly effective; and as the curtain fell the stage presented one of those striking, various, animated pictures to which the public had been accustomed of old by the Royal Italian Opera. The third (fourth) act, the dramatic master-piece of Meyerbeer, may be dismissed in few words. The scene of the plot (St. Bris, Signor Polonini) was hardly so impressive as we have known it, and the chorus of the Benediction of the Swords, for a wonder, escaped its time-honored "encore." Haste of preparation had, no doubt, much to do with this; but the principal cause was the lateness of the hour, midnight having struck before the monks promised eternal beatitude to the authors of the Huguenot massacre. Had the audience, nevertheless, been ever so impatient, they could hardly have failed to be enraptured with the splendid duet between Valentine and Raoul, which has made the Huguenots immortal, and in which Grisi and Mario, with indomitable ardor, succeeded in reviving the glories of the past. We have seldom witnessed a more enthusiastic demonstration than that which greeted the two admirable performers at the end of this striking manifestation of their power, to describe which at length would be going over old ground to no purpose. Suffice it, this was the triumph of the evening, and here, unexpectedly, the opera terminated.

"Una donna O Marcello che Padera, E che mozza per salvar suoi di—"

After the duet, Mr. A. Harris came forward, and hinting at the encroachment on the Sabbath, left it to the discretion of the audience whether they would hear the national anthem at once, or insist upon the last act of the opera being proceeded with. This led to a "row," which was hardly warranted. The galleries were for the last act; the stalls and boxes for the anthem; and for a long time neither could prevail. Mr. Harris re-appeared, and invoked the good feeling of the audience, on the plea that faith had been kept with regard to opening the theatre, and that such an achievement merited some indulgence in return. This appeal was answered by volleys of applause from the "aves," and strong opposition from the "nocs." The curtain went up, however, and the national anthem was sung by Madame Grisi and the whole company in the midst of a discreditable uproar.

Thus ended, at half an hour past midnight, the first performance in the new theatre, which we cannot but regard as one of the most extraordinary feats ever accomplished.

Sarrette, the Founder of the Conservatoire at Paris.

The Revue et Gazette Musicale lately published an account of the funeral of a most venerable and distinguished member of the musical profession in Paris. M. Sarrette, the founder and earliest director of the Conservatoire. The venerable professor considerably outlived the allotted span, and had completed his ninety-second year ere he expired. Most of the present professors of the institution of which he was the founder, among whom were Auber, Halevy, and Ambroise Thomas, attended the mournful ceremony, which took place in the Church of Bonne Nouvelle. During the service the orchestra of the opera, directed by M. Girard, executed a number of pieces by Cherubini and Beethoven; a Pius Jesus, by M. Paneron, was also sung. The funeral procession then set out for the cemetery of Montmartre, where M. Edouard Monnaix, Imperial Commissary, delivered the following oration:

"It is in the name of the Conservatorium that I am come to bid farewell to the eminent man who was its creator, and who, for a space of twenty years, governed it with so firm and so skilful a hand.

"I shall not attempt to trace a biography; neither the time nor the place will allow it. I will only recall to mind that Bernard Sarrette was born at Bordeaux on the 27th of November, 1765, and that to him was granted the privilege of growing old without any sensible deterioration of his uncommon qualities.

"The man who distinguished himself by rendering a great service to musical art in France was not himself a musician; but his mind was endowed with those natural gifts which in the application of a happy idea, are often of greater value than a special education. Entrusted, in the first instance, with the organization of the music of the Garde Nationale of Paris, associated subsequently with our celebrated Gossec for the formation of that school of military music which sent musicians to the fourteen armies of the republic, he discovered in that very school the germ of a much vaster and more important institution.

One day, in 1794, a petition was addressed to the National Convention advocating the interests of the musical art, then threatened with destruction, if the State did not rescue it by throwing open to it a public asylum, an ark in the universal deluge; and the Conservatorium was created under the tutelage of five inspectors, and five great artists, Gossec, Grétry, Mehul, Lesueur, and Cherubini. Sarrette was associated with them in the capacity of a demonstrator. The title of director was conferred on him shortly afterwards.

"Up to that time France had no doubt possessed both a music and musicians of her own; she had engendered master pieces, but she was without a school. From the foundation of the Conservatorium dates in reality the French school, for from that moment there arose a fixed doctrine, a regular system of instruction, a set of methods composed by the most renowned masters. In a word, there was a French art, long disputed but eventually recognized by rival nations, who in the present day pay homage to our composers by borrowing their works; to our professors by coming to seek instruction from them; to our artists by receiving them with favor, often even by conferring on them signal triumphs.

"In forming the Conservatorium, Sarrette had met with support from the sympathy of influential men of his time, from the community of opinion which united a great number of them.

"The empire discerned all that was generous and fruitful in the thought and in the work. It adopted the institution, still in its infancy, extended, raised, enriched it as an establishment destined to confer honor on the country.

"By a fatal transition in another epoch and under another regime, what had been a protection was become a peril. Sarrette was banished from the school of which he had been the father; the very existence of the school was seriously compromised and its title abolished, soon to reappear, it is true, and inaugurate a new era.

"Subsequently to 1815, Sarrette ceased to have any connection with the Conservatorium, and remained a mere spectator of its divers fortunes. What, nevertheless, must have been his secret joy—I am bold to say his legitimate pride—at seeing his creation survive him in some sort, and grown to sufficient strength to dispense with his help! What was his consolation when, among his successors in the direction of the Conservatorium, he could reckon Cherubini, one of the five inspectors designated by himself, and M. Auber, the pupil of the great master, the illustrious chief of the French school.

"Let us congratulate ourselves that his excellency the Minister of State has recently ordered, in a decree of a sort he has made us familiar with, that a marble bust of Sarrette shall be placed in one of the principal apartments of the school.

"This decision coming, at so opportune a moment, must have offered to the old man, just reaching the term of his noble life, the most touching of rewards, and at the same time the pledge of an immortal remembrance, which commences this day, and will henceforward hover over this tomb."

To these words, which did justice only to the public man, M. Samson added a few more, rendering homage to the qualities of the private citizen. M. Samson was a pupil of the Conservatoire at the time Sarrette was its director, as were M. M. Tulon, Vogt, Panseron, Halevy, Lehoure, Prunier, Guérin, the two Duvernoys, Moreau-Sainti, Benoist, Vasin, and Kokken, who were also present at the funeral.

He and all these had continued on terms of friendship with their former chief, and he, better than any other, could speak of the difficulties which Sarrette had encountered in seeking to unite into one school the teaching of declamation and of music. Political events might despoil Sarrette of the titles justly due to him, but could not touch the attachment and gratitude of those who had shared his labors. Catel, the celebrated composer, bequeathed his little fortune to him. This trait aptly completes his eulogium, and should not be forgotten by his biographers.

German and Italian Opera.

The difference in point of musical structure between such a work as Beethoven's Fidelio and the common run of sweet, melodious Italian operas, is well stated by a writer in the Philadelphia Sunday Topic, in the course of a somewhat too unqualified eulogium upon the singing of Mme. JOHANNSEN. He says:

Beethoven's matchless music, alike with all the compositions of the vigorous, legitimate German school, was written with an unwavering attention to correct flowing rhythm, and to precise time and measure. The instrumentation does not present an everlasting harping upon a few chords and their relative positions, but seems more like an ever-varying kaleidoscope of harmonic combinations, each one of which serves to complete the sympathy of the whole. To an imaginative and reflecting mind, this instrumentation dons the guise of a profoundly written drama, per se, in which even the humblest instrument engaged in the dialogue serves to portray certain passions or emotions. In order, therefore, to preserve entire the beautiful net-work of melodic and harmonic phrases, it becomes absolutely necessary that the prima donna should adhere inflexibly to the perfect rhythm and prescribed time, in no instance allowing her individual caprices to tempt her to distort these into languishing, sustained notes, after the fashion of the Italians. Mark well—herein does the cantatrice from Italy boast an advantage over her sister from Germany. The former has the time in her own hands, hastening or retarding the same to suit her physical and vocal abilities.

She may, with permission of the chef d'orchestre, commence an allegretta caratina, andante, or a forte passage sotto voce, thus treasuring her voice and energies for the climax; and enabling her to bring the full force of these to bear upon one grand roulade; for the orchestral accompaniments to the majority of Italian operas prove singularly accommodating in this respect. The adored Gazziniga has been known to avail herself, not unfrequently, of the unlimited license afforded by this peculiarity of the Italian school; it lay within the power of her leader to retard, to modulate, or to transpose ad libitum, without destroying the effect of the accompaniment.

Not so, however, in the mighty works of the solid German school. The prima donna cannot obtain the slightest concessions from the director without marring the structure of the splendid fabric. She, therefore, finds her energies taxed to the utmost throughout; and while her mind is exercised to its utmost capacity, in her efforts to sing the cadences and movements precisely at the place and in the time indicated by the counterpoint of the composition, it is simultaneously taxed with the elaborate delineation of, and identification with, a character, intended, if properly enacted, to arouse the sympathies of the audience to an intense degree. Those who beheld and heard Mme. Johannsen in that severest of all German roles, Fidelio, will require no recital of her successful conquest of its almost insurmountable difficulties.

LABLACHE'S ABSENCE OF MIND.—When last at Naples he was sent for to the palace, entered the waiting room, and, till called in to his majesty, conversed with the courtiers in attendance. Having a cold in his head, he requested permission to keep on his hat. Getting into full discourse, he was suddenly startled by the gentleman in waiting crying out, "His majesty demands the presence of Signor Lablache." In his eagerness to obey the royal summons he forgot the hat he had on his head, and, snatching up another thus entered the king's cabinet. Being received with a most hearty laugh, Lablache was confounded, but at length recovered himself, and respectfully asked his majesty what had excited his hilarity. "My dear Lablache," replied the king, "pray tell me which of the two hats you have got with you is your own, that on your head, or that in your hand? Or, perhaps you have brought both as a measure of precaution; in case you should leave one behind you." "Ah! maledetta," replied Lablache, with an air of ludicrous distress, on discovering his etourderie, "two hats are, indeed, too many for a man who has no head."

The late Professor Dehn.

SIEGFRIED WILHELM DEHN was born on the 25th February, 1800, at Altona, in Holstein, where he went to school until he was thirteen years old. He manifested a remarkable instinct for music from his very infancy; he did not cultivate the art, however, with the idea of becoming a professional musician, but obtained a place as keeper, under the auspices of M. Schenk, in the service of the Administration of Woods and Forests for the Duchy of Holstein.

We shall not follow him in the rough and often perilous existence his duties obliged him to lead, and which his naturally strong constitution assisted him in supporting. Having been wounded while hunting, he left the service, and resumed his studies. In conformity with his father's wish, he followed the law lectures at the University of Leipzig, in order to prepare himself for a diplomatic career. In 1824, he went to Berlin, and was attached to the Swedish Embassy, but unfortunate events changed his destiny; his father died, after losing all his fortune, and young Dehn was left without resources. It was then that the musical art, which had hitherto been only an amusement, became the means of saving him. An eminent artist, Bernard Klein, whose talent is not yet sufficiently appreciated, gave him some lessons—eighteen in all; and these were sufficient to enable the ex-diplomatist to exercise with success the professor's calling.

From this moment, Dehn devoted himself entirely to teaching the theory of music, and had numerous pupils. Klein died some few years afterwards, and Dehn was, so to speak, his heir and successor in a profound knowledge of musical literature and theory. With a degree of obstinate perseverance, of which we meet but a few examples, he sounded the depths of the science, and was not long in taking his rank among the musical celebrities of the day; in fact, composers and executants, of the greatest talent, studied under him. Among others, we may name the celebrated Russian composer, Glinka, who studied counterpoint with him, and always returned, even after long intervals, for fresh lessons.

From the 24th March, 1842, Dehn was Conservator of the musical division of the Royal Library at Berlin. It would be superfluous for us to enumerate the services he rendered in this situation; we shall, perhaps, never find any one to replace him. He made several journeys to Vienna, Munich, Venice, and other parts of Italy: while on these excursions, which were of great use to the Royal Library, he was constantly searching for rare editions, buying manuscripts, and effecting exchanges. In the years 1851, 1852, and 1854, especially, he was charged to visit Breslau and Silesia, and was successful in all his journeys.

Without entering into a detailed account of his labors, we will content ourselves with saying that he pursued them to the end with indefatigable zeal, and that age had in no degree impaired his energy. The very day a fit of apoplexy tore him so suddenly from his wife and two children, he had gone to the library as usual.

Among the many persons who followed his mortal remains, were celebrities of all kinds, especially musicians, almost all of whom, after being his pupils, are now eminent masters.

Dr. Jonas pronounced the funeral oration. The members of the Domchor executed a chorale, and a Lied by Mendelssohn.—Revue et Gazette Musicale.

Dr. Ward's Opera.

This new English opera entitled "Flora, or the Gipsy's Frolic" has had four representations at the house of Dr. Ward on University Place. The principal characters were taken by lady and gentlemen amateurs, and their performances gave great satisfaction to the numerous guests present on each occasion. This opera, original with the Doctor, is a decided success, and most of the songs and duets are very pleasing in their character. We shall publish one or more of them in The Musical World for the benefit of our readers.

We hope this opera will be produced at some place of amusement where the public can have an opportunity of judging of its merits. The argument is as follows:

Popinjay, a village innkeeper, on the occasion of his daughter's birthday, invites his friends and neighbors to a rustic fete; during which Count Ernest, who is on his way to visit the Lady Flora after his return from the wars, stops awhile at the village to rest his horse; and is induced by the beauty of the queen of the fete, and the solicitations of the host, to join the merry-making. The gipsy girl is admitted to tell the fortunes, and promote the pleasures of the guests. She is a shrewd and mischievous, but not malicious creature; and soon perceives among the various ingredients of which the party is composed, much fitting material for the exercise of her wit and love of frolic. She accordingly sets them severally by the ears, by working upon the vanity of Dame Popinjay to bore her husband for new finery—by exciting the coquetry of Annette to endeavor to attract the attention of the Count, to the great discomfiture of Claude, her rustic lover—and lastly, by drawing the attention of the highly-sensitive Lady Flora to this seeming infidelity of her lover, while rambling lete-a-lete with the village queen—all this necessarily produces a state of embrouillement, which terminates the first act.

In the second act the men are discovered seeking consolation in wine for the estrangement of their several mates; and the gipsy, having had her frolic, begins to feel some remorse at the extent to which the contending parties have carried their controversies, and resolves to reconcile those whom so lately she had fully sought to divide. She induces Claude, the village minstrel, to soften his coquetish mistress with a serenade, and warns her of the danger of driving her lover to the wars by her unkindness. She persuades Dame Popinjay that she will more surely succeed in her wishes with her husband by ceasing to annoy him with her importunities; and finally, in the third act, bribes the farrier to lame the Lady Flora's horse, so that she is obliged to leave the chase, and dismount at the village in the neighborhood of the Count; where she solemnly warns her that her lover, though guilty of a little pardonable gallantry, is not unfaithful to her; and shrewdly recommends that his fidelity be tested by exposing him once more to the fascinations of the village belle, who is privy to the scheme. Marie, the confidante, urges the justice of this course; and the lady, after a highly exciting struggle with her pride, finally consents to the plot; which results in the complete vindication of the Count, and his reconciliation with the lady. Their happiness soon contagiously affects the rustic lovers; and brings on a state of general good feeling, to the great satisfaction of the gipsy, who is discovered, in the end, to be one of Popinjay's children, who was stolen away in her infancy by a band of roving gipsies that chanced to pass that way.—*N. Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JUNE 7.—Some years ago, an operatic enterprise was started in New York, by a number of Italian singers, on a sort of mutual benefit system, the performers themselves being directly interested in the concern, by investing their services, instead of receiving regular salaries, as is customary. The company thus formed appeared at Niblo's, and though it soon became divided against itself, and fell, yet during its brief existence it managed to give some superb lyric representations. The singers, knowing that the profits and their portion thereof depended entirely upon their own attractiveness, spared no efforts to please the public, and first-class artists undertook roles, that under other circumstances they would have indignantly refused. Bosio, for instance, sang Adalgisa to the Norma of Rose de Vries, and the basso and baritone quite threw themselves away.

Something like this we have now at the Academy of Music. The well-known artists GAZZANIGA, BRIGNOLI, AMODIO, MISS PHILLIPPS, GASPARONI, and GASSIER have crystallized into a troupe, and are giving operas in the most superb style. The season opened last Monday evening, with La Favorita. This is quite a new role for Gazzaniga, she having performed it for the first time, during her recent visit to Havana. She does it well, but not remarkably so. The aria: Ah! mio Fernando, and the final duet, were the only points she made, though her acting, especially in the last act, was worthy of all praise. Brignoli sang sweetly in his role of Fernando. Amodio was very good in his part of the King; while Gasparoni as Baltasar was exceedingly bad. On Wednesday and Friday evenings, La Traviata was given. This is, as you know, Gazzaniga's greatest role, and, as I have before had occasion to observe, she renders it much more effectively than the much vaunted Piccolomini. Saturday afternoon, was presented Il Barbiere, with Miss Phillipps, Brignoli, Gassier and Gasparoni in the cast. To-night we have Trovatore. It is rumored that two operas new to American audiences—Donizetti's "Martyrs," and Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers" will be produced. The former of these is now very popular all over southern Europe, while the latter under a different title is a great favorite at Naples, and is the only successful opera that Verdi has recently produced.

Mr. Ullmann started suddenly for Europe on Saturday, bent upon some operatic enterprise, and according to rumor Mr. Barnum will very soon follow him, on a similar errand. The subscriptions for Barnum's great Lumley enterprise come in but slowly. Folks do not see why they should pay five dollars a night to hear artists, who do not surpass those whom they can now hear for a dollar; for, with the exception of GIGLI, the tenor, the Lumley troupe is inferior to Maretzek's. PICCOLOMINI is very young, and very beautiful, and very impassioned, but in the peculiar roles in which she is supposed to excel, she is surpassed by Mme. Gazzaniga. As to the idea of bringing over the third-class singers of the troupe, the members of the chorus and orchestra, it is simply absurd, for they offer no peculiar attractions over those we have here. Now, I have noticed that opera-singers are just the same all over the world—at least such limited portions of it, as I have seen. There is always a gaunt man with long legs who takes the lead—there is always a little short man with dark hair and complexion, who sings with painful earnestness and a redundancy of gesticulation—there is always a large fat woman with an expression of hauter, and a low-necked dress—there is always a sharp-nosed woman with cork-screw curls—there are always a number of meaningless automaton-like characters who are quite eclipsed in the mind of the beholder, by the proprietors of the long legs, dark complexion, low-necked dress and cork-screw curls. In orchestras I notice that the violoncello is invariably played by a fat gentleman with a bald head and spectacles—that the flutist has a long nose, and a generally consumptive appearance—that the men who flourish trumpets brave, are mild, queer, self-possessed people, and always drive one wild with fear lest they should fail to strike up at the right moment—for, they are always so self-possessed, that they whisper or gaze at the audience until the very moment that it is time for them to sound their instruments, and then quietly grasp their ponderous machines, and give a blast loud enough to wake the dead, with as much nonchalance as an elderly frog, lazily croaking after nightfall upon the surface of a slimy pond.

The musicians of New York intend to hold a grand "Festival" at the Academy of Music on the 27th inst., when Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" will be performed—CARL FORMES, and other eminent vocalists will assist. The orchestra will consist of over 300 performers; BRISTOW, MARETZKE, BERGMANN, and ANSCHUTZ will act as conductors. On the following day there will be a musical picnic at Jones's Wood in the upper part of the city.

TROVATORE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., JUNE 8.—The only musical event with us of any note for the week past, was the production of a Cantata, by GEORGE HENRY CURTIS, entitled "Forest Melody." The composer of the Music is an American of some pretensions and no little merit. The words are selected from among the fugitive poetry of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, and arranged with much taste and good judgment.

It was composed some five years ago, and not, as Mr. Fry of the Tribune has it, for Dr. CHAS. GUILMETTE, who has now brought it out in a very creditable manner. It is not as yet published, but I hope it may be, as there are some excellent things in it, and in time they would become popular. The accompaniment is somewhat difficult and showy in style, but some of the melodies are truly elegant and graceful. The Baritone part is exceedingly well done. The opening Recitative and Aria of the Prelude: "Song of the Stars," is deserving of especial mention; also the "Hunter's Serenade," and: "The May sun sheds an amber light." These were sung by Dr. GUILMETTE with excellent taste and very effectively. I think Dr. Guilmette the most accomplished and finished male vocalist we have among us. I can see a marked improvement in his singing since I heard him at your great Festival in May, 1857.

The most effective Soprano song is: "Dost thou idly ask to hear," which was sung by Miss BRAINERD in her usual happy style. This song, I am sure, would be much admired if accessible to amateurs, and I hope it may be published.

The most noticeable faults are, too much sameness and repetition in the duets and choruses. With a little judicious use of the scissors in this respect, "Forest Melody" will gradually win its way into at least a moderate popularity.

At the Academy in New York they are having a very successful season of Italian Opera, under the auspices of "Mme. GAZZANIGA & Co.," as it is printed on the tickets. It was the intention to give about five weeks, and so far their success has been quite equal to their expectations. The principal artists have united their forces under the leadership of MARETZKE, and the management of Mr. W. H. PAINE, and everything works smoothly so far. The Operas are announced without any flourish of trumpets or "Cards to the Public," with which that very venerable, but generally very sensible individual, the "Public" is thoroughly disgusted.

Mr. Ullman is reported to have left "very suddenly" for Europe. I hope he will return a wiser and a better man, for it is not impossible to make a very excellent manager yet out of even Mr. Ullman. Some think Mr. Ullman more reckless than enterprising, but then you know it is very easy to be enterprising and operate on the largest scale possible when some one else is obliged to pay the bills; when you have much to gain by success and little to lose by a failure.

The Matinée of last Saturday was well attended, the Opera being Il Barbiere, and the cast excellent, your Boston favorite, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, for the first time in New York at least, singing the role of Rosina. I am not competent to speak critically of this performance of Miss Phillips, as I am too much an admirer of both her acting and singing to speak impartially. Next to Bosio, who sang this role in New York some four years ago, and who is the best Rosina we have ever had in this country, Miss Phillips certainly is entitled to stand. There were several drawbacks to the performance on Saturday. In the first place a Matinée is a very nice place to while away a leisure hour, so convenient to just drop in if you are out shopping, such a charming place for a little innocent flirting, and all that sort of thing; but it is not the place or the occasion for artists to do their best. The artists are no more to blame than the audience, or the audience than the artists; it is an understood thing on both sides. BRIGNOLI is altogether too cumbersome and heavy for an Almaviva. Although he sings the music (as he can sing every thing when he pleases) charmingly, there is no vivacity or spirit in him. Why don't he enter into his profession in earnest, as though he loved it, or give it up?

The Orchestra was not so good as usual,—was several times at variance with the Chorus, though not always wrong. All these obstacles were in the way of an easy rendering of the role of Rosina, but they did not prevent Miss Phillipps from not only doing the part exceedingly well, but also winning much well-deserved applause.

In the "Music Lesson" Scene, the Finale to Cinderella was introduced: "Non più Mesta," with much effect. This seems admirably adapted to be sung in this place if anything is; but I somewhat question the propriety of singing anything not put there by the composer. Miss Phillipps does not appear to so good advantage in the Non più Mesta, for the reason that we have heard the great Alboni so many times sing it as no one else can sing it.

I think GASSIER's Barber the best we have ever had. His by-play and filling up of the part is most admirable, while his singing is equal to our old favorite, Badiali.

AMODIO took the part of Don Bassilio, and it is simply saying what any one would know without its being said, that he did the part admirably.

Last night Trovatore was given, with Miss Phillipps as the Gipsy Mother. How any one can prefer Vestvali in this part to Miss Phillipps, is a mystery to me.

We are to have, so the advertisements in the daily papers say, a "Grand Musical Festival" which I hope will not turn out a grand humbug, but I must say the chances are that way. BELLINI.

BERLIN, MAY 1.—Stern's Singing Society have woven another bright flower into their crown of glory by the production of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." This composition is without a rival in its religious majesty, in its depth of Old Testament feeling, in its tenderness and variety, and yet again in its proud simplicity in the treatment of biblical wisdom and of miracles. This is especially true of the choruses, which in their victorious might and splendor, often exert a magical effect. They are executed throughout with fine shading and technical perfection. The singers, supported by Leibig's Kapelle (orchestra), reproduced successfully the old Handelian spirit and the deep musical life of the master in his fond tone-painting. The solos are far inferior to these choruses; stiff and monotonous in their recitative forms, they will not gracefully conform themselves to our melodiously accustomed ears. Yet the delivery of Frl. JENNY MEYER and of Frl. von HEILIGENSTEDT must be mentioned with approbation. The performance was a contribution to the welcome of the newly married Princess Victoria, who was present with her husband. Various musical efforts were made in honor of her reception; mere occasional pieces, for the most part, of too little artistic importance to be named here. For instance, in the splendid rooms of the Ritter-saal, the picture gallery and the White Hall in the royal palace, which opened the long series of court festivities given in honor of the reception of the Princess, torch-dances by Count Redern, by Spontini and Meyerbeer, were performed by two hundred musicians, under the general military director WIEPRECHT. Moreover, Herren MUECKE, BILLERT and TCHIRCH had their Gesangvereine sing festal hymns to the newly married pair at the castle; the Opera Academy, in the concert hall of the royal theatre, performed a grand National Hymn, written by RELLSTAB and composed by Dr. ZOPPE, &c.

In the subscription concerts of the royal Dom-Choir the most interesting things have been: the performance of Palestrina's Pope Marcellus mass, which saved music from being banished from the Church by the Council of Trent; and Mozart's genial F minor Fantasia, very skilfully arranged by KULLAK for two hands, and played with a sure hand by his pupil, PAPENDICK.

The most important Trio soirées were those of Herren von BUELOW, LAUN and WOHLERS. The programmes were made particularly interesting by Suites and Fantasias, by J. S. Bach, for piano, or viola, or violoncello; among which the superb Fantasia Chromatique was performed with a bravura that carried all before it, although somewhat too wildly and not thoughtfully enough, by LISZT's wonderful pupil, the fifteen year old TAUSIG; also by Beethoven's last Trio, which frequently stands near the direction of "the future;" and finally by works in this direction, such as Liszt's charming Fantasia for two pianos, played with great bravura by Herren KROLL and von BUELOW.

In the Symphony Concerts of the Royal Kapelle, besides the more favorite symphonies, which it still reproduces in the broad beaten track of stereotyped excellence of performance, we have had Haydn's variations on the Austrian people's song, and Mendelssohn's Octet, played by all the big and little fiddles of the orchestra. But such a magnifying of the mass of sound was a mistake in the case of Haydn's tender Quartet; such expenditure of outward means is out of all proportion to the lovely simplicity of its intrinsic meaning. On the contrary, the Mendelssohn work, so saturated with voluptuous euphony, makes an advantageous impression in this form. By several instruments on each part the sound becomes fuller and milder, and little impurities of intonation are smoothed out. The first movement is the most significant; the Scherzo moves in the domain of his well-known fairy romance, into which some turns, too, of the rather stiff and heavy finale make excursions.

The meritorious Symphony Concerts of LIENIG begin to call forth competition in various quarters; especially the Soirées of THADEWALT. It is an extremely refreshing sign, that the more cultivated middle classes no longer frequent any café concert, where they cannot for their 2½ groschen (three-pence) hear at least a Symphony of Beethoven, Haydn or Mozart.

BOSTON, JUNE 12, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—1. Conclusion of SCHUBERT'S Psalm, for four female voices: "The Lord is my Shepherd."

2. Having a couple of pages left open, we fill them with one of the fine old LUTHERAN CHORALS, as harmonized in two different ways by JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. A third arrangement of the same may be found among the "Twelve German Chorals, as harmonized by Bach," published a year or two since by Oliver Ditson & Co. The last German collection of Bach's Chorals (200 in number), gives this choral harmonized in no less than six different ways, showing that it was a special favorite with that inimitable master of the art of sacred composition.

We would once more call the attention of church choirs, choral societies, of all students of the art of composition in four parts, and of all lovers of religious music in its highest purity and beauty,—the perfect blending of what is finest in Art with what is most devout and true in sentiment—to the inestimable value of Bach's Chorals. They ought to be a fundamental text-book with all societies of singers of truly sacred music. They can be sung by choirs of any number of voices, from a single quartet to an oratorio chorus of hundreds. Our music schools and "Institutes" should use them for models in teaching composition; our choirs should sing them on the Sabbath; our Handel and Haydn Societies should impress their beauty, their depth of tenderness, and grandeur on the general ear and feeling, by singing one or more of them with a grand mass of voices in their concerts; our publishers should reprint them by the score and by the hundred. We are sure, that, so soon as some of them shall have been heard a few times in the oratorio festivals and concerts, there will be such demand for the twelve already published here with English words, as to induce the publishers to issue a hundred of them in cheap form. We contribute our mite toward exciting such an interest, by furnishing this specimen to our subscribers.

The peculiar metre of the old German hymns renders these Chorals for the most part unavailable for coupling with the hymns read from the hymn-books in our Congregational service. But we have before suggested several excellent uses which may and should be made of them, and we here repeat the suggestion. We point to Bach's Chorals as the best corrective to the vulgar, flat and soulless psalm-book epidemic, under which our whole land groans.

1. They may be sung as voluntary pieces for opening or closing of service, &c., by choirs; and they suit equally well the largest or the smallest (simple quartet) choir; provided they be executed with the utmost precision and true feeling by good, well-trained voices.

2. They may be used with admirable effect in alternation with congregational singing; a verse of the latter, with organ accompaniment, in strong, homely unison, followed by a verse of the former, by trained voices, without accompaniment, the same hymn responding as it were from a more spiritual height, glorified in the fine harmonies and modulations of Bach; for as he has treated them, you have the religious essence of the music expressed, and purified from all that is low and common.

3. For great Choral or Oratorio Societies, to be sung in their more miscellaneous sacred concerts, or at the beginning and ending of a performance. Nothing has made a finer impression in such concerts here than two of these same Chorals, similarly treated by Mendelssohn in his "St. Paul." When perfectly sung by a great mass of voices, as our Mendelssohn Choral Society gave them, the effect is sublime.

4. In little private musical clubs and circles they will afford the very best sort of practice.

5. For organists and pianists, to be used simply as instrumental pieces, their purity and marvellous beauty and significance of harmony must commend them. There is more religious satisfaction in just playing them on the piano, than in listening to most of the music to be heard in any of our churches. The way in which each of the four parts, and each note in each, so perfectly serves the end of the great whole, is in itself a type of pure devotion.

6. But their most important service will be to musical schools and classes. As models in the art of four-part composition, within the short form of a choral or psalm-tune—an art at which so many try their hands in our day—they will be invaluable. The harmonizing of chorals, with Bach for a model, is made the foundation of all exercises in composition by Marx and the other masters in the German schools.

Music Dealers in Council.

The music publishers have been in council. The "kings of the earth" (the world musical) "take counsel together"—against whom or against what we know not; we do not believe they mean to set themselves, in the long run, against the Art, or the Art's anointed, the artists and true priests of Art. Our Journal has chiefly to do with the artists and not with the (money) "kings" in the world musical; but now that the makers of music seem to be doing nothing, it may not be uninteresting to hear something of that very active, cheerful, thriving and respectable class of men, our music sellers. One of their number sends us here a daguerreotype of them in full Board assembled, a life-sketch of their figures, their counsels and their humors. We see their faces, smiling or excited, their grave and queer proceedings, their looks and gestures in debate; but what they are debating we see not; it is not for us to penetrate the mysteries of kings in council. Look and be thankful.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BOARD OF MUSIC TRADE.—On the morning of Wednesday, June 2d, there convened, in the spacious and elegant "Gents' Drawing Room," of the Spencer House, in the "Queen City of the West," the fourth annual meeting of the Board of Music Trade. The attendance was very large, and the various deliberations characterized by a dignity, good-fellowship, and spirit of concession, which evidenced to a satisfactory degree, the entente cordiale existing between the members, individually and collectively.

From the "modern Athens" there came Messrs. Ditson, Russell, and the witty Tolman; the "Empire City" contributed the placid, unruffled Pond, and the wide-awake, nervously-energetic Hall; the "Quaker City" delegated Messrs. Schmidt, Beck, and the jolly, rubicund, Teutonic Lee; from the "Monument City" appeared that early musical pioneer in Baltimore, Geo. Willig, Jr., and the enterprising McCaffrey; Cincinnati wheeled into line a host of Peters; Louisville graced the meeting with the chivalrous Paulds, (Puer formosus!) and the thoughtfully venerable Cragg; St. Louis augmented the Western forces with that accomplished musician, and shrewd Music Dealer, Charles Balmer; while Cleveland deputized the courteous Brainerd to represent its interests.

The President of the Board, Mr. Oliver Ditson, of Boston, having called the meeting to order, inaugurated the proceedings with a masterly report and retrospective review of the prominent events of the past year, presenting therein various valuable memorabilia for future reference, and suggesting divers excellent measures for the guidance of the Association. Then followed the Secretary's report, which, together with that of the President, was unanimously and cordially received and approved.

Hereupon the business proceeded in the regular order prescribed by the formula, established in the "Articles of Association." Numerous applications for membership were received, and proper legislation thereupon followed; successfully, however, in but one instance,—that of Mr. L. A. Schmidt, of Philadelphia, whose claims to an election were proven beyond a cavil, and whose antecedents interposed no objection. One member of the Board, who had rendered himself specially obnoxious by a flagrant and persistent violation of the spirit and letter of the Association was unanimously declared "no longer a member of the Board." Up to this juncture there seemed to exist the most perfect unanimity upon every measure proposed; when præsto! change, in the twinkling of an eye, did the West stand antagonistic to the East, in a furious argument which proved at once exciting, and calculated to elicit the parliamentary abilities of the entire Board.

A Western member demanded certain concessions from the East, which seemed totally incompatible with the pecuniary interests of the latter. The measure was referred to a committee of five Metternichs, who perspired fearfully, after dinner, in futile attempts to concoct a satisfactory compromise. Earnestly did these labor amid the fumes of "Neptunos," and the effervescing stimulus of "Longworth's sparkling Catawba;" until finally a member cried Eureka! and presented a seemingly palatable report. The Board, however, ignored the same in toto, and by this unfortunate course of procedure, opened anew a discussion, which drew forth a variety of turbulent speeches, and prolonged the session into the "wee sma' hours of the night." W. C. Peters, the musical Nestor of the West, proved an eloquent champion of its alleged rights. Upon his left, sat Paulds, of Louisville, who displayed all the abilities of a collected and deep-thoughted lawyer, searching the records for precedent, and expounding the constitution with the acumen of a Webster. Messrs. Cragg and Balmer, too, valiantly protected the flanks of the Western Army, jealously meeting every attempt of the opposition to force its centre.

Not a whit less sturdily were the interests of the East represented. Its forces were led by the energetic James F. Hall, the Achilles of the Music Trade, vulnerable only in the one point of a good heart, which impels him frequently to sacrifice his own cherished ideas in a spirit of concession to his friends. Thus Achilles arose, and declared himself willing to accede to the demands of the West, with the proviso that the latter should yield a certain important point to the East. Unfortunately to the last degree!—for the Eastern members, after stoutly asserting their positive inability to yield the point without much detriment to their interests, thus virtually admitted that it was possible. When Achilles thus showed his heel, the Western forces, by another well directed charge, in which they were aided by several members from the East, who actually had a lurking interest in the success of the West, turned the fortune of the day.

The other business of the Board was soon despatched. An election for officers for the ensuing year resulted in the unanimous choice of Geo. Willig, Jr., for President; James F. Hall, Vice-President; and James N. Beck, Secretary. The Board then adjourned to meet at the Gilmor House, Baltimore, on the first Wednesday of June, 1859.

Hereupon followed the informal festivities; the "feasts of reason and the flows of soul." Prominent among these, might be instanced the presentation of a pair of elegant diamond studs to Mr. Oliver Ditson, the esteemed President of the Board. James F. Hall, in behalf of his fellow members, tendered the gift in a felicitous speech, which was acknowledged by the recipient in a pertinent and forceful manner.

Mr. Benj. Webb, of Louisville, in whom exists the very soul of geniality and quaint humor, had suffered to an alarming extent from the intensity of the sun's rays, by reason of the contracted margin of his chapeau, exciting thus the deepest sympathy. To relieve his distress, an ample sombrero, with a rim fit for a race course, was disembowelled from the dead stock of an extensive Cincinnati hatter, and presented to him. The presentation was alike impressive and humorous. Describing the arc of a circle stood the members of the Board; in the centre, the unconscious Webb. Fair ladies, too, graced the occasion with fascinating smiles and ample crinoline, good-humoredly leering when Mr. James F. Hall addressed the centre figure of the group, and in a characteristic speech stated the objects of the impromptu convocation. The face of Mr. Webb would have furnished an admirable study for a Raphael, at the moment when the speaker drew from behind a large rocking chair, the gift, and placed the same upon the head of its recipient. The humorous character of the surprise evoked a hearty laugh; and the innate quaintness, which imparts to every action of Mr. Webb, so much geniality and zest, expanded with the crisis; indeed his response would have imparted additional pith to the pages of a Pickwick.

Three and a half miles from the "Queen City," upon a commanding hillock, overlooking the majestic Ohio, stands the Gothic cottage of Mr. W. C. Peters, the Nestor of the Western music business. The human imagination could scarcely picture a more fascinatingly romantic and lovely landscape than that which surrounds this beautiful country seat. To the right, ensconced among the Hills, is seen Cincinnati, like a diamond studding the placid bosom of the noble river; while to the left, as far as the eye can reach, does the same majestic stream pursue its winding course among the hills, enriching the Miami valley. Immediately around the cottage, multitudes of shrubs and flowers sent the air with refreshing aroma, while the interior denoted, in its economy, the fine tastes of an educated man, who amid a Paradise like this, whiles away his otium sum dignitate in the peaceful pleasures of Art and the unalloyed enjoyments of domestic happiness. The members of the Board enjoyed a charming visit to this interesting spot, on the afternoon of June 3d, and the "Lord of the Manor" received them with fraternal affection, being materially and courteously assisted in these offices of kindness by his hospitable consort and accomplished daughter.

All in all, the members of the Board met with a most enthusiastic and cordial reception at the hands of their western confères. Pure, unadulterated native wines caused the tides of wit and sentiment to ebb and flow with regularity. Dealers fraternized and exchanged their ideas of business with happy accord; exchanges of Catalogues were proposed and substantially carried out; and finally, there ensued a satisfactory smoothing of many little eddies which had tended to ruffle the relations of individual members during the past year.

A large majority of the participants left Cincinnati on Thursday night and Friday morning for their homes; others started on the same days for a pleasure excursion to the Mammoth Cave, Kentucky, and thus ended the fourth annual convocation of the Board of Music Trade, bountifully fraught with beneficial results to all its participants, and tending in an eminent degree to develop those resources of trade, which accrue from unity of purpose and of action.

Music Abroad.

London.

The programme of the third PHILHARMONIC CONCERT, May 10, included for Symphonies, Beethoven's Eroica and Haydn's No. 11. M. Hallé played Beethoven's great Piano-forte Concerto in E flat; and Spohr's 11th Violin Concerto was played by Herr Bott—Spohr's favorite pupil. Mme. Clara Novello sang Mendelssohn's Italian Scena; Infelice, and the Romanza: Sombre Forêt, from "William Tell"; Miss Lascelles sang an aria by Winter: Paga fui. The overture to Oberon closed the feast. Sterndale Bennett was conductor. For the fourth concert Joachim was re-engaged, to play Mendelssohn's violin Concerto and a Sonata by Bach.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—After several performances of the Traviata and the Trovatore—matters of course in all Italian operas—and another repetition of the "Huguenots," came the first night of Don Giovanni, May 11, when there was great curiosity to witness Mlle. Titiens in a new part. The Musical World says:

Her Donna Anna must be placed higher, both as a histrionic and vocal achievement, than either Valentine or Leonora. It is as much superior to her Valentine as her Valentine to her Leonora. We may, in a word, say Mlle. Titiens' Donna Anna is one of the finest impersonations of that great and trying part we have ever witnessed on the stage.

In the scene after the death of the Commandant, Mlle. Titiens exhibited a world of conflicting emotions. The grand recitative and air, "Or sai chi l'onore," sung in the original key, was magnificent, the acting being as intensely passionate as the singing was artistic. "Non mi dir" was equally fine in more than one respect. The slow movement was given with genuine expression, and the allegro with equal brilliancy and force, being unanimously encored. Mlle. Titiens repeated half of the allegro (Si donc!) In the language of a morning contemporary, we may say, to conclude, "that Mlle. Titiens' Donna Anna was worthy of Mozart"—beyond which commendation cannot go.

Mlle. Piccolomini's Zerlina is as lively and bustling, and as unlike Zerlina as ever. Madlle. Ortolani looks the part of the love-lorn Elvira to the life, and sings the music cleverly. Signor Belletti's Leporello is far better sung than acted; and Signor Aldighieri, who replaces Signor Corsi, in Masetto, only gives us cause to regret the absence of his predecessor. Signor Giuglini, as Ottavio, sang the air, "Dalla sua pace," perfectly, and some parts of the duet, "Fuggi, crudele," in his best manner; but the liberties he takes with "Il mio tesoro" cannot be defended.

Il Barbiere was soon to be performed, with Alboni as Rosina, and Sig. Belart, for the first time in England, as Almaviva.

For an account of the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, in the new Covent Garden Theatre, see page 82.

There is still a third Italian Opera in full blast (Trovatore, &c.) in London. A series of operas at play-house prices commenced at Drury Lane, May 10. Mlle. Salvini Donatelli is the name of the young lady who played Leonora; Mme. Bernardi was gipsying as Azucena, with Mr. Charles Braham as Manrico. Sig. BADIALI (our old friend?) was Count di Luna; an English critic says of him: "He has been a good singer, and is still an energetic actor." Mme. Gassier was to appear in the Sonnambula, with Mr. George Perren as Elvino. Traviata and Rigoletto "in preparation"—of course.

MADAME SZARVADY, the celebrated pianist, better known in this country under her maiden name of Wilhelmína Clause, gave the first of an announced series of pianoforte concerts on Monday morning at Willis's Rooms which were densely crowded on the occasion by an audience which included many notabilities of the artistic and fashionable world. Madame Szarvady was assisted by MM. Ssinton and Piatti, who played the violin and violoncello parts in Mendelssohn's pianoforte trio in C minor in the best possible manner; but her dependence was, notwithstanding, chiefly upon herself; indeed, the rest of the programme consisted wholly of solo pianoforte performances. The pieces were Sebastian's Bach's "Fantaisie Chromatique" and fugue in D minor, selections from the "Feuilles d'Album" and "Proménades d'un Solitaire" of Stephen Heller, and the "Fantaisie Impromptu" and étude in C sharp minor of Chopin, Beethoven's sonata in G, op. 31, and a march by Alkan.

The fame which Madame Szarvady has long enjoyed as a pianist of deep sentiment and great mechanical skill was fully sustained on this occasion.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD'S SOIREEs.—This remarkable young interpreter of classical piano music—the pride of the English world of music—had the following programme at her last concert:

Air varié, pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 17), Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Horatio Chipp.—Mendelssohn.
Grand sonata in E minor (the last sonata composed by Weber), Op. 70, pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard.—Weber.

Fugue in G minor (generally known as "The Cat's Fugue")—Scarlatti.
Prelude and Fugue in G major—"Clavier bien tempéré"—J. S. Bach.
Fugue in D Major—"Kräftig und Feurig"—(Seven characteristic pieces) pianoforte, Miss A. Goddard.—Mendelssohn.
Sonata in B flat, pianoforte and violin, Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Ssinton.
Grand sonata in B flat (Op. 106), pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard.—Beethoven.

A NATIONAL SCHOOL CHORAL FESTIVAL took place in the Crystal Palace, May 9, and attracted nearly twenty thousand people. The chorus consisted of from four to five thousand voices, selected from the children and teachers of the national and endowed schools of London and vicinity, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin. The following programme was given:

Part I.—Organ, March from Eli—Costa; the Old Hundredth Psalm; Choral, "We praise thy name, O God," from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"; the Hymn of Eve, arranged from a song by Dr. Arne; Part song, "Sweetly the Sabbath bell"; Psalm cxix., v. 9, 10, 11—Dundee tune; Chorus, "O Thou that tellest"—Messiah; Anthem, "Lord, for thy tender mercies' sake"—Farrant; Chant, "Praise the Lord, O my soul," Psalm cxlvi.; Anthem, "O sing unto God"—Martin.

Part II.—Rule Britannia—Arne; Part song, "When the evening sun is shining," arranged from a glee—C. J. Stafford Smith; Part-song, "The crocus"—J. Braham; Four-part song, "Come, let us all a-maying go"—Martin; Four-part song, "The blue-bells of Scotland"; Four-part song, "See our cars"—Stevenson; Four-part glee, "Hail! smiling morn"—Spofforth; National Anthem, "God save the Queen."

The singing is said to have been admirable, considering the numbers and years of the vocalists.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We attended Wednesday evening a most agreeable concert, given to a most crowded and enthusiastic audience, in Cambridge, by students of the College, members of the old "Pierian Sodality" and "Glee Club." It showed vast improvement in the College music since our day; but we have only now to mention it at present.... CARL FORMES has contracted with Strakosch to sing at forty concerts in the Western cities, for the snug sum of ten thousand dollars.... FREZZOLINI returns to Paris, where she is engaged for the ensuing season.... We hear that we are actually to have a course of Trovatore & Co., at the Boston Theatre in a week or two.... JENNY LIND they say has twinned—a young Jenny and a young Otto at a birth.... The Musard Concerts in Philadelphia are divided of late into two parts: a Musard Concert and a FORMES Concert; in one of them Formes sang In diesen heit'gen Hüllen, the "Wanderer," and "The Bay of Biscay."

The "Country Singing-School Teacher," as a correspondent in our Journal, for May 22, designates the conductor of a recent performance of the "Creation" in Chicago, Ill., turns out to be the Editor of the Chicago Musical Review, Mr. C. M. CADY, a gentleman who devotes himself to the work of popular musical education with great earnestness and with a higher intelligence than the most. In the last number of his Review he alludes to the letter of our correspondent, thus:

The late performances of the Oratorio of the Creation by the Chicago Musical Union, under our direction, has afforded our friends an opportunity to pay us a variety of compliments, but none of them suit us so well as one paid to us by a correspondent from this city, whose letter appears in the last number of Dwight's Journal of Music, (an excellent paper by the way). After praising the Society, and the performance generally, he exclaims, "But the Conductor!!—alas! is a country Singing-School Teacher." We have spent a great deal of fruitless labor in trying to prevent correspondents from applying to us the prefix "Prof." and other nonsensical titles, but here is a title that we feel proud of. To be a successful teacher of anything, requires a rare combination of talent. Besides, it was by teaching country singing-schools that we worked our way through college. It was by teaching country singing-schools that we acquired a knowledge of the musical wants of the American people, that has more than any other one thing contributed to whatever of success has marked our course, whether as musical editor, conductor, or composer. We have therefore cause to be proud of the appellation. If our friends must give us a title, let it by all means be "the Country Singing-School Teacher."

This is all sound and sensible, and we must say we like its spirit. But how about the Gas Light joke? It strikes us "A. M." had you there!... Speaking of Chicago, we learn that the "Musical Institute" is holding there its annual session of six weeks, closing June 26. Messrs. BRADBURY and C. M. CADY are the principal teachers, and courses of daily exercises in the art of teaching, in Harmony, cultivation of the voice, Church Music, Chorus and Glee Singing, &c., go on before a class of earnest and intelligent ladies and gentlemen... The Illinois State Normal University, located at Bloomington, sets an example which older Universities would do well to follow. Music is there treated as a regular study, and a certain proficiency therein is made necessary to graduation.

At the meeting of the Board of Music Trade, described above, the President gave a review of the business of the trade during the past year, showing that though it has been a most disastrous year in the mercantile community, yet among their number there has not been one failure. This he believed mainly due to the organization of the Board, for had the same calamity overtaken them before the organization, but few, if any would have survived the shock. The Board now consists of twenty-three members, one of the number residing in Canada.

A subscriber in Millswood, Chalford, Gloucestershire, England, is informed that his non-receipt of the Journal of Music since the end of March was owing to an oversight in the copying of our mail-book at that time. The missing numbers went by the last steamer. We are very sorry for the accident, but are almost reconciled to it since it makes us acquainted with so devoted a reader, through the medium of a gratifying note, of which we take the liberty to copy a few sentences:

"J. S. DWIGHT, Esq.—Dear Sir: I write to you in the same way I would to an old friend; because your Journal has been my constant source of musical information for a very long time. A year ago I was not a subscriber, because an intimate friend in London used to send me his copy weekly; however, it is a kind of law with some men that they must go hither and thither; consequently when my friend went abroad and Dwight's Journal followed him, I felt as though I had lost two friends, and adopted the only method I could think of to regain one of them."... "I don't know whether you are an American or an Englishman—perhaps a German (!)—but you will not be offended, I hope, when I inform you that 'Dwight's Journal of Music' is very much valued by musicians in England. I have heard it described as 'a straight-forward, honest, open-hearted statement of the opinions and doings of the American musical republic.'"

The Athenæum Exhibition.

VI. OIL PICTURES. (CONTINUED.)

The seeming anomaly involved in two avowedly antagonistic forms of Art, co-existent in a country where a central unity of purpose is discernible in all its modes of intellectual and religious manifestations, I have endeavored to explain, by referring its cause to a national, ingrained, yet short-sighted love of truth, that was content to wear Art as a gaudy crown upon its head, so long as it was thought to be the insignia of a proud birth-right merely—bearing no testimony concerning the moral virtues, or internal character of the wearer—and which, when it learned that what was written upon the crown was inscribed in the name of the people, and attested their nobleness or barrenness of heart, turned, and in mere self-consistency, devoted itself to the encouragement and development of the new form of Art whose motto was also "love of truth," and whose professed aim it was, to carry integrity of purpose into Art, and make pictures embodiments of living principles.

The distinction here made, between the moral inanity of the Old, and the moral vitality of the New School of English Art, considered in reference to their respective, conscious, actuating motives, I have no present disposition to qualify; but since I have denied the existence of any well-established absolute principles of truth of Art, and yet, in presenting a summary of the leading characteristics of the different schools, have affirmed the "falseness" of the one, and the "uncompromising fidelity to truth" of the other, with a brevity so naked that there seemed no place for the concealment of a doubt, and which also so far debarred the truth of my opinion its right, and complete utterance, that as before suggested, simple, even-handed justice might well demur, and move an arrest of judgment, it may be well to pause awhile, here in the angle between the widely diverging lines of these two distinct phases of Art-feeling,—where their true planes of extension may be most clearly seen,—and, before going forward upon the track of the new Art revival, look inquiringly back over the way traversed in making the path of the old one, to see if there were no important features over-looked, or wrongly judged, and if there were not also other underlying motives besides the religious one, pertaining to this Art in its revived, or original state, which might be interpreted as forming possible fractions of an absolute governing principle in Art, but which were so dimly apprehended, that their profound truth was unwittingly warped into an expression of the "shallow falsehoods" which Mr. Ruskin has been the first to proclaim, and which his humbler followers are constantly re-asserting.

Is it not possible that the actuating motive which gave birth to the specific object of Mr. Ruskin's execrations—the Claude ideal of landscape—involving a principle lying nearer the absolute centre of Art than the so-called truth of modern Pre-Raphaelitism?

Is it not true, that the religious Art of Raphael, which has also been heartily anathematized from the Ruskinian altar, contains the same principle put to its noblest use?

Is it not possible that the principle of subordination here exercised—subordination of external fact to internal truth—body to spirit, where a complete expression of the two is impossible without jarring dissonance,—is not only right, but positively demands a recognized position amongst the leading verities of all noble Art?

If it be true, that those qualities in the landscape Art of Claude, or the more exalted religious Art preceding it, which excite Mr. Ruskin's particular irreverence and contempt, are, howsoever feebly expressed, symbols of a nobler and more philosophic ideal in Art than now anywhere exists, it would seem that, in his desire to secure a universal confession of devotion to truth in Art for truth's sake,—as manifested in his special advocacy of the Pre-Raphaelite motives, and his denunciation of those of Claude and Raphael,—Mr. Ruskin has sacrificed that immanent truth which, working through its age to make a permanent record of its animating spirit, took small heed of its superficial requirements, and was at once a cause and result of genuine inspiration, for that which mirrors itself in every trivial act of external life, and offers the semblance of truth which plays upon its surface, as an adequate substitute for the veritable soul of absolute Art.

Assuming the truth of this position, then it had only been necessary for the founders of the Old School of English Art, to have possessed an intellectual grasp of the true principle of subordination, as comprehensive as its animating spirit in the heart of Italian Art was pure and sincere, to have transmitted to us, at least, a body more sound than that which contains the nerveless pictures that form its representative feature in this exhibition.

I cannot say that they did not possess and evince such a grasp in their works, but if they did, in the travail of a century, it has lost the vigor of health, and presents itself now in a wretched, enfeebled condition. Still, that it is at all visible here, (if not worn as a lying mask,) should be admitted in evidence of a purity of motive in the Art which I have denominated as false, without at the same time admitting that it might be unconsciously so.

Let us now leave this debatable ground however, and move on into the domain of Art where "truth" is the only countersign of admission, without which, no Art, howsoever mighty in the state, can come within its walls, but giving which, the humblest are warily welcomed and passed into the inner courts. Meanwhile, we will retain our somewhat uncertain grasp upon the well-seeming principle we have travelled so far back to secure in its pristine integrity, lest in our stroll through the new kingdom, we may discover some needs which this can partially serve, and which, without it, might give us greater perplexity and discomfort.

We have noticed that Pre-Raphaelitism hangs its "banner of truth upon the outward walls." When we are within them, I will strive to discover what floats above the keep of the citadel, after noting the various objects lying about its base.

"A Fishing Harbor in the West," No. 144, is a severely drawn, cold, unattractive picture by W. W. Fenn, who gives the intended motive in some pleasant lines from W. Allingham. The picture contains no sunny cheer, but, on the contrary, is dull, dreary, and hard; yet if a thoughtful rendering of one of nature's ungenial moods in studied, prosaic literalness be worthy of praise, there is something very admirable in this picture.

Nos. 92 and 161, are two pictures of very unequal merit by W. J. Webbe, the first of which demands no especial notice. The "Twilight," however, from its peculiar composition and decision of color, and also, as we soon learn, from its successful treatment, forms one of the prominent features of the collection. The beautifully graduated light in the sky, which is doubtless somewhat enhanced in its effect by the opposition of the dark, ugly, mass of rock that is thrown boldly against it—the faint reflected flash of light glimmering over the middle distance, the peculiar, twilight mystery, pertaining to the dimly outlined forms of the foreground objects, are rendered with marked power and truth of feeling.

"Trudging Homeward," No. 133, by T. Campbell, Jr., furnishes a striking illustration of the utter abnegation of beauty, and the worship of painful ugliness. The picture certainly attests an emphatic power of expression on the part of the author; but the frequent presentation of such unassuming sadness, such mere earth-clogged, body weariness, which only murmurs of tired limbs, would prove of very doubtful utility in the mission of true Art. For the rest, the power of painting in some parts of the picture, howsoever limited, forcibly suggests, that the empty grotesqueness of form and utter want of clear perception shown in other portions, are either proofs of a very strange humor or deliberate affectation; to which latter opinion I incline, since the same incongruity is observable in many other works here, and serves a very significant purpose which Browning has clearly drawn in the following lines from "Fra Lippo Lippi":

"Thus, yellow does for white
When what you put for yellow's simply black,
And any sort of meaning looks intense
When all besides itself means and looks naught."

The two pictures, more properly called works, by T. W. Inchbold, are the most unsatisfactory elaborations which could well be produced. "Noon Day on the Lake of Thun," No. 152, might as well be called "black midnight" for aught that it truly reveals of the qualities of beauty in Nature, pertaining to this, or any other similar scene.

No. 111 contains some pleasantly harmonized color in the tree trunks, charming mazy traceries produced by elaborate ramifications of branches and twigs relieved against an intensely blue sky; but "an earnest of the Spring" it does not give.

Spring is full of sap. The heart of the earth, gathering strength through the winter sleep, of her children, is warmed in the sun's vernal rays, and pours its rich blood through all the arteries of the vegetable kingdom. There is no place for arteries beneath the shell of this beautiful mosaic.

"Bad News from Sebastopol" furnishes the theme for a painful, domestic story, which is simply and effectively told in No. 98 by F. B. Barwell. There is need of vital, breathing color in the flesh, and better modelling of parts, especially the young girl's arm, which is thrown across, or rather awkwardly hangs from her mother's lap. The action of the picture is clear, earnest, and natural, and also, powerfully dramatic.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Gentle Hattie. Song and Chorus. C. St. John. 25

A very happy effort. This is a song for the many; an easy, graceful melody, followed by an effective chorus, ending in long and solemnly swelling chords.

Lillie Lee is full of mischief. Glover. 25

Starlight Nell. Glover. 25

These are the two prettiest "hagatelles" which the fertile pen of the ever agreeable Glover has of late put forth; the latter being evidently twin-sister to the already much sung ballad, "Little Gipsy Jane."

The Spanish Muleteer. Harrison Millard. 25

A fresh, vigorous song for baritone voice, to all appearances caught fresh from the lips of some hardy mountaineer, leisurely sauntering down with his animals on the verge of a precipice, cracking his whip and not caring for anybody. It is a favorite concert song of the composer's.

Excelsior. Duet. Balfe. 60

The author has here, in an elaborate duet for tenor and bass, brought out all the beauties of this celebrated poem, and left no means unemployed to forcibly impress the fancy of the hearer.

Through the fields I trip at morning. Donizetti. 25

Everybody familiar with the gems of Italian opera will, in this ballad, at once recognize the charming melody in the duet between Adina and the Doctor Dulcamara, (last act of Elisir d'Amore). It need only be added, that the adaptation to English words is excellent, in order to insure the thanks of many singers, to whom this piece is thus made accessible.

British Grenadiers. 25

Come haste to the wedding. Callcott. 25

Two more of a series of famous old English songs.

Stand up for Jesus. L. O. Emerson. 25

The above words were the last exhortation of the late Rev. Dr. Tyng of Philadelphia, and form the subject of a highly touching poem, to which the popular composer has joined an impressive melody.

Oh, sweet the spring with its merry ring. Hutchinson. 25

A mirthful, pretty tune, which especially young folks will relish very much, and quickly sing by heart. To those who have frequented the late concerts of the family, it will be an old favorite, gladly welcomed in print.

Books.

A COMPLETE METHOD FOR THE GUITAR: containing the Elementary Principles of Music, and a New, Original, and Progressive Mode of acquiring a rapid Mastery of the Instrument, interspersed with a pleasing variety of popular Songs and National Melodies. By Otto Feder. Bound in Cloth. Price, $2.50.

This will be found a valuable acquisition to the means employed by teachers, and a superior method of imparting a correct, artistic course of instruction; while to scholars it will prove valuable and attractive in its plain, progressive lessons, capital examples and exercises, and its judicious selection and arrangement of every requisite information for the acquirement of a knowledge of Guitar playing. Beginning at the earliest point—at the very alphabet of the art, it advances step by step, and understandingly, to the classical compositions of the "great masters." To persons about commencing the study of the Guitar, we would commend a perusal of this new and admirable work, and even old players will find very much in it instructive and useful in the practice of their profession. The style of its binding is some advance on that usually adopted by publishers of works of the kind. It is bound in cloth, handsomely embossed, lettered, and finished very neatly.

June.

Skies of deepest azure,
Dance of mountain streams,
Glittering in the brightness
Of the noontide beams,
Scent of apple blossoms
Filling all the air,
Cowslips in the meadow,
Violets everywhere :
Floods of golden sunshine,
Trailing robes of green,
Gayer than the garments
Of the proudest queen :
Seas of crimson clover,
Choirs of singing birds,
And the blessed charm of Happy children's words :
Soft, melodious whisperings
In the tasseled trees,
Joy of tell-tale breezes,
Hum of honey bees :
Unrestrained resplendence,
Universal cheer,
Beauty all unbounded
Tell us June is here :
June : of bloom the fairest ;
June : of song the rarest
Of the changeful year.

Musical Orthodoxy.

From the German of MME. JOHANNA KINKEL.

That made no impression upon her ; she thought to herself : "What is it to bear the trials of life to one for whom life itself has lost its charm ?"

In her longing to see Selvar again, she half forgot that it was for the last time. She found him and his sister alone, but awaiting company. Ida had no wish to see any strange face after she had long looked upon that, which in her opinion was the most beautiful upon earth, and had impressed it forever upon her memory. She told in few words the reason of her visit, to their utter astonishment. They declared her resolution too hastily made, and an act of the greatest eccentricity ; they could hardly believe her in earnest, and demanded some satisfactory reason for that step. The real reason she could not give, and a false one she would not ; so instead of an answer to their questions she thanked them from her heart for all the kindness she had received from them, and tore herself hastily away.

When Selvar called at her lodgings early next morning, he was told that she had left the place in the night mail coach. "She was a strange girl," thought he ; "it is a pity that she had not a little more of cool prudence ; and yet upon the whole her present step is not so unwise, if she really is unable to accommodate herself to her true position."

Late in the summer Selvar's sister and Frau Werl met accidentally when walking. The question rose at once to the lips of both : "Have you any news from our friend Ida ?"

The Countess had often had a slight anxiety as to the effect of what had passed upon Ida's mind ; on the other hand Frau Werl feared more for her outward circumstances, and spake at length on this topic, with the good lady to whose mind the idea of want had never occurred. Shocked at such a possibility, the Countess besought her brother to take some step to ascertain the condition of the girl. Selvar recalled to mind a young musician, who had once been the teacher of his daughter, and who was now a member of the orchestra in the city to which Ida had removed, and wrote requesting him to seek her out and acquaint him with her present circumstances and prospect.

Sohling, a young concert-master, sat with several comrades in a public garden, and the talk was upon professional matters. One of them, who was also teacher of the piano-forte, was just then telling anecdotes of his pupils.

"The Baroness," continued he, "invited me the other day to one of her musical soirées, and I played a few Etudes of Chopin. 'Bring me these studies to-morrow,' said she, 'I should like to play them through.' I answered her plainly : 'They are too difficult, Frau Baroness, you could not possibly play them.' She would not listen to me and persisted in trying the No. 11, in E flat, with those inhuman intervals. As she went on, obstinate as grim death, striking one chord after another, all equally false, I sat by in speechless despair. By-and-by she asked me to correct her with perfect freedom. So I began, next bar, to criticize every note, for all were wrong. 'Well,' said she, quite at her ease, 'go on, go on.' And so she continued alternating her 'go on, go on,' with 'come, help me a little, and show me my mistakes.' At last we got through, and her husband, who had sat by shaking his head, exclaimed : 'Mais, c'est un diable de compositeur, ce Chopin là !'"

"I wish some one would explain," said Sohling, "what under heaven has given this woman a reputation in the musical world of being a connoisseur in the Art ?"

"Well," answered the other, "only the upper classes believe it, who never heard her play. But she gives her opinion of others with an incredible assurance."

"Unluckily for her," returned Sohling, "she can impose upon no one who understands the matter ; since the time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, she has had but two phrases to use. When a songstress is praised, the Baroness remarks : 'What a pity she has no idea of portamento !' And if the talk is about a pianist, she comes out with : 'How can any one call his playing good ? He has a very bad touch.' On the other hand, when some beginner makes her first appearance, she remarks : 'Yes, she cannot do much yet, but she has a natural portamento, which many a great singer wants ;' or : 'Let people say what they will about this man's playing ; in my opinion he has a capital touch, and that is the great thing after all.'"

"I saw a good specimen of this sort of judgment to-day," said a third. "I have been giving a young English girl lessons, who heretofore has learned nothing but waltzes. Of course I put a proper instruction book into her hands, and afterward I found she had been complaining bitterly to her mother, that the new teacher had given her nothing but 'ugly pieces.' But when I played them correctly, the mother exclaimed : 'See, child, the ugliest piece becomes good, when thoroughly practised and well played.' When I got there to-day, I found the entire family at the piano forte, and the last Etude open upon it. 'This,' cried the mother to me as I approached, 'is really too bad, — to put such an ugly piece as this into the hands of the poor creature !' All had tried it, and the elder Misses, who were considered virtuosos, had unanimously abandoned it as being 'most ugly.' I sat down and began the piece, which had nothing but natural and pleasing chords, when suddenly mother and all three daughters burst out : 'The treble-key, the treble-key, oh dear, the treble-key !' The old gentleman came up, examined the music for a moment, and shook his fat sides, while he joined in a deep bass voice with 'O ho, the treble-key ; ho, ho, ho, the treble-key !' The effect of his slowly delivered words, combined with the cackling of the women, was like that of a cantus firmus from a bass horn with violins playing in figured counterpoint ; and so they went on for a long time repeating 'the treble-key, yes, indeed, the treble-key !' There I stood as if I had popped into a mad-house, not knowing what to make of it all, until at last one of the girls explained to me, that the G cleff, in England, is very commonly called the 'treble-key,' and that they all overlooked the fact that, in this Etude, this cleff was also given to the left hand. No wonder then that they had produced a demoniac harmony."

"Such ridiculous scenes and follies," said another, "give us now and then something to laugh at ; but after all, in fact, a piano-forte teacher is a suffering individual. Beginners upon a bowed or wind instrument can only play one false note at a time, while upon the piano-forte they give us whole handfuls of them. One is ashamed of himself, for hearing such a mishandling of the ears, just for the sake of that something, which the Philistines call existence."

"And just now, it is all the rage among these abominable dilettants to play piano-forte, nothing but piano-forte," said a Harpist. "All the piano-forte teachers are prospering in this city, while I might hang my harp upon the willows of Babylon, if it was not called occasionally by the orchestra from its hiding place into the light !"

"I do not know about its being so very easy for the piano-forte teachers to gain success," returned the first speaker. "When I came here I had to use up all that I had formerly saved, and finally to sell my most valuable time for a ridiculous price, until I became the fashion ; though since then, it is true, things have gone well enough. Nobody will try the experiment of an unknown teacher; people say, 'Let us first find out if his method is good.' Old, established teachers, too, have more of the confidence of parents and guardians, though known to sit lazily by their pupils, than any younger one, however zealous and yet in general the latter are much the most industrious and conscientious teachers."

"I wonder whether Franlein Ida Fernhoper has obtained any pupils, whose laconic advertisement in the Intelligenz-blatt made us so much sport," said the Chopin player.

"I have heard nothing of her since," replied the other. "What a piece of presumption for an entirely unknown girl, pupil of an unknown teacher, and a native of some little country place, to come here seeking pupils!"

Sohling's attention had been caught by the name, and exclaimed: "Think of it; a letter came to-day from my old employer, Selvar, which recommends this Ida Fernhoper to me as a genius. I am not much disposed, in fact, to become god-father to one of these Herz and Kalkbrenner virtuosos, as I suppose she is, but I must pay her a visit, as I was of old under many obligations to the Selvar family. Does any body know where the girl lives?"

The Chopin-player answered: "I should never have thought of the person again, had I not happened to read her name again to-day." So saying, he drew an old Intelligenz-blatt from his pocket, in which cigars had been rolled, and handed it to Sohling, pointing to her address.

She lived in a distant and retired quarter of the city. When Sohling reached the house, he was directed through two courts, and the rear house, to a small garden house standing in the midst of a bleaching green. An old washer-woman with an assistant were there at work, and the numerous and various utensils for their business, which stood about the small building, caused the concert-master to have strong doubts whether a sister in his Art could dwell there.

Just as he was turning away, supposing, that some other person of the same name must live there, a few powerful chords upon a very fine instrument struck his ear,—an extemporaneous prelude to a Toccata by Searlatti. He stopped and listened, and found the execution of the difficult work faultless. As soon as it was ended he entered the house and found Ida in a low room, whose windows were shaded by a vine. The room had only the most necessary articles of furniture, and its white-washed walls contrasted curiously with the splendid Erard instrument. Ida appeared out of health and somewhat careless of her personal appearance, and upon the whole, by no means interesting at first sight.

When the concert-master mentioned Selvar's name, a fever-like red suffused her cheeks, and she was so much disconcerted that he hardly knew how to continue the conversation. He thought however that their common profession might furnish a topic, and enquired, what she played of Mendelssohn and Chopin? She had never struck a note of their music. The operas of Spohr, Weber, Spontini, were all strangers to her. In her native place there was no theatre, and in the city where she had been living only the most modern operas were given. But she had studied in piano-forte scores such works as the experience of a generation had decided to be unsurpassed. The newest work, which she was familiar with was—"Fidelio."

Sohling turned over the music, which lay about, finding none but names of the first rank, but down only to a certain era. Of living composers, not one was represented.

"What a wealth of enjoyment is in store for you," said he, "when you come to study the fine works of our contemporaries! With such a foundation as yours, you will comprehend more easily than another, how honorably our present great masters are following out the path to which these immortal men gave direction."

Ida smiled bitterly: "You do not suppose that an ear, which has been formed upon these immortal tones, can ever find pleasure in such ephemeral music," said she.

Sohling gave her an ironical look. Her eyes fell before his; for it occurred to her, that thus far she had never deigned to the works of either of the masters, whom he had named, any serious study. Sohling had met too many persons of Ida's mode of thought, to be vexed at her. He had, at the most, like every cultivated musician of wide-spread knowledge, a smile for the narrow prejudices of that small community, which may well be called the musical Pietists. Half of this class consists of those who are too indolent to keep up with the progress of the Art. They stop at a certain point and remain there, obstinately declaring it the highest, and looking proudly downward upon the present, never humbly looking up. The other half consists of young persons of little or no experience, like Ida. Such blindly assert as their own, the obstinate opinions of a teacher, who gave up learning at the beginning of the century; or they allow themselves to be ruled by the views of some head of a family, who only in youth had any real feeling for music, and now behold want of life and spirit not in themselves, but in the productions of the day. Sohling, knowing that such views of Art are as obstinate and difficult to cure, as any fixed ideas, changed the conversation and asked: "Have you succeeded in getting pupils?" Ida answered in the negative, and he continued: "That is very likely owing to your living so much out of the way. We artists are unfortunately forced for success in our profession to depend upon the favor of the better classes, and must comply with their demands upon us, however much these demands may seem to us as mere prejudices. If you had lodgings in the fashionable part of the town, in some elegant house—"

"I did begin so," interrupted Ida, "but at that time I had lost all the energy and spirit necessary to take the first steps toward becoming known. I stayed at home and had not courage to seek patrons. After waiting some months in vain, I saw the necessity of economy, and so I have hired this room of my washer-woman."

Sohling reflected for a moment, and continued: "If you will grant me your confidence, I will look out better lodgings for you, and procure you at least a moderate amount of employment."

Ida said nothing. She was ashamed to confess, that she had that very day changed her last gold-piece, and that the prospect now was that she must soon pawn her Erard, and after that seek that comfort of which love-sick young people are apt to think so highly,—death, as the best course when no flowery path stretches away before one. Happily, nature has ordered all so wisely, that it is just this necessity, which fastens man with such iron fetters to his despised existence.

Sohling no farther questioned the oddity, who aroused in him rather a feeling of curiosity than of pleasure. He simply requested Ida to allow him to call again so soon as he should have it in his power to propose some reasonable plan for support. Upon leaving her he went at once to a female painter of his acquaintance, who had just lost a sister, and proposed to her in her loneliness to take Ida under her protection. She was ready to do this, and immediately visited Ida to offer her friendship. Ida's natural unwillingness to place herself under obligations to any person, together with the consciousness of the gloomy, discordant state of her feelings, caused her long to refuse the kindness offered; but the representations of Sohling, that her presence would be a benefit to the painter and aid her in bearing the sorrow of her recent loss, prevailed; for she felt that this would be the place for her. She was, like the night, not for the joyful, but loving and gently comforting for those in sorrow.

Her new friends took pains to introduce Ida into such families as agreed with her in her exclusive tastes, or at all events pretended to, for the sake of being considered superfine critics. There were some even, who thought her hardly orthodox enough, because she placed Mozart and Beethoven in rank with Bach and Handel; but most patronized her, because she would play to them with unwearied politeness almost the entire classic repertoire of the last century by heart.

By degrees, too, at the same time, Ida was learning the hypocrisy of this sort of people, who swore by names, but never had caught the spirit of their idols. One day, vexed at the contemptuous terms in which an old professor spoke of Beethoven, whom he had known personally before he became famous, she revenged herself by mystifying him. She played an air from one of Handel's forgotten operas, as a work by Beethoven, and one by the latter as from Handel; the first the critic declared a piece of romantic fog; to the other he remarked: "Ah, so could Handel only write!"

When she told Sohling of the joke, he replied drily: "You could be mystified precisely so, if any one would play certain passages from our best recent works as being by Mozart and Beethoven."

Ida declared this impossible, and Sohling threatened to try it some day. The painter, however, thought it a better means for him to try whether Ida was in fact less prejudiced than the old professor, by playing to her some of the best new compositions without concealing the names of their authors. Ida promised not to shut her heart against what was really good and to honestly prove the music before deciding against it.

Again, her faith had been somewhat shaken by criticisms, which Sohling had brought and read to her from journals printed when Mozart and Beethoven were just coming upon the stage. She heard them accused of superficiality, want of musical idea, and a striving after originality; yet, the delightful Mozart, clear as sunlight, was said to find delight in ear-piercing dissonances, heaped together without taste or beauty, and deceased composers of the third and fourth rank held up to the hero as models of simple and noble style.

"Is n't it precisely as if one were reading some Beethoven fanatic in his assaults upon our living composers of to-day?" asked Sohling, as Ida looked with astonishment at each old yellow sheet. Ida replied that there was this difference, namely, that the Beethoven fanatic had better grounds for his opinions, and asked, whether there was a single name among the living worthy to be placed by the side of those heroes, whom alone she revered?

Sohling replied that he was far from denying that the six—Bach, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven—had thus far achieved the highest; that in their creations, the great by far exceeded the insignificant. "But," added he, "this admission by no means precludes the idea that they all in certain points have been surpassed by others. I find it perfectly right, that you place "Don Juan" much higher than—"Oberon," for instance; but absolutely ridiculous when you go so far in your regard for Mozart as to study carefully the bravair airs of Constance or the Queen of the night, and, at the same time, think it beneath you to cast a glance upon the part of Rezia. Do you not look upon it as a solemn duty to learn all the variations of Beethoven—yes, even those utterly unbearable ones upon "God save the King"—and yet describe Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte as mean and insignificant? The flat and insipid humorous pieces by Bach and Mozart, such as variations upon "Liesel and the Coffee," or "Beloved Mandel where is Bandel," you look upon as touching relics. Good; but suppose any living composer had had the childish innocence to publish anything of the sort, you would have thought to yourself: 'Well, that piece is sufficient to show what that man is!' and you would never again have opened a piece of music that bore his name upon the title page."

Ida laughed. "That would be just like condemning some great man because he had happened to make a flat joke over his bottle of wine."

"Not that exactly; but I should condemn his admirers if they should repeat the joke as an oracle for a whole century and put it above all the wisdom of everybody else. All that the great masters demand of us is that we, so far as we really understand their works, should judge them, both in their defects and excellencies, with justice and real insight. But your blind and stupid admirers are just the persons who, if they do not in many cases prevent all progress in Art, yet always retard and delay it. Why, even from the Operas of Mozart, giant steps to what is better and greater are possible, though perhaps they have not yet been taken. Still, the attempts that have been made are sufficient to prove that we are upon the right path. Don Juan and Figaro I am willing to let stand as exceptions. I would not venture to suppose that a single number in those works could have been better conceived and written by any other composer. But all his other operas have weak passages, and certain numbers of them are far surpassed by analogous passages in the works of Spohr and Weber."

He seated himself at the piano-forte and played the short soldier choruses in Cosi fan Tutte and Idomeneus, and demanded of Ida her conscientious opinion, whether that in Jessonda was not nobler and more full of life. She had to confess it. He went on and called upon her to compare the song of the three boys in the Magic Flute with the analogous chorus of Elves in Oberon. Then he gave passages from the sacred works of Haydn and Mozart, with others from Mendelssohn. He grouped some of the best passages from Spontini with similar ones from Gluck, and Ida was forced to admit that at least they could bear comparison. The two women listened unweariedly until late in the night to the long succession of examples which he played them, and after his departure, Ida seated herself at her instrument to reproduce the finest of the melodies from memory.

A mere Dilettant can, it is true, find food enough to last his lifetime in the works of six composers. But though these be the most select, the soul of one who lives and breathes in tones finally exhausts them. The thirst for that which is new and fresh will arise, and only allows one, who has been reared upon the very best, to separate from the new that which is false or common-place. Such a one can find delight only in that which is noble and worthy to take rank with the models upon which the taste was formed.

Ida's understanding was too clear, her soul too susceptible to the beautiful, not to be soon convinced by the experienced musician that the spirit of song had not merely alighted upon a few chosen individuals, within a short space of time, to make of them an unchangeable constellation, to shine down through an eternal night, but that it is poured out like a fiery stream through all ages, here appearing as a flame, there as a mere spark; and that wherever it appears, is kindled and beams forth as a pure light, it should not be trodden upon and extinguished.

"But you do condemn the modern Italians and their imitators?" asked Ida at her next visit from Sohling.

"Yes, because they represent the false side of Art; and just on the same ground I reject Mozart's air of Sextus, in which a most delicious rondo is joined to a text full of 'despair and the pains of hell.' Abstracted from the text, however, one is delighted in this Rondo with the ravishing unity of melody, harmony and rhythm, while the Italians produce little more than an insipid, flighty melody. Our flute player compares it to water-soup, with a few globules of fat swimming on its surface."

"The comparison is right enough, but rather severe," said the painter. "We should rather call the melody of the modern Italian school a coquettish woman, capable of nothing but light conversation, while our German music gives weight to all the parts, vocal and instrumental, like the conversation of a company of cultivated people."

Conclusion next week.

Infancy the Best Age for Singing.

[From DR. MAINZER'S "Music and Education."]

The earliest age, that of six or seven years, is the most appropriate for learning to sing; voice and ear, so obedient to external impressions, are rapidly developed and improved, defects corrected, and musical capabilities awakened. Experience of many years, and observation of every day's occurrence, have taught, that a considerable proportion of the numerous children with whom we have met, could at first neither sound a single note, nor distinguish one from another; ALL without exception, have acquired ear and voice, and some of them have even become superior in both to their apparently more gifted companions; in others, the very weak or indifferent voices have in a short time become pleasing, strong, clear, and extended.

Children, from five to six years of age, some of them unacquainted with the letters of the alphabet, have learnt to read music, to a considerable extent, in unison and parts, and to sing, with astonishing precision, imitations and fugues of Hiller, Rink, Fuchs, Telemann, and other great masters. So thoroughly acquainted have they become with the pitch of sound, that, without the least hesitation, the name the notes of which melodious phrases are composed, as soon as sung or played; and it is remarkable, that in this exercise the youngest, and those who had at first to contend with the greatest difficulties, appeared the most acute and ready.

This improvement is more or less rapid. Some children having no ear at first, became awakened to the distinction of sound in a few days, some in a few weeks, and others after months only.

After having seen in a thousand instances, what interest, what intense pleasure children, we might say infants, take in their little singing lessons, after we have seen the astonishing progress they make, we are convinced that, through the medium of such early instruction, musical dispositions may be awakened in a surprising degree. Thus a taste, a true appreciation of this beautiful, innocent, and delightful art may be created at a very early period, and its charming effects extended over a whole existence.

We have seen children whom their parents believed to be totally devoid of any taste or faculty for music, attend singing classes with the most unexpected success. Their interest in music grew, and with it their knowledge and their voice. With several children, a few weeks practice sufficed to change the entire character of their voices, which, though at first weak and indifferent, and of almost no extent, became strong, extended, clear, and, in some cases, of even a fine quality. Such instances are best calculated to dispel the prejudices existing against musical instruction at an early age.

It would be useless, however, to expect such results from individual tuition. We know by experience, that when children are brought together, they imperceptibly impart cheerfulness, and stimulate each other to exertion and activity; thus, the influence of singing upon the ear and voice, and in the health and morals of the pupils, will be increased tenfold, when aided by the participation of numbers in this pleasurable exercise; the delicate and nervous child will gain strength and confidence, and the slow and indolent be roused. Imitation, that powerful spring of human action—the example of their little companions, their progress, and even their mistakes—furnish the teacher with the means of making his lessons more interesting and successful, than he could ever render them by individual tuition, however great his zeal or talent. And so we find, that the children take that intense interest in their lessons which, at their age, is in general only bestowed on play; at home, the influence of singing extends itself to their habits and dispositions, and consequently to their moral character.

With regard to young persons, comparatively less advantages are to be expected than from children. The nerves and muscles to be exercised in singing have no longer the same elasticity; the voice and ear are less flexible; and the teacher has lost that creative power, which he possessed in so high a degree during the period of infancy. Then he could awaken musical faculties, form an ear, call forth a voice, inspire a love for music, and break through every obstacle. If we consider, besides this, that young persons are overwhelmed with varied studies, and cannot have their thoughts so concentrated upon this branch of instruction, we may say, with certainty, that those who have not learned the elements of vocal music before their 10th or 12th year, have lost the most favorable period of their life—a loss which nothing but zeal and perseverance, and particular musical talent, can redeem. Throughout life, the difference between a musician from infancy, and one from mature age, will be visible at a glance. The latter may possess musical knowledge and taste; the former will possess both, with deeper musical feeling, more power, and greater certainty of judgment. In the one, music will be an acquirement; in the other, a feeling, a new sense interwoven with the constitution, a second nature. With children, the teacher has a power of creation; with adults, he is dependent on circumstances; he educates in the one case, in the other he has to amend the defects of education. The errors and prejudices in regard to vocal instruction are so great, that in general it is begun only when it should cease, and when the greatest care of the teacher alone can avert fatal consequences. It must, however, be evident to every intelligent mother, that when the voice changes its scale and character, and assumes another for life, it is no time to begin to sing; on the contrary, this is the time not to sing, or to do it with great care, avoiding every violent exertion; then a voice may be destroyed, not in infancy, when every trial is gain, every exercise is strength.

Besides the physical difficulties, another, not less prejudicial, presents itself; and this is, the defective musical education which young ladies have previously received in the tedious and mechanical study of the piano. Instead of learning the poetic part of music and its higher bearings, the pupils in general pass year after year in the drudgery of seeking mechanical perfection, hardly even acquiring the exterior form, and never looking below the surface for a thought or the connection of ideas. If, in learning music, it is not the object to learn its meaning, to understand and enjoy the deeper sense hidden under the beauty of the form, it is scarcely worth the trouble, and certainly deserves not, as a mere fashion, the sacrifice of so much labor, and so many of the most interesting moments and best years of life.

Singing is the foundation of all musical education, and ought to precede the study of any instrument. In singing classes, children learn to read at sight, and are made acquainted with the general elements of the art, before their attention is called to the mechanical part of it. Thus prepared, they appreciate and enjoy the study of an instrument, instead of finding it, as is usually the case, tedious and interminable. Years of piano-forte instruction may be spared in following this more rational plan, universally recognized and adopted in Germany, with such practical advantage.

In order to remedy, as far as possible, this kind of musical education, adults will have to begin from the commencement, and pass, though more rapidly than children, over the elementary parts. Notwithstanding the obstacles which scarcity of time for practice, and more hardened natural organs, oppose, they may still attain a considerable facility in reading in parts; the voice may be cultivated, rendered more flexible, and above all, more expressive. The principal object of the teacher must be to draw the attention to the more poetical part of music; to explain the variety of form, the difference of character and style, and the consequent expression in the performance of solo compositions. Thus he may still succeed in imparting, as far as practicable, a thorough knowledge of its theory and practice; and, at the same time, cultivate the taste and judgment that are so indispensable for understanding and enjoying works of art. A deeper feeling of the beauties of music, and a more intellectual penetration of its value, will result from the study of the works of great masters; more serious compositions will thus gain an attraction and a charm, which they did not before possess. Thus we place an elevating element of thought in the room of a trivial and unmeaning amusement, with which so many hitherto have alone been acquainted, and to which they have almost exclusively devoted their time and attention. But whatever be the result at that age, it is unquestionable that all these purposes will be better and more effectually attained by those who have been brought up from their infancy with music, who have known it as the companion of their youth, and to whom it has necessarily become a study, full of interest and attraction, as delightful and consoling as it will be inexhaustible.

Before we approach the examination of the moral influence of music, we conclude by recapitulating the principal heads in the preceding remarks:

1st, The earliest period of life is the best for the cultivation of the musical faculties. The musical organs are then easily developed, and defects corrected.

2d, Instead of being prejudicial to health, singing has been found a powerful means of strengthening the lungs, throat, and chest.

3d, Singing is the foundation of all musical education; it ought to precede the learning of any instrument.

The Power of Music.

Thalberg, on a trip to Niagara shortly after his arrival in this country, stopped at a Temperance Hotel, in Albany, and upon demanding some champagne, what was his astonishment on seeing the round eyes of the Irish waiter open in astonishment.

"I want some champagne," wildly reiterated the great instrumentalist.

"Faix! and is it champagne you are after asking for?" stammered forth the Hibernian.

"Certainly!"

"By my sowl, then, ye can't have it."

"And why?" inquired Thalberg, in astonishment.

"The likes of it, including whisky punch, is not to be had in this hotel."

For a moment the thirsty musician was aghast.

"What can I have, then?"

"Water, tay and coffee."

"Go and send me the proprietor," said Thalberg, "I will speak with him."

"Ye may spake till the day of doom, but ye'll find it of no use," was Pat's muttered observation, as he quitted the room.

In a few moments the landlord entered the apartment. His lips were closely set together and a frown was on his brow. He was evidently astonished that the foreigner should persist in his wish to contravene the rules of the establishment. Meanwhile Thalberg had occupied himself in opening a piano that stood in the room. It was not of the newest class, but was tolerably in tune. As the proprietor of the Temperance hotel entered the chamber he began to play. First the frown gradually vanished from the brow of the landlord—then his lips unclosed, and finally relaxed into a smile. When the artist had concluded, he waited for a word, but none came. Without turning round, he said to himself—

"The man is obstinate. I must try him with something else."

He accordingly began his "Tarantella."

Ere it was half finished he heard the rattling of bottles and glasses on the tables, and wheeled round. Pat had reentered the apartment with bottles of champagne.

"I thought it was not allowed," said Thalberg.

"Faith! and he'll give ye a dozen if ye like it. He says a man who can knock music out of a piano in yer way may get drunk every night if he chooses to. So there it is for ye."

Mr. Punch and the Organ Grinders.

Mr. Disraeli expressed his great grief for the want of a popular tax. We fancy that we can help him to one that will be universally popular. Let him tax all the Italian Boys and Street Musicians. By this means he will either put down a nuisance, or contribute largely to the revenue. Mr. Disraeli's reputation must gain from either contingency. On the one hand, there is glory to himself—on the other, profit to the nation.

The plan is practicable enough. In Germany, every turbaned tambourine girl, every bare-legged white-mice carrier is taxed. The tax, we believe, is about a thaler; or at the utmost, three thalers a year. But in England, considering more money is ground out of the people by these musical torturers, we would have the tax much larger. We would fix it at One Sovereign. This is dirt cheap, when we take into consideration the number of knockers that are tied up throughout the year in the streets of London alone.

Hawkers pay for a license. Then why shouldn't organ carriers? They are only hawkers of music; and why, in the outraged name of Handel, should they be more favored than any other class of hawkers—the Duke of St. Albans, as being a Royal Hawker, perhaps excepted.

Only consider the flood of revenue that would come pouring in from this newly opened Pactolus. We should say that, speaking within bounds, there must be some ten thousand organ boys and men in this monster metropolis, and about twenty thousand more running about the country, persecuting all the harmless villas on the highway that haven't the protection of a dog or a policeman. This makes a clear addition of £30,000 a year to the revenue. Then there are the bands of music that infest Regent Street, and haunt the Haymarket at all hours of the day and night, choosing always some popular public house for the station where to establish their Perambulating Philharmonic Concert. These wandering sons of Orpheus go about in gangs of four or five untutored Koenigs and Paganinis. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he has an ear that leans that way, will be sure to meet with them in all the populous neighborhoods, wherever there is a great consumption of spirits and beer.

As a general rule, it may be laid down with safety, and defiance of contradiction, that the poorer the neighborhood, the more musical it is. The Waterloo and Westminster Roads, the Ratcliffe, Highway, Tottenham Court Road, the New Cut, St. Giles', and all the elegant thoroughfares that blaze of a night with the monster lamps of the publicans, are rife with discord. Every member of these bands should be made to pay his annual sovereign for the amount of deafness he contributes to the ears of her Majesty's persecuted subjects.

The same "sovereign remedy" should also be applied to the hordes of Germans, who, of late years, have invaded England in such numerous bands. The impost would not only diminish the noise, which, under the name of music, they make in this country, but might also have the salutary effect of keeping them away from our shores altogether.

For the benefit of our talented Chancellor, we beg to append a rough calculation which we have made of the musical standing army, that has hitherto been supported in England. We now vote that this army be disbanded, (no pun intended!) and that not a blessed flute or ophicleide be allowed to blow a single note until he has previously paid a sovereign for the blowing of it. We wouldn't even allow Herr Von Joel to come to any of his "larks" until he has previously paid for his whistle. Hitherto the patience of the public has been taxed by these performers. We would now reverse the rule, and let the performers themselves be taxed for playing (and playing so vilely) on the patience of the public.

10,000 Organ Italian men and boys, (in town,)	£10,000
30,000 ditto, ditto, (dotted over the country,)	20,000
2,000 Organ German women, (attending races, &c.,)	2,000
2,000 Tambourine German girls, (to accompany the same,)	2,000
6,000 Banditti of five ruffianly performers, (£1 each,)	30,000
2,500 ditto of three ditto, (at £1 each,)	7,500
1,800 German Bands of 10 performers, (at 10s. each,)	9,000
2,300 Bagpipe Players, (not less than £5 each,)	11,500
30 Clarinet Players, (at £1 each,)	30
15 Horse Organs, (at £10 per organ—too moderate,)	150

Grand total,

Here then would be a clear annual gain of Ninety-Two Thousand Pounds to the Revenue! We have no doubt that it would exceed that amount, for our calculation has been estimated rather under, than above, the truth; besides, our arrangement for the scale of payments has been dictated by the mild voice of charity such as the torturers themselves are scarcely deserving of. For instance, we maintain that £5 for a bag-pipe player is, considering the excruciating cruelty of the torture, ridiculously cheap; and that a small tax of £10 a-year for a horse-organ is infinitely below the amount of mischief it causes every year.

However, here is a pretty little sum of £92,000 a year, which we beg to make a present of to our dear Chancellor of the Exchequer in return for the by-no-means bad Budget he has just thrown into our laps. No one will feel the loss of the above sum. It is merely a tax upon one of the nuisances of society. If the nuisance is not suppressed by the tax, then the revenue gains annually so much by the non-suppression. If it is suppressed, then society gains by the suppression to an amount which only arnists and medical men can calculate. Every person, who has escaped deafness, will be grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Every wife who comes in for a less share of her husband's irritability, now that one of the most prolific causes of it has been removed, will bless the name of BENJAMIN DISRAELI as that of a domestic benefactor, who has brought peace and quietness into a household, in which there growled and grunted nothing but discord before!

Postscript.—The above sum might be increased at least twofold—that is to say, £184,000—by bringing under the operations of the tax all the ballad-singers, the street psalm-singers, the sailor-singers, the frozen-out gardeners, the false news-criers, and the Manchester weavers, who have "got no work to do." Let Dizzy look to it.

VII. OIL PICTURES. (CONTINUED).

The natural element in the landscape by Mrs. Blackburn, No. 100, and catalogued, "Scene on the Coast of Ayrshire," is curiously involved in an illustration of the "curse" of labor that was pronounced upon the primeval Adam, and has ever been the normal inheritance of all his tainted seed. It is difficult to discover any vital pertinency in the application of the scriptural texts inscribed upon the frame of this picture, to this, or any other work of Art. Labor is no curse to us, but on the contrary is a rational blessing; an essential medium for the expression of every form of life, and an absolute condition of our being. The picture is forebodingly painted, and had it been wrought as a simple expression of the scene which gives it a name, would have given us better cause to congratulate Mrs. Blackburn upon the blessedness of her labor, than it now affords.

"Middlemas's interview with his unknown Parents," is the somewhat unpromising theme of a vividly drawn picture by W. L. Windus, No. 143. Mr. Windus evinces considerable clear mastery, and some slovenly treatment of color—the latter in the background and principal shadows—and a power of discriminating, and directness in realizing varied dramatic expression, which render this a very attractive picture, and might effectively be far more nobly employed.

This and the preceding picture I have classed among the works of the New School, although neither bear more than partial evidence of legitimacy.

The next is an acknowledged child of "truth," but hardly an honor to the family.

An uninteresting bantling in a yellow flannel night-gown, is the most definite description I can make of Arthur Hughes's "Two-and half years Old," No. 108. It is certainly to be regretted, that this alone, of all the works by Mr. Hughes originally contained in the collection, should have come to us. Faith in the excellence of his Art were of much easier attainment in the absence, than in the presence of this picture, which does not possess a single quality that should entitle it to rank amongst works of Art.

In somewhat different terms must I record my impressions of the externally gloomy, unattractive picture by R. W. Chapman, No. 136, bearing the unsuggestive title of "The Lollard discovered." The story is one of religious persecution, and in the choice of time, place, and incident, Mr. Chapman evinces a rare comprehension of the subtler forms of dramatic Art. In the opposition of the calm repose of the young girl, who is quietly working her way into the heart of the proscribed book—to her the book of Life—all unconscious of impending danger, to the threatening aspect of the harsh, bony-featured woman in the back-ground, who, in smothered wrath, mutters her imprecations upon all heretics as she takes the proffered price of her fidelity, and the young girl's betrayal, there is a clear fore-shadowing of physical torture and death which is none the less powerful because her sufferings have not yet commenced. The picture does not ply its chief strength here however, but brings us back to a contemplation of the serene joy of spiritual life, which softens the hard lines in the young girl's face, and invests them with an exalted beauty.

The drawing is very carefully considered, and surely, howsoever delicately rendered, throughout; and I should have no blemish to record, but for the chilling coldness of the flesh, and the general heaviness and opacity of color, which, whether wilful or not, is too marked to be allowed to pass unnoticed. It is possible that this is only another illustration of the fallacious theory entertained by Scheffer and others, that an expression of spiritual exaltation can best be produced by the sacrifice of those qualities of physical beauty pertaining to true, healthy color of flesh, and a substitution of pipe-clay as the true spiritual pigment.

Browning significantly asks:

"Why can't a painter lift each foot in turn,
Left foot and right foot, go a double step,
Make his flesh liker and his soul more like,
Both in their order?"

That Mr. Chapman has not moved thus, is too painfully evident, and the more to be regretted as his grasp of the higher phases of human experience is strong and clear. What he has done, that is nobly worth the doing, is contained in the honest representation of a genuine soul earnest in its own redemption. Comprehensively recognizing its steadfastness of purpose, and the sometime silent force of its manifestations, he has realized it to us with such simple directness, that the motive of his picture becomes our own, and we too, bend forward to the search of a truth that shall newly inform our being, and set us in the path of the absolute life.

There is no other picture in this collection, of equal dignity of subject, possessing such perfect unity of conception, and completeness of realization.

"The Eve of St. Agnes," No. 107, by Wm. Holman Hunt, is a late copy of an earlier picture, which from the fresh fame of the author, who, Mr. Ruskin says, has produced works "that have never been rivalled, in some respects never approached at any other period of Art," rather than from any warranty of that fame which this work contains, forms one of the most interesting features in the exhibition. If this is an unaltered copy of the original picture, it can bear no adequate testimony of Mr. Hunt's present power, as that was painted ten years ago, when, if report speaks truly, the artist was not "of age."

In itself considered, it is not a strictly just interpretation. The Art that has oppressed the sprawling porter with a drunken sleep and invested the "wakeful blood-hound" with such potency of expression, loses its charm when we turn to the "fair Madeline" who, strongly asserting a verity of neither body nor soul, is yet the most tenderly beautiful creation of Keats's imagination.

The scope of Mr. Hunt's conception is confined to the mere physical fact and circumstance of the elopement. He disregards all emotion save that of fear of detection, and, for a contrast of artificial sentiment, of dull gloom to bright cheer, he introduces the brilliant hall of the "bloated wassailers" (who, if I read rightly, are, ere this, dead asleep), instead setting his strongest light in the enrapt hope of the young lovers, and opposing that to the pitiless storm of "flaw blown sleet," out into which they fled "ages long ago," and a weird echo of whose flight came back as a spell of night-mare upon the house that night, haunting it with strange forms, palsyng the aged Angela, and sending the Beadsmen to an unremembered grave.

The color of the picture challenges some attention for its originality, as also admiration for its partial beauty, especially in the back-ground and draperies, where the play and quality of hue has considerable fascination.

John Brett exhibits "an Azalea," No. 195, in the lap of a child, who, for aught I know, is herself the intended Azalea. In either case, whether we subordinate the Azalea to the child, or the child to the Azalea (both being perfectly compatible with any apparent purpose in the picture) the result is equally uninteresting. The "truth" of this picture is very hard to the senses, and excites some regret that the author had not indulged in a little agreeable prevarication, or more freely exercised the faculty that wrought the cool, pleasant greens, and white hawthorn blooms of the back-ground.

"The Glacier of Rosenlauri" by the same, wears upon its face a challenge to the closest scrutiny, in its presentation of particular and immediate "truth" of form, color, and substance; which, in a general sense, means, accuracy of linear projection; a careful rendering of local tints, and a faithful distinction between bodies of different textures; and it has, I believe, been said, by a person qualified to judge, to well sustain such an examination, and, as an accurate portraiture of the geological characteristics of the scene, to be wholly reliable.

Admitting this, (with some minor reservations,) does it necessarily follow that the truth of this picture constitutes the essential truth of Art?

Is it not possible that it may perfectly serve the demands of science without in any noble sense meeting those of Art?

In so far as the delineation of particular truths pertaining to any scene, may be made to vitalize our impressions of it, it is right and needful, but if these are realized at the expense of the higher, general truths, the result is an abnegation of all artistic truth.

I do not complain that Mr. Brett has wrought the detail of his picture with microscopic fidelity; that he has patiently carved every indentation, and followed every structural or accidental line of the geological formation in its minutest curves; but, that in doing this, he has apparently fulfilled the object of his labor, and made no visible record of those bodiless, immaterial qualities common to all Nature, without which, a picture can have no verity either of representative or imitative Art. Thus, supposing the cliff, forming the prominent feature of the picture, to possess an altitude of 1700 feet above the mean level of the foreground, what possible sense of such formidable height does Mr. Brett convey to us; or, of the half of it? It is said, that, from the point of view here chosen, the eye traverses over the surface of the glacier through many miles of space; is this realized to us as fully as the ice-worn moraine that lies strewn about the foreground?

Is there any adequate expression of those qualities of sublimity which constitute the animating soul of all such scenes? Turner's vignette illustration of the "Alps at day-break" in Rogers's Poems, affords ample proof that an expression of space may be given fully answering the requisites of sublimity, within the most limited compass; but to Mr. Brett the power has not been given to break down the walls of confinement, and open to our range illimitable areas of space, light, and air. The remarkable purity of pigment, the solidity of the rock painting, (a quality which also fatally envelopes everything else,) and some beautiful rendering of form, in light, and shadow, in the fore-ground, serve to make this a work of much interest; yet I again urge the complaint, that it does not tell us that Nature is sublime, or Art noble.

No. 184, "An English Autumn Afternoon," by Ford Maddox Brown.

Nothing can be more fatal to our enjoyment of a picture, than the presence of qualities calculated to excite a distrust in the sincerity of the artist's motive, and mode of working. In turning from the "Lear" to this landscape, there seems to be a greater disparity in the power of drawing manifested in the two pictures, than a more familiar knowledge of one than of the other class of subjects which Mr. Brown may possess, can possibly account for. A man who can truly draw the action of the human figure, ought surely to be able to indicate the habit of a tree with something approaching to general dignity and truth of expression in the masses, even though he fail in rendering the delicacy and grace of the detail of leafage. It is scarcely to be credited that Mr. Brown can have exercised the integrity of his perception, and power of realizing natural form, in producing such senselessness in the massing and detail of foliage, as characterizes the fore-ground of this work. The confusion of parts extending from the immediate fore-ground out to the open fields of the middle distance, is utterly incomprehensible. Although we may not be able to rightly estimate the distances of a landscape, especially in close masses of foliage, yet the law of gradation obtains here as in open meadows, and we have an intellectual consciousness of space that cannot be disregarded in actual transcription, without virtual falsehood.

The one great merit observable in this work is that of a veracious solidity, a firmness of material qualities which inspires us with a pleasant sense of confidence in its reality; but, in spite of the additional quality of a partial beauty of repose, and a feeling of drowsy, autumnal quiet, pervading the scene, it subordinates noble to ignoble truth, and lacks those qualities of aerial truth and refined power of color, which such a subject especially demands.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 19, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—This time we give something for a pair of hands, lest we should seem to have forgotten that there are those who only play, as well as those who only sing. Our selections are from Mozart—not, it is true, composed for the Piano, but arranged for it. Perhaps the great worth of the Piano—one available to those who have but moderate skill compared to "pianists" properly so called, lies in its power of translating, or sketching to us the essential features of great compositions in all forms, somewhat as an engraving represents a painting. If you hear an opera, or a symphony performed by an orchestra, a piano-forte arrangement helps the memory to recall it. And even of a work you never heard it will convey you some idea, at least of its essential genius. To our own mind a peculiar pleasure always is associated with Mozart's Don Giovanni, from the fact that we first became acquainted and enamored with its music through a mere piano-forte arrangement, long before we ever heard more than an air or two of the opera sung. And now those of our readers, who may have some little skill upon the instrument, especially if they have heard the opera performed, will find some satisfaction, we doubt not, in playing over the two short extracts we have made here from the Piano-forte arrangement of the entire Opera, as published by Messrs. Ditson & Co.

The first is the Quartet in the first act, where poor, deserted Elvira seeks her betrayer, and appeals to Donna Anna and Ottavio: Non ti fidar, O misera, &c. . . . te vuol tradir ancor (Trust him not, O wretched lady; he has betrayed me, he would also betray you). It has been said of it:

In this wonderful Quartet each voice-part is a character, a melody of a distinct genius, and all wrought into a perfect unity. Elvira warns Anna and Ottavio against confiding in this generous looking Don, whose aid they have unwittingly bespoken in their search for the murderer of the first scene (naming himself); Don Juan declares that she is crazy and not to be minded; the others are divided between pity for her and respect for such a gentleman; and all these strands are twisted into one of the finest concerted pieces in all opera. It is one of those peculiar triumphs of opera, which make it so much more dramatic than the spoken drama; for here you have four characters expressing themselves at once, with entire unity of effect, yet with the distinctest individuality. The music makes you instantly clairvoyant to the whole of them; you do not have to wait for one after the other to speak; there is a sort of song-transparency of all at once; the common chord of all their individualities is struck.

Another writer (Oulibicheff) points attention to this striking and beautiful peculiarity in its structure:

The clause contained in the two last measures of this solo, te vuol tradir ancor, is the principal motif, which must chiefly engage the imagination and the ear. It becomes the obligato termination of other and very different verbal clauses; and since the orchestra repeats it every time, new songs begin at this repetition, which thus serves for melody and accompaniment, for the end and the connection of the different voices of the Quartet. . . . And so it ends with the motive clause of the beginning. The flute and clarinet impress it once more pianissimo upon the ear, by two chords played pizzicato. Te vuol tradir ancor. Heed well Elvira's counsel; she gives it to you at her bitter cost.

The second selection is a portion of the serenade scene, where Elvira appears at her window, in the beginning of the second act. The music in itself is exquisite; we have not room to describe the dramatic relations.

College Music.

A Concert under (or almost under) the classic elms of Harvard, of music vocal and instrumental, performed exclusively by students, is a new thing under the sun. We had barely room to say last week that we had attended such a concert, given by the old "Pierian Sodality" and "Harvard Glee Club," in the Lyceum Hall at Cambridge. We had too many pleasant memories connected with the old Sodality, to be able to resist the courteous invitation tendered us in person by the president, upon whose violoncello bass all the harmonious elements now pivot. It was a different affair in our day—a quarter of a century ago. Then we were little better than a flute club (every music-smitten collegian played the German flute as ardently as Mr. Swiveller),—a cloying concentration of mere sweetness,—relieved however by a couple of brave French horns, a bass horn and trombone, and sometimes a bass viol as we called it, and a clarinet; well that the latter ceased its exhaustive draft upon the lungs in good season, or we should not be here to write about it! The gentlemanly and artistic violin was not then known in college. We had perhaps a dozen members. Music enjoyed no general recognition in the college system. The club existed but by sufferance; and consequently its members did not always feel that they were put upon their good behavior. There were some wild times; but there were periods of splendor, as well as of eclipse in its history. More than once, since that time, it has almost died out; then again some genuine enthusiast or two revived it.

There is a somewhat better state of things in college now. Music is at least beginning to be recognized. The government have gone so far as to appoint an instructor in sacred music, and put the chapel choir in proper training; although we do not learn that said instructor has to do with either of the clubs above named. But certain it is that Music is far more appreciated among the leading minds at Harvard than it ever was before. The musical progress of the community about the college of course exerts an influence there; and some effect undoubtedly is due to the organization among Cambridge graduates, some twenty years since, of the "Harvard Musical Association," which sprang immediately from the old "Sodality." Be this as it may, the concert on Wednesday evening gave evidence of a higher musical culture among the students than past experience led us to expect. The vocal selections were mostly of a high order; and the instrumental pieces, although belonging to the category of "light" music, were such as the occasion and materials required, and showed good skill and taste in treatment. Here is the programme:

1. Nord Stern Quadrilles; Strauss.
2. Serenade: Eisenhofer—Rhine Wine Song; Mendelssohn.
3. In Terra Solo. (Don Sebastiano); Donizetti.
4. Integer Vite.
5. Love; Cherubini.
6. Huntsmen's Farewell; Mendelssohn.
7. Amelie Waltzes; Lumbye.
8. Wecker Aolka. (Ballet of Faust.)
9. Serenade; Baker.
10. Sestette. (Czar and Zimmerman); Lorzhang.
11. Drinking Song; Mendelssohn.
12. Cavalier Song; Boott.
13. Pot-Pouri. (Martha); Flotow.
14. College Songs.—Fair Harvard, with words by Rev. Dr. Gilman. Written for our Bi-Centennial in 1836.

The "Pierians" are no longer a mere flute club; they numbered upon this occasion three good violins (forming the left wing); a cello (worthily presiding in the centre, as we said before, with steady and controlling dignity); two flutes plus one cornet, for the right wing; the whole flanked by a Grand Piano played by four hands—just a nice little orchestra for the graceful Strauss and Lunby waltzes. These were played with a precision, delicacy and spirit, which showed skill enough to master higher kinds of music, with the addition of a few more instruments. It is a good sign that collegians have begun to cultivate the piano and violin. It must of itself lead to study of the more classical schools of music. When the favor in which music is at length regarded by the Academic "powers that be," shall ripen into actual provision for music among the other recognized "humanities," when the Professorship of Music shall be founded, there is no telling with what ardor students will devote themselves to Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Bach and Mozart.

Something in this right direction might be seen already in the performances of the "Glee Club," composed of sixteen voices, who sang the Mendelssohn part-songs, the Latin chorus, &c., wholly without accompaniment, with admirable blending, light and shade, &c.,—quite up to the standard of our German "Orpheus," as we thought, and more uniformly in good tune. The Cherubini Quartet was a beautiful composition, and so finely sung as to be imperatively encored. So in fact were more than half the pieces. It was a most excitable, enthusiastic and responsive audience; neither the students, nor the enthusiastic fair (who with them naturally constitute as good a mutual admiration society as you will find) appeared to have the least respect for Mr. Panch's diatribes against the "encore swindle."

Well, it was a pleasant evening; like a realizing in one's children some of the fruitless aspirations of his own youth. A gratifying symptom, too, that the young men in College, who were wont to waste themselves in low and sensual indulgences, are learning to find that genial excitement which their natures crave in purer and more wholesome channels. Glee clubs and boat clubs are good alike for body and for soul.

Musical Review.

ERRATUM. In our last mess of reviews the types made us call Bennett's "To Chloe" a "song of wild and tender pathos," instead of mild, as we wrote it.

From the piles of new sheet music at our elbow we select the following compositions for the Piano-forte, as worthy of some notice.

(PUBLISHED BY O. DITSON & CO.)

1. Posthumous Works of Chopin. Last Mazurka (Op. 68, No. 8); pp. 5.
2. Le Soupir (Sehnen und Fragen). J. SCHAD; pp. 5.
3. Soirées de Paris, by J. EGGHARD, Op. 37; No. 4. Nocturne; pp. 5.
4. Nocturne, Op. 31. A. HERZBERG; pp. 5.

1. There is no question of the genuineness of this title. The unfinished Mazurka is really the last inspiration of Chopin, "thrown on paper but a little before his death." and when he was too weak to try it over on the piano. It is a work of touching interest, full of delicate, sad beauty, with a certain sick and dreary feeling after finer and more spiritual modulations, almost, them our scale affords. Exquisitely beautiful, and Chopin-like, if somewhat morbid. Unfinished as it is, it is a musical relic to be reverently cherished.

2. We descend into a more common sphere, and yet one not without refinement. The numerous clever little works now published under the names of Nocturne, Berceuse, &c., &c., are so much alike in style, in feeling and in merit, that one can hardly find words for each separately. Le Soupir is a kind of pleading and pathetic bass solo, violoncello-like, answered in the treble, and worked up in approved Italian Opera style; quite pleasing.

3. Egghard's Nocturne is in the usual six-eight rhythm, a musing melody accompanied by an arpeggio figure rising through the intervals of two or three octaves.

4. The Nocturne by Herzberg shows the influence of Chopin, in rhythmical outline, a certain fineness of detail, &c.,—the form without the inspiration. Yet a pleasing piece for young pianists.

From MESSRS. RUSSELL AND FULLER we have:

1. A Prelude for Piano, by SEBASTIAN BACH; good of course in every high artistic sense. A light little allegro, in G minor, three-eight measure; one of those fancies in which the old Leipzig Cantor struck a vein much worked in later times by Mendelssohn. It is a piece of 7 pages, capital exercise for light and independent play of all the fingers.
2. Etude by FERD. HILLER; pp. 2. An Andante con espressione, embodying a strange rhythmic peculiarity, which may puzzle for a while; but the piece is worth mastering.
3. Nocturne. F. HARBORDT; pp. 5.
4. Les Feuilles d'Automne: Idylle, by G. MARCALLEOU; pp. 5. A very simple, inoffensive Cantabile Andante; good practice in the legato style.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. — (From the Musical World, May 23.)

The second performance of Don Giovanni confirmed all that had been previously said in favor of Madlle. Titiens' Donna Anna. Il Traviatore was repeated on Saturday, and the Huguenots, on Tuesday; Madlle. Pocchini appearing as usual in the new ballet, Fleur des Champs.

The first performance of Il Barbiere, with Alboni as Rosina, took place on Wednesday, the Derby Day, and, in consequence the house was by no means full. Nevertheless, those who did attend were repaid by some of the most exquisite singing ever heard. How Alboni executed Rossini's music we need not insist. Enough that she charmed her hearers from the first note of the performance to the last. "Una voce" and "Dunque io son" were both faultless, and Rode's air, introduced in the lesson scene, created the same sensation as of old, and the last variation was tumultuously encored.

If only good singing were required, Signor Belletti would be one of the very best of Figaros; and as much may be said of Signor Belart in Count Almaviva. Both have wonderful fluency. We never heard the duet "All'idea di quel metallo" more perfectly delivered. Equally good was the trio, "Ah! qual colpo," by Alboni, Signors Belart and Belletti, the last movement of which—"Zitti, Zitti"—was followed by the loud est applause.

We cannot praise the Dr. Bartolo of Signor Rossi, although he sang the reproach to Rosina well; nor the Basilio of Signor Violetti, whose voice is antipathetic to Rossini's music. Mad. Ghioni deserves a word of commendation for her reading of the quaint air, "Cerca Moglie," which, nevertheless, she spoiled by an ill-judged cadence at the end.

The second act of La Figlia followed, with Madlle. Piccolomini, Signor Belart and Signor Violetti; and the entertainments concluded with the divertissement, Calisto.

On Thursday Don Giovanni was given for the third time, with Fleur des Champs.

Last evening Il Trovatore with Fleur-des-Champs.

May 29.—On Saturday the Traviata was given, together with the divertissement, Fleur-des-Champs.

On Tuesday, Don Giovanni, with Fleur-des-Champs.

On Thursday, Il Trovatore with Calisto.

To night the Nozze de Figaro will be produced, with Madlle. Titians as the Countess; Madlle. Piccolomini, Susanna; Madlle. Ortolani, Cherubino; Signor Beneventano, Count Almaviva; Signor Belletti, Figaro; Signor Belart, Basilio; Signor Castelli, Antonio; and Signor Rossi, Bartolo. Madlle. Marie Taglioni makes her first appearance this season in a new ballet, entitled La Reine des Songes: so that the performances will be more than usually attractive.

Verdi's Opera, Luisa Miller, is in active preparation for Madlle. Piccolomini, and will be produced on Tuesday, June 8th.

A morning performance takes place on Monday, when Don Giovanni will be given, with a ballet, in which Madlles. Pocchini and Marie Taglioni will appear.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the third concert the first part of the programme was all from Mendelssohn: viz. Overture: "Fingal's Cave": Aria: Infelice (sung by Mme. Castellan); Piano Concerto in G minor, played from memory by Mme. Szaryady (Wilhelmina Clauss); Duet from the Lobgesang (Castellan and Herr Reichart); Air: "If with all your heart"; and Symphony in A. The second part contained Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen" and Weber's to "Preciosa"; Rode's Variations, sung; Piano Solos from Chopin, &c.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Mme. BOSIO made her first appearance for the season, May 22, in La Traviata; Sig. Gardoni was the Alfredo, Graziani the elder Germont; Polonini, Tagliafico and Zelger in the subordinate parts. Bosio was in splendid voice and sang with all her usual brilliancy, while in acting she is said to have made a great advance. The Huguenots was to follow, for the sixth time this season. RONCONI and FORMES were expected in a few days—vainly in the case of Formes, if the report of his Strakosch engagement in our Western States be true.

The fourth PHILHARMONIC CONCERT was "one of the most magnificent concerts ever given." Two Symphonies: Mozart's in G minor, and Beethoven's in F, No. 8; two overtures: Spohr's to Jessonda, and Cherubini's to Faniska; then Joachim again, who played Mendelssohn's Concerto, and Bach's Sonata, with fugue, for Violin solo; and then for a singer, Miss Louisa Pyne, who sang Vedrai Carino, and an air by Pacini.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, JUNE 15.—Since the memorable period when that ancient foggy, William Penn, held famous treaty with the Indians, under the wide-spreading oak from the site whereof now radiate the bustling streets of Kensington, there has not been known a stagnation in musical matters, like the present. Not so much as a mocking-bird chirping from the window of a spinster. MUSARD (do you recollect my prediction?) has incontinently "caved;" the GERMANIA no longer charms the senses of the beau monde at the Musical Fund Hall; and the Music Stores liken unto those "banquet halls deserted," whereof discourseth the inspired poet. There is, in point of fact, nothing left us but Lager Beer, and the subterranean concerts, which have made beverage popular. When these caravanserais were first established, they were patronized exclusively by phlegmatic Germans, who loved to chat away the fleeting hours of the night over a genial mug of beer, and to discuss sagely the politics of the Vaterland.

Soon after, however, "Young America" conceived a passion for a snug tête-à-tête at the small square tables, entered the territory à la fillibuster, and absorbed every square inch of ground. When the Falstaffian proprietors marked the change, they shaped their ends accordingly, and altered the character of their nightly concerts.

Herr Backenbart, the violinist, and Frau Sauerbier, vocalist, received their passports, and their places were tendered to Gumbo Chaff and Paddy Miles. Thus, too, Schubert and Abt gave way to Stephen C. Foster and Samuel Lover. Some nights since, I entered one of these subterranean Concert Halls, to gratify a pre-conceived curiosity. The fumes of segar smoke, whiskey and beer filled the long, narrow saloon to suffocation, and cost me a fit of coughing as I descended the steps. Far off at the other end, enshrouded in a dense halo, (upon a rickety platform stood a female,) singing, "T'were vain to tell thee all I feel." Heaven save the mark! Here was "God's best gift to man" vocalizing to a congregation of heterogenous reprobates, who passed from tongue to tongue the most palpable obscenities within her very hearing.

Blush with me for human nature, most worthy journal! Then followed Paddy Miles, who chanted forth a refrain about a certain "broth of a boy, and his love for one Mistress Gollogher" and swung a formidable shillelagh around his brick-top head every time the chorus joined in. Hereupon a sallow Italian, redolent of maccaroni and tobacco, mounted the platform and performed the stereotyped "Carnival of Venice," with five new variations. This artist enjoyed a wild encore, and when, to oblige his critical audience, he struck suddenly into "Yankee Doodle," the confusion became so intense as to cause all the beer mugs to vibrate upon the tables. After all this followed a farce, with diminutive scenery, but I did not remain, for I was well nigh stifled.

This sort of musical entertainment is all which remains to us since the collapse of Mons. Musard and his Philadelphia Orchestra. Let those whose tastes prove sufficiently depraved, patronize these undercurrents to legitimate amusements.

FORMES has sung four times during the past week. His rendition of such morecanx as In diesen Heiligen Hallen, and the Wanderer, by Schubert, should have rescued Musard; but the inordinate heat of the weather and the extraordinary stupidity of every feature of the concerts with which the name of the great Basso was not coupled, rendered salvation impossible.

MARRICO.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., JUNE 15.—The Grand Floral and Musical Entertainment spoken of some months ago, is announced to come off on the 24th June, at the Athenæum.... The Summer Exhibition of the Brooklyn Horticultural Society will take place on the 22d and 23d, and the "Grand Floral Promenade Concert," as it is announced, on the following evening. Hall's Seventh Regiment Band are to "do" the music for the occasion. This is the largest, and by many it is considered the best Military Band in the country, but "comparisons are odorous," and it is quite unnecessary to say anything on that point, as either the Seventh Regiment or our own Dods-worth's Band will do in case of emergency.

The following is the Programme, as announced:

1. Overture—La fille du Regiment, String Band; Donizetti.
2. Aria—From Robert Le Diable, String Band; Meyerbeer.
3. Chorus—From Templar and Judin, Military Band; Marschner.
4. Duet—From William Tell, String Band; Rossini.
5. Overture—Stradella, String Band; Flotow.
6. Aria—From Bellisario, Military Band; Donizetti.
7. Prayer—From William Tell, [Solo for Oboe; Clarinet and Cornet c.] Rossini.
8. Duet—Lucia di Lammermoor, String Band; Donizetti.
9. Chorus—Tannhauser, Military Band; R. Wagner.
10. Grand Floral Festival March, Military Band; Brannes.

The Committee of Arrangements is composed of about seventy of our most enterprising and wealthy citizens. The "Flora McFlimsey's" are in ecstasies; such a splendid opportunity to show that new "love of a hat" and that superb "one hundred dollar robe" just from Stuart's. The affair promises to be something well worth seeing. No expense or labor will be spared to render it an occasion worthy to be remembered. The committee in their announcement say: "The Floral Designs, Statuary, and other Decorations, will surpass anything of the kind which has ever been attempted here."

In New York, at the Academy, the Opera goes on swimmingly, showing how much better it is to have all the principal artists interested in the pecuniary success of so large an enterprise as an opera, than to pay them a certain sum in any event, leaving the result to be worked out by other parties who are interested only in its pecuniary success. Whenever we have had Italian Opera given on this plan, it has been more successful than in any other way. It may be impracticable, because of the impossibility in the way of getting a sufficient number of artists to unite on such common ground. But this objection removed, the chances of success are ten to one in favor of the plan now in operation at the Academy.

A gentleman who has just arrived from London says that Mr. GEORGE LOBER will visit America this fall, with an English Opera company; Mrs. LUCY ESCOTT, Soprano, HENRY SQUIRES, Tenore, &c. From the flattering accounts received here of the success of Mrs. Escott and Mr. Squires since their first appearance in Italy some three years ago, their return to us is looked for with no little interest.

Musical Chit-Chat.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held at the Music Hall on Wednesday of last week, the President, J. B. Upham, Esq., in the chair. From the annual report of the Treasurer, it appears that the total receipts for the year have amounted to $5,864 15, and the total expenditures to $7,458 24, leaving a balance of $1,405 91. The following Board of Directors was elected for the ensuing year: J. B. Upham, J. M. Fessenden, George Derby, H. W. Pickering, Eben Dale, E. D. Brigham, and J. P. Putnam.

The Atlantic Monthly for July is bright and early in our hands, and ready for delivery this day. The sight of it is always good as good music to the soul. The contents of the new number seem as rich and individual as ever, the "Autocrat" included. We have yet, in duty to ourselves, to pay our respects to the Magazine of our times in full.

The following remarks of the New York Musical Review about the popular nonsense of "Old Folks' Music," are pertinent and true:

A Mr. Kendall, of Fulton, N. Y., is so much interested in "Old Folks' Music" (so-called) that he invites a gathering of all such as desire "to sing some of those good old tunes and words which so often cheered and animated the hearts of the Pilgrim Fathers and Mothers amid the toils, sufferings, and privations through which they were called to pass in the early settlement of our country." Now while we would by no means insist that Mr. Kendall should possess sufficient taste to perceive that the so-called "old folks' music" is not "good old tunes," we do claim that he has no right to be so ignorant of history as to couple this trash with the Pilgrim Fathers. Had he ventured upon saluting their ears with any such stuff, the chances are that the "toils, sufferings, and privations" would have been on his side, as he would undoubtedly have made a close acquaintance with the whipping-post. The Pilgrim Fathers set their faces resolutely against any trifling with or burlesquing of religious matters. No, Mr. Kendall, a very little reading of the musical history of the country would have taught you that your "good old tunes" date no further back than the commencement of the Revolutionary War; a very good and patriotic time indeed, but certainly not very musical. William Billings, the arch "fuguer" of them all, born in 1749, and publishing his first book in 1770, was for all we know, a very estimable man, as he certainly was a warm patriot; but he knew about as much of the laws of harmony and musical composition, as did Maelzel's automaton trumpeter, or as does that street-organ which is grinding out Casta Diva as we write. But we did not intend to disparage Mr. Billings, when we commenced, who after all only followed some very bad examples set him from over the water, just about that time; we only wish to enter our decided protest against the further continuance of any such anachronism as the coupling of continental harmony or old folk's music, whether in or out of costume, with the Pilgrim Fathers.

The "Barber of Seville," in English, has lately been performed at Louisville, Ky.; Miss DURAND doing the Rosina, and Miss Hodson, a deep contralto, the tenor part of Almaviva!... Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, after an interval of twenty years, has been brought out at the Theatre Lyrique in Paris, and with immense success.... It is stated that the Emperor Alexander has decreed the establishment of nineteen theatres in the principal towns of Great Russia, of four in Little Russia, four in the Baltic Provinces, five in Kasan, three in Astrakan, five in Southern Russia, eight in Western Russia, Finland and Siberia, five in Poland, and others in great towns where none already exist. They are to receive government subventions, and perform chiefly operas, in which foreigners and natives may figure.... An unpublished one-act "Opera Buffo," by Donizetti, called Rita, has been discovered, and pronounced authentic by a learned committee of musical Frenchmen.

The Natick (Mass.) Observer gives us a "notice" which we copy, in the hope that its suggestions may have influence in other places. Natick has done nobly, and has already sent the twenty subscribers aimed at in the notice. Any town which has one live and active friend of music in it, may and ought to do as much for the support of a musical paper, and thereby for the promotion of its own musical culture:

This paper, originally established by John S. Dwight, at the urgent request of many of the leading musical people of Boston and its vicinity, who had long known that gentleman's peculiar fitness for the position of editor of a musical periodical, is now in its seventh year. At the beginning of the present volume, its publication was assumed by the well-known firm of "Ditson & Co.," leaving Mr. Dwight free to devote all his time and energies to the editorial department. It will be seen that for the purpose of extending the sphere of its usefulness, Mr. Ditson offers it to clubs of twenty subscribers for the small sum of $25, or $1.25 each!

Considering that eight pages of reading matter and four of music are given in each number, it is evident that the mere cost of printing cannot be covered by the subscription. We can assure our readers that no Art-Journal in the world is offered so cheaply as this.

An effort is now making to form a club in Natick, of at least twenty subscribers, and we hope most sincerely, that it will prove successful. At the end of the year each subscriber will have some four hundred quarto pages of musical reading, and more than two hundred pages of music, so paged that each may be bound separately.

It may be interesting to many, to know that our townsman, A. W. Thayer, expects to be in Europe before the summer is over, and that he will correspond with the paper, giving his impressions of music and art in the countries which he will visit. Among the topics, which will be the subjects of his letters, are, Operas, Oratorios, Concerts, the performances of the most celebrated Bands of the Prussian and Austrian army, music as taught in schools, and the like.

It may be thought that the music which is published in the Journal is too difficult for us, in the country. Difficulty is a merely relative term; that which at first seems unconquerable soon becomes easy, by proper practice, and we should think very meanly of our Natick Musical Association, if we doubted its ability, under any competent leader, to sing after adequate rehearsals, the beautiful works by Mendelssohn and Schubert, which have already graced the columns of this volume of the Journal of Music.

We look forward to the time when singing societies in our various towns, shall have an annual festival; one year here perhaps, another in Holliston, or Milford, &c., as the case may be, upon which occasions these beautiful works would form the most attractive features, after the grand Oratorio, which of course is above all.

P. S.—those who wish to subscribe for the journal spoken of above, can leave their names at this office.

The Germans in New York are building a new theatre in the Bowery; the German importers are a wealthy and well-educated class, and able, no doubt, to support another opera house.... We read that the libretto of a new opera, from the pen of a highly accomplished New York lady, has just been completed, founded on incidents taken from the history and peculiar religious customs of Hindostan, and to be entitled "Lackémi." The only feature of the work as a musical composition, apart from the merits of the libretto, will consist in the adaptation and use of the choicest morceaux of the great masters, Rossini, Bellini, and others, systematically arranged and dove-tailed, so as to resemble a continuous work.

One of the Paris letter-writers says of MARIO: "He has refused to sign an engagement with the Italian Opera for the next season. His reason, as given in a letter to one of his friends in Paris, is that here his expenses are enormous. He says that his salary for the seven months of last season was one hundred and five thousand francs, and that he spent one hundred and thirty-five thousand! If the due of Candia spends as much for other articles of the toilet as he does for kid gloves, of which it is said he puts on several new pairs every day, never wearing one pair twice, there is no doubt his expenses are what he states. He is now in his villa of Florence, where he has collected treasures of art that do honor to his taste."

The Association of Amateurs and Musicians of Rhenish Prussia were to hold their 36th grand annual festival at Cologne, on the 23d, 24th and 25th of May. The performances were to take place in the newly-restored Gürzenich hall. There were to be 286 female and 233 male singers, and 148 instrumental performers—in all 667. Ferdinand Hiller was to be the director, and an oratorio of his, called Saul, was to be produced, together with works of Bach, Gluck, Mendelssohn, Beethoven and others. . . . The grand musical festival of the Swiss Confederation is to be held this year in Zurich, where they are constructing an immense hall to accommodate 4000 singers and 6000 auditors.

In the last act of Henry VIII., at the Boston Theatre last week, while the dying scene of Queen Catharine was so strikingly represented by Miss CURSMAN, Handel's sacred song: "Angels ever bright and fair" was sung behind the scenes by Mrs. HARWOOD, and in a highly artistic and expressive manner which delighted everybody. . . . The music-lovers herabouts will be very glad to learn that Mrs. J. H. LONG will not leave Boston for the present, nor is there any probability that she will do so in another season. . . . Mrs. E. A. WENTWORTH was by last accounts in Rome. . . . Intelligence has been received from Caracas, that Signora AGRILSE NATALE (known in Philadelphia as Miss AGNESE HERON) had made a successful debut in Italian opera in the Trovatore. The part of the Gypsy was sung Mme. ALDINI; of Count di Luna by MORELLI; of Manrico by GIANNONI, and of Fernando by ROCCO. Miss FANNY HERON (Signora Francesca Natale) was to appear in La Figlia del Reggimento and the Traviata, and the two sisters in Linda.

The Grand Musical Festival, in which nearly all the instrumental performers in New York are concerned, is announced to take place at the Academy of Music on the 27th inst. Among the participants will be the members of the Philharmonic Society, the Italian Opera, the orchestra of the city theatres, the various bands, &c., forming an orchestra of over three hundred performers. Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" will be performed, CARL ANSCHUTZ conducting, and Mmes. CARADORI and ZIMMERMANN, HERR FORMES and Mr. SIMPSON sustaining the vocal solos, with a chorus of 300 singers. This will be followed on the next day by a Pic-nic, Concert and Ball. The proceeds to be devoted to purposes of charity. . . . The opera advertisement in the New York papers states that Mme. GAZZANIGA is engaged at Madrid, which will "prevent the continuation of the summer season beyond the 30th inst," and furthermore that "she is admitted by the entire press, &c., &c., to be the greatest dramatic lyric artiste that has yet visited America." From the same interesting card we get the comforting assurance that Il Trovatore would be performed "most positively the last time" on Monday, June 14.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Battle of Lexington. Song. L. Heath. 30

The thrilling Poem of Oliver Wendell Holmes, which bears this name, has already won for itself a high place among the young and vigorous growth which we call our own national literature. It needed the hand of the musician to introduce it to the Homes and Hearts of the People. The Composer of the "Grave of Bonaparte" has taken the task upon himself. If a melody of a highly impressive character, warming from stern simplicity into dramatic fire and pathos, fitting exactly to the poem throughout, can insure success, then his Song will be a Household Song ere long.

Thy name I softly murmur. (Immortelle.) Kucken 25

With English and German words. A Love Song, tender and passionate in turns. One of Kucken's best.

Clemie Gay. H. Aug. Pond. 25

Childhood's happy home. H. Aug. Pond. 25

Simple songs for the young, well arranged.

Instrumental.

Chopin's Last Mazurka. 25

Although not the best of the "Posthumous works" of this sensitive musical mind, it is one of the most characteristic, and a dear relic of the master whose tide of life was already ebbing low, when he penned this Mazurka. He had never strength enough afterwards, to try it on the piano. It is even, through a melancholy whim of the dying composer, "Scorza Fice."—Other of Chopin's posthumous works will follow.

La Saison de Londres. Valse brillante. Tedesco. 25

This composition bears the stamp of decided originality, and has a melodious flow and spirits, which is not excelled by any of the more youthful works of the now veteran composer. As a "Valse de Salon" it answers all purposes. It is brilliant, melodious and piquant.

Evergreen Polka. Conner. 25

Rippling Schottisch. H. Aug. Pond. 25

Gen. Havelock's Grand Triumphal March. Jullien. 25

Sleigh Bell Waltz. Brieker. 25

Peach blow Schottisch. H. Aug. Pond. 25

Overture "Zampa" for Four Performers on two Pianos, arranged by Lattenburg. 1,50

Has long been eagerly looked for and will prove a valuable addition to the works of a similar kind already issued, viz., Overtures Tell and Fra Diavolo.

Mazurka élégante. Lefebvre-Wely. 25

A very graceful late composition of the favorite author. Rather easy.

Showers of Gold. Reverie Romance from Balfe's "Bohemian Girl." King. 30

This is a fascinating arrangement or Transcription of that exquisite little melody of Balfe's, to the words: "I dream that I dwell in marble halls." The arrangement is in the favorite Tremolo style and done with so much nicety and taste, that this may justly be considered the "Pearl of Tremolos." Moderately difficult.

Books.

ONE HUNDRED SONGS OF SCOTLAND, Music and Words. 50

This collection embraces all the popular Scotch Melodies, with poetry by Robert Burns, Allan Ramsay, James Hogg, Walter Scott, Robert Tannahill, and others, and is the most complete compilation of the kind published. Scottish airs possess little claim to technical art; but are decidedly characteristic, and unlike the compositions of any other country. There is a tone of quaint humor, and a touching, yet agreeable, melancholy in most of them, and they eloquently express the varying emotions of the human mind; whether of tenderness, joy, grief, love, or hate. What comes from the heart generally goes to the heart, and many of them originated in the love of the chiefs, the return of some wanderer, the birth of an heir, the settlement of a quarrel, or the inspirations of the sombre and majestic scenery of the mountains. They exhibit a strong love of pastoral life, and a fine appreciation of whatever was simple and beautiful in nature.

The native words, which were originally sung to the ancient melodies, have long faded away and many unmeaning verses, which up to the end of the last century possessed some of the finest melodies, have been supplanted by new and appropriate words. The verses which are now most popular are chiefly the production of a comparatively modern period, and, in connection with the Melodies, are presented in this volume in a neat, convenient and durable form, and at a price conformable to the means of all.

Dream Land.

From the pages of an English Magazine, where it appeared anonymously:

Where sullen rivers weep
Their waves into the deep,
She sleeps a charmed sleep,
Awake her not.

Led by a single star
She came from very far,
To seek where shadows are
Her pleasant lot.

She left the rosy morn,
She left the fields of corn,
For twilight cold and lorn,
And water springs.
Through sleep as through a veil,
She sees the sky look pale,
And hears the nightingale,
That sadly sings.

Rest, rest, a perfect rest,
Shed over brow and breast;
Her face is towards the west,
The purple land.

She cannot see the grain
Ripening on hill and plain;
She cannot see the rain
Upon her hand.

Rest, rest for evermore
Upon a mossy shore,
Rest, rest, that shall endure,
Till time shall cease;—
Sleep that no pain shall wake,
Night that no morn shall break,
Till joy shall overtake
Her perfect peace.

Musical Orthodoxy.

From the German of MME. JOHANNA KINKEL.

Similar conversations, based upon the music which they performed together, took place between Sohling and the two women two or three times a week. Ida's quickness of understanding, which fast developed itself as she overcame her prejudices more and more, interested Sohling greatly. Her witty vein re-appeared, though somewhat chastened by her secret sorrow. But this was to her advantage, for her natural excitability, far too great, needed a restraint. By degrees with internal peace returned her bloom, and she was compelled to acknowledge to herself that she was no longer so very miserable, though, with the obstinacy of girls of her age, she would never be happy again!

The painter, a woman of wide culture, had very soon seen that Ida had but little education except in music. Her questions, when they had been together in the picture gallery, or when any book of high character had fallen into her hands, showed how little she had read and how little, her mind always occupied by tones, she had noticed what was around her. She might pass a remarkable building or a statue a hundred times, and yet carry off no definite idea of its separate features in her memory.

In a conversation with Ida, the painter has spoken of it as one of Sohling's highest recommendations, that he was not a mere mechanical musician, adding:

"One learns so much from him, because he is not confined to mere technical methods of explaining himself to unmusical people, as others are, but because through his manifold culture, a thousand analogies are at his command, and he is enabled to find, in the case of each individual, right point of approach to his understanding. For example if you knew as much about the ancients as he does, you would be far better able to place your idol Gluck in the proper light before the musical laity. No man of culture, who had read Sophocles, would remain in love with operatic music of a low order, if you were able to show him a dramatic truth and force in music equal to that in the Greek drama."

At an exhibition, would the painter stand with delight before a capital old picture, which from its darkened colors seemed to Ida gloomy and tedious to look upon, and to which she by far preferred a young noble, painted in the style of the older Düsseldorf school. "And yet," said the painter, "you are offended because the musically uninformed hear Donizetti rather than Sebastian Bach! Here you have the spirit of each as he would have shown it in color!"

A year of such intercourse was sufficient to awaken in Ida the liveliest desire for mental improvement. She felt it her duty to give not a single hour more to her profession, than was necessary to supply her necessities. The rest of her time was devoted to study. She entered into and breathed the atmosphere of the great poets of her fatherland, and with the clear insight into artistic form as displayed in language, grew up in her the comprehension and appreciation of the lyrical in music, of the epic elements of the Symphony. Her mind opened itself to color and form, and as she became familiar with history, her fancy found new life and nourishment in old national poetry.

By this time, Sohling began to find himself as much quickened and intellectually excited, by conversation with her, and as much indebted to the activity of her mind for new ideas, as she had been formerly to his. He began to prefer her company to all other, although not the slightest spark of passion for her had entered his heart. He never experienced, when with her, anything of that dreamy state, so favorable to love. Her mind was too active to allow a young man opportunity to say to himself: "Here art thou late at night with a pretty girl alone!"

Twilight often came without notice from them, and instead of lamps shone the moon and stars into the room. The lindens in blossom out on the public square sent their fragrance into the room and the fountains plashed pleasantly below. But still no feeling of tenderness found place, which might be the bridge from heart to heart. There were no moments of silence, and a thousand topics remained untouched when they parted.

The habit of being so much together had long since banished the stiff forms of north German society from their intercourse; their relations to each other were much the same as those of two friends of the same sex, who have no secrets from each other, not even in matters of the heart.

Sohling had often wondered at her sudden change of the conversation, when he happened to speak of Selvar's family. Her emotion during his first visit and her refusal to add a note to his letter to Selvar, again recurred to his memory. At a later period it had occurred to him that possibly there might be some love affair in the case, but he never dreamed of the real person, believing, as young men generally do—even such as are not particularly vain—that a man can only be dangerous to the peace of a girl when in his best years, say from twenty to thirty.

He had therefore spoken freely of the "old Count" and told anecdotes of him, which so far as he knew were perfectly harmless, and which yet tore open the hardly cicatrized wounds in his listener's heart.

On such an occasion at length, when Ida could no longer hide her tears, she had made the young man the confidant of her secret. Her heart opened to him, like a raging volcano, and the current of passionate agony spread over the flowery garden picture, which Sohling had painted to himself of her life and labors.

Such love to a frosty gray-headed man was beyond his comprehension; still he was interested in the power and truth with which she described her emotions, so different from anything he had ever heard from the women of the great city. Ida felt ashamed of herself the next hour for having thus laid bare the secret of her heart; but her shame was overbalanced by her secret pleasure at having at length found one, with whom she could speak freely, who also had once lived in Selvar's family. She labored hard to save her recollections of the Count from that inevitable fading away, which is sure to overtake at last a love, which has its seat mainly in the fancy, and is separated from its object.

Sohling had a similar dark point in his past history, and returned Ida's confidence by relating it. He had been in love with a beautiful pupil of rank, who was endowed with a magnificent voice and real talent. Just returned from a Parisian school, the young coquette had taken pleasure in playing over the part with the music-teacher, which she in the winter hoped to perform at Court. The mother had no objection to the girl's having a little practice in love-making with so harmless an individual, in order to be the better prepared and not seem too awkward and at a loss, when more serious cases should arise.

Sohling thought himself for a long time the first love of a pure maiden soul; with bitter self-denial, he ruled his feelings in her presence, feeling the utter hopelessness of his wishes. But the little coquette knew well how, by her apparent simplicity, to lead him to some new expression of his passion, until at length the kindness of the girl and the calmness of the mother really deceived him into the idea of the possibility of obtaining her. After he had thus been kept along for some months, the innocent child married an old miser, whose ugliness of person was only exceeded by his stupidity.

Sohling was not so weak, as to cherish his passion; his heart was so suddenly cooled that he lived on for some years, without engaging in any new adventure.

The two artists now went calmly on their course of life together, with full assurance of safety in this respect; he, because he had become too indifferent to women to fall in love again; she, because her lasting sorrow for Selvar was a talisman, which defended her heart as with triple mail. Neither of them thought to inquire, why an evening passed in other society, even in the most intellectual, seemed to them both far emptier and less enjoyable, than a quiet interview in the dwelling of the painter. If Ida was not present at a concert, he directed with not half his usual ambition; if she waited in vain for him at the usual hour, she lost her composure and could find no rest either at her piano-forte or book.

A long cherished wish of Sohling was unexpectedly fulfilled. In a small, but very refined city, a music director was wanted, who at the same time should have charge of a fine theatre, and conduct an excellent musical association. Sohling applied for the place and obtained it over several men of high merit.

He hastened with the news to Ida, who turned pale and became of a sudden very sad and melancholy. The painter expressed her surprise in words. She wished him success, at the same time, honestly complaining of the solitude, which his removal from the city would bring upon her.

Sohling was ashamed of himself, that in his joy he had quite overlooked this. His heart was warm and faithful. He now felt what pain would necessarily accompany his farewell. "And worst of all, you will miss her!" said something within him as he glanced at Ida, whose eyes fell beneath his gaze. She had never seemed to him so loveable as in this quiet, retiring sorrow. His heart beat restlessly; he sighed and thought what a blind and foolish stroke of fortune it was that she had not rather loved him than Selvar!

It was necessary for him to hasten his departure, and he could give but passing moments to his friends. After each of these Ida's state of mind was more and more an enigma to herself. She felt oppressed; in his society she lost the power of conversation, and he appeared to suffer from some unknown cause of melancholy. The last evening had come. "Sing me once more," said he, "one of Beethoven's Scottish songs. You know my favorite: 'Enchantress, farewell!'"

The look which he gave her, was something to Ida strange, and one from which she at the moment shrank. The sweet melody melted her heart. He was indeed her friend, her brother, who now was to depart; he, before whom her stormy nature was all revealed, and who had allowed her to look down into the depths of his own mild and peaceful heart. She began the song; but from the depths of nature came the fast-flowing tears, and at the passage:

"O nur ein zärtlich Herz
Das Liebe will brechen, Versteht meine Qual, dass Ich dich nicht mehr seh—" her eyes grew dark, not another tone would come; she suddenly ceased and turned her head away. "Heavens! is it possible," said her heart, "I love him, and him alone!"

Sohling sat for a time beside her in silence, then rose and gently spoke her name. She regained her composure, and rising looked him again in the face. He tried in vain to speak the harsh, sad word, "farewell!"—it would not pass his lips. Forgetting himself entirely, he threw his arms about her, her head rested for a moment upon his breast, then followed a single kiss. She struggled to free herself, he held her fast, pressed her stormily to his bosom, and at length found words: "I cannot leave thee, Ida, I am wretched, for I love thee, thee only, and knew it not."

Ida could not speak. For some moments she stood with his head resting upon her shoulder, then withdrew, and placing her hand in his, said all in a look.

Sohling's departure was necessarily deferred for some days; for the problem of affection which they had just solved gave them more topics for conversation, than even music in their earlier intercourse, and topics, which they discussed as unweariedly as their Christmas gifts in childhood. For a time, Art—yes, all the world was forgotten, until the painter reminded them that greater preparations were necessary for a married pair's house-keeping than for that of a bachelor. Fortunate for them that she took this task upon herself, for they were just then too far above all the prose of life to be able to engage in details of business.

Ten years had passed since Ida's flight from Waldheim. Selvar's sister had been dead some years, and he was very much altered in person, if not in his tastes. His daughter and her husband, who was a Russo-German, had been obliged to obey the Czar's mandate at last, and return to their domain. Thus Selvar, who had no female relative to do the honors of his house, was left lonely at home. He made up for the stillness, which now reigned in Waldheim, in part by frequent journeys.

This summer he had even tired of the theatre; there was no new play, no interesting "star." So he made up his mind to visit his daughter. Upon his journey he stopped one day to rest himself in a city in central Germany, which lay in a lonely part of the country, and, as the new buildings showed, was rapidly increasing.

"Is there a theatre here?" he asked the landlord.

"Not to-day," was the answer; "but instead of a play there is a concert."

"I should have preferred a play," said the Count, "but I must use up the evening in some way. Get me a ticket."

Selvar, arriving rather late, had to content himself with a seat in the most distant part of the hall. Casting his eye over the programme, the name Sohling caught his notice. "That name is surely an old acquaintance," thought he. "Ah, yes; I wrote him once about poor Ida. Well, well," with a sigh, "I am no longer guilty of that sort of thing."

The symphony began, capitally led by Sohling. Among the upper classes the idea seems to prevail, that a symphony is hardly an integral part of a concert; but rather a prelude to it. The women especially pay about as much attention to it as to the drums in a wild beast show. They however are fond of the full orchestra, inasmuch as it covers up the remarks they exchange with their neighbors, upon the style and dress of other auditors. Here, however, the public showed that it knew something more of good manners. At the first attempt of Selvar, who was not free from this mark of quality, to engage his neighbor in conversation, he received for answer but a courtly motion of the head, and the persons sitting before him turned round with looks of astonishment.

Now, amid a tumult of applause, Ida advanced upon the stage. In spite of his eye-glass the Count did not recognize her. The change is immense which takes place in women, who early in life have been hindered from a natural physical development by too excitable a temperament, joined with an overwrought intellect. If, however, a period of rest and happiness comes at the right time, such a belated spring works greater wonders, than even the regular delay of life.

She ran over the keys of the piano-forte lightly, and as if she would join these first chords with what was to follow, she insensibly glided from them into the key of the enchanting Notturno of Chopin, which she was now for the first time to produce before her audience. Like the gentle tones of bells heard from the depths of some submerged city, in the stillness of a roseate evening, so magically do those undreamed of melodies penetrate into the secret recesses of the soul. It is, as if the voices of night were revealed in this music, voices which seem in the solitude of the forest calling to us from the stars or from ocean's depths.

Still, the number is small to whom the power is given of exorcizing these tones. He that with prosaic soul can only play notes, can never solve the problem, and only disgusts the listener. Ida knew how to breath expression into her fingers, here to raise a tone into light, and there to leave one in the shade, as the picture might demand.

In this peculiarity of touch, which revealed the artist's full command of the strings, and threw a warm and everchanging life into the dead metal, Selvar first recognized her, and again the dream of those days came clearly before his imagination. He fastened his eyes upon her until the picture thus recalled melted into the actual features of the performer before him.

The restless eye had become gentle and peaceful; the sharp features and pale cheeks of the past now bloomed in soft and pleasing freshness. Her form seemed larger, for she had at last overcome her carelessness of mien.

During the intermission Selvar noted the ease with which Ida kept up a lively conversation with the crowd of friends who surrounded her. These were not merely fops, such as are in general exclusively drawn to the female artist or singer, but people of various ages. With the women, too, she seemed to be upon terms of high respect and sympathy. She herself was full of life and spirit, and was evidently at ease and happy in the society about her.

A new composition by Selvar called Ida out again at the close of the concert. It was a piece for female voices, with accompaniment for pianoforte and solo instruments, which required thorough musicians. The text was exceedingly delicate and pretty, describing a dance of Elves in the moonlight upon the corollas of May flowers, until dispersed by the rising sun and its accompanying forest sounds and songs of the sky-lark. The neatness and beauty of the composition were rivalled by the nicety of the performance. A semi-circle of rosy young girls with clear bell-like voices sang the parts of the Elves and Larks. Ida conducted the chorus with hardly a motion, a look sufficing, for she had herself, as Selvar was told by a neighbor, taught them.

"She is in her right place," thought he, as he left the hall and noticed the hearty kindness in which the singers and their directress separated. He hesitated whether to approach and greet her; but was restrained by a singular feeling as he saw her radiant with joy leaning upon Sohling's arm. It seemed to him written upon the faces of both, that each thanked the other for the success which had crowned their efforts,—that their every breath was grateful joy.

Returned to the hotel, Selvar opened the window and leaned out to enjoy the cool night air. A carriage drove up to the house opposite, and he thought himself, by the bright gas light, able to distinguish the form of Ida, as a woman hastened into the door. Just then the room above was lighted; and certainly it was she who entered, clad in a silk dress of white with light blue stripes, with her raven locks falling down her cheeks. He could no longer restrain his desire to hear her voice once more, and sent his card over with the inquiry whether, at so late an hour, he might venture to make a short call. The servant returned with an invitation.

Sohling and Ida received him with unaffected heartiness, though the cheeks of the latter showed for the moment a decided increase of color. Selvar felt instantly the right chord to touch; and by expressions of the heartiest sympathy in their success, concealed the feelings, which the contrast with his own solitary home called up. The conversation was soon interrupted by a pair of rosy-cheeked children, who appeared roguishly listening at the door, and who would pay no attention to the father's command to go to their beds, until they had another kiss from mama.

Ida rose smiling, but before she reached the door, the little monkeys had rushed to her in their night-gowns, and were climbing into her arms. At length reduced to silence, they gave the hand to the strange gentleman, asking Sohling: "Is this the grandpapa who is coming to see us this summer?" At the same moment the youngest, in the next room, began to cry after its mother. To secure peace Ida was obliged to take it into her lap, where in a few minutes it was again fast asleep.

With this picture in his mind, Selvar departed. She belonged now to a sphere in which he had no longer part nor parcel. "And yet," said he, as he passed over the threshold, "she once loved me!"

When Sohling and Ida were again alone, she asked:

"Did it arouse no emotion in you to meet that man, whom I loved before you?"

He laughed and pressed a kiss upon her forehead, saying: "Ought I not rather to thank him who taught you so to love? The untempered flame of your wild heart would have been too much for me, and certainly the irrational first love of an unripened nature could never have made me so happy."

From My Diary. No. 9.

JUNE 11.—I had occasion to-day to make some remarks upon musical matters at a school where young persons are fitting to become teachers; and among the several points which were touched upon, were these:

The most noticeable difference between young women well educated here and their sisters in Europe—speaking of those who may be ranked together in the degree of intellectual attainment—is the want of artistic culture on the part of the Americans. The number, of even our most carefully educated girls, who have ever seen good specimens of architecture, sculpture, and painting, is very small; and I very rarely meet one out of the city, whose conceptions of the beauty of music are founded upon anything beyond the psalm tune and thanksgiving anthem of the parish meeting house, and an occasional concert by some set of "Family Vocalists." In Europe, the sense of the beautiful is developed by familiarity with galleries, fine old churches and palaces, and, especially in Catholic cities, by the fine music of the church. True, these are not found everywhere, but it is a part of education that the young girl have opportunities to spend some time in the "great city," whatever it be that is nearest.

This difference shows itself in the writings of European and American women, it seems to me, very clearly.

From the very nature of the case, few of us can obtain this artistic culture, in any direction, save that of music. Here it is possible to do something. Hence I go heart and soul into any plan by which music shall be made a study in all schools, and especially in those, where the future school teacher is preparing for that responsible position. True, I would go farther and have in every such school a few fine engravings from the works of great painters, a few specimens of sculpture and so on, if that were possible; but for the present, we must be glad to have music in some manner recognized as of value.

Now, how to make it a means of artistic culture? The answer is very simple. By the practise of good music. Good music is that which contains feeling, emotion, sentiment, elegantly expressed in musical tones. The analogy between poetry and music is very close. Everybody—at all events, almost all persons,—can arrange words so as to make them jingle. Witness the "poet's corner" in the newspapers. But is this poetry? Usually not.

So too, their name is Legion, who can take such poetry, and find musical notes to it, and sell them as songs and tunes. But as mere jingle in words is not poetry, so mere rhythmical collections of notes are not music. The child is amused by hearing nonsensical articulate sounds strung together so as to make rhythm and rhyme—Mother Goose's Melodies, for example; so he is amused by "tooting" upon the stalk of a pumpkin leaf. As he grows older he demands something better than to satisfy his poetic feeling; and so in music his ear demands something more than his pumpkin trumpet. The sense of melody awakens, and he demands a tune. By and by, he finds no pleasure in jingling words unless they contain the divine spark, which is struck out of the brain and heart of the true poet. Just so in music. Twopenny polkas, waltzes, and songs only weary and disgust, and as his taste grows apace, volumes of such stuff are not worth so much to him as some choral or simple song, which sprang from the composer's heart. A shelf full of yellow covered novels is not so much worth to him as a sonnet or song by Milton or Shakspeare,—by any true poet, though his name be not among those of the giants.

"Hickory, dickory, dock,
The mouse ran up the clock."

Let us bring out this point in another way.

The idea of a being of higher nature than man taking such delight in the beauty of a child as to steal him, living or dead, from his parents, is as old as the story of Jupiter and Ganymede. Shakspeare uses it in "A Midsummer Night's Dream." It is common enough. Now there is a certain poetic conception of this idea, which probably has offered itself to thousands of minds, in some vague, indistinct manner, but which was seized, and held for the first time by one, who, to the power of conception, added the mastery of language and the poetic art, when Goethe wrote his ballad the "Erl-king." A certain indescribable feeling of horror is therein expressed. The feeling is aroused at once in the mind of every poetic reader. A musician reads it. He feels it, and as his mode of conveying his sentiments is by musical tones, he endeavors to translate the sentiment expressed in Goethe's words into his language of tones. The attempt has been made by a multitude of composers. One succeeded—Franz Schubert. As I heard the once great operatic singer, Schroeder-Devrient, whose voice is now mostly gone, sing it, I fairly shuddered, and so did the entire audience. You could have heard a pin drop. Goethe's ballad is poetry; Schubert's composition of it is music. Both express most powerfully the same poetic conception.

An inference to be drawn from all this then is, that in the mere succession and combination of musical tones, without relation to words, we may look for sentiment and feeling—and indeed that sentiments and feelings may be so conveyed that the composer's intent shall be understood at once by the hearer. The power of tones—of mere intonation—as a means of expression was illustrated first, in respect to articulate speech, by reading passages from Shakspeare and the "Erl-king" in German; and then in music by singing several melodies to the syllable la, calling upon the auditors to decide upon the sentiment expressed. The result justified the remarks upon this topic by a correspondent of Dwight's Journal (F. H.) a few years since.

But, it is said, granting all you would claim in regard to good music, of what practical use would it be to us who are fitting to become teachers, and whose only object in music is to acquire so much knowledge as will enable us to teach simple songs and tunes to children? I may ask in return of what use is it to you to spend time in studying the art of reading Shakspeare and Milton? Why pursue studies in all directions, far beyond what most of you will ever be called upon to teach? You answer that the more you know of natural philosophy, the higher your attainments in mathematics, history, polite literature, in science and letters generally, the better you will be fitted to teach the elements of them all. In this you are right. I say, too, that it would be no more absurd for you to spend your whole course upon the a, b, c's of reading, arithmetic, history, geography, grammar, and so on, than for you to do the same thing in music. The mere reading of simple tunes should be as easy to nine-tenths of the scholars of any school such as this, and in as short a space of time, as the reading of words of one or two syllables to the classes of a children's school. Any common psalm tune, in any key, ought to offer no difficulty by the third or fourth week, provided thirty minutes a day were devoted to practise. I am speaking merely of reading music—how to write down tunes in various keys, and all the whys and wherefores thereto belonging, with the entire theory of notation—all this is a different affair. I should not begin with a child, whom I would teach to read, by some seventy-five or a hundred lessons in the rules of grammar and rhetoric. I would have him learn his letters. This is a, and that is b; and a, b, spell ab. Nothing, yet awhile, about nouns and pronouns, and verbs and articles. The child must fix in his memory the forms of the letters and a few other things, and then all that is needed is practise. The singer learns some half a dozen things about the staff, the clefs, the length of notes, and scales, &c., and then all he wants is practise. This idea of mystifying the matter until the pupil is discouraged and gives up learning to sing in despair, is one which is fatal to all progress. All that the singer wants is to feel what tones the notes represent and to learn then to express them. Let him learn to read simple music, and all the theory will be explainable to him afterward, in a very few lessons.

The old way of learning a strange language was to put the pupil into the grammar and keep him there. Take a boy from the Latin Grammar School in Boston and he will repeat you the whole of Andrew's and Stoddard's Latin Grammar—but what does he know about Latin? A boy who has been in a German Gymnasium six months can use what he knows, and ask for something to eat and drink and wherewithal to wear in Latin.

What I want to see is something practical in the musical instruction in schools—to see all who have musical powers beyond the Mother Goose's Melodies of music, really making the divine art a means of artistic culture—a means of developing an innate sense of the beautiful.

JUNE 15.—So strong an impression is seldom made upon my fancy by songs, as was done by some, which I heard in a private circle last winter—songs composed with no view to publication—mere attempts by a young lady to express in tones, in the simplest manner, her conceptions of the sentiments of certain stanzas in Dwight's Journal and other publications, which had touched her feelings with peculiar force. In this they seemed to me remarkably successful, and strains from them haunted me for weeks. I joined others in urging their publication; for, although they very probably might prove "caviare to the general," we could but think that many may find them appealing to their feelings as they did to ours.

Six of them lie before me neatly engraved in a single book: "Spring Night," text, a translation by J. S. Dwight; "The World goes up, and the World goes down," text by Charles Kingsley; "Oh, heavy, heavy day," text by W. W. Story; "Love took me softly by the hand," text by W. R. Cassells; "Cradle Hymn," Latin words, with translation by Coleridge; and "Good night, my heart," text by W. W. Caldwell.

The music is by a sister of that noble young woman, Miss Bruce, to whose memory some paragraphs of this "Diary" were devoted a few weeks since.

I know not what the professed critic will say to them; but they possess a delicate, touching beauty, which I am sure will appeal to certain friends, who will read this paragraph, as it has done to me.

The Virtuosi of the Piano Forte.

(From the London Musical World, June 5.)

There is an evident and we believe insuperable antagonism between the modern style of pianoforte-playing, inculcated by the so-called "virtuosi" (who might be more appropriately denominated "viziosi"), and that which still enjoys the very modest title of "legitimate." The difference between the two is so marked that no one can possibly over-look it. It is the difference between the Ambigu-Comique and the Théâtre-Français, the Trovatore and Don Giovanni, Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Thackeray, Mr. Hicks and Mr. Macready. It is the difference between tragedy and melodrama, common sense and bombast, poetry and rhodomontade. The question, however, is, can the two be reconciled? Can the professor of the one style either stoop or raise himself to the level of the other? In one respect we think not. We are quite sure that Mr. Disraeli is utterly incapable of writing a book like The Newcomes, and that Mr. Hicks could never have made even a tolerable Hamlet; but we are almost as certain that Mr. Macready, if inclined to amuse himself that way, could out-Hicks Hicks; while that Mr. Thackeray, when in the vein, can beat Mr. Disraeli on his own ground, is triumphantly shown in his Codlingsby, which we have always regarded as the literary masterpiece of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The same argument applies to the opposite schools of pianoforte-playing. The works of the fantasia-mongers are by no means impracticable to the fingers (the mind having nothing to say in the matter) of a pianist well "up" in the compositions of the classical masters. But vice versa does not follow, as a matter of course. There have been numberless proofs to the contrary.

"Cette musique naïve"—exclaimed M. —t, fumbling over a prelude of Mendelssohn's—"cette musique naïve, après tout, n'est pas trop facile. Fich-tre!" M. —t spoke from his heart, and very soon suiting the action to the word, abandoned the prelude together with the intention of astonishing the English public after the special manner of "virtuosi" generally. He returned to his fantasias, and commended "cette musique naïve" to the prince of darkness. M. —d de —t, a very fire-eater among "virtuosi," being invited to a musical party at the house of a distinguished amateur, since deceased, was assigned, for his share in the programme, one of the sonatas of Dussek.* Nevertheless, having labored hard for more than a week, he gave it up in despair. "This is not piano-forte music" ("Celle-ci n'est pas écrite pour le piano"), he insisted: and, shutting up the book, was speedily lost in arpeggios, chromatic scales ascending and descending, showers of octaves, and crossing of hands, thumbing the while some unhappy opera-tune, which had to make itself heard amidst all this smothering, smashing, and belaboring.† "Voilà un morceau véritablement écrit pour piano!"—said the virtuoso, after a last sweep from one extremity of the key-board to the other, with both hands in contrary directions. The "distinguished amateur," however, was of a different opinion. He resided in Queen's square, and preferred Bach's per-rigue to M. Liszt's chevelure‡—the head-dress of modern virtuosity, the first duty of which is to ape the highly gifted man from the least healthy part of whose idiosyncrasy it sprang. The "distinguished" amateur would not hear of anything being substituted for Dussek's sonata; and Sterndale Bennett, or some other non-virtuoso, played it at sight.

There are those, however, among the "virtuosi" who are more capable, if not more willing to play legitimate music as it should be played. Somebody asked Herr Castle—a devoted worshipper of Standigl the singer—whether Standigl could speak Italian. "I don't know, exactly"—replied Herr Castle—"but he could if he would." So the "virtuosi," to whom we are now alluding, "could" if they "would." But, alas! they won't. When they come across real music they are puzzled how to handle it. To bestow any amount of study upon it would be to step from a pedestal of their own imagining down to the standing point of their (presumed) inferiors. At first, it appears so easy, that they feel inclined to spread out the close harmonies into vaporous arpeggios, to double the passages in the bass, and to introduce subjects of their own—one for each thumb—with an eye (or rather a thumb) to richness and variety. A genuine "virtuoso" (a "lion" proper) cannot (or will not) understand twenty-four bars of pianoforte music in which the entire key-board has not been once or twice galloped over. The "jeu serré"—where all the fingers are constantly employed (as in the fugues of Bach)—is as unwelcome to them as "terre à terre" dancing to the choregraph whose vocation is to cut capers half-way between floor and ceiling. They cannot (or will not) keep their fingers quiet. To "virtuosi" repose is nauseous—unless it be the repose indispensable to a winded acrobat. Thus they do injustice to their own executive powers and to the music set before them—by obtruding the former and caricaturing the latter.

A remarkable instance in illustration of the point in hand occurred the other night, when a "virtuoso" of the first water had to do with a concerto of Mozart. We do not mean Sig. Andreoli, but a "virtuoso" of such water that it is unnecessary to designate him by name. A "lion" in the most leonine sense of the term, he treated the concerto of Mozart just as the monarch of the forest, hungry and truculent, is in the habit of treating the unlucky beast that falls to his prey. He seized it, shook it, worried it, tore it in pieces, and then devoured it, limb by limb. Long intervals of roaring diversified his repast. These roarings were "cadenzas." After having swallowed as much of the concerto as extended to the point d'orgue of the first movement, his appetite being in some measure assuaged, the lion roared vociferously, and so long, that many adverse to Mr. Owen Jones'

* Op. 61. The Elegy on the death of Prince Ferdinand.

† The drawing-room window was open. Mr. Thackeray was most likely passing near the house. At any rate, not long after, we read the famous description of "Such a getting up-stairs," with variations.

‡ Let it not be supposed that we include Friar Liszt among the "virtuosi" proper. Heaven forbid we should hold him in such light esteem.

idea of acoustics, admitted that, at all events, a "lion" could be heard from the "recess" in St. James's Hall. Having thus roared, our "lion's" appetite revived, and he ate up the slow movement as if it had been the wing of a partridge. (Never did slow movement so suddenly vanish.) Still ravenous, however, he pounced upon the finale—which having stripped to the queue ("coda"), he re-roared, as before. The queue was then disposed of, and nothing left of the concerto.

We remember, many years past, we used to go to Exeter Change, to see the lions fed, watching the movements of those noble and voracious quadrupeds and listening to their roar with rapt attention. All our early impressions were revived on the present occasion; and we made a solemn vow to attend whenever and wherever the same "lion" should be advertised to devour another concerto. (He—the same "lion"—is to feed upon Weber's Concertstück on Monday, in the Hanover-square Rooms.—Printer's Devil.)

On the other hand this lion," like Standigl the singer, "could" speak Italian "if he would"—in other words, "roar you like any sucking-dove." But it goes against the grain with him; and we are sorry for it, since he is no ordinary "lion."

A Mass by Rossini.

(From Le Guide Musical.)

About three years ago, Castil-Blaze was present at a rehearsal of the Donna del lago at the Italian Opera, Paris. On hearing the first few bars, of the quartet in A flat, "Crudele sospetto" (C, A, E) he perceived that the melody was perfectly adapted to the "Qui tollis peccata mundi" of the "Gloria"; this discovery, which was the effect of chance, caused him to reflect, and, the next day, he set about the task of producing, with various pieces from the operas of the same composer, an entire mass, subsequently called Rossini's Mass.

A few months afterwards the score was completed, and, one fine spring day in the year 1849, a man remarkable for his corpulency, and advanced in age, suddenly accosted Castil-Blaze, and tapping him on the shoulder, said:—

"Hallo! old boy, you are pelting along at a fine rate, upon my word!"

"Ah! is it you, Signor maestro illustrissimo? Excuse me, I am half blind."

"Give me your arm and let us air our hundred and forty springs in the midst of these speculators of the Opera; but, that we may be unobserved, and not taken for two professional stock-brokers, let us walk adagio, and talk sotto voce. Well, tell me—you are always doing something or other—what are you doing now?"

"What am I doing?—Oh! you want to flatter me, maestro! I am doing nothing, but I am doing something better, perhaps; for I am doing quite the contrary; I am undoing, transfiguring, transplanting, transferring, trans—"

He was about to continue, when the crowd of stock-brokers became so compact as to drive them from the Boulevard du Gand to the Rue Lepelletier.

From the beginning of this conversation you have, no doubt, divined, gentle reader, that the interlocutor of Castil-Blaze was no other than the illustrious author of Guillaume Tell.

"You want to know what I am doing?" resumed the great musical arranger.

"Yes, I do?"

Well, I am writing, or, rather, I have just written

"Go on—what?"

"A mass by Rossini."

"Always caustic and facetious! Will you never change?"

"Do not fancy, maestro, that my task was an easy one! Try it yourself. It is rather difficult even to parody an air, although it is allowable to twist and turn a piacere the new words you are arranging to any given music. But to adapt the immutable words of the mass to melodies which have to be preserved in all their purity; to maintain a perfect accordance of feeling, colouring and expression between the scattered materials you collect, and to maintain this accordance to such an extent as to make people believe these transplanted compositions were written for the words to which they are wedded, hic opus, hic labor est. It was thus that Gluck arranged his French operas, But no matter. I have surmounted this difficulty, and my—your mass is terminated."

"Upon my honour, my dear fellow, you are an extraordinary man!"

There they were, the one (Rossini) addressing his questions in Latin, and the other (Castil-Blaze) replying in Italian.

"Let us hear," said the first. "By what did you manage to represent the 'Credo'—'Credo in unum Deum, etc.?'"

"Ecco ridente in cielo —"
 "You have treated it, at any rate, as a chorus."
 "Of course, was not that its original form in Aureliano in Palmira?"

"Bravo! excellent! I never fancied I had composed so majestic and well accentuated a 'Credo.' And the 'Kyrie'?"

"Santo Imen," the religious chorus from Otello."

"Christe eleison?"

"The canon quintet from Mosè."

"The Incarnatus?"

"Ninetta's prayer."

"The 'Crucifixus'?"

"The 'Chœur des Ténébres' from Mosè."

"Let us go from the solemn and sad to the gay. How have you managed with the 'Cum sancto spiritu, et vitam venturi seculi?' It is there that composers introduce their fugues, full of vivacity and sometimes, of brilliant folly."

"I availed myself of the animated stretti of the quintets from La Cenerentola and the finale of Semiramide."

"Well done."

"Allow me to submit to you the manuscript of your mass."

"No, I will see it when it is engraved. It is really an astonishing feat successfully accomplished. I will answer for its success; perhaps you still wanted this triumph."

The conversation had become so animated that Castil-Blaze, without observing it, had passed from the sotto voce to the mezzo forte, from the mezzo forte to the forte piano, and from the forte piano to the fortissimo, so that all the furniente, all the "lions" and the loungers on the Boulevard du Gand had gathered round them, and were saying to each other, "What is the matter?"

"They are two fellows who have been done for on the Bourse, and are singing their De Profundis!" replied one.

"They are two shareholders of M. Mirès," replied a second.

"The one is a thief and the other a madman," replied a third, "who have just been seized under the peristyle of the Opéra and are about to be conveyed to Charenton and the Conciergerie respectively."

"They are—they are—they are—etc."

In fact, I do not know what might not have been asserted, had not one of the two pedestrians—the one who fears public meetings and railroads—harangued the crowd, which kept increasing.

"Signori Francesi," he said, "do not put a wrong interpretation on our conduct. The State is not in danger; make yourselves easy on that score. As for me, I am that stupid musician who cannot do anything more. I am no longer any one. But this venerable patriarch is Castil-Blaze; respect him! He is my second father; it is he who translated me into French, into Provençal, into Latin, and inducted me into the possession of a new empire. This is not all. The villain now wants to take me to Paradise. I am not much frightened at this, for I presume he is in no hurry to set out himself.* Make way, therefore, and let him pass, and if, in return for your kindness you get nothing from me, you will, perhaps, deign to accept from him a Mass by Rossini!"

Since this meeting, and in spite of all the obstacles raised against it, Rossini's Mass has been brilliantly successful among musicians. The score has everywhere had a large sale, and some choral societies have executed it. I am well aware that some sticklers for all matters of art relating to sacred music, have blamed the author for having dared to undertake and carry out such a piece of eccentricity, or rather such a wonderful feat. But are they gratified in so doing? For my part, I think they are not.

* Castil-Blaze died at Paris, December 11th, 1857.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. — Mozart's Nozze di Figaro was produced May 29, with Mdlle. Piccolomini as Susanna, not well up to the mark, according to the critics. Mlle. Titiens, as the Countess Almaviva, was pronounced "not very far off perfection" and to "have it in her power to reach that goal." Belletti was masterly, of course, in Non più andrai and all Figaro's music. Sig. Belart was Don Basilio, and the subordinate parts were carefully done. Our old friend, Sig. Arditi, conducted. After repetitions of Figaro, and re-repetition of the Huquenots, Verdi's Luisa Miller was to be presented for the first time in England: Piccolomini, Alboni, Beneventano, Giuglini, &c., in the principal parts.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. — Grisi has sung and acted Lucrezia Borgia in a manner "worthy of her best days." The Gennaro was not Mario, but Sig. Neri-Baraldi. Ronconi made his first appearance for the season as Duke Alfonso. He is reported to have sung more out of tune than ever, but his masterly acting disarmed criticism. Nantier Didiée was admirable as Maffeo Orsini. The Londoners have enjoyed that exquisite treat vouchsafed to us one memorable Saturday afternoon, in the Boston Theatre, with a handful of audience — namely, the hearing MARIO warble through the delicious tenor melodies of Rossini's "Barber." Bosio, Ronconi, Tagliafico, and Zelger took the other parts.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. — The fourth concert, and last but one, was less like a Philharmonic concert, old or new, than any of its predecessors. Instead of one symphony we had none. In revenge, however, there was the ottet for wind instruments, capitolly performed by Messrs. Barret and Crozier (oboes), Lazarus and Maycock (clarionets), Hauser and Anderson (bassoons), C. Harper and Standen (horns) — one of Mozart's least elaborate but most genuine compositions.

The first part of the concert was wholly engrossed by Mozart; and a nobler specimen of dramatic orchestral preludes could hardly have been presented than the overture to Idomeneo, which was executed by the band (diminished by some 30?) under Dr. Wylde, with point and vigor. The first part terminated as strangely as it began auspiciously. The finest of all Mozart's piano-forte concertos, and one of the finest ever composed, was allotted to Herr Rubinstein, who executed the solo part in such a manner as to surprise the initiated and to bewilder the laity. Herr Rubinstein attacked the concerto much in the same manner, "mutatis mutandis," as the furious Pélissier, in the Crimean war, may have rushed with his hosts upon that devoted Malakoff of which he is now the titular Duke. The Concerto of Mozart was the Malakoff of Marshal Rubinstein, and his furious hosts were his ten fingers — ten "divisions" as irresistible in their strength as in their impetuosity. Herr Rubinstein rushed at the concerto, and "took" it even quicker than the French general took the Muscovite stronghold. Possibly Herr Rubinstein, being Russian born, and considering the task he had in hand was that of overwhelming a foe, rather than of caressing a friend, was determined to profit by the example of the Crimean campaign. In the course of capturing the concerto, moreover, Herr Rubinstein, doubtless to perplex and deceive the enemy, let off a series of fierce canonades in the form of "cadenzas," which were wholly irrelevant, both to the concerto and the capture thereof. Had Mozart been alive to hear these "cadenzas" — he would — n'importe.

The rest of the first part consisted of vocal music, sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Messent, and Herr Pischek.

In the second part there were some more vocal pieces, by the first and last named singers, among which may be mentioned especially a melodious and expressive air, "For spirits when they please," from Dr. Wylde's Paradise Lost, given with the utmost feeling and correctness by Miss Louisa Pyne. There was also a very long and very dreary violoncello concertino by Kummer, the prolixity of which even the admirable execution, fine quality of tone, and thoroughly legitimate style, of Mr. Horatio Chipp could not conceal. Moreover, Herr Rubinstein appeared a second time, and performed a prelude and fugue of his own composition, the chief object of which appeared to us to prove that John Sebastian Bach's idea of fugue was much more severe (and much more musical) than that of Herr Rubinstein.

This decidedly original, but scarcely more than semi-interesting, concert terminated with Beethoven's overture to Prometheus, to listen to which, after the prelude and fugue just mentioned, was like issuing forth into the open air and beholding the sun in the heavens after a week's detention in the black hole of Calcutta. — Musical World.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY. — The last concert of the season was given on Monday evening, at the Hanover-square Rooms, to a very large and fashionable audience. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, No. 11: Haydn.
 Song, "Adeleide," Mr. E. Gordon Cleather; Beethoven.
 Selection (Les Huguenots), solos for oboe and cornet-piston, Mr. A. Pollock and Mr. H. E. Tatham; Meyerbeer.
 Lied, "Grüner Frühling Kehr' ein," Mr. E. Gordon Cleather; H. Esser.
 Concerto, in G minor, pianoforte, Angelina; Mendelssohn.
 Recit., "Fier Teatro di Morte," aria, "Ritorno alle ritorte," Miss Palmer; Handel.
 Overture (Don Giovanni); Mozart.
 Song, "The Three Fishers," Miss Palmer; Hullah.
 Overture (Der Freischütz); Weber.

The symphony was excellently played, clearly showing that the music of Haydn is that which is best suited to the amateur orchestra.

The star of the evening was the far-famed pianist, Angelina, who, in her performance of Mendelssohn's concerto, proved her right to be styled something more than "Queen of Amateurs." It was, indeed, a very fine reading of the work, showing that mind as well as fingers had been employed in its study.

CHARLES HALLE'S RECITALS. — The second took place on Wednesday afternoon (the 27th ult.) at M. Halle's residence, and the rooms were just as inconveniently crowded as at the first. The programme was again one of the highest interest, commencing, as as before, with an early sonata of Beethoven—the second in op. 2, dedicated to Haydn at a time when the young and vigorous giant was already restive under the prim conservatism of his master, the greatest of musical Tories. This sonata (in A major) is much too seldom heard. All the movements were finely executed by M. Halle—the scherzo, especially, being one of the neatest and most sparkling performances we can call to mind. Not less eminently successful was Bach's very interesting Partita in G, which followed. M. Halle has studied the works of this great master profoundly, and always interprets him in the right spirit. Haydn's delicious little sonata in E minor was a rare treat, and the more welcome since it has never before been publicly given in our time. The great and poetical Op. 109 of Beethoven cannot be played too often. New beauties reveal themselves at each new hearing.

Nos. 11, 14, and 18 from M. Stephen Heller's Nuits Blanches, the second of Mendelssohn's caprices, Op. 33 (dedicated to M. Klingemann), the nocturne in F minor, and the Berceuse, of Chopin, were the last things in the programme. Mendelssohn's Caprice, a graceful and exquisite composition, we prefer a little slower. The pieces of Heller and Chopin were rendered to perfection. The amateurs of classical piano-forte music (and classical piano-forte playing) will be pleased to know that M. Halle has announced a series of chamber-concerts in Willis's Rooms, assisted by Herr Joachim, M. Sainton, and Signor Piatti. — Musical World.

CHAMBER CONCERTS, &c. — This is the height of the London musical season, and there seems to be no limit to the number and variety of soirées of classical piano and quartet concerts. Besides those of M. Halle, of Mme. Szarvady, and of Miss Goddard, of which we have copied notices in full, there is "Ella's "Musical Union," M. Aguilar's Matinée, Mdlle. Speyer's "Piano Recital," &c., whose doings in one week are summed up by the Athenæum as follows:

In the world of more minute (not necessarily lesser) music, the number of entertainments leaves no choice for the chronicler save enumeration, with a passing word or two on matters of special interest. — Signor Biletta's Matinée, yesterday week, was principally devoted to his own compositions. There were many interesting things at the first Matinée of Miss Dolby and Mr. Sloper—a fine song, "Dolce corde," by Mozart, which was unfamiliar to us,—and an elegant romance "Broken Vows," by M. Berger, to both of which the lady did full justice. Amongst other music, Mr. Sloper gave two new compositions of his own, of which we may speak elsewhere, and (what was no less welcome to us) three of the highly-finished "characteristic studies" of his master—Professor Moscheles. We are satisfied that the excellent intellectual music of this writer will revive in popularity. The other artists who appeared were M. Sainton, Signor Piatti and Mr. Santley. To name this young singer, is already equivalent to speaking of rapid progress and merited success. At Mr. Blagrove's third Quartet Concert it was interesting to hear the Quartet in A minor by Herr David, of Leipzig—the work, obviously, of a man of sense and of science. If not one of those creations of fancy and spirit to which we can return again and again. Some of Mr. Blagrove's own studies, too, were a novelty which we were glad to meet,—and not less so his clever pupil, Mr. Isaac, who takes the second violin in his quartet, and plays with discretion as well as feeling.

Nor is this by any means all the note-worthy music of the week. There has been Herr Pauer's Second Soirée, at which Herr Joachim (who is wanted everywhere) assisted him, and Miss Kemble (another rising, because real, artist) joined Madame Pauer in the vocal music,—a meeting of the Réunion des Arts,—another concert of the Vocal Association; and a Soirée by Miss B. Corfield, who comes out as pupil of Prof. Bennett. As such, we are pretty sure to hear more of her.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION. — The fourth Concert took place May 21. Joachim played Bach's Chaconne, with Mendelssohn's piano accompaniment played by Mr. Benedict; Herr Pischek sang airs by Mozart and Schumann; Mme. Liza Haynes sang the romance and prayer from Otello; Miss Susan Goddard (pupil of Benedict) played Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat, with Mr. Chipp, violoncellist; and the Vocal Association, with the "Orpheus Glee Union," sang several part-songs, a motet by Hauptmann, and Marczio's madrigal: "Fair May Queen." Mr. Best played on the grand organ Bach's Prelude and Grand Fugue in G.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—The second programme was as follows:

PART I.—Overture (Leonora) Beethoven. Aria "Quando Miro," Miss Dolby; Mozart. Song "Mad Tom," Mr. Weiss; Purcell. Solo for Flute, Mr. Svensen; Boehm. Aria "Casta Diva," Miss Louisa Pyne; Bellini. Aria "Dalla sua pace," Mr. Sims Reeves; Mozart. March Hongroise: Berlioz.

PART II.—Overture (Der Freyschutz); Weber. Part Song "Ave Maria," H. Smart. Duet "Serbani ognor," Miss Louisa Pyne and Miss Dolby; Rossini. Song for four voices "To May Morning," H. Leslie. Aria "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight," Mr. Sims Reeves; Weber. Glee "The Cloud-capt Towers," Stevens. "Rule Britannia," Mr. Leslie's Choir; Arne. Ballad "The Tribute of a Tear," Mr. Weiss; Loder. Bacchanalian Chorus from "Immaueuel," H. Leslie. Conductor, Mr. A. Manns.

HERR MOLIQUE, the classical violinist and composer, has given a concert with the following programme:

PART I.—Overture (La Clemenza di Tito); Mozart. Recitative and Air (Crocato in Egitto), Miss Lascelles; Meyerbeer. Violin Concerto, Op. 33, Herr Molique; Spohr. Recitative and Air, "O voi dell' Erebe," Mr. Santley; Handel. Recitative and Air (Faust), Madame Rudersdorff; Spohr. Piano-forte Concerto (MS., first time of performance), Mlle. Anna Molique; Molique.

PART II.—Concert Overture (MS., first time of performance) Molique. Recitative and Air (Idomeneo), Miss Kemble; Mozart. Concerto for the Concertina, Sig. Regondi; Molique. Bolero, Madame Rudersdorff; Randegger. Duet (Torquato Tasso), Miss Kemble and Mr. Santley; Donizetti. Fandango for the Violin, Herr Molique. Overture (Prometheus); Beethoven.

Conductors of the Orchestra, Herr Molique and Herr Manns.

(From the Neiderrheinische Musik Zeitung.)

COLOGNE.—The 36th Niederrheinisches Musical Festival was celebrated with great splendor in Whitsun week, on the 23d, 24th and 25th of May, under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller. The various works were more imposingly and admirably successful, on account of the number and excellence of the members of the choruses and orchestra (amounting to 682 persons) than they had ever been on any previous occasion, a result in a great measure attributable to the place in which the Festival was held, and which affords a depth and breadth for the arrangement of the artists, such as is to be met with nowhere else, besides leaving nothing to be desired in an acoustical point of view. All present were, moreover, unanimous in the opinion that it would be impossible to find such a chorus anywhere else; in fact, it worked so steadily and with such magnificent power in Hiller's Saul, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Nacht, and, more especially, in the "Credo" from J. S. Bach's High Mass in B minor, that the entire audience was seized with a feeling of delight and astonishment, particularly when the sopranos took up the theme and soared into the regions of the twined f sharp, g, and a. The choruses, therefore, obtained the londest and most protracted applause. The next place is due to the orchestra, for its magnificent performance of Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica, every movement of which was received with tumultuous applause; nay, persons were not wanting who declared that the execution of the symphony was the most perfect musical treat of all the three evenings.

The solo singers, Fräulein Krall (soprano), from Dresden; Fräulein Jenny Meyer (mezzo-soprano), from Berlin; Herr Schneider (tenor), from Frankfurt-on-the-Maine; Herr Stepan (bass), from Mannheim; and Herr Abiger (bass), from the Stadttheater, Cologne, were, on the whole, satisfactory, and, in certain points, very deserving of applause, but in no wise distinguished for virtuosity or European celebrity.

PARIS.—Germany has ceased to retain M. Roger, the celebrated tenor, who returned to the native fields of his artistic triumphs last week, and re-appeared on Wednesday at the Grand-Opera in his original part of John of Leyden. The reception of this favorite artist after his successes in classic Germany was warmed by the two-fold motives of congratulation and welcome. Madlle. Artot, (pupil of Mad. Viardot), the new representative of Fides, produced a very satisfactory impression.

The Théâtre-Français will shortly close, that the building in which that establishment abides may be restored.

A new opera, it is said, by M. Linnander, will be produced at the Opéra-Comique on the 1st of August, and the new tenor M. Montaubry, is to make his début therein.

At the Théâtre-Lyrique there has been a revival of "Gastibelza," an Opera by M. Aimé Maillart, originally produced ten years ago, for the opening of the National Opera, under the management of Adolphe Adam, and M. Mirecour. The principal parts were sung by Madlle. Borghese and M. Michot. Sabina, the heroine, was originally cast to Madlle Chérie Courand, now Madame Adolphe Adam. The "Noces de Figaro" will continue its run on alternate nights with "Gastibelza;" and so great has been its success, that the director, M. Carvalho, has decided to prolong the season a month.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 26, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — We commence this week a couple of extracts from Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, an extended composition to the Latin words of one of the old Roman Catholic hymns. From the eight pieces of which the work consists, we have selected No. 3, Soprano Solo and Chorus, and No. 4, Quartet. The latter will appear next week. The Solo and Chorus should pass directly into the Quartet, whose key is prepared by the modulation of the last bars of the accompaniment; if it is sung separately, it should end before the unison passage of tenors and basses. The Quartet will be found complete in itself.

Church Music.

The old question, what is the best use to be made of music as an element in public worship, still comes back upon us. We have several times endeavored to convey our ideas, and have given hints which we thought practical. If there is truth in them, they will bear repeating; and we will endeavor briefly to re-state them now. We limit the problem, for the present, to the prevailing so-called Congregational modes of worship, leaving aside those forms and "services" of music which are dictated by the peculiar creed and discipline of sects.

The present evil lies in the overwhelming deluge of stale, soulless and unprofitable psalmody; in the perpetual multiplication of mere psalm-tunes, a multiplication yielding no new fruit, no live additions to our stock of sacred song, but only everlasting variations, purely mechanical, upon one short form, whose capabilities were long ago exhausted. The cause lies in the two demands, for simplicity and for novelty. Now we believe in an immense reduction and thinning out, instead of the further multiplication, of these monstrous and absurd crops of weeds. We think a few plain old tunes, or chorals, of the most solid, time-tried and familiar, such as all, or nearly all may learn to sing, to be far more edifying than this perpetual striving after variety and novelty, and never finding it. Three things seem to us to include what is really practicable and really desirable for music in most of our worshipping assemblies.

1. As the simplest thing, and the foundation of the whole, and as a direct act of religious utterance through music in which all may take part, we would have in every service at least one plain Choral, — simple, grand, time-hallowed, familiar, sung in unison or harmony by all of the congregation who can sing. These should be few; since repetition here is no monotony; a worshipping assembly joins in "Old Hundred," with the same ever new interest and fervor, that a social circle breaks up with the joining hands and "Auld Lang Syne." Musical novelty or variety is not the object here; but the renewal of an inspiring and time-hallowed custom. Hence we have said that a dozen good old tunes are better than books-full of new psalmody; not meaning to condemn all the new things in this shape, of course; but simply to suggest that an essential charm and virtue of this branch of religious music resides in the very fact that the tunes sung are few, familiar, oft-repeated, and fraught with venerable associations. The older these chorals the better; for then the sound thereof links the present with the earliest centuries of Christianity, and inspires a feeling of the identity and oneness of Humanity throughout all the stages of its development in history. In the simplicity and grandeur of the thing would consist its ever-renewed novelty.

2. Music of a more artistic quality, designed to influence our hearts and minds, to meet and sympathize with our holier aspirations and emotions, and conspire with our good thoughts as Nature's beauty and sublimity conspire with them; music in which the unskilled many cannot take part, as a direct and outward act, but in which competent persons minister to deep and real wants of all. First, under this head, comes singing by a small trained choir, of artists — artists at least in spirit and in feeling, in general culture and refinement, — of pieces of a more artistic character, whose beauty and deep sentiment should penetrate the souls of listeners. For this what better than extracts from the masses of Mozart and others? We might also mention many admirable motets, hymns by Marcello, quartets, trios, &c., from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," or "St. Paul," or from his admirable psalms — such pieces as we have lately printed in this journal; — much of the old Church of England service, &c., &c. There is no lack of good compositions for the purpose, if choirs will but cultivate acquaintance with them, instead of ringing everlasting changes on the short form of a psalm-tune. Psalm-tunes and waltzes are subject to the same fatality in regard to indefinite multiplication; beyond a certain number they will sound all alike.

Above all, we would repeat our recommendation of the Chorals of Bach. These unite the soul and essence of the plain-song of the people, with the perfection of artistic treatment. Bach has so admirably harmonized these old tunes for four voices, that they have, when well performed, a beauty and a meaning that is inexhaustible and always fresh. These should be sung by a trained choir, the larger the better; but their beauty is intrinsic, in the harmony itself, and not dependent upon mere mass for effect, so that a simple Quartet choir may sing them to advantage. Study the specimens we gave two weeks ago.

3. Organ voluntaries, fugues, &c., of the highest and noblest kind: — music, which shall pervade the place as with a holier atmosphere, mingling with the soul's silent, heavenly occupation, charming the thoughts upward, as by a sort of spiral Jacob's Ladder of the Fugue, to heavenlier and purer states, to rapt and full communion with the Infinite. This, if it be true organ music, ministers to the religious sentiment in the same way that the choir does; and better, since such music is more impersonal, less narrowed by the idea of persons singing, or of thoughts and statements sung. Pure instrumental music always gains upon the preferences of those in whom a real love of music is awakened. Of course an orchestra might render a like service, were it not attended with such difficulties as to make it impracticable, except in the case of great religious festivals; of which our oratorios suggest a type.

MASTER ERNST PERANO. — We have several times alluded, during the past two years, to the extraordinary musical talent of this boy, now twelve and a half years old. About a year ago we spoke of an effort being made in Boston to raise by subscription the means of sending him to Germany for proper education. Owing to hard times and to the sudden removal of the family to the West, that effort failed. But it is now taken up again in real earnest by our friend SCHARFENBERG and other artists, amateurs and music dealers in New York, who feel, and very properly, a certain artistic pride and common sense of responsibility in such a case, as if it concerned us all that such rare powers should have the best chance of a true development secured to them. These gentlemen call upon the friends of music here in Boston and elsewhere to help them. What their plan is may be seen by the following Circular:

A number of artists and amateurs of music, of the cities of New York and Boston, having carefully examined the above-named lad, and being convinced that, on account of his remarkable and quite unusual talent for music, he is a fit object for their particular regard and interest, it is proposed that this boy, now twelve and a half years old, should be sent to Germany for the period of five years, there to be thoroughly educated, first in those branches requisite to give him a general culture, refinement of taste and artistic tendencies, and afterwards specifically in the various branches of the art he has chosen for his future profession.

In order to carry out this plan, it is suggested:

1st. That all persons, who may feel interested in this undertaking, should subscribe, for the period of five years, a certain sum, to be paid annually, during the month of June.

2d. That, when a minimum amount, say $250 annually, is signed, all the contributors have a meeting, at which they shall appoint three trustworthy and in every way efficient men, whose duty it shall be to carry into effect the plan suggested, with such modifications as may seem best to their judgment, and into whose hands the amounts subscribed are to be paid at the time specified. This committee of three will be required to make annually a report, stating what has been accomplished during the past year, and furnishing such information as may have been received from the various teachers of the boy, &c.

All those, especially artists and amateurs, who may be induced to favor this object, are requested to affix to this circular their signature and residence, together with the sum subscribed.

A copy of the subscription list, with the above heading, is in our hands, and it will give us great pleasure, as it will to Messrs. Scharfenberg & Luis, in New York, to add thereto the names of any friends who wish to help on this good work for Art. Most of the leading artists, pianists, music-publishers, &c., in New York have already signed it. Their subscriptions range from $5.00 to $15.00 per annum for the five years. Nearly half of the required sum remains yet to be raised. We can truly say we never met a case of youthful talent, which appeared to us so well to warrant general interest and outlay for its full and proper education. The boy possesses uncommon general intelligence; a frank, ingenuous, affectionate nature; and his passion for the tone-art is most genuine. At the age of eleven we heard him play on the piano difficult fugues of Bach (of which he knew a score or two by heart), Sonatas, &c., with accuracy and expression. He played a prelude and fugue by Mendelssohn at sight; he had no slight mastery also of the organ and the violin, and he composed things that indicated more than ordinary inventive faculty. Poverty has stood in the way not only of true musical culture, but also of that general schooling and those social influences under which an artist should grow up. We trust the friends of music now will see to it that he shall lack these benefits no longer. It is all-important that whatever is done, should be done quickly.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The musical clubs of Cambridge students ("Pierian Sodality" and "Harvard Glee Club"), gave another concert at Lyceum Hall, on Wednesday evening, and with no falling off of audience or enthusiasm. The instrumental pieces were the "Amelie Waltzes" by Lumbye, the Brindisi from Traviata, a Pot-pourri from Martha, and the Andante movement of a Trio for Piano, Violin and 'Cello, by Pesca; all of which were nicely played. The Club sang Mendelssohn's "Songs of Home," "Drinking Song," and "Farewell"; "Good-night," by Kücken; "Serenade," by Eisenhofer, and other part-songs, also the Ode of Horace: Integer vitae, &c., and another Latin song, to German music, even better than before. The Trio "Lift thine eyes," from "Elijah," and other Trios and Quartets, were nicely sung by male voices. The object of the concert was to raise funds for the purchase of a musical library and other permanent conveniences of the two clubs; which shows that the spirit of musical improvement is revived in earnest among the undergraduates of Harvard.

Our military bands are preparing to celebrate the morning of the Fourth of July on the Common in grand Jullienesque style. The four principal brass bands are to join forces, and discourse divers medleys of national airs, with aid of gun-powder percussives, as arranged for the occasion by Mr. Burditt of the Brigade Band.

"Stella," of the Worcester Palladium, directs attention to a feature of our journal, which surely ought to make it indispensable to every circle of cultivators of good music in all our towns and cities. Such a list of musical pieces of the highest order, which, we furnish in the course of a couple of months, should be of itself sufficient advertisement. Hear "Stella":

The contents of the music pages of Dwight's Journal of Music are a new surprise to us week after week. Look at the list since the recent commencement of a new volume: Solo and Chorus, "Hear my Prayer," by Mendelssohn; "I wait for the Lord," from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise;" Mozart's "Ave Verum;" two of Mendelssohn's Four-part Songs; a beautiful psalm for female voices by Schubert; and, in last week's paper a choral by Bach, which we trust may be to many an incentive to further study of these old Lutheran chorals of which we know so little. Why will not some of our well-trained choirs, like that under Mr. Allen's direction at the Church of the Unity, seize vigorous hold of some of these great compositions, and take a sure step towards showing how "poor and little worth" most of our church music has become; how great, how sublime four-part composition is, and how sadly it has been perverted.

The abstract of the Treasurer's report of the late meeting of the Music Hall Association, copied by us last week from the daily papers, contained an error in figures, which placed the balance on the wrong side. The receipts for the year should have been stated as $8,864 15, instead of $5,864 15. From this deduct the total expenditures, $7,457 24, and it leaves a clear gain for the year of $1,406 91. . . . The musical societies of Portland, Me., talk of celebrating the first arrival at that port of the great steamship "Leviathan," by a musical festival, occupying it may be several days. The "Creation," choruses of Handel, &c., will be performed. Of course they must have Fornes or some other mighty basso to sing: "The Lord created great whales. . . . Mrs. J. H. LONG, Mr. W. SCHULTZE, and Mr. B. J. LANG, gave a subscription concert in Newburyport on Thursday evening last, (June 17th.) . . . Mrs. LONG and Mr. LANG, in connection with local talent, give a Sacred Concert in Lynn, at one of the churches in that city on Sunday evening next, on the occasion of the opening of a new organ.

Messrs. Russell & Fuller have just published an admirable medium-sized photograph portrait of BEETHOVEN, taken from the large lithograph copy of the picture in the Royal Library in Berlin. Our "Diarist," who is familiar with that Library, and who knows everything about Beethoven, tells us: "Schindler assured me repeatedly that that portrait was altogether the best, and I have heard the same from many other persons. The small lithograph of the same is the one which has the best reputation in Germany. Of course during my stay abroad, I made every effort to find out what picture gave the most correct idea of Beethoven—the man. This is, as is evident to every one, not flattered, not idealized. It accords very perfectly with Schindler's description of his personal appearance, and in my judgment, the photograph in question gives one a better idea of how the man actually looked, at about the age of forty-eight or fifty, than any other picture of the same size whatever." Our own impression accords with this; we have always found the lithograph referred to the most satisfactory of all the portraits of Beethoven; and yet the present photograph seems actually to surpass it.

There is a plan on foot to furnish New York with what it sadly needs, a first class music hall. The plan is thus described: "A number of capitalists have secured fifteen lots of ground fronting on West Fourteenth street, and of sufficient depth to admit of a large structure. On these lots will be erected during the present summer a magnificent Concert Hall, capable of seating 8,000 persons, and opening on extensive conservatories, thereby affording promenade accommodation for 8,000 more. Located in one of the healthiest and breeziest streets of the city, and with nothing to interfere with a perfect system of ventilation, the hall will be delightfully cool in summer, and when the frost comes and external Nature is nipped and bare, it will afford all the pleasures of a winter garden, with blooming flowers and budding exotics to relieve the eye, instead of straight lines to weary it."

A patent has been secured by Mr. Gustav Schuermann, of Newgate Street, London, for printing music by a process entirely different from the common mode of printing in type. Among the advantages affirmed to be gained by the new method, are a saving of seventy-five per cent in the expense of composition and correction; greater durability of type and less expense in its manufacture; transposition of keys easy of effecting, with but slight alteration in the type; facility for ornamental music printing; and greater beauty, clearness and sharpness in the impressions.

Both Herr FORMES and Herr THALBERG have been suddenly stopped in their Western Concert tours; the basso by an attack of bronchitis, which has led him to seek repose and cure at Dr. Munde's Water Cure establishment near Northampton, Mass. The pianist is called home by private circumstances to Europe. Formes is evidently out of favor with the London Athenaeum, which says: "All lovers of good singing will rejoice to hear that he prefers America to the Old Country, and has broken his engagement. But his behavior makes the search for a basso profundo, to replace him, imperative; since, in this respect, the Covent Garden Company, as it stands, is incontestably weak." . . . The Mozart Institution at Frankfort is said to have purchased a property, at a high price, near the Eschenheimer Gate, for the purpose of establishing there a conservatory and a music school.

The NEW YORK MENDELSSOHN UNION, at their fourth concert, on Thursday evening, brought out a couple of famous works, which we believe were never before publicly performed in this country: namely, Mendelssohn's "Athalie," and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens." . . . The great musical Festival, with the "Choral Symphony," &c., will commence to-morrow at the Academy of Music. . . . The Italian Opera performances have acquired new interest this week, by taking up Pacini's opera of "Saffo," which was performed in Boston many years ago by the first Havana troupe, when TEDESCO was in her prime, and never before or since unless we are mistaken, in this country. This time GAZZANIGA takes the part of Saffo; ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, Climene; BRIGNOLI, Phaon; GASSIER, Alcandro.

ST. LOUIS, MO., JUNE 12.—As a novel as well as amusing style of criticism, I send you the following from the Columbia Mirror (Tennessee):

"THALBERG AND VIEUXTEMPS. These distinguished individuals are now in Nashville, giving high-pressure concerts and selling tickets, when convenient, at two dollars a-piece. A stage-load and a half or two stage-loads of ladies and gentlemen went down from this place to hear them. THALBERG is said to be death, in its most horrid shape, on the piano, and it is probably true; while VIEUXTEMPS is represented as a fiddler of considerable skill, considering his opportunities, which he no doubt is. We haven't heard either of them since they were quite small; and unless they come out here and reduce the price of tickets to their value—say about sixty-two and-a-half cents per dozen—it is possible that we shan't hear them any more. When we ride forty miles, at an expense of at least ten dollars, extras not included, to hear a couple of itinerant Dutchmen torture a brace of unoffending instruments into fits, until the very spirit of music howls in sympathy, if somebody will have the kindness to cave in our head with a brick-bat, we'll feel greatly obliged to him.

BUT seriously. THALBERG and VIEUXTEMPS have never done us any harm that we know of, and we don't suppose they intend to. We wouldn't much mind hearing their music, for no doubt it is very nearly, if not quite, as good as that of the common run of Dutchmen, which, as the latter will tell you, is saying a good deal."

These artists gave two concerts here this week to good houses, considering the very unfavorable weather. Mme. D'ANGRI (the only new attraction) created a very favorable impression—excepting with the everlasting "Rataplan," which would not go down with the St. Louis public. THALBERG and VIEUXTEMPS out-did themselves.

Both played beautifully, and their duets were perfection. They left a more favorable impression than on their former visits. PERRING (the Tenor) was the general favorite, being encored almost in everything he sang. The duets between Madame D'Angri and himself were really gems, and alone worth the price of admission. Taking it altogether, our generally cold audiences were more delighted with those concerts than any we have had for some time, and we hope these artists will soon visit us again.

FORMES, under the auspices of STRAKOSCH, will be here on the second and third of July. He will do well here,—the German element especially will turn out in full force.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., JUNE 16.—The "City of Elms," as I think I have mentioned once before, can by no means lay claim to the title of a musical place. Yet the meaning of the word "concert" is well enough known here, to make the attendance of such an entertainment a requisite of fashion. Consequently, when sundry small advertisements in the daily papers and large placards around the streets, have duly announced the forthcoming event, and the auspicious night has arrived, students and school-girls (the chief components of society in this place) may be seen flocking in pairs, like doves to their windows, to Brewster's Hall. This latter is a very pretty, chaste-looking room, containing an organ, and capable of seating, by exact calculation, six hundred and twenty-eight persons, minus hoops. My first introduction to it was on the occasion of a concert given a few nights ago by your Germania Band, who, having been engaged for the Wooden Spoon Exhibition, took the opportunity to make themselves more generally heard. As I invariably have to buy a few months' ruralizing with the almost total loss of all musical enjoyment during the summer, I was glad of a chance to hear melody and harmony of any kind, and so, though the programme was of the lightest character, I took possession of one of the 628 seats. There were about twenty performers, who seemed to have two sets of instruments with them, which formed, respectively, a full brass band and a small orchestra. The effect of the former, in that miniature music hall, would have satisfied even friend "Trovator"; I could not but think of him when my ears were nearly splitting with the first march, and heartily wished him in my place. Nevertheless, the brass instruments were very finely played; much better than most of the others, of which several, too, were sadly out of tune. Besides sundry waltzes, galops, and polkas, among which I noticed Musard's newest, the Champagne Galop, Cuckoo Polka, we had an Overture or two, one by Reissiger, and the second, not that to "Stradella," as was put down in the programme, but some other, unknown to me. Sundry pot-pourris and arrangements filled up the programme, one of the former jumbling together, in a most unmerciful manner, the Russian National Hymn, Wait for the Wagon, Old Folks at Home, Hail Columbia, God save the Queen, etc., ending, of course, with "Yankee Doodle bedevilled." Altogether, the ordering of the programme showed no great deference for the public taste of this city, and nowhere was this more manifest than in the two solos; the one for Cornet-à-Piston, played by Mr. Eichler, the other, for Violoncello, by W. Fries. W. Eichler's performance, I regret to say, did not make one forget König—and some of the solo-bits for the same instrument in the ensemble pieces were far better played. The piece, however, must be acknowledged to be entirely novel—Variations on the last new air, i. e., "the Merry Swiss Boy." When Mr. Fries's turn came, I was all expectation, having heard so much of this gentleman through your Journal, that I was glad to judge of him for myself. I did not expect any very profound composition under the circumstances, and when he played a charming Swiss-sounding introduction, (and very beautifully) thought that I should perhaps hear Proch's "Alpen horn," or something similar. Judge of my astonishment, when the "Merry Swiss Boy" again fell upon my ear! I confess that I was not a little indignant, and still consider this mode of proceeding rather an insult to the New Haven public. What if, as was doubtless the case, half the audience did not notice anything unusual—is this the way to educate the public, to further the cause of good music? It was bad enough to give one set of variations on so trite a subject—though the latter arrangement was, really an artistic one—but to bring it up twice in one concert, that was going rather too far. I have heard the hope expressed that this band will not come again till they have learnt to play some new pieces.

If the general taste for music is not very much developed here, there is still a small "Band of Brothers," who plod quietly but unceasingly on their way, seeking to improve themselves by constant practice, and others by letting them occasionally hear the result of their efforts. Several "Soirées Musicales" have been given, at private houses, this winter, the programme of one of which is worth copying:

Wedding March, (for four hands).	Mendelssohn.
Adelaide. (Vocal).	Beethoven.
Variations for Violin and Piano.	De Beriot.
Jubilee Overture, (for 8 hands).	Weber.
Duet from Puritani, (Vocal).	Bellini.
Concerto for Violin and Piano.	De Beriot.
Il Segreto, (Vocal).	Donizetti.
Masaniello, (8 hands).	Auber.

The good has certainly the preponderance here. A small singing club, too, has been steadily practising Oratorio music for some months; they have taken "Elijah," and are now studying "St. Paul." All these are refreshing signs of an earnest striving for the good cause, and as another, I may add that I have met with quite a number of very attentive readers of the "Journal."

From the pretty village of Farmington comes the rumor that some Quartet concerts will again be given there this summer, by the same performers as heretofore. Not quite the same, either, for I much fear that Mr. Mosenthal, who is only just recovering from a dangerous illness in New York, will not yet be able to join his companions by that time.

I was not a little surprised to see "Trovator's" last letter dated from New York. Has he acted upon his Mormon Italian friend's suggestion, and brought over the eight cantatrice to make his fortune for him? I should not think, however, that this was the best season for such an enterprise.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Selections from "THE BUCCANEER," Grand Tragic Opera. G. W. Stratton.

Like as the flowret,	25
Flora, art thou yet true,	25
Ye winds of heaven,	25
O, let my heart be free,	25

The fair fame which this new American Opera has won already, after the performance of only a scanty selection from its vocal beauties before a select few, claims the full attention of all music lovers for these issues, which are to be followed by others, selected and arranged by the author. Those named above are some of the more simple, ballad-like portions of the Opera, but still full of real dramatic pathos and sufficiently elaborate to excite the interest of the cultivated vocalist.

Mountains of Life. Quartette. J. G. Clarke. 25

An excellent Quartette for the Church as well as for the home circle, on Sabbath evenings.

Little Dorritt's Love, Macfarren. 25

Simple and unpretentious, but heartfelt and touching.

My Little Sue, Lucius H. Parish. 25

Graceful and pretty.

Kitty alone and I. Song and Chorus. Thompson. 25

Bridal Morn. Ballad. J. L. Hatton. 25

A beautiful parlor song, light and gay in style, introducing the joyous tinkle of the wedding bells in the accompaniment, thus imparting an airy and picturesque character to the whole.

There is an isle, a bonny isle. Song. Kirk. 20

A new edition of this lovely little ballad, which has long been treasured as a real gem by the few who were aware of its existence. Once known, it will become a universal favorite.

Wait till I put on my bonnet. Song. Minasi. 30

Easy and pretty, with a handsomely illustrated title page.

Instrumental.

Bombardone Mazurka. H. Aug. Pond. 25

For a Mazurka, which does not require much execution in the player and still sounds full and brilliant, which captivates the ear of the many, and gracefully accompanies the steps in this characteristic dance, this composition is exactly "the thing."

Cradle Song, by Kücken, transcribed by Oesten. 40

A fine arrangement which fully develops the beauty of the well known air of Kücken's.

French Polka. D'Albert. 50

Sprightly and light. Excellent dance music. The title page has a likeness of the imperial prince of France, in colors, done true to life.

Fantasia on Airs from Mozart's Operas. For three Performers on One Pianoforte. Czerny. 1,25

This veteran among the writers of piano music for the advance of pupils, has hardly written anything more indispensable to the judicious teacher than his series of concertant Fantasias for three players on one piano, which are calculated even more than duets to develop the sense of rhythm in the pupil, and teach him that firmness and equality in time, which many a ready player is so sadly wanting. The series, called the "Three Amateurs," of which this Fantasia is a number, is intended for players of some address. The other numbers, which are already published, comprise Fantasias on Airs from Norma, on Airs from Donizetti's Operas, on Irish and on Scotch Airs. Independent of this set, but of the same difficulty, there is a set of six operatic Overtures, arranged also for six hands, viz: Tancredi, Fra Diavolo, Freischütz, Don Giovanni, Barbieri, and Figaro, all of which are published.

Alicia Schottisch. A. Mayer. 25

Forget me not Waltz. A. Mayer. 25

Peach blow Schottisch. Pond. 25

Books.

A NEW AND SCIENTIFIC SELF-INSTRUCTING SCHOOL FOR THE VIOLIN, on an entirely different Method from any work of the kind heretofore offered to the Public in this Country, intended for Beginners, Amateurs, Business Players, and Teachers. In Three Parts, Complete in one volume. By George Saunders. 75

This work contains a large amount of valuable instruction for all grades of violinists, and, while it furnishes the rudiments of a thorough knowledge of Violin playing to those just commencing their studies in this branch of music, it also imparts numerous hints and facts of great practical importance to advanced players. The music comprises nearly two hundred popular tunes, thirteen sets of cotillions, and a good variety of Contra, Spanish, and Fancy dances, with proper figures appended.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1858.

VOL. XIII. No. 14.

To W. J. H., while playing on his Flute.

A little poem by S. T. COLERIDGE, not found in his collected works, but preserved and published by his friend, Mr. Joseph Cottle.

Hush! ye clamorous cares! be mute.

Again, dear harmonist, again,

Through the hollow of thy flute

Breathe that passion-warbled strain:

Till memory each form shall bring,

The loveliest of her shadowy throng;

And hope, that soars on skylark wing,

Carol wild her gladdest song!

O skill'd with magic spell to roll

The thrilling tones, that concentrate the soul!

Breathe through thy flute those tender notes again,

While near thee sits the chaste-eyed maiden mild,

And bid her raise the poet's kindred strain

In soft, impassioned voice, correctly wild.

In freedom's undivided dell,

Where toil and health, with mellow'd love shall dwell,

Far from folly, far from men,

In the rude, romantic glen,

Up the cliff, and through the glade,

Wand'ring with the dear-loved maid,

I shall listen to the lay,

And ponder on thee, far away.

(Translated for this Journal.)

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

I. ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.

PARIS, middle of April, 1842.

Arriving one fine day, at noon, last summer, in Cette, I saw a procession pass along the quay, before which spreads the Mediterranean sea; and never shall I forget that sight. In front marched the brotherhoods in their red, white and black attire; the penitents with their cowls drawn over their head, in which were two holes through which the eyes looked spectrally; in their hands burning wax-lights or banners of the cross. Then came the different orders of monks. Also a crowd of laity, women and men, pale, broken forms, devoutly staggering along, with a touching, sorrowful sing-song. I had often met such in my childhood on the Rhine, and I cannot deny, that those tones awakened in me a certain sadness, a sort of home-sickness. But what I never had seen before, and what seemed to be a Spanish custom, was the troop of children, who represented the Passion. A little fellow, costumed in the way the Saviour is usually depicted, the crown of thorns upon his head, whose fine golden hair flowed down mournfully long in waves, came pausing along, bent under the load of an immense great wooden cross; upon his forehead were brightly painted drops of blood, and marks of wounds upon his hands and naked feet. At his side walked a little girl clad all in black, who, as the Mother of sorrows, bore several swords with gilded handles on her breast and seemed almost dissolved in tears—an image of the deepest affliction. Other little boys, who walked behind, represented the apostles, and among them Judas, with red hair and a purse in his hand. A couple of little fellows, too, were helmeted and clad in armor like Roman lancers, and swung their sabres. Several children bore the habits of religious orders and church ornaments: little Capuchins, little Jesuits, little bishops with mitre and crooked staff, the cunningest and dearest little nuns, certainly not one of them over six years old. And strange to say, there were among them also some children dressed as Amorettes, with silken wings and golden quivers; and immediately about the little Savior tottered two much smaller ones, at the most four-year-old little creatures, in the old Frankish shepherd's garb, with little ribboned hats and staffs, dainty things to kiss, as marchpane dolls: they represented probably the shepherds, who stood at the manger of the Christ-child. But would any one believe it, that this spectacle excited in the soul of the beholder the most seriously devout feelings; and the effect was all the more touching, that it was little innocent children, who were enacting the tragedy of the grandest, most colossal martyrdom! This was no aping of the matter in historic grandiose style, no wry-mouthed pietistic mummary, no Berlin make-believe of faith: this was the most naïve expression of the profoundest thought; and the condescending child-like form was just what saved the sense of the symbol from operating with an annihilating power upon our mind, or from annihilating itself. That sense indeed is so immensely mournful and sublime, that it exceeds and over-leaps the most heroic-grandiose and most pathetically exalted mode of representation. Hence the greatest artists, both in painting and in music, have thrown the charm of as many flowers as possible over the exceeding terrors of the Passion, and mitigated its bloody earnestness by playful tenderness—and this is what Rossini did, when he composed his Stabat Mater.

The Stabat of Rossini was the notable event of the past season; talk about it is still the order of the day, and even the strictures passed on the great master, from the North German point of view, attest quite strikingly the originality and depth of his genius. The treatment is too secular, too sensual, too frivolous for the spiritual subject; it is too light, too agreeable, too entertaining,—such are the comments groaned out by certain heavy, tedious critics, who, if they do not purposely affect an exceeding spirituality, yet certainly torment themselves with very narrow and erroneous notions about sacred music. With musicians, as with painters, there prevails a totally false view about the treatment of Christian subjects.

The latter believe, that the truly Christian must be represented in subtle, meagre contours, as lean and colorless as possible; the drawings of Overbeck are their ideals in this respect. To refute this delusion by substantial fact, I simply call attention to the pictures of saints of the Spanish school; here fullness of color and of contour predominate; and yet no one will deny, that these Spanish pictures breathe the most un-diluted Christianity, and their creators certainly were not less drunk with faith, than the famed masters who, in Rome, have gone over to Catholicism in order that they may be able to paint with more immediate fervor. It is not this outward aridness and paleness that is the sign of the truly Christian in Art; but it is a certain inward exaltation, which cannot be got by baptism nor by study, whether in music or in painting; and so I find the Stabat of Rossini really more Christian than the Paulus, the oratorio of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, which is held up by the opponents of Rossini as a model of true Christian Art.

Heaven forbid, that I should say this to disparage so meritorious a master as the composer of the Paulus; and least of all could it enter the head of the writer of these pages, to pick flaws in the Christianity of that oratorio, because Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy was born a Jew. But I cannot help alluding to the fact, that at the age when Herr Mendelssohn commenced Christianity in Berlin (he was first baptized in his thirteenth year), Rossini had already left it and had plunged completely into the worldliness of operatic music. Now, when he has abandoned this again and dreamed himself back into the Catholic recollections of his childhood, into the times when he sang as choir boy in the cathedral at Pesaro, or served as acolyte at mass—now, when the old organ tones again thrill in his memory and he has seized the pen to write a Stabat Mater: now he does not need to first construct the spirit of Christianity by any scientific process, still less to be a slavish copier of Handel or Sebastian Bach; he only needs to call up once more from his soul those earliest sounds of childhood, and, wonderful indeed! these tones, with all their earnestness and depth of sorrow, powerfully as they sob forth and bleed forth the intensest anguish, yet retain something child-like in their expression and remind me of the representation of the Passion by children, which I saw at Cette.

Nay, I involuntarily thought of this little pious mummary, when I heard the performance of Rossini's Stabat for the first time; the sublime, prodigious martyrdom was here represented, but in the most naïve tones of childhood; the fearful plaints of the Mater dolorosa resounded, but as if out of an innocent little maiden's throat; along with the crape of blackest mourning rustled the wings of all the Amorettes of loveliness; the horrors of the crucifixion were mitigated as it were by toying pastoral play; and the feeling of infinity breathed over and encompassed all, like the blue heavens, that shone down upon the procession of Cette; like the blue sea, along whose shore it moved on singing and resounding! Such is the perpetual graciousness of Rossini, his indestructible mildness, which no impresario and no music-dealer could seriously disturb or even cloud. Whatever mean and base tricks may have been played him in his life, we find no trace of gall in any of his musical productions. Like that sprig of Arethusa, which preserved its original sweetness, although it had passed through the bitter waters of the sea, so, too, Rossini's heart kept its melodious loveliness and sweetness, although it had drunk pretty deeply out of all the wormwood cups of this world.

As I have said, the Stabat of the great maestro was this year the prominent musical event. About the first execution, which set the tone for all the rest, I need not speak: enough, that the Italians sang. The hall of the Italian Opera seemed the fore-court of heaven; there sobbed holy nightingales and flowed the fashionablest tears. The journal La France Musicale, too, in its concerts, gave the greatest part of the Stabat, and, of course, with immense acceptance. In these concerts we heard also the Paulus of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who by this very proximity, claimed our attention and of himself provoked comparison with Rossini. With the mass of the public this comparison was by no means advantageous to our young countryman; it was like comparing the Appennines of Italy with the Templower mountain near Berlin. But the Templower mountain has its merits none the less, and it wins the respect of the multitude by the fact that it has a cross upon its summit. "Under this sign thou shalt conquer." Surely not in France, the land of infidelity, where Herr Mendelssohn has always made fiasco. He was the sacrificed lamb of the season, while Rossini was the musical lion, whose sweet roar still resounds. It is said here, that Herr Felix Mendelssohn will come to Paris in these days. So much is certain; by much expenditure and diplomatic labors, M. Leon Pillet has got so far as to order a libretto to be prepared by Scribe, which Herr Mendelssohn is to compose for the Grand Opera. Will our young countryman come out successful from this task? I know not. His artistic gift is great; yet it has very considerable gaps and limits. I find in respect of talent a great resemblance between Herr Felix Mendelssohn and Mlle. Rachel Felix, the tragic artist. Peculiar to them both is a great, severe, most serious earnestness; a decided, almost importunate leaning upon classic models; the finest and most intellectual calculation, sharpness of understanding, and finally an entire want of naïveté. But is there such a thing in Art as genial originality without naïveté? The case has never yet occurred.

Whitsuntide Festival at Cologne.

(From the London Athenæum, May 19.)

How near to, how far from, London is the City of the Three Kings!—distant nineteen and a half hours only by the aid of steam, which hurries one through the fields of Belgium, just now fat with high green corn,—down the valley of the Vesdre, yellow with the young oak-shoots,—and across the plain on the brink of the Rhine, from which the fruit-blossom has hardly faded. How remote is the look of the flourishing old Catholic city, and are the ways of its rough, but thoroughly cordial people! But neither London nor England has such a concert-hall, with its appliances, to show as the old Gürzenich Hall at Cologne is now, in its altered state. That antique chamber has been raised to almost double its former height. This rendered necessary the abolition of one characteristic feature—the row of pillars which divided the room lengthwise; since Prudery's self could not have dreamed of heightening these. Everything has been done in the best possible taste. The hall, taking the form of a nave, with shallow side aisles, is pillared with oak, and has an elaborate wooden roof in the style of that of Westminster Hall. Strange to say, it is none the worse as a room to sing and play in for all its arches, and recesses, and pendants, and beams, and traceries,—thus proving once again that resonance does not go by receipt, but by chance. Hard by, an accessory Gothic building has been erected. This has enabled the architect to plan a pair of capital entrances with two separate staircases and a series of smaller chambers, which, besides being picturesque, are invaluable on all festive occasions. The new work, within and without, is alike solid and in good keeping. The lighting of the hall is, by daylight, sufficient; by night, splendid, thanks to its six stately chandeliers in the fantastic German style. It will accommodate on the ground-floor some fifteen hundred persons with ease. In short, a more magnificent and thoroughly characteristic concert-hall could not be imagined, nor, it may be asserted, exists in Europe.—Its roc's egg is an organ,—but this, it may be hoped, will be presently added.

The programme of this year's Cologne Festival and the names of the solo artists have already been given in the Athenæum. The orchestra was an excellent one—numbering 150 performers, who played Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the "Bad Weathers" prelude to Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," as those works can only be played in Germany, with the relish given only by nationality, and with which no stranger can intermeddle. The chorus—500 strong—was a very fine one, as regards its deliciously fresh soprano and basses,—the alti being more toneless and the tenors weaker than the other two voices. Some want of effect—some slight uncertainties of attack—may be ascribed to the great breadth of the orchestra and the placing of many of the chorists in the side aisles, but this arrangement could easily be remedied another time. On the whole, however, the chorus offered no great matter for envy to the English visitor, save, perhaps, in that zeal which can only belong to those who sing together more rarely than our overworked thousands do.—Herr Hiller is an excellent conductor, with a slight tendency to heaviness, a skilful, without being too skilful, disciplinarian at rehearsals. On him, too, as a composer, a special interest has centred this year by the grand performance (its second) of his new oratorio, "Saul."

It is no light task for any man to treat anew a subject treated by Handel. Ingenious and something more as is the "Jephtha" of Herr Reinthaler, he has to fight against such immortalities as "Deeper and deeper still," "The smiling dawn," "Happy they," and "Farewell, ye limpid springs."—So again, though the "Saul" of Handel is neglected for the present among Handel's oratorios, it has pages, combinations, and scenes which, in music, will only die when Lear's madness dies in Tragedy, or Portia's noble grace in Drama. David's song, with which the madness of Saul is beguiled; the Chormas (how different!) "Envy, eldest-born of Hell," on its ground bass; and "Welcome, mighty kings," with its chime;—the wondrous invocation of the Witch of Endor (which cries aloud for Madame Viardot to disinter it)—and that noblest of dirges "In sweetest harmony," offer terrible stumbling-blocks to any new aspirant; because they remind the world (as has been elsewhere said) that Handel was always greatest in the greatest scenes,—and in this was the greatest of artists. Sometimes careless—often unscrupulous—always rapid—incomplete (as the jargon is)—he is never weak when strength was wanted—never insufficient nor inexpressive when the strongest emotions and passions, which "Music can raise or quell," came under his ken. Hence, did we write music, we should dread to venture on Handel's ground. Others—Handel's countrymen especially—seem to have less misgiving; perhaps because they know these immortal works less than we English do; perhaps because they do not consider any musical "Macbeths" or "Othellos" as final. So be it. They are right in so far as they can assert themselves; and we must endeavour to take their view.

Herr Hiller, however, has hardly had a fair chance in his attempt to re-set "Saul." His poet, Herr Hartmann, does not seem to have appreciated the difficulty of this striking Biblical episode as subject for a long musical work, in its want of prominent female interest. In Handel's case this was met by giving to Michal a large allowance of that soffeggiato music which now would hardly pass, were there even a new Handel to make it interesting—and by writing the part of David for a mezzo-soprano voice. Here we have no equivalent for these devices, and the consequence is undue preponderance of masculine tone. A like disproportion (in spite of the beauties prodigally lavished over every bar of the opera) hangs to a certain degree as a dead weight on "Guillaume Tell." Herr Hiller, we are sure, will take it for no disparagement to be told that he is less able to dispense with aids and suggestions than Signor Rossini. If his oratorio sound too long, it may be owing to his want of due scrutiny before he began to write, not because he has failed to write well, and to write—though an eclectic—in a way of his own. To analyze either the book or the music of so elaborate a work in detail is here impossible. Enough to say, that the former is divided into three parts.—Part the first includes the King's jealousy and madness,—the spell of David's harp,—the avowal of Michal's love for him,—David's expulsion,—and Samuel's prophecy. Part the second, and longest, shows us David among the shepherds,—Samuel's anointing of him,—Saul at battle, in the cave at Ziklag,—Samuel's death,—and "the improvement on this," to use the phrase of our old divines. Part the third brings us on the dangerous ground of Endor and its witchcraft,—the battle on Gilboa,—David's lament for Saul and Jonathan (more dangerous ground still,) and his reception as king of Israel. The small part originally destined for Jonathan has been retrenched to nothing since the first performance, and the weight of the work lies on the insane monarch and the Psalmist-King of Israel.

Both these two men have been well characterized in music by Herr Hiller:—David, by a flow of sweet and pious melody, to which the harp, fitly, mostly bears company; Saul, by that lurid and imperious music with which it seems not hard to fit a bass voice. Michal is treated with less decision,—the case being one in which the musician must color the character, not the character inspire the musician. The weird woman of Endor does not make us forget Handel's air adverted to; but a truly ghostly tone is thrown over the apparition of Samuel by a phrase repeated to monotony, and scored with lugubrious instruments.

The oratorio is strong and various in its choruses,—some half-score of which are capital; bold in idea, vigorous in construction, and massive in force of sound. In particular may be mentioned two very delicate choruses for female voices alone in the first Part:—then, one after David has been saved from the King's javelin,—a cheerful and stout shepherd chorus, following his consecration by Samuel,—another, of David's followers when Saul is found sleeping, which is dramatic,—one, very delicious in nine-eight (Herr Hiller seems more than usually fond of triple rhythms),—and the grand chorus closing the second Part, the close of which is pompous and large. In the third Part, one of the most remarkable features is the music to the battle on Gilboa, which is watched by women. Here the instrumentation is rich, the stir perpetual, and the use of merely the shrill female voices through a long and rapid movement heavily scored amounts to a new effect. David's lament, too, is one of the best numbers of the work, which winds up with a "Hallelujah" in a new form. This last, however, would gain in brightness, were the solo, to which the chorus replies, transferred from the tenor to the soprano voice. Throughout the oratorio the instrumentation is highly colored, solid (not excluding picturesque effect), and masterly. The style, to sum up, is modern, without being profane—dramatic, but nowhere theatrical. There are few or no fugues; their absence, however, is obviously caused by no deficiency in contrapuntal science, neither by want of power to originate those clear and tractable phrases on which alone fugues can be successfully built.

Herr Hiller's "Saul" offers difficulties to the performers. On the whole, it was well performed. As meriting praise, the orchestra comes first, which went through its duty with true German fervor. In the chorus, the bell-clear soprano voices predominated so largely above the other three parts of the quartet that the beauty of their sound, which at first seemed charming, became importunate as the performance went on. The part of David gives us occasion to mention the good progress made by Herr Schneider. Six years ago, when we ventured to prophesy on his capabilities, he was second tenor in the Leipzig theatre, and was there little regarded, because others hawled more loudly than he. His voice, always a sweet one, has gained volume without losing sweetness,—his expression is good, without that sickliness which too many of his tenor countrymen mistake for sentiment. He is the most pleasing artist of his class in Germany that we know of, and as steady in his music as pleasing. Herr Stepan, the bass, did his best as Saul,—and worked out some of the scenes with fair dramatic truth, landably, the while, clear of exaggeration. Mlle. Krall, the Michal, sang better than she did when in London. Mlle. Jenny Meyer, from Berlin, was the mezzo-soprano, her voice being hardly deep enough in quality to be called a contralto. This young lady has a future before her, if she choose to take it. She is young,—pleasing in appearance, and with a certain refinement of manner promising intelligence. Her voice, too, is tuneable and full, without extraordinary power,—a voice worth first-class training. This, we imagine, it has hardly yet received, to judge from the manner in which certain of her notes are arrived at, not attacked,—a defeat easily to be cured in one so young, but which, if it be not amended, may bring her into the category of impassioned ladies, who sigh, or scream, or sob, but cannot sing. Mlle. Meyer does not seem at present to command much execution—but she does not attempt much; and her feeling is true and intelligent. As a new comer she cannot fail to impress every hearer hopefully.

The programme of the second day's concert was a magnificent one. It was well worth the fatigue of a flight to Cologne in the midst of our season to hear the 'Credo' of the Mass in B minor, by Sebastian Bach, so excellently sung—in itself amounting to a complete work; and in its choruses, "Et incarnatus" and "Et resurrexit," rising higher than its composer anywhere rose in his preferred 'Passions-Musik.' The 'Credo,' however, would gain by the omission of the solo clauses. There is little music in being more dryly mechanical than the duet for two female voices, "Qui propter." There is no solo, by the most frivolous modern Italian composer, in which the music bears less relation to the words, than the long and tormented pastorale, "Et in Spiritum Sanctum," for a bass voice. Hard labor was it for the singers to force their way through these utterly inexpressive pieces, and a slight pause sufficient to detach chorus from chorus, would be more welcome than any attempt to execute what, at best, is unmeaning, and therefore ineffective. The second item was a selection of scenes from the second and third acts of Gluck's 'Armida.' Grandeur concert-music for a festival could not be devised than Armida's 'Invocation to Hate,' and her answer, chorused by her attendant fiends,—nor lovelier airs for singers of the highest quality than Armida's soliloquy or Rinaldo's enchantment in the fairy garden (which last, by the way, was very well rendered by Herr Schneider). Never could rapturous applause have been better deserved:—so noble, indeed, was the effect that our conductors and festival committees may be justifiably urged to try something of the kind. Gluck's music, be it noted, demands a powerful and brilliant force of stringed instruments, as well as of chorus:—better, therefore, not attempt it at all than to give it on a small scale. It is fresco-Art in opera,—but richer in color and more seductive in beauty than any fresco-painting in being. The rest of this superb concert was made up of the 'Sinfonia Eroica' and the 'Walpurgis Night.'

The third, or Artists' Concert, though commanding the largest crowd, is habitually the least interesting one to the English stranger, who is familiar with better things than the best which these German committees, with their limited means and low prices of admission, can compass. On the miscellaneous selection at Cologne, there is no need to dwell: the artists who are unfamiliar to London having been already spoken of.

The Festival, let it be repeated, was well worth the labor of a visit: interesting in the comparisons naturally excited,—pleasant as bringing together old friends, and as affording an opportunity of making new ones; and made especially cheerful by the ready courtesy of all concerned in its management. Surly-ness himself could hardly find himself a stranger or solitary on such an occasion. With regard to the professional criticisms and bickerings and rivalries which came to the surface,—possibly inevitable, in a country made up of small independent musical principalities,—what shall be said, save that they form as constant a feature in a Whitsuntide Rhine Festival as the garlands which hang the roof-tree, or the Maitrank in its tipsy looking-glass-barrels—insidious beverage!—of which one drinks twice, to repent the whole day after. German unity is a strange thing; but, in music at least, its dislocation is perhaps after all an affair of argument rather than of opinion,—of talk for talking's sake rather than of active dissent and discord. The "ifs" and the "buts,"—the whisperings in corners,—the onslaughts across the supper-table,—did not prevent this Festival at Cologne from being numerously attended and cordially enjoyed—as, in truth, it well deserved to be—by every one present at it.

The Black Opera.

(From the N. Y. Tribune, June 30, 1855.)

If the lyricism of Stiersichorus or of Anacreon be regarded as an embodiment of the characteristic sentiments of the ancients; if the genius of Alcæus and of Sappho perpetuated the mysterious music of the olden time, unvoiced before—why may not the banjoism of a Congo, an Ethiopian or a George Christy, aspire to an equality with the musical and poetical delineators of all nationalities? It may indeed be urged that the banjo is not as classical an instrument as the lyre of the ancients—that the metrical compositions of the colored race and their imitators fall a trifle beneath the standard of excellence at which custom has rated the poets of antiquity—that the use of the jaw-bone and bellows, of Mechanics' Hall notoriety, cannot be countenanced by the votaries of æsthetic pursuits. All this may be urged by the erudite stickler for conventionalities and accepted by others of his class, but the world will go on believing, as it now believes, that truthfulness to nature is the vitality of Art; that music is only true to its high mission when it expounds the subtle philosophy of the soul, the language of the heart, the mystery of the senses, with the infinite emotions, passions, thoughts, which constitute the nature of man; and that whether the instrument which subserves this purpose chances to be a lyre or a banjo, or whether the people whose lives and emotions are thus perpetuated be the highest or the lowest type of the human family, the result is still the same, differing only in the standard of its influence and the character which that influence assumes. Absurd as may seem negro minstrelsy to the refined musician, it is nevertheless beyond doubt that it expresses the peculiar characteristics of the negro as truly as the great masters of Italy represent their more spiritual and profound nationality. And although the melody of "Long-tailed Blue" may not possess the intellectual properties of an aria by Bellini, yet it will contain as much truth to the humanity of which it assumes to be the exponent, and quite as much enthusiasm will be manifested by its listeners.

Whether the black opera originated in Numidia, or on the banks of the Nile, history nor tradition saith not. Its first appearance in "good society" may be set down to 1822, when, in a drama produced at Drury-lane Theatre, in London, Dibdin introduced the character of a negro, who, in the course of the piece, sang a ballad, of which we give one stanza:

"Ribal King he make great strife,
Gumbo dad, him life to save,
Sell pickaniny, crown and wife,
And poor Gumbo for a slave!
Cruel ting of dam ole King,
But Gumbo dry him tear, and sing
Dingle, jingle, tangaro."

The "dingle, jingle, tangaro" is the only portion of this composition which smacks of originality; the rest was tame and vapid, but suited to the audience for which it was intended. About the same time O'Keefe, in the operetta of Paul and Virginia, borrowed the idea of a colored solo, and gave a very passing and characteristic melody. Subsequently, Carney Burns, the clown of a circus company performing at the Park Theatre, sang, between the acts, a composition which he termed "Gumbo Chaff." Its popularity was immediate, and the eccentric Carney instantly became an object of considerable importance; but the appearance, during the same season, of an illustrious competitor for the palm of negro lyricism caused his star to fade and gradually disappear. It was at this epoch that Mr. T. D. Rice made his debut in a dramatic sketch entitled "Jim Crow," and from that moment everybody was "doing just so," and continued "doing just so" for months, and even years afterward. Never was there such an excitement in the musical or dramatic world; nothing was talked of, nothing written of, and nothing dreamed of, but "Jim Crow." The most sober citizens began to "wheel about, and turn about, and jump Jim Crow." It seemed as though the entire population had been bitten by the tarantula; in the parlor, in the kitchen, in the shop and in the street, Jim Crow monopolized public attention. It must have been a species of insanity, though of a gentle and pleasing kind, for it made hearts lighter, and merrier, and happier: it smoothed away frowns and wrinkles, and replaced them with smiles. Its effects were visible alike on youth and age.

The success of Mr. Rice called out numerous imitators. "Sittin' on a rail," "Getting up stairs," "Long-tailed blue," "Zip Coon," etc., succeeded each other rapidly, and for the time being, Negro Minstrelsy was the ruling power. "Goosey Gander," and "Old Dan Tucker" came afterward—and who is there that cannot recollect the enthusiasm with which the first appearance of "Dandy Jim" was hailed? How often that colored gentleman came from "Caroline," it would be impossible to estimate, but we suppose it would bear comparison with the number of occasions on which the ancient and venerable darkey was made to sing "Carry me back to old Virginny." The homeliness, the truthfulness of these compositions, established their popularity. There was nothing factitious in them; they filled a void in public amusement, which was beginning to be sensibly experienced, and from their very naturalness appealed to the sympathy of the multitude. Particularly was this the case with the younger portion of our population, most of whom have grown up to be men and women since then. For if the songs were of a humorous character, it was humor of a positive, gushing kind—boisterous fun, just suited to the nature of youth, and not without its effect upon the risibilities of the oldest; or if the air was a saddened one, there was a pathos in its mournful simplicity, quite as impressive as any waves of melody which ever gushed from the soul of a composer. Who has not often observed the tear of sensibility moistening the cheek of youth, while listening to the primitive strains of "Uncle Ned"—that poor old colored gentleman, who has gone "where the good darkies go!" Ah, those tears constituted one of the blessings of that youth, which has now departed. Sorrow and disappointment have doubtless weighed heavily upon many a heart since that spring of life passed away, with its smiles and tears. We can no longer smile at "Lucy Neal," nor weep at the pathetic story of "Uncle Edward." And, in the meantime, has there been no change in the feelings of the true originators of this music—the negroes themselves? Are the great mass of those held to labor on Southern plantations the same careless, brutalized race they were twenty years ago? We believe not. Let the Southern traveler of to-day compare notes with one who went over the ground even ten years ago, and he will find a striking change in the mental characteristics of this unhappy people. The gay laugh and cheerful song are not heard with former frequency; there is less of that noisy exuberance which not long since was regarded as a trait in the African disposition. The old, unmeaning compositions of the plantation have fallen into disuse, and if they sing now there is memory in their songs. Plaintive and slow, the sad soul of the slave throws into his music all that gushing anguish of spirit which he dare not otherwise express. And yet the careless reviewer of events, observing not the causes or consequences, mourns what he terms the decadence of national negro minstrelsy!

The "Virginia Minstrels" was the first organized band of performers that appeared in public. This comprised the following individuals, who have since enjoyed considerable notoriety in their vocation: Dan Emmett, Whitlock, Pelham, Frank Brower, E. P. Christy and George Christy. The Company afterward changed their appellation to "Christy's Minstrels." The first performance they gave was in Water Street, Buffalo, 1842. Being very successful in the new experiment, they traveled through the West and South, where George Christy acquired that intimate knowledge of negro character which has since made his performances so acceptable. It was in Lexington, Kentucky, that he first saw the jaw-bone and bellows accompaniment introduced by a juvenile specimen of the African race, and he was the first who used these doubtfully melodious instruments in the concert-room. E. P. Christy was among the first to harmonize songs for public performance. We can well remember when the well-known ditty of "Lucy Long" made its appearance, and with what success its author, night after night, informed the audience that he had—

"— Just come out afore you
To sing a little song;
I plays it on the banjo,
And they call it Lucy Long."

Among the most successful writers of Negro Songs may be mentioned Mr. Silas Steele, Cool White, Stephen C. Foster, and George Washington Dixon. The last named individual is well known to Gothamites, both for his musical and literary proclivities. He was one of the earliest votaries of the colored opera, and his muse was among the first employed in its behalf. While performing at the Park Theatre he introduced the "Ching-a-ring Chaw," which afterward became so popular:

"Broder, let us leabe Bura land for Hettee,
Dar we be recieib gran as La Favet-to;
Make a mighty show, when we land from steamship,
I be like Munro, you like Louis Phillippe.
On dat equal soil, who no want to goe,
Dar we feel no rod, dar we hab no foe,
Dar we lib so fine, wid our coach and hos-se,
And every time we dine, hab one, two, tree, four cos-re.
Ching-a-ringer, ring, ching, ching,
Ho a ding, a-ding, kum darkee;
Chinger ringer, sing ching chaw,
Ho, ah, ding kum darkee."

This has the ringing sound of true metal. A long residence in the South doubtless furnished the material for many of the productions of the erratic Dixon, whose life was so checkered and full of incident. The "Coal Black Rose" was another of his popular melodies:

"Lubly Rose, Sambo cum,
Don't you hear the banjo—tum, tum, tum,
Lubly Rose, Sambo cum,
Don't you hear the banjo—tum, tum, tum.
Oh, Rose, do Coal-Black Rose,
I wish I may be burnt if I don't like Rose,
Oh, Rose, &c."

This was a duet, sung by the author and a Mr. Leicester, and always with the most happy effect. Christy composed the next musical popularity, "The 'Yaller Girls," which was followed by Charley White's "Bowery Girls." The rivalry existing between these musical belles was excessive; but the public finally decided in favor of the "Bowery Girls," and from that time forth the number of occasions upon which they were asked if they purposed "coming out to-night," would be impossible to enumerate.

The first company of Minstrels established in this City was that under the management of Mr. E. P. Christy, in 1846. Their performances were given at Palmo's Opera-House—now Burton's Theatre. Finding their popularity on the increase, and seeing a prospect of establishing themselves permanently in the Metropolis, they shortly afterward removed to Mechanics' Hall, which they have since occupied. It is scarcely necessary to speak of the success which attended the experiment. In the year 1852 the number of concerts given by this Company was sixty-nine, and the receipts amounted to $1,848; in 1853, the number of concerts given was 312, and the amount of receipts was $47,972. The intermediate years corresponded in success with the last. Mr. E. P. Christy retired from the business in the possession of a fortune, leaving it to be carried on by George Christy in connection with Mr. Henry Wood. George had long been popular with the New-York public, and his career bids fair to be as successful in a financial point of view as that of his predecessor.

The Buckley Family were among the pioneers of negro minstrelsy. Their first appearance was in the Tremont Temple, Boston, in 1842, under the name of "Congo Melodists," and proved immensely successful. Subsequently they travelled through the South and West, and in 1846 visited England, where they performed successively at Drury-lane and the Princess's Theatres. Returning to New-York, they located themselves in the Chinese Assembly Rooms, where they have since continued to produce burlesque operas, and become very popular with our citizens. The Buckleys consist of James Buckley, the father, and three sons—Richard, George Swaine and Frederick. Winemore was formerly a member of this company, and early contributed to its success. They are at present assisted by persons of considerable taste and skill, and the entertainments which they nightly present attract numerous and respectable audiences.

There are at present a great many companies of negro minstrels performing through the country, the most celebrated of which are Christy's, Buckley's, White's, Ordway's, Campbell's, Peel's, Kunkle's, and the Empire Band. In fact minstrelsy has become a permanent institution in our society, and will undoubtedly maintain its position for many years to come. There is some truth in the assertion that the music has deteriorated. We find that Miss Nancyism of vulgarity assuming a place in the concert room among the votaries of burnt cork, bones, and banjos. The sickly sentimentality which has of late characterized the productions of the majority of these companies, as well as the wholesale plagiarism of music now systematically pursued, has had the effect of injuring the claims of minstrelsy to originality. Let us hope that this will not be longer tolerated by the directors of the colored opera. Instead of adapting trashy words to some defunct Scotch or German melody, let the aspirants after this species of lyric fame mingle with its originators and draw inspiration from a tour through the South and West. There is plenty of material to work upon; and there is certainly no scarcity of room for improvement.

The Philadelphia Musical Fund Society.

[From Fitzgerald's City Item.]

This old and honored association occupies a distinguished place among the multifarious institutions for which Philadelphia is widely famed. Few of our citizens, it is probable, know what the Musical Fund Society actually is; what its end and aim are; or what is the precise nature of the work it is doing. Everybody is aware that the Society has a building devoted to its objects, with a grand saloon which has always been, and is at this day, the most favorite musical hall in the city. It has been pronounced by fastidious musicians the most perfect saloon, in an acoustic sense, on the continent, and artists have frequently asserted that Europe can boast of very few superior to it. Its simple, refined elegance, and its comfortable accommodations have endeared it to the people above all other public saloons. Everybody, too, is aware that the Musical Fund Society give annually a series of concerts, which are among our most popular and fashionable entertainments. Indeed, they constitute one of our few purely local musical attractions.

The Musical Fund Society was instituted on Feb. 29th, 1820, and finally incorporated on Feb. 22d, 1823, so that it has now attained the hale and hearty age of thirty-five years. The essential objects of the corporation are the relief of old, feeble, invalided, or incapacitated musicians and their families, and the cultivation of skill, and diffusion of taste, in music.

The members of the Society are divided into two classes. One is styled the class of amateurs. No pecuniary relief is granted from the corporate funds, unless the applicant for the same shall have been a member of the class of professors during at least three years immediately preceding his or her application, or unless the applicant is the widow or child of a deceased member to whom, at the time of his or her decease, relief might have been granted. The Society has the power to confer academic degrees in music, also to establish schools for musical culture. The corporation is governed by a Board of twenty-four directors, who hold office for a term of three years, and are divided into three classes, eight directors serving for each year. This board elect annually, on the second Tuesday in May, from their own number, a President and Vice-President, a Treasurer and Secretary, and such other officers as the Board or the Corporation may decide upon. Four Standing Committees are also yearly appointed by the Board of Directors, viz: a Committee of Admission, a Committee of the Fund, a Committee of Relief, and a Committee of Music. Their titles indicate, clearly enough, the duties and offices of these committees. Every professional member of the Society is subject to an annual contribution of ten dollars.

If any professional member is in needy circumstances, and is disabled by age, sickness, or accident, from attending to his business, his case is carefully examined into by the Committee of Relief, who report the circumstances to the Board of Directors, who grant to the distressed member a certain weekly allowance. If a member dies, his widow or children, if left destitute, are granted a like weekly allowance. If a poor member is attacked by sickness, an investigation into the case is made and the advice and attendance of one of the regular physicians of the Society (of whom there are two, duly appointed,) are procured for him, and pecuniary assistance is also rendered, if required. In case of the death of a member in needy circumstances, the funeral expenses are defrayed by the Society; if the wife or child of a poor member dies, similar relief is given.

Thus, it will be seen, the Musical Fund Society is fulfilling a most charitable, humane, and beautiful mission. The vicissitudes of a professional musician's life, in this country, are far greater and more fearful than the public, who get the benefit of his genius and labors, have any adequate conception of. It is extremely hard for an artist to obtain, even by the most diligent toil and unswerving effort, a decent subsistence for himself and those who are dependent upon him. If overtaken by age, sickness, or calamity of any description, his situation is indeed pitiable and melancholy. Without the merciful assistance of some such noble and benign agency as the Musical Fund Society, he must starve, beg, or die a miserable death, leaving the family he has to the chance kindness and protection of a world that is not especially notorious for sympathy and generosity. There is a "fate of genius," although stupid creatures, with a painfully cheerful and contented disposition, will not see it nor try to avert it.

The Musical Fund society have expended during the term of their existence, nearly thirty thousand dollars in relief of decayed musicians, their widows and orphan children. During the past few years the relief extended has amounted to over fifteen hundred dollars per annum. Surely an institution that accomplishes such a large and glorious work as this, should have the cordial support of the community of which it is such a shining ornament.

Violins and Poems.

Among the many fine things with which the "Antoeat of the Breakfast Table" continually regales the readers of the Atlantic Monthly, is the following about three good things which grow more good by use:

You don't know what I mean by the green state? Well, then, I will tell you. Certain things are good for nothing until they have been kept a long while; and some are good for nothing until they have been long kept and used. Of the first, wine is the illustrious and immortal example. Of those which must be kept and used I will name three,—meerscham pipes, violins, and poems. The meerscham is but a poor affair until it has burned a thousand offerings to the cloud-compelling deities. It comes to us without complexion or flavor,—born of the sea-foam, like Aphrodite, but colorless as pallida Mors herself. The fire is lighted in its central shrine, and gradually the juices which the broad leaves of the Great Vegetable had sucked up from an acre and enrdled into a drachm are diffused through its thirsting pores. First a discoloration, then a stain, and at last a rich, glowing, amber tint spreading over the whole surface. Nature true to her old brown autumnal hue, you see,—as true in the fire of the meerscham as in the sunshine of October! And then the cumulative wealth of its fragrant reminiscences! he who inhales its vapors takes a thousand whiffs in a single breath; and one cannot touch it without awakening the old joys that hang around it, as the smell of flowers clings to the dresses of the daughters of the house of Fanna!

* * * * *
Violins, too,—the sweet old Amati!—the divine Straduarini! Played on by ancient maestros until the bow-hand lost its power and the flying fingers stiffened. Bequeathed to the passionate young enthusiast, who made it whisper his hidden love, and cry his inarticulate longings, and scream his untold agonies, and wail his monotonous despair. Passed from his dying hand to the cold virtuoso, who let it slumber in its case for a generation, till, when his hoard was broken up, it came forth once more and rode the stormy symphonies of royal orchestras, beneath the rushing bow of their lord and leader. Into lonely prisons with improvident artists; into convents from which arose, day and night, the holy hymns with which its tones were blended; and back again to orgies in which it learned to howl and laugh as if a legion of devils were shut up in it; then again to the gentle dilettante who calmed it down with easy melodies until it answered him softly as in the days of the old maestros. And so given into our hands, its pores all full of music; stained like the meerscham, through and through, with the concentrated hue and sweetness of all the harmonies that have kindled and faded on its strings.

Now I tell you a poem must be kept and used, like a meerscham, or a violin. A poem is just as porous as the meerscham;—the more porous it is, the better. I mean to say that a genuine poem is capable of absorbing an indefinite amount of the essence of our own humanity,—its tenderness, its heroism, its regrets, its aspirations, so as to be gradually stained through with a divine secondary color derived from ourselves. So you see it must take time to bring the sentiment of a poem into harmony with our nature, by staining ourselves through every thought and image our being can penetrate.

Then again as to the mere music of a new poem; why, who can expect anything more from that than from the music of a violin fresh from the maker's hands? Now you know very well that there are no less than fifty-eight different pieces in a violin. These pieces are strangers to each other, and it takes a century, more or less, to make them thoroughly acquainted. At last they learn to vibrate in harmony, and the instrument becomes an organic whole, as if it were a great seed-capsule that had grown from a garden-bed in Cremona, or elsewhere. Besides, the wood is juicy and full of sap for fifty years or so, but at the end of fifty or a hundred more gets tolerably dry and comparatively resonant.

Don't you see that all this is just as true of a poem? Counting each word as a piece, there are more pieces in an average copy of verses than in a violin. The poet has forced all these words together, and fastened them, and they don't understand it at first. But let the poem be repeated aloud and murmured over in the mind's muffled whisper often enough, and at length the parts become knit together in such absolute solidarity that you could not change a syllable without the whole world's crying out against you for meddling with the harmonious fabric. Observe, too, how the drying process takes place in the stuff of a poem just as in that in a violin. Here is a Tyrolean fiddle that is just coming to its hundredth birthday,—(Pedro Klans, Tyroli, fecit, 1760.)—the sap is pretty well out of it. And here is the song of an old poet whom Neraera cheated:

"Nox erat, et celo fulgebat Luna sereno
Inter minora sidera,
Cum tu magnorum nomen lesura deorum
In verba jurabas mea."

Don't you perceive the sonorosity of these old dead Latin phrases? Now I tell you that every word fresh from the dictionary brings with it a certain suaveness; and though I cannot expect the sheets of the "Pactolian," in which, as I told you, I sometimes print my verses, to get so dry as the crisp papyrus that held those words of Horatius Flaccus, yet you may be sure, that, while the sheets are damp, and while the lines hold their sap, you can't fairly judge of my performances, and that, if made of the true stuff, they will ring better after a while.

Opera in New York—Pacini's "Sappho."

From the Sunday Atlas, June 27.

The production of the "Sappho" of Pacini, during the past week, is decidedly a great event in the musical annals of this country. It was performed in this city a few years ago, at the old Park theatre, with Tedesco in the role of the Grecian poetess, and the silver-voiced Lorini as Phaon, her lover. The present cast at the Academy is as follows :

Saffo	Sigra. Gazzaniga
Climene	Miss Phillips
Phaon	Signor Brighelli
Aleandro	Signor Gassier
Diree	Sigra. Morra
Ippia	Signor Barattini
Lysimachus	Signor Mueller

The "Sappho" of Paccini is deservedly the pet of the Neapolitans and Sicilians. The music is highly classic—perhaps too much so for the present atmosphere of New York, but still melodious and intelligible. Why such a master-piece should have lain neglected for so many years is to us a mystery. In a dramatic point of view, it is full of brilliant points and situations, requiring the highest exercise of dramatic skill. Madame Gazzaniga many years ago set Naples in a furor over her rendition of the unfortunate heroine. The audiences at the Academy were similarly exercised during the past week. One could hear, all over the house, whisperings about its greatness and sublimity. The orchestra and chorus, having been strengthened, acquitted themselves for the first time this season with decided ability. Max threw his whole soul into his baton, and interpreted the music in a style that would have pleased Paccini himself. We hope this opera will become a permanent institution in this city. For the information of such of our readers as have not heard it, we subjoin the following synopsis :

Act I.—During the games of the 42d Olympiad, the populace excited by Saffo's denunciations of the inhumanity of compelling hopeless lovers to leap from the Leucadian rock, drive Aleandro, the high priest of Apollo, from the Circus. Incensed and outraged, he plots revenge, and meeting with Phaon, who is loved by Saffo, he stimulates his affections for his own daughter, Climene, and excites his jealousy of Aleus, a former follower of Saffo. Saffo appears, and soon regains her former sway over the fickle lover, but as she is called to receive the laurel crown from Aleus she forgets her love in her pride, and carelessly calls on Phaon to follow her. Phaon's jealousy is again aroused; he upbraids and spurns her as she clings suppliant to his knees.

Act 2.—Climene, attiring for her nuptials with Phaon, receives Saffo, who has vainly sought her lover, and now, in despair, comes to Climene to beg her intercession with Aleandro that she offer a sacrifice to appease the wrath of Apollo. Climene receives her with kindness and as a sister, and invites her to be present at her coming nuptials. Saffo objects to her mean appearance, but Climene orders her damsels to give to Saffo her best attire, and proceeds to the temple. Saffo soon follows in gorgeous apparel, crowned with a laurel wreath, and finds in Climene's husband her true lover. Aleandro orders her to leave the temple; she is about to do so and calls on Phaon to follow her, but hearing that he is already married, in rage she overturns the hymenial altar, and is driven with curses from the temple.

Act 3.—Broken-spirited and bowed down by the celestial malediction, she supplicates the high priest of Apollo to permit her to take the fatal leap to appease her unrequited love. The priest consults the oracle, which is favorable, and while preparing herself for the fatal sacrifice, Aleandro learns from Lysimachus and an amulet she wears about her neck, that Saffo is his own lost daughter to Climene. He endeavors to free her from the fatal decree, but the god is obdurate; in an inspired frenzy she sings a nuptial song; the voice of Phaon recalls her to herself; she lends him to Climene, and rushes to plunge from the fatal rock—Phaon in vain attempting to follow her.

While Brignoli is fair, and Miss Phillips good, in this opera, Gazzaniga and Gassier were positively great. We expected as much from the lady, and were prepared to hear a careful rendition from the baritone; but the latter did more than we expected. He absolutely surprised and dazzled us. The aria "Di sua voce," in the first act, was given magnificently. The house fairly trembled with spontaneous applause. The duetto, "Compunta e supplica," with Gazzaniga in the third act, was equally well rendered, while the solo, "Oh Smania," was absolutely thrilling. Never before did we hear the rich reedy, cultivated voice and artistic method of Gassier to such advantage. We consider him an invaluable acquisition to any troop, and we regret that he is about to leave us next month. Since he has been here he has improved very much in actina, and no doubt will reap new laurels on his return to Europe. Madame Gazzaniga, by her example, seems to have infused new life into all the artists except Brignoli, who is, without exception, the worst actor on the Italian stage.

Miss Phillips filled the pleasing role of Climene, and made a decided success. Paccini seems to have wisely and equally distributed the weight of his music among the four principal singers, so that each one has a fair share of the work to do. The air, "Il cor non basta," in the second act, is a little gem for the contralto, and the duet, "Di quai soavi," with Gazzaniga, received an enthusiastic encore. The pizzicato of the violins and the accompaniment of the harp, made this duet one of the most pleasing we ever heard. In fact, Miss Phillips in this opera, as in "Il Trovatore," is entitled to a high position both as an actress and singer. From the fire that sparkles in her eye, and the intelligence that beams in her face, we predict all sorts of good luck for her in the future. We are proud of our American prima donna, and hereby nominate her queen of the young contraltos.

Brignoli is incorrigible. He should be made to wear trousers full of thistles, to keep him awake. The role of Phaon, though somewhat threadbare, is still full of dramatic interest. The role of Violetta, in the "Traviata," is equally threadbare; but in the hands of Gazzaniga, it becomes absolutely great. Phaon can be made a magnificent role for dramatic intensity, but Brignoli (who appears to detest the character,) sings it like a stick. Where and how he will end, if he persists in pursuing this sleepy course, Heaven only knows. The aria "A nitigar le smanie," in the first act, was deficient in fire, and very bad in the upper notes. He has lately acquired a trick of singing high notes as if from the roof of his mouth—a mode very easy of execution, but tending in the end to what might be called nasality. "Mai piu, mai piu divisi," in the third act, was well sung, and is also a little gem in its way. Brignoli can sing divinely, if he chooses. He is enormously fat, but "width and wisdom," in his case, do not come together. His repose on the stage is death-like, and enough to throw a cold chill over the impassioned Gazzaniga. The costume in this opera seem made up from "Norma" and "Semiramide"; and Brignoli's, in particular, is abominable.

Of Gazzaniga, what can we say? If we had swallowed forty dictionaries, in as many different languages, we should still be unable to do her justice. Her face is childlike and full of expressive simplicity with the sweetest (looking—for we cannot, alas! vouch personally for its saccharine qualities,) sort of a mouth imaginable, that utters sounds of joy or woe in the most wonderful manner. From the beginning to the end of this opera, her performance was a triumph. She carried the entire weight, almost, like Atlas of old, upon her own shoulders. The duet, in the second act, with Miss Phillips, was tender and bewitching. Of Paccini, it may well be said that he does not overtask the voices of his principal singers. Everything is written within an easy compass, unlike Verdi and other composers of a more recent and florid school. The "Ai mortali O erudo," in the second act, was magnificent. Madame Gazzaniga's lower notes have a wild, wailing tone about them, at times, that appeals strangely to the heart. The trio, "Al seno mi stringi," in the third act, with Aleandro and Climene, was admirably given. The nuptial song, "Teco dall' are pronube," with harp accompaniment, and the finale, "L'ama ognor qua," were truly grand. Her acting throughout was superb. This opera demands so much intense action, that we fear, in other hands, it would prove a failure. It so proved in London, when first produced there, and was withdrawn after the second representation. Here, Madame Gazzaniga has made it a great success. Mr. Gye should have secured her for Covent Garden, and pitted her against the reputed formidable Piccolomini, of Lumley's troupe. London would be swept, as if by a tornado, at the rivalry of two such actresses.

The libretto of this opera was written by an Italian poet named Cammarano, and although full of dramatic points and situations, is equally full of historical blunders. For example, Saffo is represented as delivering an oration against an alleged barbarous custom of causing unfortunate lovers to leap from the rock of Leucadia, a ceremony belonging in some way to the temple of Apollo, of which Aleandro is high priest. Inflamed by her words, the populace thrust the priest from the circus and at this point the play begins. According to the poet Menander, Saffo herself is said to have been the first to try such a violent remedy for her unrequited passion. It was clearly the hasty suicidal impulse of the moment, for no custom then existed compelling hapless lovers to take such a leap. But a custom did prevail at that time of throwing down a criminal every year on the festival of Apollo. In order to break his fall birds were attached to him and if he reached the water alive, boats were stationed to pick him up, after which he was allowed to depart unmolested from the territory of Leucadia. The best scholars now agree that the leap, if taken at all, was taken by a courtesan of the same name, a native of Presos, in the same island (Lesbos.) Antipater, of Sidon, in an epigram asserts, that Saffo, of Mytilene, (the poetess,) died in the usual course of nature and was buried in her native island. It appears moreover that she was a respectable married woman, the wife of one Cereolus, a wealthy gentleman of Andros, by whom she had a daughter named Cleis. History is silent as to whether she had a sister, and in all her productions no allusion whatever is made to the youth called Phaon. It is certain that the suicide was a voluntary one, and not commanded by the gods or the priests of Apollo. The rock itself exists to this day, and is situated in the modern Santa Maura, an island lying on the west coast of Greece, while Lesbos, now the modern Mytilene, lies off the west coast of Asia Minor, many hundred leagues distant. The Italian author of the libretto of the opera in question, evidently drew largely on his imagination for his facts, after the usual fashion of poets. History aside, the plot is clever and well worked out, and affords great scope for an exhibition of dramatic talent in the four principal roles. We fear that this opera will be shelved after the departure of Gazzaniga, unless indeed some equally clever actress makes her appearance here under the auspices of Ullman next fall. Paccini is a Sicilian by birth, at present residing in Florence. His works are but little known out of Italy. We do not consider him a copyist of Rossini, nor can we detect any resemblance of style or melody. The genius of the latter has so completely covered the whole ground of Italian music, that other composers are frequently accused of pilfering, or imitating.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Quartet, for four voices, from MENDELSSOHN'S Lauda Sion. In performing the whole work, this Quartet follows without pause the Soprano Solo and Chorus, which we gave last week. It is complete, however, in itself. The concluding pages will be given next week.

The "Heated Term."

"The Heavens are as Brass above us."

Journalists of all kinds and parties just now are perspiringly eloquent upon one topic—the hot weather. It seems (nay it is), we are in the midst of one of those fever crises, which our old earth has to undergo more than once every summer, and for which some learned Yankee cousin of the Moon, Clerk of the Weather by the general consent, has invented the name "heated term." It is a term, whose meaning may be felt, if not so clear to intellectual ken.

The "heated term" is not an unfit topic, either, for a journal of music. Indeed it is the very topic—and, in the present surcease of all quiet, temperate, unfeverish music, the only topic left us. It has its precise musical correspondence: to-wit, Brass. When that fearfulest of dog-stars rages,—the lurid evil star of Brass Bands—with unescapable peculiar virulence, we are in one of the "heated terms" of the musical season. At such times the fine ear, the fine-strung musical nature has to suffer for its sensitiveness. Then the unprotected sense and nerve-imagination are entirely at the mercy of all sorts of vexing, stinging, torturing, mosquito-ish, as well as noisy, brassy, Calithumpian persecutors. The everlasting bray of hoarse and screamy and discordant brass seems the most apt and natural accompaniment of all the vulgar noises, heats and smells of crowded, dirty city streets, in a hot day after the blessed height of Midsummer.

That there may be music of brass instruments, which is music, we do not deny; used in their right place, in right proportions, and especially for music properly adapted to them, they often fill a noble function. But as we have to hear them, grown so cheap and vulgar, blating "harsh discords" or most maudlin pathos out of the windows of every dirty beer-shop,—band blowing against band, with hideous cacophony, at all the four or thrice four corners of the squares where rowdies most do congregate (we cannot pass the dear old house where we were born, on any pleasant evening, without literally experiencing this very nuisance),—as this intensely brassy, "heated term" does actually exist in every city and in every town, perpetual accom-paintment of every show and place of entertainment, dogging you and shouldering you (in an auricular sense) in a style most insolent and ruffian-like, you cannot help exclaiming that "the heavens are as brass above us!" Verily it is the age of brass. And the worst side of it is the moral side. There is a natural affinity, a pre-established, diabolic harmony between rowdiness and brass music. Where rowdiness is rife, there do the Sax-horns bray the loudest. Their effect upon the musical sense, as well as on the moral, is to trample under foot and crush out all the tender germs of finer feeling. No delicacy of taste can long exist amid such crazing tumult. The music, which we hear o' nights, amid the glare of gas, is vulgar, coarse, illiterate music. Its whole expression, tendency and influence are just the opposite of all that is refining, humanizing, and exalting.

The ordinary brass bands, the poorer and more common class we mean, are a ten-fold greater nuisance than the hand-organs. These do delight small children, and awaken some germs of a sense of melody; but brass bands crush out every germ, and substitute the brutal love of noise for that of music.

The culmination of this "heated term," under which we now ply a languid pen, is close at hand: — the Nation's Jubilee, the "glorious Fourth;" and this in music is a great Pentecost of brass. By all the powers of Brass, in league with Gunpowder, we publish and proclaim our patriotism. With the unthinking multitude the first attribute of patriotism is the war-like spirit; and war-like music is pre-eminently brass. The military brass band sets the key to all the music of our national rejoicings. Witness the "stunning" programme of the Grand Military Concert, which is to lift the patriotic souls of thousands upon wings of glory, Monday Morning, upon Boston Common. We chronicle it in this our musical weather record, as one would the memorable thunder storm or great tornado of the season:

A Grand Military Concert will take place on the Common, commencing precisely at 8 o'clock, A. M., and concluding at 9.

The music will be performed by the Brigade Band, Boston Brass Band, Metropolitan Band, and Germania Military Band, forming one Grand Band of eighty Musicians, under the direction of B. A. Burditt, of the Brigade Band. The Concert will commence with three grand chords, each chord being accompanied by one of the guns of the Light Artillery, Capt. Nims, which will be followed by the following programme of pieces:

1. Yankee Doodle, in Grand Chorus, with solo variations by the leaders of each band, viz: E. H. Weston, Brigade Band; D. C. Hall, Boston Brass Band; B. F. Richardson, Metropolitan Band; Antoine Heinicke, Germania Military Band.
2. Wood Up, with variations and solo performances.
3. Washington's March.
4. Verdi's Celebrated Anvil Chorus, with eight anvils.
5. Star Spangled Banner.
6. God Save the Queen.
7. Marseilles Hymn.
8. Russian National Hymn.
9. The Turkish Song of Peace.
10. Hail Columbia, in which the guns of the Light Artillery will speak in unison with the bands, giving repeated salvos to heighten the effect of America's National Air.

The Concert will conclude at nine o'clock, A. M., and, owing to the subsequent engagements of the bands, no piece can be repeated.

Verily, in the words of a contemporary, "the music of Vulcan and Jupiter Tonans will be mingled with the vibrations of brass and sheep-skin, in a manner that would have tickled the cockles of old John Adams's heart to have heard it!"

Now all this of itself is very well. Let the prophetic wish of old John Adams be respected, and let the nation make a great boy of itself, in the frenzy of its joy on such occasions, to its heart's content; and let the old tunes, homely though they be, which are associated with our country's pride, repeat themselves through whatsoever lungs of brass. Noise is the order of the day; and music, to be heard, must needs be of the noisiest. Moreover, there are good musicians in our principal brass bands; men who desire, as well as we, a music of less coarse, monotonous material, with pleasant contrast of reed instruments with brass. But the bands live by military employment, chiefly from single companies; and economy requires that the instruments be few and loud enough to make their way through all the mingled noises of the street. The bands play well. All we regret is, that such demonstrations set the tone to all the coarser elements below them; they give the cue to thousands of base imitators everywhere in cities and in villages, who in the summer season make night hideous with the brutalizing, irritating discords which have formed the theme of this discourse upon the weather.

Musical Review.

The Church and Home: a collection of Sacred Music. Selected and adapted by GEORGE LEACH. (Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.) pp. 232.

This is not a "Psalm Book," but a collection, and a very choice one, of pieces of several pages each in length, selected for the most part from the works of the best classical masters, mostly German, with a goodly number from the English school, and a sprinkling of clever contributions from the compiler's own pen, as well as by other well-known musicians in New York. Here are fine Glorias, Sanctuses, &c., from the Masses of Mozart and Haydn; choruses, quartets, trios, solos, from Mendelssohn, Handel, Beethoven, Weber, Spohr and others; Te Deums, Jubilates, Chants, Anthems, from Orlando Gibbons, Boyce, Crotch, Jackson and other masters of English service music: all arranged to English words, and making a collection which we think must become extremely useful in all choirs and musical circles, who want good music of more length and interest than mere psalmody. Mr. Leach is an Englishman who has for some years resided in New York, and a brother of Mr. S. W. Leach, one of the most tasteful and artistic of the oratorio singers. In the performance of his task he had the aid of that excellent musician, Mr. H. C. TIMM. In his modest Preface he says:

The several pieces comprising this collection were mostly prepared during eight years, while the music of the "CHORUS OF THE MESSIAH," New York, was under the direction of the editor. They were intended to supply immediate wants, with no idea of publication; having, however, been frequently requested to print them, after a careful revision, he now gives them to the public, in the hope, not only that a confessed want in the Church will be supplied, but that they will prove a source of pleasure and instruction in the Home, and excite a desire for a more intimate knowledge of the sublime works from whence these gems have been chiefly taken.

In selecting and adapting the words, it was not deemed sufficient that they should be merely lyrical, but that they should also suit the spirit of the music, and be at the same time of a character acceptable to all classes of Christians. This book therefore may not in any sense be regarded as sectarian. In the good time coming, it is believed that all churches will unite in the bonds of brotherly love and Christian charity, to worship the one Universal Parent of mankind.

Six Songs, by EMILY C. BAUCE. 1. "Spring Night;" 2. "The World goes up and the World goes down;" 3. "Oh, heavy, heavy day;" 4. "Love took me softly by the hand;" 5. "Cradle Hymn;" 6. "Good night, my heart." (Russell & Fuller).

Here, in a very tasteful and inviting little brochure, we have some modest Spring flowers of a young girl's musical life. They are fresh, simple melodies, genuine and full of feeling. In the accompaniments they show taste and invention, as well as inexperience. Some of them are pretty sure to win their way, and all of them are better worth than many songs of more pretension, largely sold in these days. The "Cradle Hymn," to Latin words, with translation by Coleridge, is the simplest and perhaps the most perfect of them. No. 2 has a significant accompaniment. No. 6 has striking beauty; but the translation of the German poem is unfortunate.

Come into the garden, Maud: Song for Mezzo-Soprano voice, by OTTO DRESEL. (Russell & Fuller).

Of all the settings to music of Tennyson's most musical verses, this is by far the best. It conveys, in a somewhat dramatic strain of melody, the delicate poetry and passion of the words, and has points where all the soul-warmth of a rich voice may pour itself forth. The accompaniment is strangely beautiful but difficult.

✍ We send this number of the "Journal" to the subscribers of the "CHICAGO MUSICAL REVIEW," which paper has been discontinued, and shall be pleased to place the names of those who receive it on our books as permanent subscribers to "Dwight's Journal," allowing to all such the amount they may have paid on the "Review," covering any period beyond the first of July.

Musical Correspondence.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., JUNE 29. — The Grand Floral Promenade Concert, the programme of which I sent you in my last letter, came off as announced, on Thursday evening last. Although the thermometer had ranged in the neighborhood of 90 "in the shade" all day, there was a cool, refreshing breeze from the bay in the evening, and the arrangements were so well made and so admirably executed by the committee, that there was but little discomfort felt by the large and gay company. While there was the largest liberty granted as to dress, many elegant toilets were to be seen, some of which would have been quite creditable to an occasion more pretentious than a Promenade Concert in the "city of churches."

The decorations were arranged with excellent taste and were both elaborate and expensive, costing upwards of $1,000, which of course does not include the flowers, and much labor which was gratuitous. At one end of the room was the stage, occupied by the band, with the following decorations:

Three arches of evergreen and flowers; under the centre arch a statue of Flora, on each side a female figure, holding a shield: one bearing the inscription, "Philharmonic Society," the other, "Horticultural Society."

Over the centre arch, the "American Eagle," and on each side papier-mâché cupids, literally in a "bed of roses." On the stage also was a full sized Harp made of a great variety of roses, which was very much admired.

In the centre of the room was an octagon Floral Temple, surmounted by a cupola, terminating under the chandelier. In the centre of this Temple was the Floral design, which received the first prize at the exhibition.

On the other end of the room is the gallery, forming a half circle, on which were the statues of the Gardener, Fisher Boy, Hunting Girl and Cornucopia, surmounted with arches of evergreens and flowers, above which were smaller statues of Bacchus, a Bacchante, Dancing Girl and Flora.

The sides of the room were hung with wreaths, festoons, gilt frame mirrors, &c.

This brief outline gives but a faint idea of the truly elegant and tasteful appearance of the room. The committee did everything they promised and more too. The music was from Noll's, and not from Hall's Seventh Regiment Band, as your compositor printed it from my last letter. It would be quite superfluous to say that the music was excellent, as this band never gives us anything that is not excellent. They are not only a body of musicians that do credit to our city, but we have reason to be, as we are, proud of them.

At the Academy in New York the Opera closes tomorrow (Wednesday) night, for the summer. This season, under the management of W. H. Paine, Esq., has been highly successful, everything considered.

The production of "Sappho" has created no little interest in our little musical world, and the critics have thought it worthy their attention, so that editorial ink has flowed freely on the merits and demerits of this opera. The verdict both of the public and the critics, is in its favor. The merits of this opera, however, are so different from its contemporaries, that it can only be brought in contrast, rather than in comparison with them.

The critics, however, have made one valuable discovery during the late season at the Academy. They have finally discovered that Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, a young lady who has formerly lived in a remote, and out of the way place called Boston, and who is most highly esteemed and respected by the good people of the said out of the way place,—I say, the critics of Gotham have discovered that this young lady is really a fine artist. One says: "As to execution, Madame GAZZANIGA may learn a good deal from her." Another—the Daily Times, says: "The second act opens with a delicious and quaintly accompanied chorus, for female voices, followed by a fine scena and aria for the contralto, (Clinene, played by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS,) which was rendered in an almost faultless manner."

The Grand Musical Festival, notwithstanding the unsufferably hot weather, has been quite successful, but not having attended, I cannot speak from personal observation.

BELLINI.

Musical Chit-Chat.

What a man of the right sort may do towards elevating the taste for music in any town, which has a fair share of materials, is shown by the example of Mr. B. D. Allen in Worcester, Mass. This gentleman gave another of his truly classical Soirées, last week, at his Music Rooms. The programme was of the highest order. "Stella," of the Palladium, says of it:

The Grand Battle March of Priests in Athalie, opened the programme, and was finely played by the Messrs. Allen, Mrs. Allen, and a little miss of tender years, who, in her laurel-crown seemed a priestess of the divine art to which she devotes herself with an ardor which tempts one to see in her some future Clara Schumann. The Hymn by Mendelssohn, "Hear my Prayer," was effectively sung; Mrs. Allen's pure soprano rendering the solo very truthfully, notwithstanding the hoarseness from which she suffered; and a strong, rich chorus doing justice to the highly-dramatic allegro and finale. Beethoven's Sonata in F minor formed the third number; and, much as we had anticipated its performance, Mr. Allen's playing left nothing to be desired. In its allegro and prestissimo there was "the wild witchery of Beethoven's strains," while the adagio was rich in beauty of form and expression. Ah! these Sonatas of the great master! Perfection, truly! Mr. Sumner, a highly cultivated singer, has a pure and sympathetic tenor which we could have chosen to have heard in something better worthy of him than Stradella's "Pity, O Saviour!" which had more sweetness than beauty or depth. Five piano duets by Schumann added to the list of pictures of happy child-life which Mr. Allen has before given us. They were the joyous "Birthday March," the lugubrious "Bears' Dance," the "Garden Melody,"—redolent of zephyrs and flowers and the oddly pretty conceit, "Hide and Seek." Himmel's Veni Creator Spiritus was given with telling effect; Mr. A. S. Allen taking the solo, and the chorus doing well their part. Pensées Fugitives, performed by Messrs. Burt and Allen, (violin and piano), would have challenged strictest criticism. Mr. Burt brings from his violin a singularly pure, round tone, and plays with most feelingly. He is a true artist. Mr. Allen's piano-solos—including an exceedingly pretty Mazurka of his own composition, one of the ever-beautiful Songs without Words, No. 19, and the rich Etude in A flat, of Chopin's, were among the most enjoyable of the evening's performances. Mrs. Allen sang one of the most enlivening of the songs of Robert Franz; and the quartet closed all with the grand Latin Hymn of Cherubini, "Veni Jesu, amor mio,"—inspiring and sublime.

The Grand Musical Festival, Pic-nic, &c., in New York, came off as announced on Sunday and Monday last. The concert at the Academy was slimly attended, partly owing to the intense heat, and partly because it was Sunday; the numbers on the stage almost rivalled those in the auditorium. The newspaper critics seem to have been so entirely possessed by the great topic of the "heated term," that they have hardly anything to say about the concert,—although there was an immense orchestra, some 1400 singers, and Beethoven's "CHORAL SYMPHONY" was brought out in full! Fry, in the Tribune, says, however: "It is not saying too much that, as a whole it would be difficult to find a better execution of this great work in Europe; and what was wanting in the crowd, was compensated for in the close attention and appreciation rendered it by the amateurs present."

Verily the thermometer has much to answer for, when an opera called Saffo, or even a hacknied Traviata, can call forth whole columns of comment in all the newspapers, while such an event as the Ninth Symphony is barely mentioned!

On Monday the Grand Rural Festival and Musical Pic-nic took place at Jones's Woods, between sixty-sixth and seventy-first streets. The Times says:

About 9 o'clock, A. M. the members of the various societies, who were to take part in the proceedings, the Arion and Harmonia Bnnds, the Liederkranz, Mozartverein, Allgemeiner Sängerbund, &c., assembled at the Metropolitan Rooms in Hester-street, and afterwards paraded Broadway and other streets, accompanied by two immense military bands, and several military companies. The display was very effective, the gorgeous banners belonging to the "bunds" attracting special attention. At the time when the festival was at its height there were not less than twenty-eight or thirty thousand persons present, and locomotion almost became impossible, so dense was the crowd. The shade afforded by the trees was very partial, and the intense heat (the thermometer standing at 90 deg. in the coolest place) detracted greatly from the general pleasure. Wherever any shade could be procured the ground was packed with human beings, too heated to stir—the women and children being especially wilted. . . . Poles and stands had been erected for gymnastic exhibitions, but no one patronized them. The athletic sports of the "Turners" are not suited for a torrid atmosphere.

To say that lager beer was consumed in greater quantities than on any previous German festival that we can remember, is to give no idea of the immense demand which was made for it, and which at last exceeded the supply, although 1300 kegs were ordered for the occasion, which, as each keg contains 120 glasses, was equal to 156,000 pints of that beverage. Light wines, soda water and lemonade were also in great request.

An immense stand, capable of holding several hundred persons, was erected under the shade of some fine trees, near the centre of the grounds, where the concert commenced at 2 o'clock. This stand and its vicinity were crowded so densely that the noise made by those who were rushing to get in, and others, who, nearly fainting from the heat and pressure, were struggling to get out, often rendered the sound of the music inaudible at a very inconsiderable distance. To those who were fortunate enough to get within comfortable hearing distance the effect of so many instruments was very fine.

There were, according to the programme, 1,400 singers, belonging to the Arion, Harmonia, Liederkranz and Allgemeine Sängerbund Societies; 300 instrumental players in the orchestra, and 300 in the bands in the procession, making 2,000 performers in all. The various pieces were given under different conductors, namely: Messrs. ANSCHUTZ, BRISTOW, RIETZEL, BERGMANN, NOLL and WEBER. After the "Star-Spangled Banner," a speech was made by Mr. WM. HENRY FRY, which called forth repeated cheers. He spoke of the precarious position of the musician, especially in "hard times," of the noble charitable object of the Festival, which he hailed as the beginning and "basis of a great and enduring benevolent Association, which shall provide for the sick, the unfortunate, the aged and the suffering of the musical profession" in New York. All accounts agree that this great gathering was characterized by the usual temperance, good order and friendly courtesy of Germans upon such occasions. There was also a good disposition shown to Americanize the thing as much as possible; a fair proportion of Americans participated.

Our Berlin correspondent told us some months since of a concert, at which the programme was made up exclusively of compositions by kings, princesses, duchesses, and other titled personages, from "Old Fritz" to the present powers that be. The Athenæum tells us of another case more recent, and comments as follows:

Amateur composition—no scandal against ladies and gentlemen who employ their leisure gracefully—is (in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred)—amateur composition—showing that its makers have heard that

and thus dispense with any. May we "of the herd" venture a step further, and dare to whisper that royal amateur composition is a still more delicate ware? How should it be otherwise? Can we look for fugues from the great ones of the earth,—and where is the musical professor who would dare to point out a third case of "consecutive fifths" in Prince Chéri's madrigal or King Cophetua's quartet? Theirs are productions too august and genteel to bear the light of every-day publicity, or to be exposed to audiences who are justified in resenting a stolen tune or a corrupt sequence. We have been led to these venturesome speculations by meeting in the foreign journals with traces of an exquisite piece of courtiership just enacted at Berlin by Herr Theodor Formes, the tenor. He has been giving, it is said, a concert, in which the programme was made up of music by Frederick William the Third and Frederick the Great of Prussia (the latter sovereign's music, we know, was washed clean"—to use Voltaire's phrase—by Quantz).—Prince Louis-Ferdinand of Prussia,—the Duke of Saxe-Cobourg-Gotha, the Hereditary Princess of Würtemberg, formerly the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia,—the Princess Anna of Prussia,—our own Prince Consort,—and the King of Hanover. Had the concert-giver gone more largely into the matter, he might have treated us to some ancient fragments from "Talestri," by the Dowager-Electress of Saxony, praised by Burney. Had he studied the international relations of Europe, he should have wound up with "Partant pour la Syrie," to do honor to the French Alliance.

The Illustrated News gives us a brief sketch of the antecedents of Mlle. TITIENS, or TITJENS, the new prima donna at Her Majesty's Theatre:

This lady, now the brightest star of the musical stage, is a native of Hamburg, but of Hungarian extraction, and descended of a noble family. She was born in 1834, and is thus in her twenty-fourth year. Like most great musical artists, she showed a disposition for the art at an early age, and, after having received instructions from an eminent Italian master, she appeared on the Hamburg stage at fifteen. Her outset in life was romantic. A young man of considerable fortune fell in love with her and sought her hand; but her unconquerable attachment to the stage led her to reject his addresses. Her guardian (her father was then dead) used all his authority and influence to get her to withdraw from the stage, and a sort of compromise was made that she should do so for twelve months at all events, to return to the stage at the end of that time, should her inclination for it continue unabated. At the end of nine months her love of her art prevailed: she returned to the stage, sacrificing to it her domestic prospects. While performing at Hamburg she was seen and heard by the Director of the Opera at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, who immediately engaged her. At Frankfort she appeared in the great parts which have since rendered her famous. Her growing celebrity attracted the attention of the director of the Imperial Theatre at Vienna, with whom she entered into an engagement for three years, of which one year is yet to run, her present visit to London being on a congé for a limited time. At Vienna she soon rose to the height of public favor, and was on the point of renewing her engagement with the direction of the Imperial Theatre, when Mr. Lumley, arriving at Vienna at a critical time, was enabled to make her a more eligible proposal, and to secure her for Her Majesty's Theatre.

The great parts in which she has gained her renown are Valentine, in the "Huguenots"; Norma, Lucrezia Borgia; Donna Anna, in "Don Giovanni"; the Countess, in "Figaro"; Leonora, in "Fidelio"; and Leonora, in the "Trovatore," in which last she has appeared during the present week; so that it may be seen that her "line" is tragedy, or the class of comedy which is akin to tragedy. We add, with great pleasure, that Mlle. Titjens is not less amiable as a woman than illustrious as an artist. Her manners are singularly engaging.

Uhland, the venerable poet of the Schwarzwald, celebrated his seventy-first birthday on the 26th April, in Tübingen. He was fêted with serenades brought by the Student's Liedertafel, one of the best in Germany, which has been directed for the last twenty-seven years by Dr. Silcher.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The success of Le Nozze at the Théâtre Lyrique is described by French ear-witnesses to have been real; so much so, indeed, as to make the management contemplate mounting Don Juan. Where the hero is to be found, save it be in M. Battaille, we have no conception. The Gazette Musicale announces that the "Faust" of M. Gounod is in rehearsal. The state of the Grand Opéra meanwhile is described, on competent testimony, as going from bad to worse. "No music, no voices, no discipline," were the words used the other day in regard to it by a great German conductor, who, like ourselves, recollects the palmy days of that theatre. Signor Tambrlik, it is now said, hesitates as to the loan of his C sharp; and, we think, wisely. Meanwhile, the Paris correspondent of the Illustrated London News announces a discovery of its kind and in its world as precious as the great gold nugget or the "Koh-i-noor." This is a new tenor, one M. Lebat, with an upper note more in his voice (what do we say?—one—two—three—there is no limit to promise on similar occasions) than Signor Tamberlik himself. M. Lebat is announced as a professor of rhetoric; but it is undertaken for him that after a year's training he shall be ready to succeed to the crown and sceptre of Nourrit, MM. Duprez and Roger. Great is the pleasure in hoping,—greater still in believing—but experience is apt to be troublesome on such occasions. We have not forgotten the similar promises made for the Rouen cooper, M. Poulter, before he was "brought out,"—nor the sensation excited by the preternatural voice of M. Belfort some years later. A weed is not to be cultivated into a hot-house flower within the compass of a twelvemonth, neither is a singer qualified to cope with the difficulties of the Grand Opéra of Paris to be improvised under a few months' training by singing-master and ballet-master. In Italy, we know, such things can take place. There—Chicco, who in January was bawling behind his cobbler's bench or Milord's equipage, may towards August be seen figuring on the stage as a tenore robusto in one of Signor Verdi's operas. This, however, (and it is well), will hardly do for France.

Signor Rossini again! Was ever the retreat of great man so perversely public in its privacy? A silly book—half romance, half biography—about him has been published by Herr Oettinger, under pretence of superior knowledge, confidence—containing, in short, that sort of story, which is told the most minutely by those who have none to tell. Signor Rossini has condescended to advertise the silly book by assuring the public that he never had anything to do with Herr Oettinger.

The Whitsuntide news from Paris, where the season may be said now to have ended, is not exciting. M. Elwart's "Ste. Cecile Mass," written for Bordeaux, is to be executed at the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, on the 10th of June. M. Oscar Comettant has completed a Symphony on the story of "India in an uproar." Give us the good old foolish "Battle of Prague" in preference! Madame Pauline du Chambge, an amateur whose romances held for years a place and a publicity of their own in French vocal music, has died lately at a very advanced age.—Athenæum, June 5.

Sweden.

Lindblad, the composer of many of the sweetest and truest songs of our day, (some of which Jenny Lind sang), and a real musician, but (as Chorley says) "a talent ice-bound in a remote land," has produced a new Symphony, and a Cantata called "Dreams."

Germany.

The name of Bach seems coming forward in Germany just now,—not merely in the disinterment and revival of compositions by Sebastian the Great, but also as represented by the works of Bach's children. The St. Cecilia Society of Carlsruhe, executed at its fourth concert "The Israelites in the Desert," by P. Emmanuel Bach, of Berlin, arranged and re-scored by M. H. Giehne. This Emmanuel was the most worthy son of a worthy sire, because no servile imitator of his manner; as all must feel who have gone through his "Art of Playing the Pianoforte." In this the amount of prophecy of what has been falsely considered modern discovery is remarkable. Emmanuel Bach wrote voluminously in every style, and musical readers may recollect the visit paid to him at Hamburg by Burney, who was one of his warmest admirers, and who thought he was too much neglected in Germany. The few compositions by Emmanuel Bach which we have heard have left an impression of grace and absence of stiffness (without poverty in the matter of science) which would make a hearing of some of his important music interesting. The other day, too, we observe that a Concerto by Friedemann Bach was brought forward at a concert given by the Society of Artists-Musicians at Berlin.

M. Ole Bull the original,—who seems to try and tire of every country in turn, having left his Norwegian colony in America, where he was understood to have settled himself after the fashion of Shelley's "for ever,"—has turned up, violin in hand, at Vienna. So far as we can understand, his playing has pleased less than it did when its eccentricities were young.—Athenæum.

ORATORIOS.—Handel's Judas Maccabeus was performed June 5, at St. James's Hall, in aid of the funds of the Royal General Annuity Society.

In order to give the fullest effect to the rendering of this great work of Handel, the services of Madame Sherrington Lemmens, Madame Weiss, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Wilby Cooper had been secured, and to these eminent vocalists were added the band and chorus of the Vocal Association, numbering four hundred performers, the conductorship being confided to the experienced charge of Mr. Benedict. Under these circumstances, it is hardly necessary to add, the oratorio was most efficiently executed, and the fashionable assemblage attracted, evidently appreciated to the full the rich musical treat accorded them. The opening chorus, "Mourn, ye afflicted," was sung with a precision and unity of tone that at once spoke well for the training of the large body of voices that had been collected together, and Mr. Weiss, who was in remarkably fine voice, gave the recitative and air, "Arm, arm, ye brave," in his best style. Mr. Sims Reeves infused the fine recitative and air, "Call forth thy powers, my soul," with the force and expression of the true artiste, and, in the second part, rendered "Sound an alarm," magnificently. Madame Weiss attempted to sing the air, "Oh Liberty," but, being unwell, could not proceed, and Miss Dolby and Madame Sherrington Lemmens sang for her. The latter was most efficiently heard in the third part, "So shall the lute and harp awake;" and the familiar trio and chorus, "See the conquering hero comes," was, as usual, the means of fully rousing the responsive enthusiasm of the audience.—Times.

The usual monthly concert of the Cæcilian Society took place on Tuesday evening, 25th ult., the performance consisting of Handel's oratorio Esther newly arranged with additional accompaniments, by Mr. George Perry. The vocalists were Miss Annie Cox, Miss Boden, Mr. J. W. Morgan, Mr. Beardwell, who in their respective parts were much applauded. The band and chorus were on the usual efficient scale, conducted by Mr. J. G. Boardman. Handel's Israel in Egypt will be repeated on the 15th inst.—Mus. Gazette, June 5.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.—The fourth performance of Ella's Musical Union, at St. James's Hall, May 30, exhibited a brilliant assemblage of talent. Besides Rubenstein at the piano, Joachim for the violin, and Piatti for the violoncello, we had Messrs. Blagrove (viola), Howell (contra bass), Barrett (oboe), Lazarus (clarinet), Hauser (bassoon), and C. Harper (horn). The Quintet in E flat (Mozart) was admirably played by the representatives for the piano, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn, and Beethoven's Septet in E flat, deserved the enthusiastic enlogies received. The Grand Sonata (A minor) of Beethoven's, for piano and violin, was rendered most ample justice to, by Rubenstein and Joachim. In the "Titania," Schubert's violoncello solo, Signor Piatti proved himself a perfect master of the instrument, and the exertions, indeed, of the instrumentalists received a large and liberal acknowledgment.—Times.

MISS DOLLY AND MR. LINDSAY SLOPER gave their second concert at Willis's Rooms. Miss Dolby made the present concert prominently distinguished by her magnificent rendering of Purcell's song of "Mad Bess," which, though less known than its companion, "Mad Tom," to the general public, is not less remarkable for its vigorous originality, and broad, bold treatment of the harmony. Her voice rang out in the fine declamatory recitatives with a fullness and roundness of tone which no amount of the Italian inanities with which our native vocalists are so fond of satiating their audiences, could develop or render appreciated. Mr. Lindsay Sloper, by his faultless execution of Mendelssohn's prelude and fugue in E minor, and some delightful selections from some clever compositions of his own, fully sustained his reputation, of being one of the most accomplished pianoforte executants we possess. In Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 102), for piano and violoncello, he was ably assisted by Signor Piatti, and in Haydn's trio in G major, by Mr. Henry Blagrove's support in addition.—Ibid.

BIRMINGHAM TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL.—This great musical event is already exciting general interest. The committee of management have fixed Tuesday, the 31st of August, and the three following days, for holding the festival. The Earl of Dartmouth has accepted the office of president; and the proceeds arising from the meeting are to be applied, as on all former occasions, to the benefit of the General Hospital. This will be the twenty-seventh celebration of the Birmingham Festival, which, from small beginnings, three-quarters of a century ago, has grown into an unrivalled musical position, and is looked forward to by all interested in the progress of music as the most refined undertaking of a similar nature throughout Europe. The preparations for the forthcoming festival will be on a scale of grandeur and importance befitting the occasion.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

The Wanderer. Schubert. 20

A new edition of this celebrated song, carefully revised and corrected, with German words added.

Come into the Garden, Maud. John Blockley. 35

One more musical treatment of Tennyson's exquisite "Serenade." Lovers of Vocal Music will find it somewhat difficult to make their choice from the three arrangements of Balfe's Blockley's, and J. C. D. Parker's.

Row, row, homeward we go. Spörle. 30

A charming evening Song on the water when the moon is up and a light breeze just rippling the silvery sea. The title page has a fine lithograph, representing Rhine boats, at nightfall, making for the shore.

Day is past. Song and Chorus. E. R. 25

Be what you seem to be. Song. Montgomery. 25

Gather Flowers in the Spring. Song. Hime. 25

A rover I've been in realms afar. Song. Hatton. 25

True heart's constancy. Song. " 25

Ever of thee. Ballad. Foley Hall. 25

A Bouquet of light, pleasing Parlor songs, by good English authors.

Away with care. Ballad. Avery. 25

A pretty song, with melody so joyous, that, once sounded, it will be sure to chase away the sorrows, whose removal it advises.

Keep thy heart young. Song and Chorus. Parish. 25

Banish those clouds of care. Song. Marquis. 25

Fresh, light, and spirited.

Homes of England. National Song. Blockley. 25

A strain of a pompous, stately character, of much musical merit, and altogether well calculated to please those who are interested in the subject.

Oh, tell me what transport. (Un moto di gioia.) Mozart. 25

One of the Series of Mozart's Songs in Dr. Wesley's adaptation to English words. These adaptations of Wesley's are made with the object in view of affecting a complete transplantation of the best of Mozart's operatic airs from the stage to the parlor and fireside. Any allusions to incidents of the play occurring in the text have been erased, and only the general character of each individual piece has in every instance been scrupulously maintained. In this respect they form a valuable selection for the amateur, who in the text will with pleasure feel and recognize a fine and musical taste, instead of being bored by a mere bungling translation.

SEMINARY CLASS BOOK OF MUSIC.—Designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, &c., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfeggios, and a Copious Selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. White and T. Bissell. 50

An improved edition of this valuable work has been issued, in which the suggestions of those well qualified to judge of what is wanted in our Seminaries and High Schools have been acted upon, and the result is a volume of music with suitable instructions, in every particular adapted to the use of those for whom it is intended. The Elementary Studies are simple, and arranged with a view to a progressive, thorough attainment of the Art of Vocal Music. The Solfeggios are mostly taken from the best masters, and are arranged for two or three Soprano voices. The Songs, Duets, and Trios are partly original, and partly selected from the best compositions of the day. The Songs and most of the Duets have a piano accompaniment, and the Trios may be sung by two Sopranos and a Bass. The selection of words has been made with much good taste, and the volume closes with a choice collection of sacred pieces.

The Orchard.

(From the Crayon for July.)

They shall not pass, the blossoms of sweet May,
Till I have sung how sweet they were to me.
Their gentle breath perfumed the buoyant day,
And won me like an odor-loving bee.

We turned aside and climbed the orchard wall,
And passed beneath the spreading apple trees,
Where every bough and bloom was musical
With the deep murmur of rejoicing bees.

We climbed the rock, the orchard trees above;
Below us breathed one snowy bank of bloom.
One soft, low hum of industry and love,
One large embracing air of rich perfume.

The bustle of that insect multitude
Harmed not the issue of the perfect flower:
But here was room for all, and all was good,
Even the calm musings of that idle hour.

And ever as that fragrance floated up,
And ever as the blossoms scattered down,
We like the bees drank from Spring's brimming cup,
And hived a honey which was all our own.

For budding May to us a blossom is,
Where we can gather food for future hours,
Storing our hearts with those dear memories
That far outlast the time of bees and flowers.

Spinning.

By ADELAIDE ANNE PROCTER, (Daughter of Barry Cornwall.)

All yesterday I was spinning,
Sitting alone in the sun;
And the dream that I spun was so lengthy,
It lasted till day was done.

I heeded not cloud or shadow
That flitted over the hill,
Or the humming-bees, or the swallows,
Or the trickling of the rill.

I took the threads for my spinning,
All of blue summer air,
And a flickering ray of sunlight
Was woven in here and there.

The shadows grew longer and longer,
The evening wind passed by,
And the purple splendor of sunset
Was flooding the western sky.

But I could not leave my spinning,
For so fair my dream had grown,
I heeded not, hour by hour,
How the silent day had flown.

At last the grey shadows fell round me,
And the night came dark and chill,
And I rose and ran down the valley,
And left it all on the hill.

I went up the hill this morning
To the place where my spinning lay,
There was nothing but glistening dewdrops
Remained of my dream to-day.

Mrs. Smith and Elizabeth.

(From the "Brown Papers.")

"How that woman has changed!" was the remark I made to myself after my first call since my return to Hildale upon Mrs. Smith, the mighty Mrs. Smith, the blustering Mrs. November Smith — her that was Lily Jones. It was not that she had descended into the vale of years, as some one expresses it — that her more than three-score years had recorded themselves legibly upon her strong form and features; there was nothing note-worthy in that. Nor had my remark reference to the apparent social position in which I found her. True, she lives in one of the best houses in the village — that one with the front built upon the pine-plank-Parthenon-pediment-principle, which has usurped the place of the old Foster House, down the street; whereas, she and Smith began their married life in the little red house, with hardly room enough to turn in, especially upon washing days when, in addition to the cooking stove and Smith's cobbler's bench, she had her tubs and kettles about. She received me with rather more dignity and ease of manner than I expected; but, knowing the adaptability of the American character to change in social position, I was in no degree surprised at it. The utter absence of caste feeling in our northern states, arising from our republican institutions and democratic habits of thought and feeling, is at the bottom of this; and the humble, uneducated mechanic, as he rises gradually in political life and social position, generally finds means to attain the necessary culture to do himself credit, however prominently he may stand out above the general level of the public. The awkward country youth, unable to speak a half a dozen consecutive phrases grammatically, and not knowing what to do with his hat or his hands in the presence of the village 'squire and his family, will in time do the honors of a chief magistrate's parlor gracefully, and command the respect and even admiration of listening Senates. With the women this adaptability is still greater, and the coarseness of the uneducated country girl — when not in the grain, and an essential part of her character — will in time give place to dignity and ease, and often, even to elegance of manner.

My earliest recollections of Lily Jones are of a tall, masculine young woman, a loud, decided talker, a boisterous laugher, one whose manners were pervaded with an indescribable something, which filled my little, fluttering self with an indefinite feeling of fear — I see now that it was but the natural, involuntary shrinking of an extremely sensitive child, used only to kind and gentle words at home, from a rude and strong nature — the instinctive drawing back of the sensitive plant from contact with one whose caresses even might crush.

Later, I remember her as the hard-featured, strong-minded woman, the notable house-wife, ruling her house-hold, Smith, and all, with autocratic sway — the terror of school-mistresses in general, and Susan Bedloe in particular. Smith, in those days, was a non-entity, and his obedience and deference to his wife's opinion upon all subjects, was a standing joke in the neighborhood. "I asked Mr. Smith, and Mrs. Smith, says she," was the inevitable introduction to all his expressions of opinion.

I smiled the other Sunday, as he came into church, smoothing his top-knot down over his weazen, dried-apple face, just as he used to thirty years ago, and ushered his wife into Pew No. 2, with precisely the same motions as into the cheap corner pew, they occupied in their day of small things.

Mrs. Smith is a representative of a class of women peculiar, I take it, to our country, but common enough here. I suppose every New England village has its Lily Jones. I imagine, too, that in no country so many men are made — and ruined, too, for that matter — by their wives. When young, she was ambitious, but not belonging to the Deacon Jones family, over the river, she had to depend upon herself entirely for any rise in life. Marriage was an indispensable starting point. It was necessary as the fulcrum upon which to plant the lever. But the spring-time of life was gone, the summer was passing, and Lily Jones, was Lily Jones still.

So she took Smith the cobbler; he certainly never took her. When the girls, her intimates, rallied her, she laughed with them. "True," she would say, "Smith isn't a very good man, but he is a great deal better than nothing, and I guess we shall hoe our row as well as the best of you, and come out ahead of some of you — we'll see."

Smith was, in the language of the old ladies, "a good sort of a man enough, but shiftless." He was weak and easily led; rather liked to loiter about the tavern; was apt to keep his customers waiting; would promise everything and perform when he felt so disposed.

Lily put a stop to all this, and was shrewd enough to do it without hen-pecking and spoiling him. She taught him to think her a sort of vicarious over-ruling Providence, especially provided for him. She took entire charge of the domestic economy, saved the cents as well as the dollars, and when the small farm of the Fosters came into the market, she ordered her husband to buy it. "Where is the money to come from?" asked Smith. "Bid it off," said she, "the money will come," and it did.

This was the first great step. Once fixed in the Foster house, Mr. Smith developed new qualities. What butter she made! How fresh the eggs always were which she sold to the inn-keeper or sent to market! Her husband was elevated to a shop of his own, and took an apprenticeship or two, and she began to be one of the 'powers that be' in the village.

In process of time the manufacture of shoes for distant markets grew up in the neighboring towns, and Smith the cobbler became Smith the manufacturer, — in a small way, it is true, — but it was no small step onward and upward. Coarse and unrefined his wife remained in feeling and manners, and her remarks were often the cause of general merriment among the people of Hildale, but she would live respectably, and while practising the closest economy, no one ever accused her of meanness. There was even a certain generosity in her character — which sometimes exhibited itself in the queerest manner. But what a blusterer! Truly, Mrs. November Smith!

A time came when the old Foster-house was too plain for her, and as pine-plank Partienons, were just then the exquisite ideal of our carpenters and architects (so-called), she had one erected on the site of the old dwelling, a foot wider and higher than the Doctor's, which, until then, was considered the finest house in the village, and into this she came with new furniture, and I do not know what all; remarking that now she was fixed to her satisfaction, for not one of her old friends could show a better place to live and die in than she.

I was far away, when the grand culminating point in the rise of the Smiths was reached, and could hardly trust my eyes as I read in a Boston paper, in the list of representatives chosen to the Massachusetts Great and General Court:

"Hildale, Jabez Smith, Esq., Whig." But so it was.

What did surprise and puzzle me, as I left the house at the close of my call, was the strong impression left upon my mind, that Mrs. Smith was a beautiful instance of mild, gentle, calm and serene age. Can a leopard change his spots? thought I. Had her life been one of trial and misfortune, bearing her down until she was compelled to look beyond earth for comfort, to lean upon an invisible arm for support; had long-continued ill-health broken her strong spirit, or had any great misfortune fallen upon her with crushing weight, the change in her would have caused no surprise. But nothing of the kind had occurred. Not only was she enjoying the fruits of her good judgment and economy, but she had settled her "Dolphus and Dorindy" — two ill-conditioned, bullet-headed abominations of my boyhood, reared upon strong scolding and "clips 'side o' the head," but now very respectable young people — in life, the one as a "shoe boss," in the other village; the other as wife of the principal village merchant, and they were "getting on famously."

What could have wrought the change?

Walking by the river the other day, I came to the rock whence the people in the neighboring houses cast all their rubbish into the water. The last spot where one would look for anything beautiful; yet, rising from the bottom, its roots fastened among potsherds, old tin vessels, bones and stones, I saw a beautiful water-lily floating and expanding its petals upon the dark water to catch the morning sunbeams, and exhaling its delicious fragrance to the frogs and turtles. This is no phenomenon; but I can never cease to wonder, when in a family, like the Smiths, I find a delicate, gentle, refined being in strange contrast to all the rest—a single fragrant flower, in a bed of mulleins and thistles.

Elizabeth Smith is such a flower. She is our prettiest girl, and does not seem to know it. It is one of the joys of my life now to chat with her; nor do I weary of hearing her mother talk of her by the hour, with tears in her eyes. Lizzy, as the neighbors call her, is the phenomenon, but there is no mystery to me now in the change in her mother.

The appearance of Elizabeth, after an interregnum of some eight years from the birth of Dorinda, was as much a surprise to the Smiths as to the neighbors. She was a weak, puny infant, and claimed a degree of attention from the mother, which was uncalled for by the two robust, muscular little animals, abounding in life and dirt and temper, which had preceded her. As she grew apace, she was a delicate little creature, quiet and still, who by her odd ways, as Mrs. Smith called them, oft-times put her mother completely at fault.

"I declare, I don't know what to make of the child," said she to me, "I might cuff and clip the other children all day long, and no damage done; but this little chit, looking up at me so timidly with her half-frightened blue eyes, when she had done anything out of the way, — I was actually afraid to touch her. It seemed to me, a box upon the ears would dissipate her like a suds-bubble. When but two or three years old, she would shrink and quail at my loud, harsh tones of voice, and look so pitiful, that I could never find it in my heart to scold her for anything."

Mrs. Haynes, who lives next door, has told me of the interest with which she marked the singular relations between the mother and child, and the struggle in the former between the instincts of maternal affection and her imperious nature, strengthened as it was by the habits of all her life. The presence of the child operated at all times as a restraint upon her; and yet it annoyed her, that the good-natured, kind simplicity of her husband caused the little one early to prefer his caresses and caresses to her own. Though oft-times a relief to her to be free from the timid, shrinking glance of those little eyes, it nevertheless mortified her to see the evident delight, with which the child made herself ready to "go away with father."

Though feeble, and a constant source of anxiety to the parents physically, the child possessed a sharp and quick little intellect, which was really out of the common way. As she grew older she became naturally habituated to her mother's ways, and it became a question as to their final effect upon her character. There was a craving within her for something, which neither father nor mother could give. Her nature required something kindred to it, and this want was supplied, when at the age of four years she was sent, as her brother and sister had been, to Susan Bedloe's school. Susan's warm heart, so rich in all refinement and affection, opened to the child its modest portals, and she entered in and dwelt there. The change in the child during the first year was so striking as to attract the notice of all who knew her. Her eye gained a new expression, losing much of its timidity and a certain restlessness, which was strange in one so young. The small, childish intellect was no longer occupied so exclusively, with the rough and fearful caresses and torments wantonly inflicted by her brother and sister, who, being incapable of conceiving her extreme sensitiveness, often caused the child to cry at really well-meant efforts to contribute to her amusement. Her neat little figure and features filled out and became very graceful and pretty. But between mother and daughter still remained that invisible wall of separation, the natural dividing line between two natures so diverse in character. The strong-minded autocratic woman felt it and struggled against it more and more. It became a settled though secret sorrow with her, that Lizzie's eye should speak to Susan or the widow Bedloe in a language so different from that which it addressed to her own mother. As I said, there was deep down in the heart of the rough Lilly Jones, now Mrs. Smith, a fund of kindness and sympathy, but crusted over by long habits of independence, and by the necessity which she had felt of fighting her own way in life. How, oh how could she open this fund to her child? How form a magnetic connection between their hearts? How conquer that expression in the child's face? When would Lizzy look into her eyes with that confident, fearless, innocent love which now she only bestowed upon her father and her teacher? Well, she could only wait and hope.

One of Susan's daily exercises with her scholars was in singing. She taught them the sweetest melodies then in vogue, and her exquisite taste was not without influence in giving a true direction to the tastes of many of the young people of our village, who, in those days, were little children under her care.

To Lizzy Smith, who at home had heard no attempt at music which had not grated harshly upon her ear, child as she was, the sweet voice of her teacher, singing the beautiful melodies which were formerly the staple of our psalmody, was as a voice from heaven. It may be different with others, but with me the culminating points in the grandest performances of vocal and instrumental music, in the Oratorios of Handel and Bach, the church services of Mozart and Haydn, the operas of Mozart and Gluck, the symphonies and chamber music of Beethoven, are those, in which I am once more filled full to overflowing, and am affected most nearly as I was, in earliest childhood by the Soprano voice singing Effingham or New Sabbath, Mear, Hamilton, Eaton, or Derwent in the Handel and Haydn Collection. When Susan sang, her little pupil was in bliss. It wrought upon her so powerfully at first as sometimes to cause fits of weeping, almost hysterical; and of all enjoyments the highest was soon that of sitting nestled to the kind breast of Widow Bedloe and listening to her and her daughter singing. Thus a year passed away. Susan Bedloe died and was buried, and a terrible void was left in the child's existence; but the event brought about that for which the heart of Mrs. Smith had so long yearned.

"It was not long after the funeral," said she to me, "may have been three or four weeks perhaps, — at any rate, it was the evening after the head-stone was placed, that I missed Lizzy, then just five years old. I sent out Dolph and Dorindy to find her and finally went myself. After hunting all over the village, one of the children told me she had seen her by the burying-ground gate. Now, would you believe it? I found her at Susan Bedloe's grave, spelling out: 'Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God,' and singing meanwhile: 'Sister thou wast mild and lovely.'"

"Years afore, if one of the other children had caused me so much trouble, I should have cuffed its ears soundly, and brought them home in a hurry. But I tell you, when I saw that, and heard that little voice singing so pretty — and it all came over me how poor Widow Bedloe must feel, all alone as she was now, with her boys away in the world, and her only daughter lying there under the sods, I broke right down. It seemed to me then, my Lizzy would be another Susan Bedloe, and I thought to myself, why should she and I not be of one heart and one mind as Susan and her mother had been? In this melted mood

I seemed to see myself in a new light, and felt how different I was from the widow, and how little sympathy there could be between the natures of my child and myself. So without speaking to her I went into the burying-ground and sat down on the grass by her. The dear little thing was too busy with her own thoughts to be startled by my coming; keeping her finger upon the letter, she stopped singing, and looking up, quietly asked:

"Ma, why did they bury school-mistress here?"

"Because, poor school-mistress was dead," said I.

"And Lizzy—she go to school to her no more?"

"No. She has gone away, never to come back."

"What, Lizzy baby, do now? Who'll love her now and sing to her?"

"I can't sing to my baby; but I can love her so much! Oh, why should my little Lizzy love the school-mistress more than her mama?"

"At that moment I had such a yearning tenderness for the child,—I do believe I was the bigger baby of the two,—how I longed to have her come of her own accord to my arms! I believe in magnetism myself; for as she looked, she read my feelings. Her hand left the cold stone; her little face changed in its expression, she forgot Susan Bedloe; the old timid look gave place to one of loving trust; she crept up to me, and without a word seated herself on my knees, and nestled herself like a lamb upon my bosom, with her little cheek against mine, her little arms about my neck. And such a feeling of sweet joy and delight sank down into my heart—it was a new experience—it was new life. And so I carried her home, the precious treasure. And after she had eaten her bowl of bread and milk, and I put her in her little bed, she kissed me as never before, and gently whispered, 'dear good mama!' I felt that, I tell you!"

"Widow Bedloe did not last long, you know, after Susan's death, but she never wanted anything I could give her, nor anything I could do for her."

And so mother and daughter became of one heart and one soul.

Still, it was a question, what the result would be in the case of a child of such a peculiar temperament. The influence of the mother must in the end prove stronger upon the child, than the child's upon her, although the delicacy of little Lizzy's health continued to act as a restraint upon the strength and force of Mrs. Smith's natural impulses.

The return of Mrs. Johnson, our music-teacher, to the village was most fortunate for the child. Her high artistic culture, her wealth of genius and refinement, rendered her peculiarly fitted to the task of developing the germs of good in Lizzy.

With her the young girl could satisfy her craving for the beautiful in art, literature and music. When twelve years of age a piano-forte appeared in Mrs. Smith's parlor, and thenceforth music exerted its holy and refining influence upon the family. It is wonderful, what depths of expression, what an all soul-satisfying language lies in tones, to people of a certain mental constitution. Elizabeth Smith, through her feeble and sickly childhood, had suffered unappeasable yearnings for something—she knew not what, excepting in so far as the melodies of Susan Bedloe and her mother had revealed it to her.

Now under the care of Mrs. Johnson, who soon came to love her as her own daughter, and soon had the place in her heart once held by Susan, she passed rapidly through the mere drudgery of overcoming the mechanical difficulties of the instrument, and began to find in music that for which she so long had such indefinite longings.

Her brother and sister married and moved away, and thenceforward she was the ruling spirit in the house. She grew apace. Her health became confirmed. Her form rounded out into the most perfect proportions. Her features became very beautiful, and through them shone the exquisite spirit within, lending them an exceeding radiance.

Now, at the age of nineteen, she comprises in her character more excellences, than any other I have known, save perhaps one.

She is all that Mrs. Johnson ever hoped to make her in her tastes and mental culture—all that her mother can ask as a housewife. At this very time, while keeping up her music and drawing, her knowledge of books and her study of German, she has entire control of the domestic duties of the farm; and I believe she took more pride in the fine butter and cheese she sent me the other day, than in her exquisite performance of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 26, which I often ask her to play.

No, Elizabeth, it is no mystery to me now, that your mother, as she sits in the front-room sewing, knitting or reading her Bible, is such a sweet picture of calm, gentle, serene age.

Michael Von Glinka, and Music in Russia.

(Translated from the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung).

MICHAEL VON GLINKA was born, of rich and noble parents, in the year 1804, near Smolensk. The peculiar melodies of his native country—melodies for which he conceived a great affection in his earliest childhood, and which exercised an important influence on his talent and artistic effort—floated round his cradle. We do not know who was his first musical instructor; he was eighteen when he took piano-forte lessons from Field, in Moscow. It was to this master of the good old school that he owed the elegant and expressive style for which he was distinguished in his early years.

Favored by birth and fortune, Glinka at first cultivated music simply as an amusement. His happy talent suggested melodies and songs, in which a fine artistic feeling was apparent. Dilettanti spread them abroad, and music-sellers soon hastened to publish them. Adolf Henselt used some as themes for pianoforte pieces. Glinka, also, wrote several smaller pieces for the piano; they were very successful, especially when he played them himself.

After a somewhat long residence in Warsaw, which he left in consequence of the events of 1830, he obtained permission from government to go to Italy. He remained several months in Vienna, and then proceeded to Venice, where, also, he stayed some time. In Milan he published Italian canzonets, pièces de salon for the piano and stringed instruments, on themes from Bellini and Donizetti; a septuor (serenade) for piano, harp, horn, bassoon, viol, violoncello, and double-bass, on motives from Ama Bolena; an original sextet for piano, two violins, viol, violoncello, and double-bass, and several variations and dances.

The year 1833 was spent by Glinka in Naples, where he delighted the saloons by his pianoforte playing and songs, which were sung by Ivanoff, then in the full possession of his magnificent tenor voice.

In the year 1835, Glinka was once more in St. Petersburg. A great alteration had taken place in him. He had previously cultivated music simply as an amusement, but he now looked on it as a serious pursuit. He felt his inward vocation as an artist. The warm desire to prove this vocation to his native country by a grand composition, induced him to take the resolution of writing an opera. He naturally selected a Russian subject, Life for the Czar, at which he worked several years with industry and love. In 1839 the opera was produced in St. Petersburg, and enthusiastically received; in fact public opinion instantly raised the author to the rank of the most celebrated composers. The Imperial Court had interested itself in the production of this national work, and nothing was neglected to put it on the stage in the most brilliant manner. The natural son of Field, Leonof, a tenor and an excellent musician, a lady, Mad. Stepanowa, educated in France, and known in Paris under the name of Verteuil, and the bass Petrof, sang in the opera. The choruses and orchestra were good, and the whole was directed by Signor Caves, a talented Italian musician.

This opera was followed by a second, a grand opera in 5 acts, Russian and Ludmilla, adapted for the stage, from a poem by Puschkine, founded on the earlier history of the Grand Prince of Kiev. It was very well received, although it did not achieve the extraordinary success of the first, a success principally caused by the libretto and the story. His countrymen were, however, unanimously of opinion that the two scores rendered Michael Glinka the greatest Russian composer of the time.

After the success of these works, Glinka again obtained permission to travel abroad. He went to Spain, and, on his way thither, visited Paris, in the year 1845. He was forty years of age, but known to no one, with the exception of a few virtuosi, who had been in Russia. He gave a concert, with full band, in the Salle Herz. He could not raise a chorus. This was greatly to be regretted, since the choruses play a very prominent part in his operas, and he was compelled to limit himself to the performance of a Scherzo in the form of a waltz, grand Cracovienne, a fantastic march from Russian and Ludmilla, and a few songs. Hanmann, and Leopold von Meyer, also, played at his concert. The public then heard, at a concert given by H. Berlioz, a rondo from the opera of Life for the Czar, sung by Mad. Solowska (Verteuil), and a grand piece of ballet-music from Ludmilla. The result did not come up to the composer's expectations. The Russian words, and the want of a programme to explain the various situations, prevented the public from understanding them. In addition to this, the romantic and, it must be owned, somewhat monotonous character of the music did not please the French; and, as they had just read in Cuvine's book on Russia, that "the national opera of Russia is a horrible drama in a magnificent house," the general public felt bored, while musicians objected to certain peculiarities, and reproached the composer for having introduced pieces of such small proportions to a Parisian audience.

Although a kind notice appeared in the Gazette Musicale, Glinka was deterred by his little success from further efforts. He left Paris, and retained all his life a very unfavorable opinion of the judgment of the French in musical matters.

In the summer of 1845, Glinka went to Spain. In July, he was at Valladolid, and in October, reached Madrid. The principal object of his sojourn in the Pyrenean peninsula was to collect national melodies. As a man of the world, who despised none of the enjoyments of life, he felt very comfortable in Spain, and spent several years there in the dolce far niente style. His friends considered him lost for art. He resided for a very long time in Madrid; then in Andalusia, and at last, in Cadiz. He did not return to Russia till the year 1852.

He now seemed to pluck up courage once more, and be desirous of devoting himself afresh to the kind of activity for which his inclinations naturally fitted him, especially as the Emperor bestowed on him the management of the Imperial Chapel, and the opera. This post induced him to busy himself with sacred music amongst which there is a mass with a full band. He was putting the last touch to this, when death overtook him in Berlin, on the 15th February, 1857. He was just 53 years of age.

His decease is to be regretted, as far as the progress of music in Russia is concerned. Whatever may be the verdict of posterity on the two great works which were the foundation of his fame among his countrymen, it cannot, at any rate, be denied that his music possesses a highly peculiar character, different from that of the Italian, German, and French schools of any period. Had it been developed by his successors, it might have become a separate artistic form.

Music, as an art, has, indeed, enjoyed only an exotic existence in Russia during the eighteenth and the first quarter of the nineteenth century. A Russian musician, Dimitri Stepanowitch Bortnianski, educated in Italy, had, it is true, about 1769, founded a peculiar and beautiful kind of vocal sacred music, when he re-organized the Imperial vocal chapel, established in the reign of Czar Alexis Michailowitch. Foreign artists and connoisseurs who have heard the singing of this chapel, assert, as is well-known, that it is impossible to hear anything more beautiful, as well for the quality, the wonderful compass of the voices and delicacy of execution, as for the noble, serious and impressive character of the compositions. But to this alone, and to the charming national melodies in the provinces, was all Russian music properly so-called, limited. In the reign of the Empress Elisabeth, an Italian company was invited to St. Petersburg, the Venetian, Galuppi, being the director and court composer. Catherine II. retained this company, and, at various times, had Paësiello, Sarti, and Cimarosa in her service. Sarti, who, from his long stay in the country, had become, to a certain extent a Russian—he possessed a number of estates and serfs, which the Empress and Prince Potemkin had given him, and spoke Russian fluently—was the first who ever composed an opera and a Te Deum to a Russian text. But the music was Italian and nothing more.

After the death of Paul I., the Italian opera was abolished, and Alexander I. summoned to St. Petersburg a colony of French artists, amongst whom were Boieldieu, Rode, Baillot, and Lamare, the excellent violoncellist. French comic opera took the place of Italian opera. Boieldieu directed it, and wrote, also, new works for the theatre. Clementi and his pupil, Field, the pianists, also, were in St. Petersburg at the same period. Before the arrival of these artists, the public of St. Petersburg and Moscow were acquainted only with Pleyel's music. Baillot and Lamare introduced the quartets of Haydn and Mozart, for whom the educated aristocracy were most enthusiastic. The traditions of this epoch were continued by Counts Matthias and Michael Wielhorski, Messrs Lwof, Semenov, Amatoff, and other amateurs. After Boieldieu's departure, Steibelt succeeded him as director of the French opera. He wrote for it Cendrillon and Sargines, and touched up his scores, Romeo et Juliette, and La Princesse de Babilone. He died in the year 1823, just as he was completing a new opera: The Judgment of Midas.

Thus both dramatic and instrumental music, up to about 1825, existed in Russia only as something imported from abroad. It was then that the spirit of creation first awoke in the breasts of a few distinguished lovers of art. Count Michael Wielhorski wrote quartets and symphonies; General Alexis Lwof, director of the Imperial chapel, and a very talented violin player and composer, wrote, in addition to several smaller pieces, and a hymn, which has become the national hymn, two operas: Bianca e Gualitero and Undine, and a Stabat Mater, which is much prized. At the same time, Glinka's talent began to make its way, while Werstowski produced his opera, The Grave of Askold.

A little later, Dargomyski, who, like his artistic colleagues, belonged to the upper classes, and was distinguished as a pianist, published several Russian songs, most of which were very popular. In the year 1848, his opera, Esmeralda, was produced in the national theatre. It is a well-written work, in which we find concerted pieces conceived in a really artistic spirit. Since then, two other operas by him have been brought out, but I do not know the scores. Dargomyski is now 44 years of age. His music differs essentially from Glinka's by its structure, which is more certain and better adapted to the general forms of art at the present day. It is, also, more dramatic and passionate, but less original and less Russian than Glinka's Life for the Czar.

It is well known that, in Anton Rubinstein, a new instance of talent has now sprung up. His original position in society was different from that of his noble predecessors. He would have been compelled to become a soldier, and in all probability, have been lost to art, had not the protection of the Grand Princess Helen assured his destiny. As long since as 1841, he excited, as a boy, admiration by his pianoforte playing, and we all know that, at present, he is one of the heroes of that instrument. Rubinstein has already written for the voice, the piano, and the orchestra. Two operas by him have also been produced, but they are youthful efforts, and to be looked upon rather as essays than aught else. [He has composed, likewise, an oratorio.] May he not go astray on his path, and exaggerate certain tendencies, which appear prominently in his works of the present period!

On the whole, Glinka seems to have comprehended, better than his artistic contemporaries and immediate successors, the secret of imparting a national character to Russian music. The choice of his melodies and rhythms, the peculiar forms and harmonious passages, to which he is partial, give his works an impression of originality, and that is their principal merit.

"NATIVE AMERICAN MUSIC."—Here is a description of the real genuine unadulterated article, and with no "Professor" work about it:

This morning, about daylight, an old Sioux was shot while fishing in the Minnesota river. The encampment was soon aroused; the braves, some forty in number, ran down to the river, the squaws and children into the city. A few Chippewas showed themselves on the north side of the river, and the Sioux went to a neighboring ferry and crossed. After an hour's skirmish, the Chippewas retreated, hearing off a number of their band, and leaving four dead on the field—one a chief. The Sioux cut off the heads of their fallen enemies, and returned to their encampment to scalp them at their leisure. Nine Sioux were killed, one or two have died during the day, and several are severely wounded. It is thought the Chippewas will not give it up so, as there is a large party of them.

The body of the chief was cut to pieces, thrown on the fire and burned! After one of the heads was scalped, a squaw, who had lost a relative in the battle took a club and pounded it to a jelly.

The "scalp," as taken by the Sioux, includes not only the part of the head covered with hair, but the skin of the forehead and cheeks to the corners of the mouth. This is stretched in a hoop about two feet in diameter, the ornaments of the ears still in them, and those of the hair or neck fastened in the centre of the scalp. A pole is fastened across, so that it is carried like a banner. The pole, hoop and the flesh side of the scalp are painted with vermilion; the skin, where not covered with hair, is painted blue or some other color.

After a great deal of ceremony in dressing the dance begins. A procession of squaws carries the scalp around the encampment, singing and shouting, the men, meanwhile, beating rude drums made of powder kegs, and making a noise with rattles and every other way they can.

After a while the men stand in a row with their music, the scalp is set up and the dance begins. The squaws arrange themselves in ranks of three or four together, standing so as to form tangents to a circle, about twelve feet in diameter, (the scalp in the centre.)

The drumming begins, and the squaws, by a "half hitch, half jump," go round backwards.

The music, if it may be so called, is in "double time," a light stroke and a heavy one alternately, about forty measures to a minute; the "step" is taken at the heavy or accented stroke. Every one that can get something to beat with, does so. The time is kept very exactly. The singing or yelling, for it is both, is very violent, occasionally a few words in connection are chanted, but generally the only articulate sounds are ho yo, ho yo, the first syllable a violent explosive. The tunes are better than the music; they are frequently so regular in their construction, as to create surprise. I have heard intervals struck truly and repeatedly by the squaws that I have heard practised choirs drill upon for hours, beside the organ, and then pronounce them difficult. One time they have begun as high as the voice can reach, and descend by "diminished thirds" to the low bass tones, and then rises by a similar succession.

They sing until they are tired, and then break off with a kind of bark, like a dog. Some of the squaws frequently accompany the singing with a harsh, guttural "squak," like the note of a wild goose, in the same manner as a "la la" accompaniment in some of our glee books. The most surprising part of all is that it is kept up so long. I have noticed the threats of the men swelled out, the veins turgid, and the eyes look as if starting from their sockets—but still they kept on.

These dances are continued night after night, all night, for months.

A Dirge.

From the San Francisco Pacific.

Is there a ringer in the town can ring a solemn chime?

Let him come toll earth's happiest soul out of this realm of time.

Ring minute bells! their tone best tells how now goes life's employ,
For, straitened here on the bare bier, lies the queen-child of joy.

Toll all this day while Christians pray for hearts now crushed with sorrow!

Toll all this night that has no light, till Phosphor brings the morrow!

Earth, sea and sky! your minstrelsy must marshal for this hour,

Sweet Phosphor too shall chant a true sad dirge in Memnon's tower.

She was the merriest one in mirth, yet truest to a task,

For the same oil sustained her toil that fired her in the masque.

Life was a constant sense of joy, inspired we know not how.

There was no cloud could ever shroud the halo on her brow.

Her sunny hair spread on the air, she danced life's daily round,

E'en in her duty she was Beauty—she was Motion—bound.

The dreaded wand in Azrael's hand has touched her—ah, how still!

She is His slain, none may complain; there's faith, but there's no will.

Ah! wild gazelle named Isabel! how leaden now those eyes!

Whose shooting light starred every night, tho' dark as Egypt's skies.

Peal minute bells! their tone best tells how now goes life's employ,

For frozen here on this black bier lies the queen-child of joy.

They bear her hence! Ho bearers! whence now moves yon ehon plume?

Will ye to-day with such array our Life of life entomb?

Up the long street with muffled feet majestic moves the train,

Oh my heart bleeds! the very steeds seem conscious of the pain.

My heart will burst, my brain be cursed with madness and grow wild,

If by yon vault the pageant halt, to leave this blessed child.

Now toll a knell, and toll it well, with majesty of tone,

For in that train rides Isabel, with them, and yet alone.

Ah dreadful wand in Azrael's hand, this day what hast thou done!

But why complain before his Slain?—the face of Fate is stone.

Stay for one moment, bellman! lo, they kneel upon her sod—

"Ashes to ashes, dust to dust, the spirit to its God."

My blood is chill with agony, my heart with anguish torn,

As I behold to what a cold couch Isabel is borne.

Oh dreadful wand in Azrael's hand, this day what hast thou done!

My tears like rain fall on thy slain; thou hast no mercy—none.

Toll, sad bells, still, and let them fill the night with solemn strain;

This mountain hillow has given her pillow, and thereon sleeps the slain.

Toll minute bells, their tone best tells how now goes life's employ,

Entombed here we leave the dear, dear, dead queen-child of joy.

San Francisco, April, 1858.

A New Biography of Rossini.

(From La Revue et Gazette Musicale.)

It has, at the present day, become the custom not to wait till celebrated men have ceased to exist, in order to write their biography. There would be but little objectionable in such a course, if books of this kind contained merely what was suitable and becoming, and if the writers were always truthful and well informed.

Truthful biographies are not, however, now-a-days the most numerous, but, instead of them, the biographie-réclame ("the puff biographical") and the biographie-pamphlet ("the biography pamphlet") flourish. Men of real merit do not need to have recourse to the former; unfortunately, it often happens that they cannot escape the latter; and the greater the celebrity a man possesses, the more is he exposed to see his acts and words travestied.

Rossini had no need of the puff-biographical; his praises were written by all who, throughout the world and for nearly half a century, have never ceased applauding so many delicious master-pieces of his. As for the biography-pamphlet, he has had to undergo it on more than one occasion, and only a short time since one was printed, in which sentiments and even acts of the most revolting coarseness were attributed to the most polite and well-bred of men—one who possesses in the highest degree the sense of propriety. Such kinds of productions may be allowed to pass unnoticed; they never enjoyed a very extensive influence, the pamphleteers not reflecting that, by endeavoring to run down men of recognized merit, they would only bring themselves into disrepute, supposing they had not long done so already.

The book of which I am about to speak is, without being precisely a pamphlet, more audaciously conceived than all the pamphlets in the world, and I do not think it possible to adduce an example of another such publication, not exactly for what it contains, as on account of the manner in which its contents are presented to the public.

In the first place, we must inform our readers that the first edition of the work, written in German, and, up to the present time, utterly unknown in France, dates from fourteen years back. It has just been translated into French, with the address of Brussels and Leipzig, under the following title: "E. M. CÉTINGER. Rossini: L'homme et l'artiste. Traduit de l'allemand, avec l'autorisation de l'auteur, par P. Royer." It forms three small volumes in 18mo., and opens with an introductory letter, beginning as follows, to Joachino Rossini:—

"Do you remember, glorious maestro, a young German, who in the month of April, 1830, was presented to you in Paris by M. Castil-Blaze, and who brought you—illustrissimo Dio della musica—a whole heap of affectionate remembrances, a little green velvet cap, and a letter of recommendation, on rose-colored paper, from the Signora L. M.—i, of Munich. Do you remember this young man, who soon inspired you with such a feeling of friendship that you gave him a room in your house, a place in your box, and something of which he was much more proud, namely a little corner in your heart? At that time, he who writes these lines had the honor of sitting every day by your side, before the crackling fire on your hearth," &c.

M. Céttinger continues by informing Rossini that he can only gain by being exhibited as he really is, without rouge and without veil.

After such a declaration, addressed to the very person of whom the author is about to speak, who would not feel inclined to accept for gospel all that is asserted in the work? Unfortunately, there is a little obstacle to this. To M. Céttinger's interrogation, Rossini will not reply in the words of the epigram—

"Ma foi, s'il m'en souvient, il ne m'en souvient guère," for the excellent reason that he recollects nothing at all about the whole matter. He never received the introductory letter, the German work, nor the French translation of it. He only heard of all these a few days since; before that period he knew nothing of M. Céttinger.

Will it be said that this is a piece of forgetfulness on the part of Rossini, and that, having known so many people, in different countries, he has forgotten the author of the letter and the work? In the first place, we must bear in mind that Rossini possesses a memory that astonishes all those who come in contact with him; he recollects persons he has not seen for thirty years, and remembers the times and circumstances of his meeting them. But, even supposing he did not possess this precious gift, what man, in the full enjoyment of his faculties, would ever entirely and absolutely forget a person who had lived on terms of intimacy with him, who had lodged in his house, and who had brought him a letter and a green velvet cap from a lady, forgotten like everything else connected with the master? No one, assuredly, will be able to believe such a thing.

The whole story is simply a plan employed by M. Céttinger to sell his book, though I consider a man must be very daring to adopt such a course, at the risk of being almost inevitably convicted of being an impostor.

And now, what is the value of the book itself? Most certainly it is nothing immense; it is a production in which, as M. Céttinger confesses elsewhere, he mixed up fiction with fact, by inventing certain adventures of the most ordinary description, with which he connects Rossini's sojourn in Naples, and in which he makes him figure. M. Céttinger depicts in them the manners and customs of the Neapolitans after a fashion that proves he has not the slightest acquaintance with them.

This circumstance is of no importance as far as our subject is concerned; but what is of great importance is that, in facts purely historical, or, at least, given us as such, M. Céttinger is no better informed. Nor is this all. He expresses himself with regard to Rossini's first wife (Isabelle Colbrand) in a manner the most offensive and unbecoming to the composer to whom he dared to write his introductory letter. Nor does he treat the second any better, a lady whose kindness, amiability, talent, and above all, devotion to her husband, are known to us all.

As for Rossini himself, he is made to write letters and express opinions, which certainly never entered his head, and I would have the reader mark that I am not now speaking of the romantic portion of the book, but of that which is given us as historical. M. Céttinger, while pretending to exhibit Rossini to us without a veil, muffles the composer in a sort of ignoble costume, which, as I can guarantee, does not fit him in the least, and which M. Céttinger might well keep for himself.

But do we find any new information, or any example of interesting appreciation? Not the slightest. Everything under this head is borrowed from Carpanti, or Beyle (Stendhal), another impostor, who gave himself out as a friend of the maestro, and pretended he had lent him a coat.*

All that relates to the general history of music is no better treated. I will not abuse the reader's patience, but will content myself with one specimen. M. Céttinger introduces on the stage Guinault talking to Rameau, to whom he has brought a part of the Gazette de Hollande for him to set to music; now Rameau was five years old when Guinault died. Moreover, the names of the composers mentioned, and tolerably well known, are given incorrectly, etc.

Well, this book has remained utterly unknown in France since the first edition, published fourteen years ago. It then went through two other editions, without the composer who was the subject of it being informed of its existence, and without any one crying out against it. At present, M. Royer, deceived like every one else, has translated it, and will, no doubt, find a great many readers.

Rossini always cared very little for what was said about him, and, in a certain sense, he was very right. In the present case, however, it appeared necessary that one who did not bring him green velvet caps, or letters from ladies in Munich, on rose-colored paper, but whom he is kind enough to honor with his friendship, should protest for him, and not allow matters to go further.

Otherwise, what would be the result? In thirty or forty years' time, M. Céttinger's book would be everywhere quoted as an authentic and irrefutable testimony; it would be said to emanate directly from Rossini, whom the author knew intimately, and, consequently to present the public with the most exact portrait ever traced of the composer of Guillaume Tell. The lines the reader has just perused will, I hope, be a sufficient protestation, and not be without their effect.

ADRIEN DE LE FAGE.

* Rossini happening to be taking a walk in London one day with Mad. Pasta's husband, an individual bows and turns towards them. Rossini does not move, thinking the salutation is addressed to his friend. The latter, who really knew the person, returned his politeness, and then observes to Rossini: "How is it, maestro, you say nothing to your friend, who, when in Italy, lent you a coat for some ceremony or other?" "My friend—in Italy—lent me a coat! Why, I never knew him or even saw him, in all my born days!" Beyle related the fact in a Vie de Rossini. Beyle, as we know, who was afterwards an author of some talent, commenced his career by giving himself out as the author of the Lettres sur Haydn, a translation of the *Haydn*es of Giuseppe Carpani.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Conclusion of the Quartet, following Solo and Chorus, from the Lauda Sion, by Mendelssohn.

The Musical Festival at New York.

Mr. Editor:—I supposed that your regular correspondents in New York would furnish you with a full report of the Festival of June 28th, at the Academy of Music, but as they have not done so, and as it was an occasion quite too remarkable to be passed over in your Journal, I will give you my recollections of its principal features. It seems to have been an effort on the part of the Germans to introduce a new element into their annual summer meeting. In addition to the usual picnic with singing and playing upon brass instruments, in the open air, they determined to unite for the performance of the most classic compositions, and to bring together for this purpose all the best musicians employed in the different theatres and other orchestras of the city. This was most successfully accomplished, and the result was a union of some 250 musicians, thoroughly in earnest and devoted to the best performance of the highest forms of musical art. The indifference of the general public was evidently of little consequence to them. They were absorbed in the work they had undertaken and were determined to execute it to their own satisfaction. This earnestness and esprit du corps was one of the most delightful features of the occasion. You felt, as one of the audience, "fit, though few," very much obliged to them for allowing you to participate in the good time they were having. The empty benches of the Academy could only be accounted for by the excessive heat of the weather, making people instinctively avoid gaslight and crowds, and by the fact that the performance was on Sunday evening. The lower part of the theatre was barely sprinkled with auditors; but up above, the galleries seemed fairly boiling over with a happy crowd of Germans, hanging upon the railings, and displaying costumes of fantastic colors and shapes, and whose enthusiasm was in perfect correspondence with the temperature.

The orchestra occupied the entire stage, except a small space in front reserved for the singers. They formed a compact mass of 60 or 70 feet square. This disposition of the instruments was as bad as possible for the audience, since the open spaces at the sides and overhead absorbed a great part of the sound and prevented its being thrown into the body of the theatre.

The concert opened with the Oberon overture. The conductor, ANSCHUTZ, a thin, nervous, and odd looking person, quickly crossed the stage with the slightest possible obeisance to the audience; and, with a vigorous rap upon his desk, the music began. After the introduction by the horns, a piano passage is taken up by the strings, and then we felt the wonderful force and beauty of this unrivalled orchestra, the more impressive that it did not at once burst upon us with all its power. There was indeed a fullness and richness similar to the open diapasons of a great organ, but of far greater expressiveness; an effort, in short, which only such a body of strings can possibly produce. Anschütz held them well and firmly in hand, and the precision of their movement was quite equal to what we are accustomed to in our orchestra of thirty or forty players. The overture was vociferously cheered, and repeated.

Then we had a male chorus from the "Magic Flute," sung with spirit and exactness, and (like all the German Clubs) the crescendo and diminuendo of a great accordeon, and with the true national coarseness of tone. Then two movements from one of Schumann's Symphonies, led by Mr. BERGMANN. The "music of the future" was well and fairly given, but the audience of the present seemed to hear it without pleasure. Like the pictures of the Pre-Raphaelites, it interested by its strangeness, and by a sort of ugly fascination, but the charm of beauty was wanting.*

How bright the contrast when chorus and orchestra took up "the Heavens are telling." It was like sailing into smooth water after being tossed about in the chopping sea of the German Ocean.

MARETZEK, conducting the march from the "Prophet," was in his element. Its flowing rhythm and thundering harmonies carried all before it.

Of the great feature of the Festival, that for which they must have labored long and well, the immortal NINTH SYMPHONY, I will only say that it was nobly given. Every player and singer entered heartily into the spirit of the work. The wonderful depth and beauty of the third movement was most fully brought out. The chorus, though not large, was carefully drilled and sang with confidence. Even those difficult Soprano passages were well got over, without making the throats of the audience ache by sympathy.

Indeed, notwithstanding the fearful temperate in which all this was done, there was neither fatigue nor discomfort, but interest unflagging to the end.

Finally, Herr Anschütz, who indeed proved himself a conductor of great excellence, and to whom the successful issue of the affair was mainly due, was cheered and pelted with flowers by his compatriots, and the Festival was over. May it be repeated in future years! X.

* When we heard that—not exactly Symphony—but "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" (if we recollect the programme rightly), we did not think its fascination ugly.—EDITOR.

Obituary, not Eulogistic.

We copied last week, under the title of "The Black Opera," from an old number of the Tribune, a sketch historical, and rather eulogistic, of the rise and growth of "Negro Minstrelsy." In the New York Musical Review (Dec. 7, 1854) we read, with greater pleasure, its "Obituary," which, to make the record of this curious antediluvian and Saurian period in our country's musical development complete, we also copy.

Negro Minstrelsy is dead. Draw around its salle bier in tearful groups, ye lovers of Ethiopian absurdities. Ye grave men in city and village who have sought relief from the cares of the day in Sambo's antics and grimaces; ye fast young men and delicate maidens who have perfumed his haunts with Jockey Club and Eau de Cologne, come, yield the tribute of a tear to departed burnt cork and curled horsehair. What! Not one among the thousands who have compromised their respectability for an hour of his jibes and jocularities to follow him to the grave? Alas! not one! The gay crowd ignore his corpse, and pass by on the other side. They have, in the day of his popularity, retailed his jokes, entertained their friends with his trashy if not vulgar effusions, and vitiated public taste by patronizing his plantation caricatures to the neglect of wholesome, improving musical entertainments; but now, not even the peanut boys in the Bowery will admit that they ever affected the banjo or the bones.

Negro Minstrelsy, we repeat, is dead. By this we mean that the characteristic "Ethiopian Melodies" have ceased to sell, and that, though troops of singers continue to blacken their faces, they no longer rely upon African platitudes as an attraction. Henceforth they must depend upon dramatic effect—the performance of burlesque operas, etc. This being the case, it seems a fit opportunity to pass in rapid review the rise, progress, and subsidence of the "negro music" mania that has within a few years past exerted so wide-spread and deleterious an influence upon the musical taste of this country.

About thirty years ago, Way back of Albany, by MICAH HAWKINS, and other songs of a similar character, gained considerable popularity at the Chatham Theatre, in this city. The melodies were simple, and united to the low doggerel words that might very naturally be the effusion of an illiterate but wide-awake and funny negro, were very captivating to the vulgar. In 1831 or 1832, a celebrated clown, DAN RICE, made a great sensation among the Bowery boys by his performance of the well-known negro song, Jim Crow, at the Bowery Theatre. This may, in fact, be considered the inauguration of negro songs. Master DIAMOND soon followed in Jim along Josey; and these songs, spawned in the very lowest puddles of society, at length found their way, like the frogs of Egypt, into places of admitted respectability. On so dark a subject it can hardly be expected that we should be quite precise in reference to dates; but, as near as we can ascertain, concerted negro music was first performed in this city by Dumbolton's Ethiopian Serenaders, at Palmo's, about ten or twelve years since. In 1842, CHRISTY began with a similar style of music in a dance-house in Buffalo, so low in its character that it was several times indicted for being a disorderly house. After travelling about the country, and coming occasionally to New York, he at length settled here, where he has since made a fortune. Dumbolton's Serenaders popularized Rosa Lee, Dearest Mae, Mary Blane, etc., a species of composition more nearly bordering upon respectability than the characteristic negro-songs by which they had been preceded.

DUMBOLTONS troupe went to Europe in 1845, where their African caricatures met with great favor. In 1846, Christy's Minstrels commenced in New York with such pieces as Carry Me Back to Old Virginia, Stop that Knocking, etc. Negro minstrelsy now became the rage all over the country. Troupes of "serenaders," who blacked their faces and made buffoons of themselves, reaped a golden harvest, while the true artist, the educated and refined musician was starving. Success invested even bones and burnt cork with an air of respectability. Fashion sent her cohorts to mingle with the unwashed million at the shrine of Gumbo, and negro sheet-music had immense sales, being found upon almost every piano in the land, grave deacons smiling at its performance, and sentimental Misses pronouncing it "sweet." We have often felt comforted by the numerous and convincing proofs, that "honesty is the best policy." The friends of music have equal cause to rejoice in the evidence deduced from the history of negro music, that it is most profitable to gratify the tastes of the respectable. This accounts for the bleaching process that has steadily been going on in this style of music, observable in the gradual rejection of the plantation dialect, and the adoption of sentiments and poetic forms of expression, characteristic rather of the intelligent Caucasian. This becomes quite apparent when we compare Jim Crow, O Susanna, and other early effusions of the Ethiopian muse, with the later and more popular productions, Old Folks at Home, My Old Kentucky Home, Hazel Dell, etc. The truth is, genuine "negro music" is no longer written; and if it were written, it could not be sold. People have grown tired of its burlesques upon a degraded race, of its vulgarity, its silliness, and its insipidity. Henceforth they will be satisfied only with something worthy of being called music. Taking advantage of this change in public sentiment, BUCKLER'S Minstrels, WOOD'S, and CURISTY'S, have within eighteen months commenced the performance of burlesque operas, and introduced travesties upon "spirit knocking," "women's rights lectures," etc., all indicating that their chief reliance is upon good music, as far as music goes, and beyond that, upon scenic and dramatic effects. The music they sing is Italian, German, English, or American. The mere fact that they continue to blacken their faces alters not its character.

A word in reference to the cause of the negro musical mania and its effects upon the musical interests of this country, and we have done. Its remains may then be wrapped in their ceremonies and toted off to the grave as soon as possible. The success of negro minstrelsy was not an accident, nor yet again a mere mania. There are philosophical reasons why it succeeded and why its day is now over. Its chief elements of popularity were:

1. Its burlesque of the negro character. There is among all classes of the American people a keen appreciation of humor. This feature of negro minstrelsy, together with the interlarded jokes, conundrums, etc., appealed to this love of fun, and at the same time afforded amusement, where amusements were scarce. The humor of Ethiopian caricatures having been exhausted and the jokes become stale, this element has lost its novelty and ceased to be an attraction.

2. The music was adapted to the popular taste, the melody being simple, flowing, and easily caught by the musical ear, while the harmony was of the commonest kind, being confined to the use of two chords, the tonic and dominant. Such common chords sung in tune, (as companies constantly practicing together could hardly help singing,) united with simple melodies and the rhythmic effects produced by the tamborine, banjo, bones, etc., made up an entertainment, so far as the music went, just on a level with the popular appreciation. We say such music "was adapted to the popular taste." We are glad to say it is so no longer. The American people are just emerging from musical childhood—putting away childish things—and are no more to be pleased with such puerilities. Hence the resort of "minstrels" to music of a higher order.

3. These entertainments have always been cheap, thus bringing them within reach of the million. We commend this feature to the attention of concert-givers generally.

Of the general effects of the rage for negro music upon the tastes and musical interests of this country, we think there can be but one opinion. It has degraded Art, diverted attention and patronage from worthy and elevating concerts, and made many a true musician feel that the only road to success was through the purlieus of buffoonery and badinage. It must be admitted, however, that its effect is not wholly bad. The burlesques and comicities connected with these entertainments have drawn in many of the low and vulgar, who have first carried away with them and hummed and whistled and sung the simple airs they have there heard, until at last they have come to demand music worthy of the name. In our general detestation of its musical platitudes and insipidities, let us rejoice that, from the laws of the human mind, it could not exert an influence wholly evil.

No event within the last half century has been fraught with more unmistakable evidence of the progress of music in this country, than the demise of this hybrid between a Bowery clown and St. Cecilia. We exult over its fall and take courage for American Art. Let Negro Minstrelsy be now borne to its grave amid popular rejoicings, the ringing of bells, and the booming of cannon. Let his winding sheet be the unsold copies of Uncle Ned, and let there be buried with him, as the emblems of his departed power, the Banjo and the Bones.

Chicago Musical Review.

Having arranged with the Messrs. Higgins, Brothers, of Chicago, Ill., to supply the subscribers to the "Chicago Musical Review" with our Journal, monthly, until the termination of their subscription, we commence the agreeable duty with the present number. We had expected to place this card under the valedictory notice of Mr. CADY, the editor of that paper; but the document has not arrived; either the mails have behaved badly, or Mr. C. has been unable to write in time. Before sending the next number we trust to hear from him.

We shall be happy to supply the intermediate and back numbers of our Journal to those subscribers to the Chicago paper, who care enough for it to pay the balance of the subscription price. Many will be glad enough to do this, if only for the sake of getting more than fragments of the choice pieces of music that go with our Journal.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We had to fill up a large part of our space this week with old selections, already in type, in order that the printers might gain time and have their "Independence." This has abridged the editorial matter, and crowded out the conclusion of our friend's fine criticisms on the English painting, besides a "Diary," letters from New York, &c.

Our "Diary," Mr. ALEXANDER W. THAYER, sailed from New York on Wednesday, in the good ship "Athena," for Bremen, via London. He will devote the coming year, in Germany—principally in Berlin and Vienna—to the completion of his long expected Life of Beethoven. In the meantime look out for some interesting correspondence from him in these pages.... We had the pleasant surprise a few days since of shaking hands with our Boston tenore, HARRISON MILLARD, who had just returned from London, looking none the worse for wholesome English air and fare.... We are to have a renewal of the "Promenade Concerts" in the Boston Music Hall, commencing next Monday evening, and continuing on Wednesday and Saturday evenings. The Brigade Band, the Germania Band, and Gilmore's Salem Band will play in turn. We hope it will not be all brass!... Of the great monster brass band demonstration on the morning of the Fifth, the Courier reports:

Thirty or forty thousand people assembled upon the great hill of the Common, and perhaps ten thousand more around the enclosed space in which the musicians were stationed. Of all these, possibly the tenth part were able to hear the music. A concert in the open air must always be a failure, when attempted on any large scale. What are eighty performers in the vast infinitude of space? For the few within hearing, the concert was interesting, the concluding piece peculiarly so, as developing certain possibilities of effects novel and stupendous, by the introduction of cannon. The idea is not new, Handel having contemplated it in his time; but no opportunity of observing the result has ever before been afforded here. We may observe in this connection that the musicians played "Hail Columbia" in the usual hurried, slap-dash manner: It is to be hoped they will discover the absurdity of doing so some time. "Hail Columbia" rapidly played is nothing—properly harmonized and rolled forth in stately measure, it is grand. The rest of the concert amounted to nothing particular. "Yankee Doodle" was perpetrated, with extensive solo operations by leaders of the different bands; "Wood Up" was again exhumed from the obscurity in which it ought to be permitted forever to rest; "Washington's March" was murdered; "The Anvil Chorus" was pounded out on eight diseased anvils; "The Star Spangled Banner" came next, to afford a sufficient pretext for the sudden unfolding of the stars and stripes from a temporary flagstaff; then "God Save the Queen," for a similar purpose respecting the development of the Union Jack; afterwards "La Marseillaise," to accompany the unfolding of the tri-color; in turn, "The Russian National Hymn," with a spread of bunting supposed to represent the Romanoff ensign; subsequently "The Turkish March,"—that same old Turkish March—on the strength of which the crescent was revealed from a fifth flag-pole;—ultimately "Hail Columbia," hereinbefore spoken of.

A most valuable addition to our American library of classical Piano-forte music has just been made in the publication, by Messrs. Ditson and Co., of Mozart's SONATAS, nineteen in number, beautifully engraved and bound up in one splendid volume; price, $6.00. . . . The Promenade Concerts in Philadelphia, by Sentz's Germania Orchestra, go on, but are said to have been so far a failure pecuniarily. . . . In Mr. BEXEDICT's annual concert in London the great feature was the performance, for the first time in England, of Pergolesi's Operetta, La Serva Padrona, composed about the year, 1730.

The Worcester Palladium compiles "A Mirror of the times," out of chance reflections in the poets of various notoriety and features of the day; some of them are musical, for instance:

Jenny Lind.

"The angels sang in heaven when she was born."

Longfellow.

A Certain Concert Singer.

"To hear him, you'd believe
An ass was practising recitative."

Byron.

Carl Formes.

"That tall man, a giant in bulk and in height,
Not an inch of his body is free from delight;
Can he keep himself still, if he would? oh, not he!
The music stirs in him like wind through a tree."

Wordsworth.

Verdi's Anvil Chorus.

"This must be music," said he, "of the spears,
For I'm blest if each note of it doesn't run through one!"
The Fudge Family.

Brass Music.

"Twang out, my fiddle! shake the twigs!
And make her dance attendance;
Blow flute, and stir the stiff-set sprigs,
And scurrious roots and tendons.
'Tis vain! in such a brassy age
I could not move a tistle;
The very sparrows in the hedge
Scarcely answer to my whistle.
Oh! had I lived when song was great,
And legs of trees were timber,
And ta'co my fiddle to the gate,
And fiddled in the timber!"

Tennyson.

The Opera at the New York Academy closed last week. GAZZANIGA goes to Europe; and so do BRIGNOLI, AMODIO and GASSIER. Mme. GASSIER, a singer of some fame, will return with her husband in the autumn. . . . Signor PERELLI's opera, "Clarissa Harlowe" has been produced, under his own superintendence, at the Imperial Theatre in Vienna. A letter to the London Times, dated Vienna, June 13th, says: "Signor Perelli's opera, Clarissa Harlowe, has proved a failure, although the music was well sung. Almost the only good things in the opera were 'borrowed' from Donizetti and Verdi." . . . Mlle. TRIENS, the prima donna at Her Majesty's Theatre, who belongs to the Imperial Theatre at Vienna, has been unable to get an extension of her leave of absence, and her engagement in London was to close on the 26th of June. Of course this makes it very improbable that Lumley and Barnum can bring her to the United States next fall.

A Choral and Orchestral Concert was given in Hartford, Ct., last Monday week, under the direction of Mr. HENRY WILSON, assisted by J.G. BARNETT, W. J. BALDWIN, pianist, and other resident talent. The programme was one of the right kind, creditable to all concerned. It included the entire 42nd Psalm: "As the hart pants," by Mendelssohn; Haydn's aria: "With verdure clad" (sung by Mrs. STRICKLAND, with orchestra); Sextet from the "Huguenots"; Air: Batti, Batti (sung by Miss HOYT); Inflammatus from Rossini's Stabat Mater; the overture to Semiramide; "Wedding March," &c. Such a Society will find music in these pages suited to their purpose. . . . In San Francisco the first concert of Mr. LEACH, Mrs. GEORGIANA STUART LEACH, and Miss ANNA GRISWOLD, took place in the first week of June. . . . The Philadelphia Academy of Music has been leased by CARL SENTZ, with his "Germania Orchestra," who will give Promenade Concerts, nightly, through the summer.

Stephenson, the sculptor, has designed a monument to the memory of JOHN HOWARD PAYNE, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," the model of which in clay may be seen at his studio, No. 195 Tremont street. It is an allegorical monument, typical of the character and profession of the deceased.

The London Musical World does not get converted to the piano-virtuosity of RUBINSTEIN. Speaking of the last Philharmonic Concert, it says:

The performance of Weber's Concert-Stück by Herr Rubinstein was just as much a burlesque of Weber as Mr. Robson's Shylock, or Macbeth, of Shakspeare, but without those admirable qualities that place the impersonations of Mr. Robson among the achievements of genuine art. The burlesque of Herr Rubinstein was in no way amusing; on the contrary, it was flat and dull, without a spark of intelligence, without a single happy touch to relieve its intolerable insipidity. We remember no instance of such an amount of presumption, coupled with such an amount of impotence. First, Herr Rubinstein's reading of the Concert-Stück was ridiculously exaggerated; and, secondly, his mechanical powers did not enable him to realize what he had conceived. "What makes it" (said Herr Molière, on another occasion), "that he play quick, if he play not fine?" Now, Herr Rubinstein played quick—uncommonly quick—absurdly quick; but he "played not fine." On the contrary, he missed an abundance of notes, and struck a great many wrong ones in the bargain.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Il Barbiere was performed June 2, with Bosio as Rosina, Mario as Count Almaviva, and Ronconi as Figaro. The reports are enthusiastic. On Tuesday, Il Barbiere was repeated; and on Thursday, Lucrezia Borgia. Auber's Fra Diavolo has been given, with Bosio, Murai, Ronconi, &c.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. The last novelty of which we have accounts, was the performance of Verdi's Luisa Miller, founded upon Schiller's Kabale und Liebe. The cast included Mlle. Piccolomini, Mme. Alboni, Sig. Giuglini, Benvenuto, Vialelli, and others. The singers are praised, but the music itself does not appear to have made a great impression. We are moved to copy what the Athenæum says:

In power over the strongest emotions of grief and pity, Schiller, as a dramatist, has been surpassed by few. The coronation act in 'The Maid of Orleans,' the departure of Max, and the interview betwixt Thekla and the soldier in 'Wallenstein' have a fascination without limit in their force. To think of these passages is to call up a phantom of trouble and dread,—to return to them is willfully to place ourselves on the rack. Nevertheless, the certain, direct, and naked intensity in their passion is sparingly adorned by the graces of a rich poetical fancy; and, hence, it may be, that so few of Schiller's tragedies offer genial scope to other arts besides that of literal stage presentation. If we compare them with 'Romeo and Juliet,' 'Othello,' 'Hamlet,' 'Macbeth,'—even 'Lear,' with its tremendous distress,—their inferiority in suggestion, such as painters and musicians love, will be apparent. None in the list is a more cruel tormentor than Kabale und Liebe. Perhaps it is for this very reason that Signor Verdi, whose demon seems to demand drums ere it can be made to speak, has selected it for the subject of an opera. To ourselves, in its absence of local color and in the monotony of its misery, it appears thoroughly ineligible. Further, that which must happen to every operatized drama has happened to Kabale und Liebe, also in Luisa Miller. The situations are weakened, the passion is diluted: in place of midnight, "black as a wolf's mouth," we have a darkness, foggy and tearful. The rant does not thunder us down—the grief fails to melt us. In this fact, we have another plea for poetry as an element in all subjects for the musical drama, more important than has been admitted. The tragedy is shocking,—the opera was lachrymose and tiresome, save when the actors amused us, without meaning to do such harm.

There is little, from first to last, in the music to reconcile us to the composer. Signor Verdi's overture is a long monologue on a phrase of four bars, not half so expressive as the well-known four bars, "Sara l'alma," in the trio 'Cruda sorte,' from Signor Rossini's 'Ricciardo,' still less as another four, those which open the subject of the stretto to the noble finale in 'Moise.' But that Signor Verdi is not abashed by any amount of platitude, a following hunting choros, exceeding even the "Robber chorus" in his 'Masnadieri,' shows. As regards the solo music, 'Luisa Miller' contains nothing so good as his Settimino or "O sommo Carlo" in 'Ernani,' or his finale in 'Nabucco,' or his quartet in 'Rigoletto,' or his 'Miserere' in 'Il Trovatore.' The heroine might be either Gilda, or Violetta, or Abigaille, for any touch that marks her life or her country. A pastoral introduction, weak if compared with similar things by Donizetti, a waltz-chorus, "Quale un sorriso," again, courageous in its puerility, are the little efforts by aid of which we are to consider ourselves in Germany. The want of local color, however, might be overlooked (in consideration of the maestro's school and country) were there any compensating beauty of melody. Everything that is not trite in the score is unpleasant. In the unaccompanied quartet, for instance "Come celar le smanie," the unisoned passage of seven bars for the four voices, is queer, but unmeaning. The close of the same movement, were it signed by M. Meyerbeer or M. Halévy, would be called French and affected. Exceedingly disagreeable, too, is the choral introduction to the second act, where rhythm is called in to do duty for air. The songs are in the known Verdi patterns, full of fever, empty of feeling. The cabaletta for the tenor, 'L'ara o l'avello,' (for which, by the way, Signor Giuglini substituted another) is, to our liking, the best solo in the opera. Luisa's cavatina, in the last act, 'La tomba è un letto,' with its threadbare staccato theme, has no more of the long sleep of the tomb in it than Marguerite's 'Ah, si j'étais coquette,' in 'Les Huguenots.' The music of 'I due Foscari' was meagre and dismal enough; but the music of 'Luisa Miller,' so far as idea is concerned, seems yet more meagre and dismal. To be just, however, after this wholesale dispraise, we should say, that a disposition may be traced on the composer's part to enrich and to vary his instrumentation, leading him in many passages to eccentricity, in some near invention, and in one or two happy effect.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The programme of the fifth concert was as follows:

Sinfonia in C; Mozart.
Aria (Calvary), Madame Novello.
Overture (Melusina); Mendelssohn.
Concertstück, Herr Rubinstein; Weber.
Sinfonia in C minor; Beethoven.
Recit. and Aria, "Deh vieni," Mad. Novello; Mozart.
Solos, Pianoforte, Herr Rubinstein.
Overture (Anacreon); Cherubini.
Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Mr. Costa's Eli was given for the first time this season on Friday night week. The Hall was crowded to inconvenience. Eli was produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1855, with a success almost unparalleled, and brought out the same year by the Sacred Harmonic Society. Since then it has become a stock piece in the repertory.

CHARLES HALLE'S RECITALS.—At the third and last, on Thursday afternoon, M. Halle introduced another very fine sonata of Clementi (in F. major) his execution of which was beyond all praise. The last movement, a presto, is amazingly spirited, and peculiarly in the composer's marked and individual manner. There were also Mozart's lovely and passionate rondo in A minor and Mendelssohn's extremely difficult Presto Scherzando, besides an early and a late sonata of Beethoven, op. 7, in E flat, and op. 90, in E minor, with the exquisite allegretto in E major, to which Mendelssohn was so partial. The second of these sonatas was played by M. Hallé last year at the Dudley Gallery. The first is not sufficiently often. It is perhaps the most beautiful as it is the most largely developed of the early pianoforte works of the "immeasurably rich master." Chopin's Nocturne in D flat (op. 27, No. 2), with two numbers from the Promenades d'un Solitaire and the Tarantella in A flat, capital specimens of M. Stephen Heller, completed the programme. These could hardly have been performed in a more finished manner.

The Athenæum Exhibition.

It is the familiar experience of critical readers of Shakespeare, that theatrical personations of his great characters generally involve the serious mutilation, if not the complete sacrifice of their most important attributes. Whether in the moral complexity of Macbeth, the diabolism of Richard III., or the metaphysical subtlety of Hamlet, the impressions of the author's conceptions, which are derived from a reading of the plays, are lavishly outraged in the average, and hardly re-enforced in the best stage representations.

Nor is it certain that they have been more adequately interpreted through the medium of pictorial illustrations. The famous Boydell Gallery, howsoever admirable in some respects, rests its fame upon other than Shakspearian merits. Retzsch's outlines are more conventional adaptations, than true inspirations; and John Gilbert throws the power of his fertile brain and the cunning of his hand into the scale of these comedies; so, that, judging out of these I have named, if we would recall the living energies of Shakespeare's grandest creations, we must go to the magical text, along whose lines troop shapes of mighty heroes voicing their cadences to the thoughts they bear.

Among the several arguments against the above conclusion offered by this exhibition, is Madox Brown's "King Lear," No. 93, which, although not wholly convincing, is certainly a most forcible plea.

Passing over with approval his choice of time and incident, as affording that point of repose into which the tender pathos of the drama could be most impressively gathered, and before discussing the real merit of his conception, I would suggest that it is not textually true; that he has not conceived the "fact as it was really likely to have happened, rather than as it most prettily might have happened," which Mr. Ruskin says, the modern Pre-Raphaelite conscientiously endeavours to do, but has warped the natural action of the scene to enhance the effect in his composition. At the risk of seeming hypercritical, I will adduce some proof of this.

Between the order of the Physician, and the lines spoken by Cordelia, which are printed in the catalogue, occurs a passage that seems to have an immediate verbal and dramatic connection with the one quoted as forming the motive to the picture, and to indicate its accompanying physical action with considerable clearness.

For the purpose of awakening Lear the physician orders louder music, when Cordelia, who is anxiously awaiting the event, that she may assure her father of the unabated loyalty of her affection, breaks out in the following invocation:

Cor. O my dear father! Restoration, hang
Thy medicine on my lips; and let this kiss
Repair those violent harms, that my two sisters
Have in thy reverence made!

Kent. Kind and dear princess!

When follows:

Cor. Had you not been their father,
These white flakes, &c.

as quoted in the catalogue.

The above passage demands that Cordelia should be at her father's bedside; and in the transition from this perfect expression of filial love, to that of sorrowful indignation at the unnatural cruelty of her sisters, there is nothing which warrants the artist in removing her to the foot of the bed, and there making a theatrical "point" of her emotions in attitudinized affectation.

There is doubtless abandonment, as there is deep tenderness and strong nature in her grief; but it would naturally express itself as she bends over her sleeping father, eagerly scanning his face, and tracing therein the lines of his mighty passions, and bitter sorrows, which, in her infinite compassion, she marks as scores against her own happiness. It is only when Lear wakes that she steps back, and then bids the physician speak to him, fearing perhaps that he may not welcome her presence, or that its too sudden announcement may endanger the quiet to which she hopes rest and kind treatment have restored him. Thus much for the equivocal "fidelity to truth" in the composition of this picture. Mr. Brown violates the probable physical action of the scene to secure pictorial effect; and at the expense of that powerfully poetic suggestiveness which dwells in natural attitudes, and would be found in the passion-wrecked old Lear quietly sleeping beneath the bending form and tender watchfulness of his child, Cordelia.

I have urged this at some length, because here is a mis-statement of fact, involving also some denial of the poetical capabilities of the subject, incompatible with perfect "truth," and a condition of honest passivity in the receptive process of gathering the total impression of a scene through the aggregation of parts, which necessarily precedes the creative one of imaginative reconstruction.

Independent of this, and other marked deficiencies, this picture is powerfully and rightly impressive. The prostration of Lear is physical, rather than mental, and Cordelia's mingled love and resentment are so subtly expressed as to be recognized only through faith, and patient scrutiny; and yet, we derive from this work a haunting remembrance of a passion which, springing from a hot nature, stirred by foul cruelty, o'erleaped nature, and in a single stride reached a height of demonic sublimity; and then suddenly drooped, with utter exhaustion, into the tender, sad waywardness of grieved, joyless old age; as also of the love of that daughter, whose simple truth of speech won for her a father's curse, which she forgave without forgetting, and who lost her life in restoring him to power, when she had regained his love.

We find a suggestiveness of this, in the sombre tone of color, and the alternating gloom and sunshine of the tent, landscape, and sky. We read it in the profoundly abstracted face of the fool, who stands gazing sadly at the King, and apparently absorbed in the painful retrospection of those swift calamities which he in his strange, untaught wisdom foresaw, but could not avert from the head of his master, and in the loutish face of Kent, kindling with adoration as he listens to Cordelia's recital of love, as loyal as his own, and heightened by a daughter's tenderness; and we hear it issuing as an unearthly symphony from the instruments of that motley group of musicians, accompanied by a low, throbbing undertone, which interweaves itself with the fiercest chords, subduing them with ineffable pathos, and lingering at the close like the serene flush of twilight.

Notwithstanding its incompleteness, the power of the exhibition culminates in this picture, and it is much to be regretted that it has not been detained among us.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Wapping Old Stairs. Song. 25
One of the old, standard English songs.

Thy Loving Call. Ballad. Emerson. 25
A charming love song, quite easy.

The Promised Land. Song. Sloman. 25
Sweet and pathetic, with quite an Italian flow of melody. Rather easy, but in some degree brilliant. Altogether a desirable song, such as will take hold upon a musical ear.

On we come to the sound of the drum. Song. G. H. Russell. 30
Of bold and martial character, with the very air of the camp.

Instrumental.

The First Kiss. Polka. H. Farmer. 50
An unusually pretty Polka, or better, Schottisch. Just the thing to play for a dance in the parlor. The title page is embellished with a fine lithograph.

Juvenile Sonatina. H. Schwing. 30
A little instructive work of much merit, and withal pleasing to the young player. The compositions of this author, mostly written for instructive purposes, bear a strong resemblance to the much lauded similar works of sterling old authors. Teachers who strive to promote a solid taste in their pupils should avail themselves of these efforts of their cotemporary.

Kinloch of Kinloch, and I'm o'er young to marry yet. Transcribed. Wallace. 30
This is a transcription of medium difficulty. The airs, although long known, have never before been put into a form elegant enough to admit them into the boudoir of the refined musical amateur. Wallace's arrangement will gain ready admittance for them everywhere. It removes the wornout and hackneyed touch which melodies of so respectable standing invariably have.

Lago Maggiore Quadrille. D'Albert. 30
The five parts of this Quadrille form a bouquet of airs borrowed from Italian composers. They are not the airs that every body knows and every body is tired of, but some gems, selected from Pacini's, Mercadante's and others' works, which furnish spirited and striking quadrille music. Easy.

Prize Banner Quickstep. With variations. C. Grobe. 25

Fredonia Mareh. " " 25

Hero's Quickstep. " " 25
Easy arrangements of "Melodies of the day." Accessible to players of only little experience.

SEMINARY CLASS BOOK OF MUSIC.—Designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, &c., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfeggios, and a Copious Selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. White and T. Bissell. 50

An improved edition of this valuable work has been issued, in which the suggestions of those well qualified to judge of what is wanted in our Seminaries and High Schools have been acted upon, and the result is a volume of music with suitable instructions, in every particular adapted to the use of those for whom it is intended. The Elementary Studies are simple, and arranged with a view to a progressive, thorough attainment of the Art of Vocal Music. The Solfeggios are mostly taken from the best masters, and are arranged for two or three Soprano voices. The Songs, Duets, and Trios are partly original, and partly selected from the best compositions of the day. The Songs and most of the Duets have a piano accompaniment, and the Trios may be sung by two Sopranos and a Bass. The selection of words has been made with much good taste, and the volume closes with a choice collection of sacred pieces.

I.—November.

The dead leaves their rich mosaics,
Of olive and gold and brown,
Had lain on the rain-wet pavements,
Through all the embowered town.

They were washed by the Autumn tempest,
They were trod by hurrying feet,
And the maids came out with their besoms
And swept them into the street,

To be crushed and lost forever
'Neath the wheels, in the black mire lost,—
The Summer's precious darlings,
She nurtured at such cost!

O words that have fallen from me!
O golden thoughts and true!
Must I see in the leaves a symbol
Of the fate which awaiteth you?

II.—April.

Again has come the Spring-time,
With the crocus's golden bloom,
With the smell of the fresh-turned earth mould,
And the violet's perfume.

O gardener! tell me the secret
Of thy flowers so rare and sweet!—
—"I have only enriched my garden
With the black mire from the street."

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

II. THE PIANO-FORTE VIRTUOSOS.

PARIS, March 25, 1843.

The reigning bourgeoisie have, for their sins, not only to stand old classical tragedies and tragedies, which are not classical; the heavenly powers have bestowed on them a yet more terrible artistic pleasure: namely, that Piano-forte, which one can nowhere now escape; you hear it ring in every house, in every company, both day and night. Yes, Piano-forte is the name of that instrument of martyrdom, with which the fine society of these days is particularly racked and scourged for all its usurpations. If only the innocent had not to suffer with the guilty! This everlasting piano-thrumming is no more to be endured! (Ah! my fair next-door neighbors, those young daughters of Albion, are this very moment playing a brilliant morceau for two left hands.) These hard, tinkling tones, with no natural dying away, these heartless whirring sounds, this arch-prosaic rattling and picking, this forte-piano kills all our thought and feeling, and we become stupid, dull and imbecile. This ascendancy of piano-playing, and indeed these triumphal processions of piano virtuosos are characteristic of our times, and proclaim the victory of machine-life over the spirit. The technical facility, the precision of an automaton, the identification of self with wood and wire, the sounding transformation of the man into an instrument, is praised and celebrated as the highest. Like swarms of locusts come the piano virtuosos every winter to Paris, less to earn money than to make themselves here a name, whereby to reap a richer harvest in other countries.

Paris serves them as a sort of bulletin board, whereon their glory may be read in colossal letters; for it is the Parisian press that proclaims them to the credulous world, and these virtuosos show their shrewdest virtuosity in managing the journals and the journalists. They know how to reach even the most hard of hearing, for men are always men, are susceptible to flattery, love dearly, too, to play the protector's part; and one hand washes the other; the least clean, however, is seldom that of the journalist, and even the cheap retailer of praises is at the same time a deceived blockhead, who gets half his pay in wheedling caresses. People talk of the venality of the press; they are much mistaken. On the contrary, the press is usually duped, and this is particularly the case with it in regard to celebrated virtuosos. For celebrated are they all; that is to say in the puffs which they in person, or through a brother, or through their lady mother, offer to be printed. You can scarcely believe, how abjectly they beg in the newspaper bureaux for the smallest alms of praise, how they cringe and how they fawn.

When I still stood in great favor with the Director of the Gazette Musicale—(ah! by my youthful levity I have joked it away)—I had a chance to see with my own eyes, how subject-like those famous ones lay at his feet and crawled and wagged their tails before him, that they might be praised a bit in the columns of his journal; and of our highly celebrated virtuosos, who, like conquering princess, accept homage in all the capitals of Europe, one might well say in the manner of Beranger, that the dust of Moritz Schlesinger's boots is yet visible upon their laurel crowns. One has no idea how these people speculate upon our credulity, if one has not seen their importunity here on the spot.

In the bureau of the above-named musical journal I met once a tattered old man, who announced himself as the father of a famous virtuoso, and begged the editors of the journal to print a reclame, in which some noble traits out of his son's artist life were brought to the knowledge of the public. The famous youth, it seems, had somewhere in the southern part of France given a concert, with colossal success, and with the proceeds had supported an old Gothic church that threatened to tumble into ruin; on another occasion he had played for a widow who had been flooded out, or for a seventy-year old school-master, who had lost his only cow, and so on. After longer conversation with the father of that benefactor of mankind, the old man quite naively confessed, that his distinguished son did not do so much for him, as he might do, and that he often suffered him to starve a little bit. I might advise the celebrated person to give a concert some day for the dilapidated trowsers of his poor old father.

When one has seen this pitiable sight, he cannot feel indignant at the Swedish students, who expressed themselves rather too strongly against this nuisance of virtuoso-deification, and prepared the well-known ovation for the famous Ole Bull when he arrived in Upsala. The honored hero thought indeed, that they were going to unharness his horses, and was reckoning with composure upon torch-light procession and flowery crowns, when he met a most unexpected good sound honorary cudgelling,—a real northern surprise.

The matadors of this present season were MM. SIVORI and DREYSCHOCK. The first is a fiddler, and as such I place him above the latter, the terrible piano-smiter. With the violinist virtuosity is not entirely the result of mechanical finger facility and mere technics, as with the pianist. The violin is an instrument which has almost human humors, and stands in sympathetic rapproch with the mood of the player, so to say: the least shade of unhappiness, the slightest commotion of the spirit, a mere breath of feeling, finds here an immediate echo; and that comes from the fact, that the violin, being pressed so very closely to our breast, perceives our very heart-beat. This is only the case, though, with artists who actually carry in their breast a heart that beats,—who have in fact a soul. The emptier and more heartless the violin-player, the more uniform will always be his execution, and he can count on the obedience of his fiddle, at all hours, in all places. But this much-praised certainty is after all but the result of intellectual limitation, and the greatest masters have been they, whose playing was not seldom dependent upon outward and inward influences. I have heard no one play better, and also at times no one play worse, than PAGANINI; and I may say the same thing of ERNST. This latter, Ernst, perhaps the greatest violinist of our day, resembles Paganini in his faults, as well as in his genius. Ernst's absence was much lamented here this winter. Signor Sivori was a very tame substitute, yet we have heard him with great satisfaction. Because he was born in Genoa, and perhaps as a child occasionally met Paganini in the narrow streets of his native city, where it would have been impossible to turn out of his way, he has been proclaimed here as his pupil. No, Paganini never had a pupil; could not have one; for the best that he knew, that which is the highest in Art, can neither be taught nor learned.

What is the highest in Art? That which in all other manifestations of life also is the highest: the self-conscious freedom of the soul. Not only a piece of music, composed in the fullness of that self-consciousness, but also the mere delivery of the same can be regarded as artistically the highest, if it only breathes over us that wonderful breath of infinity, which instantly announces that the executant stands on the same free spirit's height with the composer,—that he also is a free man. Nay, this consciousness of freedom in Art reveals itself especially through form, through treatment; in no case through the subject matter; on the contrary we may maintain that artists, who have chosen freedom itself and the struggle for freedom for their subject, are commonly men of limited and fettered soul, are actually not free. . . .

MARCH 26, 1843.

As the most remarkable appearances of the present season I have named MM. SIVORI and DREYSCHOCK. The latter has reaped the greatest applause, and I may truly record, that public opinion has proclaimed him one of the greatest piano virtuosos and placed him on a level with the most admired. He makes a hellish spectacle. You seem to hear not one pianist, Dreyschock, but drei Schock, three score, pianists. As the wind on the evening of his concert was south-westerly, you might perhaps perceive the powerful tones in Augsburg; at such a distance their effect is certainly agreeable. But here, in the department of the Seine, one's tympanum may easily burst when this piano-smiter thunders away. Hang thyself, Franz Liszt, thou art but a common wind-god in comparison with this thunder-god, who binds the storms together like a birchen rod and therewith scourges the sea. The older pianists sink more and more into the shade, and these poor, out-lived Invalids of fame must suffer for it now severely, that they were over-estimated in their youth. KALKBRENNER alone maintains himself a little while. He has publicly appeared this winter, in the concert of a lady pupil; upon his lips still shines that embalméd smile, which we have lately remarked also on one of the Egyptian Pharaohs, when his mummy was unwound here in the museum. . . .

A contemporary of Kalkbrenner is Herr PIXIS, and although he is of a subordinate rank, yet we will mention him here as a curiosity. But is Herr Pixis really still living? He maintains so, appealing at the same time to the testimony of Herr Sina, the famous watering-place visitor of Boulogne, who must not be confounded with Mount Sinai. We will put confidence in this brave wave-compeller, although many evil tongues assure us, that Herr Pixis never really existed. No, the latter is a man, who actually lives; I say a man, although a zoölogist would give him a more long-tailed name. Herr Pixis came to Paris at the time of the invasion, in the moment when the Apollo Belvidere was restored to the Romans and had to leave Paris. The acquisition of Herr Pixis must have been some compensation to the French. He played piano, composed, too, very neatly, and his little musical pieces were particularly valued by the bird-sellers, who teach canary-birds to sing on hand-organs. They have only to hum over a composition of Herr Pixis once to these little yellow creatures, and they catch it on the spot, and twitter it over after, till you are delighted and every one applauds: Pixissime! Since the old Bourbons have left the field, there is no more shouting Pixissime!; the new singing birds demand new melodies. By his outward appearance, the physical man, Herr Pixis still passes for somewhat; he has in fact the biggest nose in the musical world, and to make this specialty the more strikingly noticeable, he often shows himself in the company of a composer of Romances, who has no nose at all, and who on that account has recently received the order of the Legion of Honor; for certainly it was not for his music that

M. PANSEON was decorated in that fashion. They say, that he is to be named Director of the Grand Opera, because he is the only man, of whom it is not to be feared, that maestro GIACOMO MEYERBEER will lead him by the nose.

Herr HERZ belongs, like Kalkbrenner and Pixis, with the mummies; he shines now only through his beautiful Concert Hall; he died long ago, and lately, too, he married. Among the resident pianists here, who now have most success, are HALLE and EDWARD WOLF; but only of the latter will we take especial notice, since he is also distinguished as a composer. Edward Wolf is fruitful and full of verve. STEPHEN HELLER is more composer than virtuoso, although he is also highly honored for his piano-playing. His musical productions all bear the stamp of a distinguished talent, and he belongs already with the great masters. He is a true artist, without affectation, without extravagance; romantic feeling in classical form. THALBERG has been in Paris these two months, but will give no concert himself; he will only play in public in the concert of one of his friends. This artist distinguishes himself to advantage from his pianist colleagues by, I might almost say, his musical deportment. As in his life, so also in his art Thalberg shows an innate tact; his delivery is so gentleman-like, so well-to-do, so respectable, so wholly without grimace, so wholly without any forced air of genius, so wholly without that bullying clownishness which ill hides inward timidity. Healthy women like him. Sickly ladies are not less gracious to him, although he does not claim their sympathy by epileptic onslaughts on the piano, although he does not speculate upon their over-sensitively tender nerves, although he neither electrifies nor galvanizes them; negative, but fine peculiarities. There is but one, whom I prefer to him, and that is CHOPIN, who is, however, far more a composer than a virtuoso. With Chopin I forget entirely the mastery of piano-playing, and sink into the sweet abysses of his music, into the melancholy loveliness of his no less deep than tender creations. Chopin is the great, genial tone-poet, who should properly be mentioned only in the company of Mozart or Beethoven or Rossini. .

Revival of Bach's Music.

[From the London Musical World.]

There are certain phases of musical progress which we believe can find a parallel in no other art. The Bach mania, which very recently has pervaded all classes of the musical community—perhaps even more in this country than in Germany—is one of them. On the 30th of July, 1750, in the 66th year of his age, died the very greatest of "absolute musicians;" and now more than a century later we are beginning to estimate properly his worth.

Herr Richard Wagner, though perhaps the least musical in temperament of all men who have endeavored, through the medium of music, to express outwardly what inwardly moved them, has admirably marked the distinction between the musician per se, and the musician compelled to invite extraneous influences, as aids in the cultivation and promulgation of his art. The author of the Kunstwerk der Zukunft pronounces Mozart to be the greatest "absolute musician;" and here, as in many other places, shows how little he comprehended music in the abstract. A thousand forces acted upon the plastic nature of Mozart, just as a million did upon the still more plastic Beethoven. With Bach it was otherwise: music was his whole being; he revealed himself invariably in music, no matter what he had to say, simple or elaborate, trivial or sublime. Even the orchestral symphonies of Beethoven cannot be compared to the preludes and fugues of Bach, as exemplifications of art wholly independent of other resources than its own. The world of imagination and of dreams suggested endless ideas to Beethoven, to which music gave expression. Like Mozart, he was not only a musician, but a philosopher, a man of the world, and a poet. Not so Bach. Bach was a musician, and nothing more. Whatever impressions he may have received from the exhaustless phenomena of nature were subservient to the art which was his only language. Had it occurred to Bach to write a pastoral symphony, how differently would he have accomplished his task! The song of the nightingale would have formed the principal subject of a fugue, to which the cry of the quail might have made one episode, and the notes of the cuckoo another. These pastoral objects would have been submitted without mercy to every device of counterpoint; while some ingeniously contrived "stretto," towards the end, would have brought the three voices as close together as Beethoven has brought them in the second movement of his immortal symphony. With Bach, however, the nightingale, the quail, and the cuckoo would have been made to etherealize music—instead of, as in the case of Beethoven, music etherealizing the cuckoo, the quail, and the nightingale. Thus Bach was a musician absolutely; for beyond music to him there was nothing; while Beethoven was a musician relatively, since all things in nature ministered to his invention, and helped him in the development of his art. Beethoven might perhaps have been a great sculptor, or a great painter; but Bach could only have been a musician; and for this reason, though profounder men than he have shed glory on music, Bach was still the first of musicians. Listen to the G minor Symphony of Mozart; and then, immediately after, to one of the most finished instrumental pieces of Bach—for example, the violin solo sonata in C, performed with such extraordinary effect by Herr Joseph Joachim, at the last New Philharmonic Concert. Compare the two. The exclamation after each, in one respect, will be much to the same purport. "What a splendid piece of music!" you will say of one; and idem of the other. And yet they are as wide apart as the poles. Mozart's symphony is a poem in music, of which passion and love are the elements. Bach's sonata is simply music—magnificent music, but music without any relation whatever to the outside world, and therefore music which can never possibly have a chance of penetrating to the inmost heart of the crowd that constitutes nine-tenths of humanity.

On the 30th of July, 1750, died the very greatest of "absolute musicians;" and now, on the 19th of June, 1858, we are congratulating our readers on the progressive taste for his works! What there is in Bach's music to have staved off general appreciation for a century, and yet, at the end of that century, to put to the blush all those who had failed to appreciate it, we cannot pretend to say; but it is quite true that the glowing encomiums and unbridled enthusiasm of the initiated were impotent, as years went by, to persuade the majority of the transcendent merits of the Patriarch of harmony. "Patriarch, as much as you please"—was the prevalent admission; "but spare us the infliction." Now things have changed; and, what is most consoling, Bach goes "up" without Handel and the rest going "down." Now, more than ever, the Leipzig Cantor is hailed "Patriarch;" while no one wishes to be spared "the infliction."

The last six months have been especially marked by a continually growing appreciation of Bach's music. The youngest and most gifted of our established pianists, Miss Arabella Goddard, has been playing his fugues, not merely to select circles, but to multitudes, and always with success. The Passion of St. Matthew, backed by the influence and true devotion of Professor Bennett, has obtained its first emphatic recognition in London; and since then, M. Hallé, with "suites" and "partitas," Herr Joseph Joachim, with solo violin-sonatas, and vocal music at Mr. Hullah's concerts or elsewhere, have, step by step, advanced the cause. Decidedly the music of John Sebastian Bach is becoming popular—which, if popularity be its just due, is not a bit too early, seeing that the composer has been dead nearly one hundred years and ten.*

* Bach died eight years before Handel. The two great musicians never met, although they produced their works and earned their fame contemporaneously.

MUSIC IN NEW ORLEANS. — A lively correspondent of the Musical Review, who was in the Crescent city previous to the close of the operatic season there, writes as follows:

I attended a Sacred Concert, given in the Catholic church, and led by the kindest conductor I ever saw. He not only put the chorus through in enthusiastic style, but stood beside all the solo singers, and beat time for them. As I never saw the like of that before, I was induced to wish his charity might also prompt him to do the singing. Think of such a compliment to soloist and organist, to have the conductor beat time in a public concert!

The French opera is the standing musical institution of the place. The house itself is comparatively small, with scenery which looks like a calico dress washed for the ninety-ninth time; and the other appointments, as though they had become damaged traveling to the pawnbrokers and back. Prima donna, Mad. Colson has been singing here for years, and is very good. Her voice is of a veiled quality, and her execution indicative of study and care. She has the reputation of being a very estimable lady. Mad. Paolo is the second donna, or rather mezzo soprano, possessing a voice exuberant and of gushing freshness. She sings Verdi splendidly. The tenor, Del-agrave, is a little fellow, who acts like a woman, and has a voice very similar to Ceresia; has been (truthfully) "indisposed" for six months, and for which reason he backs down on the high tones, and sickens into falsetto. There is another "oh-summer-night" tenor, with a Dutch tongue, who looks as sweet as sugar; and another ditto, who is a whole team on a fortissimo G or A; but he can't diminish to the lines again without a "break," to save his life. The little baritone sings entirely out of the cigar-side of his mouth, and the big one is flat as a pancake. The basso, Mr. Junca, is "the noblest Roman of them all." He has a physique like our always-magnificent Badioli, ("to memory dear,") and sings nobly. Would you believe it?—Cesare Badioli is unknown down here. Presume the reason is, did not sing French, and therefore never appeared here.

Musicians and Maniacs.

[From Punch.]

The following paper was picked up between St. James's Hall and Hanwell, at the height of the late hot weather:—

I am not mad! I'm but fanatico
Per la musica—"De Lunatico
Inquirendo" no commission
 On my person c'er shall sit!
 No Forbes Winslow, Conolly, Sutherland,
 No mad doctor's inquisition
 To the question shall put my wit.
 I scorn the science of father and mother-land,
 But the art of Italia, Deutschland and Gallia,
 How I revel, how I rage, how I wanton in it!
 Bravo, Brava, Bravi, Bravissimo,
 E' Fortissimo, E' Pianissimo!
 Two Philharmonic Castalias flowing,
 Three Italian Operas going
 Hammer and tongs,
 Trombones and gongs!
 Viola, Violin, Violoncello,
 Clarionet shrill and Saxhorn mellow—
Flauti, fagotti, cembale sounding,
 Kettle-drums clashing, big drums pounding,
 And confusion worse confounding!
 Three Traviatas in diff'rent quarters,
 Three Rigoletti murr'ring their daughters!!
 Three Travatori heheading their brothers,
 By the artful contrivance of three gypsy mothers!
 Verdi in the Haymarket, Verdi at the Lane,
 Green's in Covent Garden and Verdi again!
 Was ever a being so music be-ridden,
 Barrel organ be-ground: German-brass-hand-bestriden!
 What with all the Concerts at all the Halls,
 And the Oratorios—Sampsons and Sauls—
 Mozart and Mendelssohn, Haydn and Handel—
 All lights of the Art in every part,
 From the blaze of the Sun to a farthing-candle!
 And the Classical matinées,
 With Claus's touch satiny,
 That to hear her your heart seems to go pit-a-pat in ye—
 And Halle so dignified, pure, and sonorous,
 And Henry Leslie's amateur chorus,
 And Fair Arabella, so melting and mellow,
 That she charms the stern judgment of Autocrat Ella,
 And Rubinstein,—rapid and rattling of fist,
 That one cries out with Hamlet's papa, "Liszt, Oh Liszt."
 And Piatti, Di Dio, con fuoco, con brio,
 The famed fagottisti, and violinisti,

Superbi, Sublime, Divine Artisti!

Joachim, Sainton, and Blagrove, and Molique,
 Whose famed Stradivariusses,
 Amatis', Gnamariusses,
 Can groan like the chol'ra, and scream like the colic,
 And the aspirants all,
 The great and the small,
 Let loose upon London, to blow, scrape, or squall,
 From Prague and from Paris and Berlin and Brussels,
 With small stocks of brain, but immense power of muscles!
 I breakfast off programmes,
 I sup upon scores,
 I vote my friends foegrums,
 And flats, brutes, and bores,
 Because they object to my musical taste,
 And declare that I'm crazy, and ought to be placed
 In the care of the Court—

The New Play at the Howard Athenæum.

[From the Courier, July 12.]

"Wit shoots in vain its momentary fires." This line of our accommodating quotation suggests thoughts of that truly brilliant and charming play, which, produced at any other time, would have run its full measure of success, but which, coming at so unpropitious a season has only won a fame for the author without adding much, we suppose, to his fortune; that play, the first worthy of a lasting record among American dramatic productions, "The Queen's Heart." The reputation of this comedy was firmly enough established by its first performance, but succeeding representations have added vastly to the favor with which it is regarded by all who have seen it. It was certainly universally welcomed at first with the warmest expressions of approbation, but as, unfortunately, the custom here in Boston is to pour indiscriminate laudations on everything new, the value of this approval was not, after all, of the highest. This very season, at this very theatre, we have seen, for instance, a play literally stolen from French authors, and passed off as original, praised beyond all reason, as a great American work, and praised all the more persistently after the fraud had been exposed; we have seen an indescribably bad three act play,—written by a talented man to be sure, but one lacking the playwright's inspiration,—so bad as to be forever withdrawn on the second night, complimented repeatedly as if in the author a Yankee Scribe had dawned upon the world. While this sort of thing lasts, and it seems likely enough to last a good while, a production of genuine merit has no chance. The hyperbole of panegyric having been long ago wasted on worthless things, what is left for those which are worthy? For this reason, we would endeavor to represent more particularly the real excellence of this new comedy—not forgetting its faults, for it has them, although few, we believe, not easily to be removed.

If the subject of "The Queen's Heart" had been American, we presume every one would have been better pleased. The scene was undoubtedly laid in France, however, on account of advantages in plot thereby to be derived, as well as advantages in lively, piquant and concise forms of expression. Since the author has made his play a French play, he has done it well. The language is thoroughly French, in spirit and in idiom. The first scene, in which that charming letter of Aglae to her mother is read, shows how cleverly this is managed. Charles Reade and Charles Dickens have done the same thing, and certainly not better. By selecting a Parisian plot, too, the author is enabled to put his characters upon familiar relations with each other, noblemen, artists and all, a thing utterly impossible out of Paris, to the discredit of the rest of the world, be it said. And, not the least important consideration, the variety of character among the French affords the widest possible field for illustration. All these things we suppose were taken into account, because all seem to have been improved upon in the play. In these connections, however, it has its shortcomings. The diction is delightfully French, without doubt, and so delightfully French that we are all the more horrified at the introduction of vulgar English and American slang in various places. The laugh which they bring is dearly purchased. What business have "Paphian Lotions, and Holloway's Pills, and the Retired Physician," to occupy the mind of a French villageoise? Was there over a Parisian manager who could eject from his stately mouth a phrase so low as the English "draw it mild"?—or a Gallic comedian, however eccentric, who could circulate an old Knickerbocker joke of "patent back-action," &c., or torture his tongue into such an Americanism as "catawampously into everlasting smash"? We cannot help reminding the author that the success of his comedy will undoubtedly call for a second edition, and then —

So far as characters are concerned, the author has certainly given us two which could not have lived in any other atmosphere but that of Paris. Count Louis, Aglae, Judith, M. Role, Rose Jupon—such are native to any soil you please. But Madame Mondieu and little Aravir (pity his name could not have been his own,) are essentially French—the former in her scheming, serpent-like malignity, glossed over with conventional varnish; the latter in his careless, rollicking gayety, and his hearty good-nature—it is hardly anything deeper. And, to digress a minute, the author has been peculiarly fortunate in the original representatives of these two parts. No special characteristic quality is needed to play the others; but these depend altogether upon the exact spirit with which they are rendered. Miss Morant by culture, and Mr. Owens by nature are precisely fitted to these roles; and the fact that both are in a degree familiar with Parisian life gives them additional advantage. The characters throughout are well drawn, the only error, to our mind, being a want of tenderness and amiability in Miss Aglae, who is oftentimes quite as sententious and severe as the Schemer herself. Two characteristics like these, upon the stage especially, should be more directly contrasted than they appear to be.

It seems a little singular that, while adopting a French plot, the author should have forsaken the French form of dramatic construction, which is unquestionably the best. People may rail at the unities, as fetters to diffusive genius, but the principle of the unities is sound, notwithstanding. When the action of a play, or at least of an act, is confined to one scene, and the time of representation is identical with the supposed time of the events, it is much more easily comprehended, and of course much more enjoyed. But as this was entirely in opposition to the author's plan we must not quarrel with him on this point. It is a little unfortunate, nevertheless, that he should have attempted to compress so many incidents within the limits of three brief acts. We find in the first act a lapse of half a day between one scene and the next; and, by the way of opposite extreme, one short scene is made to cover the representation of an entire play. These things are confusing but not, of course, unjustifiable. The great length of the first act, however, is a serious evil—serious because even the beauty of the dialogue cannot secure the undivided attention of the audience for so long a time—and should be remedied by unsparing curtailment in representation. And now, having exhausted all points of adverse criticism (which the general high character of the play compels), let us at last say what we can heartily and candidly in its warm praise.

There has never been written by any American a comedy with so ingenious, entertaining and satisfactory a plot—and yet the plot is absolutely nothing compared to the language in which it is clothed. The lines are always musical in their smoothness and flowing grace, and often glitter with an epigrammatic sparkle that reminds one of the English comedies of the Restoration—the most pungent and brilliant in the world. Take the manner in which Madame Mondieu's shoulders are personified—"I have known her to play two parts at once, one with each shoulder"—what could be happier? Or the badinage of little Rose—"if one cannot bully one's lover, I don't see the use of keeping one"—this is an irresistible reminder of Congreve's "Way of the World," in which the fine lady says—"one makes lovers as fast as one pleases, and they live as long as one pleases, and they die as soon as one pleases; and then, if one pleases, one makes more." All through the three acts there is a constant play of wit. It is only when the author undertakes a broader humor that he fails. For a specimen of the terse sharp sentences with which the play abounds, take the interview between St. Cyr and Madame Mondieu, at the end of the second act. It is admirable. The situation is even more forcible than that of the second act of "Still Waters Run Deep," which it strongly resembles—not sufficiently, however, to afford the slightest pretext for a charge of imitation.

We have, then, to thank Dr. John W. Palmer for the first great American comedy. The success which "The Queen's Heart" will everywhere secure will probably induce him to continue in the pursuit of dramatic fame. We cannot doubt that he will make his first effort a stepping-stone to higher achievements, and that this experience in writing for the stage will enable him to combine with the fullest effect the literary ability he has shown himself master of, with the complete dramatic effects which here in a few instances are wanting. We shall welcome with pleasure another play from his pen.

Finally, a word of the performance of "The Queen's Heart." Altogether it is as good as even the author could have desired. Miss Morant's part, Madame Epauline Mondien, is the most important, the most difficult, and the most capably played. The Judas-like assumption of honest affection, the deep plottings for the destruction of her victim, and the venomous intensity of baffled hatred are all depicted by her with very remarkable fidelity. Mr. Owens, as Aravir, is as "brisk as bottled beer," and infinitely more exhilarating. If he has done anything so well this season, we cannot at present remember it. His singing of "The little brown man," is perfectly unique. Mr. Owens and Miss Morant should be induced to accompany the play as fixtures, wherever it is performed. The part of Aglaie, in Miss Thompson's hands, is also the best performance of hers that we remember. She is not quite equal to the knitting scene, in the second act, which is a happy idea of the author, and which might be made a great deal of. Miss Carr, as Madame Judith, is comme il faut, and Mrs. Leighton, as Rose Jupon, infinitely better than one would have expected in a role so much apart from her usual line. Mr. Jordan's Count Louis is tasteful, elegant and completely effective—he makes the most of the part; and Mr. Norton, as the wily stage manager, is exactly what is needed. The representation throughout is worthy of the piece.

From My Diary. No. 10.

HARTFORD, JULY 5.—I know not when I have been so much gratified by the musical services in church as yesterday, in Christ Church in this city. The choir consists of eight trebles, two altos, two tenors and five basses, one of each composing the leading quartet.

Miss Clare Hoyt, of Boston, is the soprano. Her voice is clear, powerful, sympathetic and of great compass. She is an uncommonly fine reader and sings with great taste and expression. Miss H. Hodge, the alto, is uncommonly true in her intonation, her voice is sufficiently powerful, and she is also a very fine reader. Mr. Wander, a German, is the tenor, and his voice is in all respects worthy of its place with Miss Hoyt's, being of great compass, and remarkably pure, sweet and beautiful. Mr. Gundlach, also a German, is the bass; his voice is very powerful and full, brilliant and always in perfect tune, and easily runs down to E flat below the staff.

All the members of this quartet are good musicians, but Gundlach a very fine one. He plays organ, piano-forte, and half a dozen orchestral instruments, and his knowledge of musical works is very extensive.

Of these the soprano is the only one, who makes music a profession. The quartette is so admirable that I feel it worthy of these few words.

The rest of the choir are all people of education and cultivated taste, fine readers of music, and lovers of only the best.

With such a force at his command, it is clear that a man of taste and musical culture can have no difficulty in introducing and adequately performing music of a much higher order than we often hear in our churches. This is the case with this choir, which for two years and a half has been under the charge of Mr. HENRY WILSON, the organist. He entered upon his duties, fresh from a year's residence abroad, during which he had become familiar with the music of the famous 'Dom Chor' of Berlin, of the Thomas School at Leipzig, of the Cathedral at Cologne, and the like. Without undertaking to introduce music which, however fine for those cathedrals and churches, would be out of place in our Episcopal worship, he has labored to make his singers and the congregation catch its pure and noble spirit, and by gradually introducing new pieces of even higher and higher character, has proved how comparatively easy it is to teach people to love the best and only that. His choir now find no difficulty in the beautiful psalms and hymns of Mendelssohn, Hauptmann and their school.

Much of the music which they sing is composed or arranged by Mr. Wilson, and to its beauty, taste and high religious character I can testify. Yesterday there was but one composition from his pen, a "Gloria Patri" in fugue style, which was a striking to me as it is evidently a favorite of the choir and congregation.

The chanting is faster than I am used to, and not quite as satisfactory on that account, though remarkably well done.

For the psalm he sings invariably some solid choral. Yesterday, for instance, in the morning, as it was in long metre, it was sung to an arrangement of Luther's "Ein feste Burg," the first stanza being in unison, with a figured accompaniment upon the organ, the second stanza in parts, and the doxology like the first stanza. In the afternoon the choral was one, which he heard sung in Goettingen at a Lutheran church, solemn and grand, two of the three stanzas being also in unison.

With the hymns the case is different. To these he gives music of quite another character; for instance, in the morning, the hymn was sung by the choir to an arrangement of "If with all your hearts" in 'Elijah'; in the afternoon it was a six-line long metre:

"When gathering clouds around I view," &c.

and the music an arrangement of the duet and chorus: "I waited for the Lord," recently printed in Dwight's Journal. This was sung by six voices only, two sopranos, two altos, tenor and bass. I feel justified in recording this—taking the music, the organ accompaniment, the excellence of the voices, the deep feeling, the perfect execution, into consideration—as the finest specimen of hymn-tune singing I ever heard. It was indescribable. Above all else was the charm arising from the fact that it was no exhibition; there was no straining for effect—but those six voices all sang as if they felt every word, and in their tones did but give utterance to the emotions which they felt,—oh, it was beautiful!

The progress which Miss Hoyt has made since I heard her nearly two years since is remarkable. She sang then coldly, but now her clear, ringing voice "has tears in it." Why should we be deprived of her in Boston? If she can sing in the Music Hall as in the Church, she would take rank among our best songstresses.

Here then, I have at length found that ideal choir (almost—for I should like voices enough to sing grand choruses) which I have so often hinted at in Dwight's Journal.

The anthem, chant, motet, sentence, hymn, sung by a thoroughly trained and cultivated choir,—the psalm led off by them in solid choral style for the congregation to join in and add the majesty of multitudinous voices.

Quietly, making no show, striving conscientiously, and with a lofty standard of taste, Mr. Wilson has labored to elevate the music of his church. How finely he has succeeded, what noble fruits have rewarded him, I have endeavored to record.

His exertions are not, however, confined to his own choir. The description, by Macfarren, of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which he found in Dwight's Journal of Music, led him to study that work, and the other—"As the hart pants"—which in Novello's edition is bound with it.

Through his exertions other choirs and amateurs of Hartford joined his own, and the latter psalm was the principal piece given at a concert here last week. He collected an orchestra, rehearsed with the singers, in short, was the Caleb Factotum of the whole affair, and most successful it must have been, if I can depend upon the opinions expressed to me on all sides.

Now all this shows progress—real progress,—and I record it—not to 'puff' Mr. W.—but to encourage others to emulate him.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JULY 6.—It is now no news to inform you that our opera season is over, that the time of Italian singing birds is gone, and the voice of that operatic turtle, Brignoli, is no more heard in the land. The season was short, and disastrous to those peculiarly interested, while to that part of the public, which could stand such preternatural hot weather, it was productive of great enjoyment. Yet it must be said that the public did not exhibit such a noble, salamander-like disregard of heat as to attend in any great numbers; the dead-heads however—those musical Shadrachs, Meshachs and Abednegos, who can endure the caloric of any fiery furnace whatever—were present in large forces and white coats, and fanned themselves with palm-leaf fans and fortitude.

It was my intention to write you an eighteen-pager about the new opera "Sappho," but acting upon my great golden rule: "Never do to-day what you can put off till to-morrow," I procrastinated until my eyes were gladdened by an able description thereof in your journal, taken from the columns of the Sunday Atlas. This description will satisfy your readers better than anything I can give.

"Sappho" is a really great opera, and why its composer is not more generally known here I cannot comprehend. His works—those at least that I have heard—are replete with luscious melody, and remarkably excellent instrumentation. Verdi, Bellini and Donizetti, sound thin and water-gruelly after listening to one of Pacini's operas; at the same time I do not see that he bears any marked resemblance to Rossini, as some critics aver. His chorus writing is rich and full, and many of the choruses in "Sappho" remind one of those in Semiramis, while the favorite duet for Soprano and Alto in the former opera, undoubtedly resembles the Giorno d'orrore of the latter. Yet as a general thing I cannot see that Pacini's music is any more like Rossini's, than Donizetti's, Verdi's or Bellini's. The only reason one can think so, is because Rossini and Pacini are both much greater composers than the three others mentioned.

Last winter I saw Signor Pacini at Florence. The Teatro Paliano was crowded to excess to witness the first production of an opera new to the Florentine public—Elisa Velasco. It was gloriously performed and most enthusiastically received. After the grand finale of the third act, the house resounded with loud cries for Pacini, and soon the composer appeared, led out in triumph by Carlotta Zucchi, the prima donna, and Cresci, the baritone. He is a rather elderly man, thin and gentlemanly, and nervous. He bowed a few times and walked very awkwardly across the stage, treading on the prima donna's dress and the tenor's toes. The whole audience rose to their feet as he passed before them, and made the building re-echo with their cries of Bravo! Bravissimo! There was no speechifying and none expected; the public seemed naturally enough to think that Pacini, the musician, had said all he had to say in the music of the opera, and for that music-speech he now received their heart-felt applause. Their seems to be a difference on this point between the custom here in and Italy. Our American public, when they call out a composer, do so not that they may thank him for the pleasure he has given them, but they may give him the honor of thanking them, for allowing him to try to please. This great and mighty public is condescending. It applauds the good composer, and then expects him to come to the foot-lights and bow, and put his hand on his heart, and say that it is the happiest moment of his life, and that he only hopes and prays and asks that the favor extended to him may be a propitious augury of the spread of Art in this great and glorious country. That is how they do in America. But in Italy, the composer is called out to receive a simple, child-like, grateful ovation. The people wish to thank him, and do not expect that he shall thank them.

The success of "Sappho" will, I think, induce other managers to bring out works of Pacini, and it is very likely he will take in public favor the place now occupied by Verdi—for, say what you will, Verdi is now the greatest favorite with the opera-going public, from New Orleans or Mexico to Boston or Valparaiso. There is no reason why this change in public opinion should not take place. Pacini is a greater composer than Verdi. He has nearly as great a flow of melody, while in his chorus writing and orchestration he is vastly superior. I hope he will live to hear, in his Florentine home, of the success of his works here, for he certainly deserves the gratification which honest appreciation always bestows on the musician. Rossini at Paris, Pacini at Florence—the author of "Tell," and the author of "Sappho!" they appreciate each other and are warm personal friends. The composer who has his home upon the Seine, has long been admired here, and now it is the turn for him who dwells upon the Arno, to meet a like appreciation.

So, with this long sentence, I shall wind up and make my bow, like the infant Phenomenon, standing on my head amid a blaze of fire-works. Curtain falls. TROVATOR.

HARTFORD, CONN., JULY 9.—The Journal can seldom receive a musical echo from this goodly city. An occasional concert by a travelling "celebrity," a flying visit from a Thalberg or a Formes, makes up the little sum of our musical entertainments; and even these great names cannot fill our small hall; a few devotees scattered here and there, with many an hiatus valde deflendus.

But of late a movement has been on foot amongst us which promises better things, and I hasten to chronicle the first efforts of what I trust will be a permanent musical organization. A few professional and many amateur musicians united in giving a grand choral and orchestral concert, last week, and the result was a complete success. Look at the programme:

Overture to Semiramide,	Rossini.
Forty-second Psalm, (complete),	Mendelssohn.
Wedding March,	"
Aria, from The Creation,	Haydn.
Sextette, from The Huguenots,	Meyerbeer.
Aria, from Don Giovanni,	Mozart.
Pianoforte Fantasia on William Tell,	Rossini.
Inflammatus, from Stabat Mater,	"

Here is a varied and excellent bill of fare, showing the wise determination of the management to offer the public nothing but choice music, trusting to its intrinsic excellence to elevate the general taste, and to elicit for this young society its due meed of patronage.

The concert was in all respects a success. Though the night was the hottest of the season, five hundred persons were present to enjoy the treat offered them, and to bid the musical laborers "God speed." The execution was throughout good, in many parts excellent. There were evident, of course, some of the crudities of a first performance; but these did not mar the general accuracy and beauty of the rendering. To the soloists, in particular, much credit is due for the faithful, and in one or two instances, all most faultless execution of their parts.

Mr. WILSON, the organist of Christ Church, acted as Conductor; and it is chiefly to his zealous efforts that we owe this gratifying exhibition of Hartford musical taste and talent. Many of the orchestra, of course, were Germans. No musical movement in America seems to succeed without their invaluable aid.

The success of this concert augurs well for the future, and we may hope that the "Hartford Musical Association" is now a permanent organization, and that many a series of successful concerts shall testify to a growing musical culture amongst us, and to the determination of our good people to cordially second every such true artistic movement.

Three days after the concert was "Commencement Day" of Trinity College. The usual exercises were enlivened by much of the same music, given with the addition of a fine organ, to the delight and satisfaction of all. T. C.

NEW YORK, JULY 13, 1858.—Last evening our Academy of Music was re-opened, by Mr. Ullman's agent, the attraction being Musard with his band. The house has been beautifully fitted up, the stage and parquette floored over, while the orchestra is accommodated on a raised platform near the centre of the building. The place formerly occupied by the stage is decorated with exquisite taste, and forms an admirable dancing floor. Not that people dance at the Musard Concerts—by no means—we are too severely proper, too elegant, too recherché for anything like that. On the contrary we come to a promenade concert, to sit in solemn rows on the same seats we occupied during the operatic season, or to stand in immovable groups, near the musicians, holding our hats carefully behind our backs, to preserve them from undue pressure. A promenade concert in New York is anything but a promenade concert. A few adventurous couples will sail solemnly around in eddying circles, but at the same time with an unpleasant consciousness of being stared at and taken for foreigners. American ladies will not promenade at our promenade concerts.

This awkwardness on our part (for after all it is only awkwardness) will, I fear, militate against the success of the Musard concerts. The music itself, though excellently performed, does not equal in general attractiveness, that of Jullien's band; there are not as many performers, and there is also a deficiency in queer noises, outlandish instruments, and other ad captandum effects, with which Jullien attracted the multitude—and if the popular Jullien did not succeed, we may reasonably entertain fears as to the success of Musard.

The programme for the opening evening was very good, however, and should have attracted a larger audience. There was a fine solo performed on the ophicleide by a M. Moreau, who drew out the most delicious tones from his unwieldy instrument, and the overture to Weber's Oberon was as well performed as I wish to hear it. If the weather were not so fearfully warm, I think that Musard with his pleasant musical entertainments would find at the Academy a pleasant and profitable summer engagement.

At a new concern called the Palace Garden, (because there is no palace anywhere about the vicinity), Mr. Baker, late leader of Laura Keane's orchestra, is giving promenade concerts, in which he certainly "caters for the million," if "novel effects" and "popular melodies" and "negro tunes," and "sleigh ride polkas with bells and whips" can be called catering. To give you some idea of the classical style of these concerts I copy for you the last programme issued;—you will observe, on a careful perusal thereof, that "Mr. Thomas Baker," is not inclined to hide his own light under a bushel—but rather will set it on a table or hang it up in the front entry, that it may give light to all that be in the house:

PROGRAMME OF A GRAND PROMENADE CONCERT

Given under the direction of Mr. THOMAS BAKER, late of Laura Keane's Theatre; formerly leader of Jullien's renowned band; musical director at Niblo's Garden; leader of the first promenade concerts ever given in London, at the Lyceum, under Signor Negri; next under Orsini; then with the celebrated Musard; and now leader of a choice orchestra at the most magnificent Garden ever opened to the public in America. Also, A Splendid Display of Fireworks, by Edge, to-night.

PROGRAMME FOR TO-NIGHT.

1. Overture, "Le lac des fées;" Auber.
2. Comic Polka, "Bobbing Round;" Baker. Composed on the popular songs.
3. Operatic Quadrille, "Etoile du Nord;" Baker. Arranged from melodies in Meyerbeer's grand opera, "The Star of the North." Solos for flute, oboe, blast, cornet, trombone, &c.
4. La Naranjera (Spanish), "The Orange Girl's Song," Schochdopole. Sung by Madame Gazzaniga, at the Academy of Music; arranged for Palace Garden Concerts by T. Baker.
5. Ballad, "The Light of Other Days;" Balfe. From the opera of "The Siege of Rochelle."
6. Music for the Million; a medley, embracing all kinds of popular airs; Baker. Namely: English song, "Villikins and his Dinah;" Ethiopian ballad, "Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground." "Nancy Till," Italian cavatina from Rigoletto, "Donna e Mobile," with cadences for flute and elaronet; American song, "Jordan's a Hard Road to Travel;" Finale, "The Sleigh Ride," accompanied with bells, whips, &c.

1. Operatic selection,—I Puritani,—Bellini. Arranged by Baker. Containing the following gems from that popular opera: Cavatina, "A te o Cara;" Polacca, "Son Vergin Vezzosa;" Duetto, "Suoni la Tromba;" &c.
2. Schottische—The Laura Keane, (by desire,) Baker.
3. Valse—"Love;" Koenig. Arranged by Baker. Duet for two cornets, with distant echoes.
4. National Quadrille—"The Irish;" Jullien. With variations for flute, violin, oboe, blast, &c.
5. Galop—"The Singing Galop;" Lambye. With novel effects.

Conductor, Thomas Baker.

These promenade concerts comprise the entire musical pabulum of the New York public, at the present writing. TROVATOR.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—We give something this time for the gratification of Italian tastes; that naïve little chorus of peasants, which forms such a refreshing and half-humorous interlude in the Sonnambula; always to our mind one of the pleasantest little wayside bits of Bellini's genius, but less generally known, perhaps, than the rest of the Sonnambula music.

Characters of the Different Keys.

Many ingenious attempts have been made to characterize the expression of the various Keys in which music is composed. They are not very satisfactory. To be sure, there are some coincidences among the witnesses. There is no mistaking the broad noon-day, natural expression of the key of C major; the triumphant, martial, hallelujah character of D major; the pastoral serenity of F; the sweet, unsatisfied, vague heart-yearnings (as in the "Moonlight Sonata") of C sharp minor. But what contradictory reports we get of many of the keys! What very various expressions they are all susceptible of, in various ways of using them. Here a correspondent sends us a curious conceit upon the subject, translated from the eccentric German, SCHUBART. The musician recognizes not a little truth in what he says, and finds the whole by no means uninteresting and quite suggestive. Yet how many of his characterizations go against all one's experience! Think, for instance, of his calling A flat major the "sepulchral key!" when in that key are written the Adagio of Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, the Andante and variations of Sonata, Op. 26, &c., &c!

[Christian Frederic Daniel Schubart was born in Suabia in 1739. A child of very little promise, he suddenly developed an uncommon degree of musical talent. At Nuremberg, where he was at school, his taste for Art found ample food, and somewhat later he gave up the study of Theology for that of Music. He led, however, so dissolute a life at that time, that the habits then formed had a ruinous effect upon his whole career. He officiated as organist in various small towns successively, married, and in 1768 was appointed director of music at Ludwigsburg, where he also delivered lectures on Aesthetics. Here his life grew still more unbridled, in consequence of which his wife became deranged, and he was finally imprisoned for his immoralities. Shortly after he was dismissed from his post and exiled, on account of a satirical poem on some influential person at court, and a parody on the liturgy. Subsequently, he edited for some time a journal entitled German Chronicle, but in consequence of the liberal opinions expressed therein, was again thrown in prison, and remained in confinement ten years. Through the intervention of literary friends, he was at last liberated, and appointed Director of Music and the Theatre at Stuttgart, in 1787. Here he published a volume of poems, "Ideas on the Aesthetics of Tone-Art" (from which we imagine the following curious composition to be an extract), and several other similar works. So far as can be ascertained, he never stood remarkably high as a practical musician. He died in 1791. — M. A. R.]

C major, is entirely pure. Its character is that of innocence, simplicity, naïveté, child-language.

A minor; pious womanliness and tenderness of character.

F major; serenity and repose.

D minor; melancholy womanliness, breeding spleen and vapors.

B flat major; cheerful love, clear conscience, hope, longings for a better world.

G minor; dissatisfaction, annoyance, worrying over a frustrated plan, fretful chafing of the bit; in a word, rancor and discontent.

E flat major; the key of love, of devotion, of intimate communion with God; expressing, by its triple signature, the Holy Trinity.

C minor; declaration of love, and at the same time, the lament of an unhappy love. All the yearning, languishing, sighing of the love-intoxicated soul lies in this key.

A flat major; the sepulchral key. Death, the grave, corruption, judgment, eternity, lie in its compass.

F minor; profound melancholy, funeral lamentations, the moans of deepest anguish and yearnings for the grave.

D flat major; a squinting key, degenerating both in joy and sorrow. It can laugh, but not smile; it cannot howl, but can at least mimic weeping: It is therefore only possible to represent very unusual characters and sensations by this key.

B flat minor; a singular fellow, clad mostly in the garment of night. He is rather sulky and rarely puts on a pleasant face. Mockery towards God and the world, dissatisfaction with one's self and everything else, preparation for suicide result from this key.

G flat minor; triumph in difficulties, free breathing on surmounted heights, the vibrations of a soul which has bravely struggled and finally conquered, lie in every application (Applikatur?) of this key.

E flat minor; sensations of vague terror, of the deepest oppression of the soul, of brooding despair, of the blackest melancholy, the darkest state of the mind. Every dread, every apprehension of the shuddering heart breathes from the chord of E flat minor. If ghosts could speak, they would speak in this key.

B major; strongly colored, expressive of wild passions, composed of the most glaring colors. Anger, rage, jealousy, fury, despair, and every freezing sensation of the heart lie within its realm.

G sharp minor; moroseness, a heart heavy to suffocation, lamentation, sighing itself out in the double sharp; violent struggles, in a word, all that costs sorrow and trouble is the coloring of this key.

E major; shouts of joy, laughing pleasure, and yet not quite the fullest enjoyment, lie in this key.

C sharp minor; the pains of joy, intimate communion with God, our best friend, or the companion of our life; sighs of the most unsatisfied friendship and love lie in the compass of this key.

A major; this key contains declarations of innocent love, contentment with one's situation; the hope of meeting again on parting with a loved one; youthful cheerfulness and trust in God.

F sharp minor; a gloomy key; it tugs at passion, like an ill-natured dog at a garment. Grumbling and muttering are its language. It seems almost as if it felt uncomfortable in its situation. Hence it is ever longing for the repose of A major, or for the triumphant happiness of D major.

D major; the key of triumph, of hallelujahs, of war-cries, of shouts of victory. Hence, all inviting symphonies, marches, festival songs, and jubilant choruses are set in this key.

B minor is, as it were, the key of quiet waiting for destiny and resignation to Divine Providence; therefore its lament is so gentle, without ever breaking out into offensive grumbling or whining. The application of this key is pretty difficult in all instruments; hence we find but few pieces which are exclusively written in it.

G major; everything in the style of rural idyls or eclogues, every quiet and satisfied passion, all tender thanks for sincere friendship and faithful love; in a word, every gentle and peaceful emotion of the heart can be admirably expressed in this key. It is to be regretted that, on account of its apparent facility, it is much neglected at the present day. Modern writers do not consider that, in reality, there are no difficult and easy keys; but that these apparent difficulties and facilities depend alone on the composer.

E minor; this key speaks of naïve, feminine, innocent declarations of love; of complaint without murmuring; sighs accompanied by few tears; of hope whose near fulfilment lies in the purest bliss, resolving into C major. As it has, by nature, but one color, it might be compared to a young girl, clad in white, with a bow of rose-colored ribbon in her bosom. From this key we once more return, with inexpressible grace, to the fundamental key of C, in which the heart and the ear find the most perfect satisfaction.

Brass! Brass! Brass!

The "heated term" continues — musically — in spite of East winds. Brass bands have it all their own way. The only concerts are the "Promenade Concerts" in the Music Hall, three evenings in the week, at which there is much timidity about promenading, although not for want of brass. Brass is the fiery dragon left in charge of the whole tone-world, during the summer absenteeism of Apollo and the Muses. But he is not content with literally blowing his own trumpets; he finds "the pen is mightier than the" — ophielied; the Press has tougher lungs than Brass; so he resorts to literary methods; he would fain write as well as trumpet his importance. We have a score of communications from brass bands; and our readers will oblige the writers by perusing a few specimens thereof.

1. The first is a counter-blast, by which our correspondent Mr. "—t—" will please consider himself blown away; — but to return, we trust, with Apollo and the Muses:

EDITOR DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC.

SIR,—In yours of the 26th ult., page 104, a correspondent "t" of your paper writes from New Haven, Conn., about the best Band of Boston, the Germania (on this point I claim the voices of all music professors whose judgment is not by rivalry biased) in a manner that would appear as if this Mr. "t" intended to deprive that Band of the good will and patronage of their friends in New Haven. Would you therefore have the kindness to insert the following few remarks:

This Mr. "t" seems to be all for the "classics," like many other ignorant pretenders who thus impose (in the French sense) on those that are less pretending. See, how he exposes his taste, when he praises a soirée musicale of amateurs, which consisted of eight pieces, for or with Piano-forte; viz: three for piano exclusively, with more or less hands; three for piano and voice, and two for piano and violon. And this homophonous concert I suppose this gentleman considers classical, because there is a Ballad by Beethoven, a piano arrangement of a march by Mendelssohn, and a ditto of a Morceau P'occasion by Weber. In another place the gentleman insinuates as if the Band was deficient in novelties, while he shortly before designates two of their pieces as Musard's newest, (neither happening to be by Musard,) and indeed the piece played instead of the Stradella Overture (from Verdi's Nabucco) he does not know at all! His remarks about J. Eichler not eclipsing Koenig, taken as merely silly, deserve no comment. When a man tries his best to please, other reasonable people will be satisfied. But this gentleman was out of tune with the band ere the concert began, as is further seen by his strictures on the programme generally.

When, however, the band expects an audience of six hundred persons, of which three hundred and fifty are still in days of joyous youth, and two hundred and fifty disposed to recall those happy days on a proper occasion, it would be folly in making out a concert programme to think of nobody but one, two, or even twenty-eight Beethoven-mad hypercritics—not a member of the Germania or of any other Band.

2. The next is a blast from the heart of the old commonwealth, showing that some people can do good things as well as others; only this brass trumpet utters "an uncertain [German-silver] sound."

MR. EDITOR:—Permit me, through the columns of your Musical Journal, to say a word or two about music in the heart of the old commonwealth. Stopping in Worcester, a short time since, I was very much pleased to see the great advance in music within the last few years, especially band music. They have one of the best bands in the State. It is known by the name of "Fiske's Cornet Band," who is the manufacturer of the German silver instruments used by them. It is said, and generally acknowledged, that his instruments are superior to any others now in use. M. Arbuckle, Leader and Director, has no superior in that branch. He commands the love and respect of all. He has the faculty to impart his peculiar and pleasing style to the members of the band, and no description of mine would convey a proper idea of their performance, compared with hearing them. You would be surprised to see the large audiences they nightly draw when they perform upon the balcony of the Lincoln House, or on the stand at Hamilton Square, or as they occasionally call at some private residence for the benefit of those who cannot conveniently go to more public places to listen to their most excellent music, performed with so much skill and taste as to win the admiration of all who hear them.

A TRAVELLER.

3. The next is from the skilful and popular arranger of the Brigade Band music in this city, and explains in notes the great event and triumph of our age, (at least in the opinion of all the boys), the incorporation of artillery into the Brass Band, as stupendously and gloriously illustrated upon Boston Common on the morning of our nation's birth-day. Now is Music quite prepared to carry any Malakoff of "classical" and gentle tastes by storm. We publish it, in spite of our unmilitary tastes. We are not over-fond of guns and drums. The driest, most pedantic musical canon has far more interest to our ears, far more saving grace in it, than all the salvos ever fired from warlike cannons' mouths:

MR. EDITOR:—The music below, marked where the guns of the Light Artillery, (Capt. Nims,) accompanied the bands on the Common, July 5th, shows with what unerring precision the art of firing a salute is brought by practice. The guns were discharged at the instant marked by the conductor's baton, dispelling all doubts held by eminent military men as to the result; a triumph in which, it is believed, that for the first time a battery, or park of artillery, kept perfect time with the music of the band.

Very respectfully,

B. A. BURDITT,
Arranger and Conductor of the Music.
HALL COLUMBIA.

Finally, we see by the newspapers, that Mr. Burditt's novel experiment wrought on the imagination of the Turkish ambassador, or admiral, visiting our city, and that through him he has been commissioned to arrange our national airs for the hand of the Sultan. We congratulate Mr. B. upon the compliment; but we wish the Turk had the monopoly of all the brass music. It has been called "Janissary music" before now, and that is the proper name for it. Julien ought to be grand vizier.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Besides the "Promenade Concerts" mentioned in our New York correspondence, we see announced a three-days' "Mammoth Musical Festival," in Jones's Wood, for August 2, 3, and 4, with "Fête Champêtre," bands, balloons, and what not, under the auspices of Maretzek and Anschuetz. . . . In Cincinnati, the sixth and last Philharmonic Concert was highly successful; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was played. . . . The Worcester Palladium speaks very highly of a private Organ concert given in that city by Mr. George E. Waring, who is a pupil of Mr. MORGAN, of New York; this young man, of scarcely eighteen years, acquitted himself well in an Organ Sonata by Mendelssohn, the Fugues in G and F minor by Bach, the overtures to "Tell and Oberon," a free Fantasia, &c. . . . Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, with her husband and two children, (son and daughter,) arrived in London during the week ending the nineteenth ultimo, with the intention of residing in England for some time. The whole family, including domestics, have taken possession of a neat villa, called "Roehampton Lodge," situated near to the south side of Barnes Common, and about a mile from Putney. The house is in a retired position, and in the immediate vicinity of Putney Common and the picturesque village of Roehampton. . . .

Who has ever thought, says the Athenæum, of a Zealand festival? Yet we see that the dwellers on that quiet and picturesque country (not half enough, as we have often said, appreciated and frequented), have been holding their music meeting at Zierikzee, on the 10th. of June, Handel's "Samson" being the entire work performed, though the programme also comprised specimens by Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn.

The Leipzig Illustrte Zeitung, for June 12, has a portrait, a long and glowing biography, and a short piano composition (his 84th Opus) of our sunny, happy friend, ALFRED JÄLL. . . . LEOPOLD DE MEYER has been concertizing with great éclat in Cracow, in Warsaw, in St. Petersburg, &c., and was recently in Hamburg. . . . TAMBURINI, after all, is not engaged at Drury Lane, and our old friend BADIALI is to play Don Juan. . . . Dr. HARSLEY is dead—one of the patriarchs of English music, and the composer of many famous English Glees. . . . Mlle. TURZEN's congé from Vienna is prolonged, and she will stay in London.

The Athenæum Exhibition.

IX. WATER COLORS.

For the threefold reason, that the pictures in this department rank higher than the oil paintings, in the scale of artistic completeness; that works of such magnitude in this material are comparatively new to our Art galleries; and that there is an intrinsic charm pertaining to the qualities of the pigment, they form the most attractive feature of the exhibition.

We have been so long accustomed to think and speak of the merits of works of Art in water colors, with reference to an assumed feebleness in the medium itself, as a vehicle for Art expression, that the comprehensive excellence of these, and their manifest superiority to the oil pictures in artistic and technical qualities, is a matter of great surprise, and perhaps a too limited credence among us.

In addition to the power of rendering the aerial qualities of skies and distances, which has generally been conceded to water colors, with, however, a limited appreciation of its due importance, these pictures also demonstrate their fitness for expressing all the variety and solidity of natural foregrounds. Some of them are indeed nearly perfect examples of completeness; comprising delicacy of air-tone united with solid realizations of foreground, by gradations of finely-wrought beauty; breadth of masses, undisturbed by the utmost clearness of detail; and a purity of light and shadow, which are scarcely to be found among the other works of this collection, and which should teach us that the limitations of water colors are those of knowledge and skill in the artist only, and that the difference between works of Art in oil and water colors is rather one of kind, than degree of artistic merit.

Since nearly all the pictures here deserve attention beyond the limits of this article, I shall speak rather of general characteristics, and make single words stand for paragraphs of commendation.

In Finch's pictures, we find a very pure vein of feeling for the imported classicism of English landscape. Renouncing truth of detail, form is shown in broadly generalized conditions of stateliness and grace, and embody the sentiment of nature in their beautiful renderings of air, light and space in refined delicacy of tone; especially in the twilights, which perfectly express the diffused and penetrative quality of evening light. In the sense of repose and tranquil joy which comes of the central unity of these idealized compositions, there is an echo of natural beauty which forbids my calling them false.

Much less rightly true are the landscapes by Aaron Penly, who, in his foregrounds, loses the infinite variety of natural form and color, without securing its breadth and unity. The conventionalism of these pictures must have had its origin in indolence or indifference; although, in spite of it, they are interesting as scenes, and contain considerable charm of color in the distances. The "Convict Returned," No. 18, is a very strong, sterling picture by the same, and has I believe, found a purchaser here.

John Burgess, J. N. D. Egville, and G. P. Boyce, furnish spirited illustrations of continental street scenes, and Egyptian ruins, lacking the force of reality, (as perhaps all architectural drawings do?) but full of picturesqueness, sculptured grace, or colossal grandeur, artistic knowledge, and effective treatment of color and light. In No. 55 we have a drawing of Rouen Cathedral, by Samuel Rayner, that seems diminutive when compared with Turner's illustration in the "Rivers of France," within the small compass of which are revealed the sublime proportions and inexhaustible enrichments of its wonderful facade. Yet in the pure blue sky that arches above the summit of this, floating in its cup a sea of sun-lighted, fleecy white clouds, that break and fall away to the brink of the horizon, and linger there on its edge in hazy, luminous beauty, there is a charm that half recompenses us for the loss of architectural solidity and effect. The Convent of St. Amaud, No. 26, by J. S. Prout, combines all the good qualities of the other architectural drawings, adding thereto a reflection of the skill of the elder Prout.

Not the least attractive works in the collection are from the hands of women, (if by preference ladies! they will pardon my choice of words,) who paint nature without the remotest hinting at feminine timidities and the characteristic weakness of the sex. No. 49, by Miss M. L. Oakley, painted from the garden bed with the open sky for a background, is very firm in drawing, vigorous and true in color, and only wants a little feminine refinement, to make it a complete "Study of Hollyhocks." Mrs. Barbara L. Smith presents some powerful effects in composition, somewhat marred by crudity of color; Mrs. Oliver a quiet charm in the grey tones of her "Hargrave on the Thames" and the "Obertahnstein," needing only clearness and distinction of parts in the Welsh "Valley of Conway" to render it, like the others, agreeable and true. The "Killarney Rocks," No. 53, by Miss Fanny Steers, is rich in exquisitely broken lines and color fascinations, and preserves its purity through endless elaborations of washes and stipple, embodying the truth of beauty rather than the beauty of truth.

The "View of Funchal, Madeira," No. 62, by Mrs. Murray, contains the material for a magnificent picture, in the broad expanse of grand mountain-crests, villa-mottled, sloping vallies, reaching to the sea, but the picture is not here. Very nearly good throughout, it nowhere reaches the expression of life. Mrs. Criddle's sentimental "Celia," No. 64, has sufficient beauty of color to redeem its insipidity of subject, as have also the finely wrought draperies of Miss G. Farmer's "Mary," to partially excuse the mistake in calling her the "Sister of Lazarus," who would serve as well for Shylock's daughter, or a well dressed match girl.

To preserve the balance of wrong conception, E. H. Corbould plays flippantly with "Faust and Margaret in the Garden," answering our demands for the subtle, moral antagonism of the scene, with a complaisant prettiness in the lovers, and a ninepenny mask for Mephistopheles; yet draping the whole in a veil of consummately wrought color, that partially conceals its defects and gives it a place among the riches of the collection. In "The flight of fair Helen," he has a subject better suited to his ornate fancy, and which he has treated with all the facility of unerring skill.

Madox Brown's "Christ washing Peter's feet," is so much the less a work of true Art as it is one of palpable and puerile affectation. Almost identical in form and posture with Giotto's "Studies of Apostles' Heads," which is to be seen in the Dowse Collection, the head of Christ is necessarily fictitiously conceived in its external relations, and is inferior to Giotto in internal expression. The solid sense of satisfaction visible in the face of Peter, the vacant stare in the countenances of the other apostles, who are inextricably imbedded in the sea of muddy impurity forming the background, and withal the painfully mortal humility of Christ, combine to render this a work which contains neither the power of true knowledge, nor the honesty of ignorance.

Two other contributors have works in each department, both of which exhibit their best efforts in water colors. John Brett finds expression for his Swiss Alps, No. 193, and evinces some sympathy with nature, in its cool, yet not ungenial sky, the firmness of structure, and beauty of modeling in the middle distance, and in the glow of sunlight which suffuses the central group of trees in the foreground. Although mainly very prosaic in color, there is a passage of light in the group above alluded to, that is certainly not surpassed in any other work of the collection.

In the "Righi Lake of Lucerne," No. 33, W. Colingwood Smith combines rare aerial lightness in effects of sky and mist, with great breadth and solidity of foreground, cramping the whole with a slight conventionalism of feeling, but evincing nevertheless a strong mastery of the subtle forces of nature, and presenting us with a most attractive picture—very unlike his "Castle of Chillon," in oil colors.

"The Old Forest of Sherwood," No. 192, by W. Bennett, illustrates much of the stalwart majesty of an open oak wood. With color and form broadly and agreeably massed, and treated with a free, bold hand, it needs only an occasional heightening, or refining touch of color, and some added sinewy force in the tree trunks, to generously fulfil the demands of truth.

In a "Marriage Procession in Cairo," No. 28, Henry Warren brings us into familiar correspondence with the utmost perfection of technical art. Answering all the conditions of artistic completeness required by the subject, it presents its most potent fascinations in the burning light of the Orient which fills the sky, and pours through the street with palpitating intensity, playing in chequered shadows with the network of the jalousies, sharpening with white strokes the tawny cheeks of the stately, bridal company, and at last falls among the rich stuffs of an eastern bazaar, flooding the scene with inexhaustible modulations of color harmony.

Turning from this to No. 81, by Geo. Rosenberg, we find a quiet reach of sheep-cropped herbage, extending with scarcely a surface dimple, from the foreground to the horizon of the picture; above this vaults a cloudless sky, and between the two are grouped the mysteries of "Stonehenge." Blackened, grey stones lying on the scarcely broken green sward, or rearing their rude forms beneath the ungenial light of a cold, blue sky, seem hardly sufficient materials for an attractive work of Art. Yet it is out of these simple elements that love, right perception, and power of expression, have wrought the quiet and enduring charm of "Stonehenge."

The three pictures by P. J. Naftel demand much more than I can now say concerning them. Disclosing acute perceptions of beauty and variety of form and hue, both of earth, and sky; quick sympathies with the commonest aspects, or daintiest inspirations of nature, they each present a subject for the faintest disapproval, and the heartiest eulogy.

Sutcliffe's "Early Spring" combines in a remarkable degree the power of sight and touch. At first astonished, then charmed, I am finally discontented with the incompleteness of this power, that washes in skies and distances with the slovenly ease of indifference, and hangs,—glittering with sunlight,—a marvellously drawn, fresh, budding twig, against a dull, blotched mass of vegetable debris, and traces with consummate delicacy of line and tint, the upspringing, tender fern shoots, as they unfold their palm-like beauty to the beneficent influence of light and air, and imparts a limpid clearness, and sparkling joy to the spring torrent, as it leaps, and toys among moss-cushioned rocks, and runs its way over a yielding bed of living green. I do not complain that this is, only that it is too nearly all.

John Ruskin's "Block of Gneiss" for obvious reasons, challenges elaborate criticism, which, wanting space, the requisite knowledge, and therefore inclination, I shall not give; yet will suggest in passing, that the opalescent hues of this wonderful block test an artist's power of color much less than the simple, grey tones of our mountain boulders; and, that in his rendering of the more quiet tints of sky, mountain distance, and fore-ground trees, there is a lifeless crudity that ill accords with the impressions of natural beauty which we derive from his grandly wrought descriptions, and scarcely warrants the important allusion which he makes to this work in Chap. X. of the fourth volume of "Modern Painters," where it is referred to as forming a complete scene, and not as a mere study of a rock. Without denying its appreciable power and beauty, I will hazard the opinion that it is one of those equivocal essays:

"That palter with us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to our ear
And break it to our hope."

Leaving this, I will make a last pause in the quiet repose of the "Arisaig Country," so beautifully embodied in No. 37, by A. T. Wells. Whether in the photographic clearness of the distant islands, softened in the tender warmth of a cloud-barred sky, that is fretted in broken masses of pearl and azure; the dewy freshness of the blooming heath that flushes the foreground with rosy loveliness; or in the patient, rightly guided toil that reveals the gushing richness and delicate mysteries of color in the weather-stained rocks, and sea-washed, shallow bays at ebb-tide, this picture overflows with the truth and beauty of nature, and is a nearly perfect example of the serene joy of painting.

I have promised a word in review and will add it here, premising that, at the expense of logical completeness, the water colors shall pass harmless, nor be concerned in my present speculations.

We have been told that the English are a genial people, loving nature in open simplicity of heart; yet, in looking for the proofs of this among the productions of this professedly first, unsophisticated, and veracious Art that England has ever seen, we are surprised to find that geniality does not express itself, and the love to be that which worketh in the blindness of fear, rather than that clear-eyed love which casteth it out. The faith of the New School seems cold, and constrained, and, in the name of truth to, unconsciously perhaps, excite the worship of arbitrary fact. We see, then, evinced a strong grasping at the actual, striving without the cheering light of internal truth, but yet, within the limits of this exhibition, it is rarely reached. The intention is all that is expressed, while, in the representation of the subtle qualities of nature, their faith seems soulless, and all their labor vain.

Love of Nature is man's rightful inheritance, and howsoever he may for a time disregard it, or circumstances retard its development, whenever it finds expression, it will recognize the difference between fact and truth, and commit itself to the worship of that which most commands its reverence.

Devotees in the new faith seem to be forsaking the worship of deep, tender skies, tremulous, color-laden atmospheres and broad sunshine, and bending themselves to the fruitless labor of making microscopic geological, or botanical studies, simply because the voice that calls them speaks in the name of truth. Admitting it to be true, that the specific beauty of the simplest object of God's creation is worthy of our love, and is quite beyond our power of adequate Art-reproduction; still, as experience has taught us that we may reach equally approximate degrees of truth in the representation of the noblest, as the humblest elements of natural beauty, the progress which the nearly exclusive devotion to little things in the new Art is said to symbolize, seems somewhat abnormal.

With a strong predilection for the motive of Pre-Raphaelitism, I must confess to considerable disappointment in these practical results. Instead of being naïve, they are only awkward; for unmannered simplicity they present palpable affectations; in the place of geniality, and the warm glow of natural sunlight, we find a painful sense of hopeless solicitude struggling with all manner of uncouthness, white lights, and chilling shadows; and instead of cutting straight into the heart of truth, they file unceasingly away at its circumference, dulling the keen edge of right perception for coming generations, and delaying the day when we shall herald the discovery of absolute Art.

If the true result of modern Pre-Raphaelitism appears in the "Huguenot" let us honor the faith as one born of inspiration. If we are to read it in Madox Brown's "Christ," we will wage a war against it for its falseness—and affectation—so different are the effects of apparently similar causes.

Judging the faith as here interpreted, it lacks a clear expression of idea, and is more likely to mislead, than rightly lead the humble follower; yet, reading its character through these manifestations, guided by no philosophic insight, and aided by an experience which has been neither broad, nor deep, it would not be strange if my conclusion should prove somewhat superficial.

Awaiting the issue of time, we may thank our English friends for the pleasure and instruction which they have afforded us, not omitting the suggestion that, when next they proffer their services as teachers of the resources of the language of Art, they should more fully heed the dignity of their profession, and send us only such examples as they delight to own, thus doubly honoring themselves and us;—so shall we broaden our vision of what the domain of Art contains, still reserving the right to choose that which best answers our own needs and intuitions.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Lovely Flute. Song, with accompaniment of Flute and Piano. Furstenau. 30

This song might be properly called a duet between voice and flute. The dulcet strains of the latter instrument blended with a mellow, rich voice, make most delightful music. Some skill is required on the part of the flute-player. Amateurs, however, who read Forde's arrangements in the "Anima dell Opera," readily, will easily master the flute part. The song is very melodious, and has often, in concerts, obtained great applause.

Fare thee well, and if forever. Song. Phelps. 25

Byron's deeply touching verses will ever remain a favorite subject with the musician. There prevails a melancholy sadness in the present composition, which is quite appropriate to the words. Easy.

A lake and a fairy boat. Song and Quartet. Wood. 25
Light and pretty.

I would that the rose. Duet. Mendelssohn. 30

One of Mendelssohn's best two-part songs, with a new English version.

You say you're not remembered. Song. Baldwin. 25

A simple, plaintive ballad.

Oh, let hope for brighter days. Trio. Stratton. 25

One of the concerted pieces in the Opera of "The Buccaneer." Short and effective.

Instrumental.

Grand Marche Heroique by Gungl. Transcribed by Voss. 50

This is a very full and brilliant arrangement of Gungl's celebrated and widely known "Warrior's Joy March." Voss is acknowledged to be unsurpassed in this kind of transcriptions. They are always melodious, effective and interesting throughout. He does not lose the thread of the whole in meaningless passages, or dull variations; nor does he ever introduce difficulties, which are inadequate to the effect produced. His arrangements of "Long, long weary day," and "Then you'll remember me," may be quoted as well known examples of the beauty of his style. The present transcription is perhaps even more brilliant than either of these, although not more difficult.

Bridal Varsoviennne. Blockley. 25

Silver Lake Varsoviennne. Montgomery. 25

Excellent music for this favorite and fashionable dance. Both of these Varsoviennes have of late been the pets with the English dancing public. They are easy, striking in melody, and express the peculiar rhythm of the dance perfectly.

Brightest eyes. Variations. Grobe. 25

Eclipse Polka. " " 25

Easy arrangements of "Melodies of the day." Well adapted for new beginners.

Planxty Kelly. Flute (or Violin) and Piano. Dressler. 25

GiovINETTE che fate. " " " 25

God save the Queen. " " " 25

Very pleasing and easy for both instruments.

The Reaper's Polka. D'Albert. 35

A very spirited Polka, evidently doing the most effectual service in a hall-room. Not difficult. The title-page represents a very graceful group of youths and maidens among the cornstacks.

Elements of Velocity; 4 numbers, each. Bayers. 50

Intended for the first stages of instruction, where the pupil is rather shy of substantial food unless it is thoroughly sugared. The author has used these studies in his classes, and thoroughly and practically tested their usefulness. They have nothing in common with Czorny's "Studies in Velocity," but might be employed very properly as preparatory exercises to the latter work.

Books.

FIRST STEPS TO THOROUGH BASS, in Twelve familiar dialogues between a Teacher and Pupil. By a Teacher of Music. Price, 50 cents.

This is a book of upwards of one hundred pages, presenting in a very pleasing manner the principles of thorough bass. The author has, by the admirable clearness with which he has laid down the rules and given the reasons for the various combinations of harmony, produced a most satisfactory treatise on the subject. As a text-book for younger classes, it will be found superior to any other prepared for a similar purpose. The author has met with great success in his application of this method of instruction to pupils of ten or twelve years of age, and confidently recommends it to teachers, as an invaluable aid in their labors.

Song.

From the German of HEINE.

As the moon's image trembling falls
On the wild ocean's heaving breast,
While still and calm through heaven's blue halls
She moves above the waves' unrest,

So keepest thou, beloved one,
So still and calm, thy course above,
While in my trembling heart alone
Thy wavering image seems to move.

Thou 'rt like an opening flower,
So good and pure and fair,
I look on thee, and sadness
Steals o'er me unaware,

As though my hands in blessing
Were laid upon thy brow,
Praying that God might keep thee
As fair and pure as now.

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

III. SPONTINI AND MEYERBEER.

PARIS, June 12, 1840.

The Chevalier SPONTINI is just now bombarding the poor Parisians with letters, hoping at one cost to remind the public of his forgotten person. I have a circular before me at this moment, which he sends to all the editors, and which no one will print, out of regard for sound human understanding and for Spontini's old name. The ridiculous borders here on the sublime. This painful weakness, which expresses itself, or rather frets itself out, in the most baroque style, is quite as remarkable for the physician as for the student of language. The former sees in it the sad phenomenon of a vanity, which blazes up in the mind with all the greater fury as the nobler faculties burn out in it; but the latter, the linguist, sees what a delightful jargon arises when a stiff Italian, who while in France has necessarily learned a little French, has further cultivated this so-called Italian-French during a residence of five-and-twenty years in Berlin, until the old gibberish has become oddly interlarded with Sarmatian barbarisms.

The circular is dated February, but was recently sent here again, because Signor Spontini hears that they want to bring out his famous work here again; which is nothing but an accident—an accident which he would improve, in order to be called here. After some pathetic declamation against his enemies, he continues:—

Et voilà justement le nouveau piège que je crois avoir deviné, et ce qui me fait un inférieur (?) devoir de m'opposer, me trouvant absent, à la remise en scène de mes opéras sur le théâtre de l'académie royale de musique, à moins que je ne sois officiellement engagé moi-même par l'administration, sous la garantie du Ministère de l'Intérieur, à me rendre à Paris, pour aider de mes conseils créateurs les artistes (la tradition de mes opéras étant perdue) pour assister aux répétitions et contribuer au succès de la "Vestale," puisque *c'est d'elle qu'il s'agit. This is the only passage in these Spontine marshes, where there is firm ground; here the cunning of the fellow stretches out its long ears. The man wishes to leave Berlin altogether, where he can hold out no longer, since the operas of MEYERBEER have been performed there; and a year ago he came here for a few weeks, and ran about from morning to midnight to all persons of influence, begging them to further his re-call to Paris. As most people here supposed him long since dead, they were not a little terrified by his sudden ghost-like apparition. There was in fact something to make one feel uneasy in the wily agility of these dead bones. M. Duponchel, the director of the Grand Opera, did not admit him to his presence and cried out with terror: "This intriguing mummy may stand off; I have enough to bear already from the intrigues of the living!" Yet had Moritz Schlesinger, the publisher of Meyerbeer's operas—for through this good, honorable soul had the Chevalier announced his visit to Duponchel—volunteered all his trust-inspiring eloquence to place the bearer of his introduction in the best light. In the choice of this introducing medium M. Spontini displayed all his shrewdness. He showed it also on other occasions; for instance, when he talked about a person, it was usually with that person's most intimate friends. He told the French writers, that in Berlin he had arrested a German writer who had written against him. To the French cantatrici he complained about the German cantatrici, who would not accept an engagement at the Berlin opera, without a proviso in the contract, that they should not sing in any opera of Spontini's!

But he is resolved at any rate to come here; he can no longer bear to stay in Berlin, to which city, as he says, he has been banished by the hatred of his enemies, and where still he is allowed no rest. So in these days he writes to the editor of La France Musicale: his enemies are not satisfied with driving him across the Rhine, across the Weser, across the Elbe; they even wish to drive him further, across the Vistula, across the Niemen! He finds great resemblance between his own fate and that of Napoleon. He fancies himself a genius, against whom all the musical powers conspire. Berlin is his St. Helena, and Rellstab his Hudson Lowe. But now his bones must be allowed to return to Paris and be solemnly deposited in that musical Hôtel des Invalides, the Académie Royale de Musique.

The Alpha and Omega of all the Spontini-an complaints is MEYERBEER. When the Chevalier did me the honor of a visit here in Paris, he was

* "And here is just the new snare which I think I have divined, and which makes it an imperious (?) duty with me to oppose, I being absent, the putting of my operas again upon the stage of the Royal Academy of Music, unless I shall be officially engaged in person by the administration, under the guaranty of the Minister of the Interior, to come to Paris, to aid the artists with my creative counsels (the tradition of my operas being lost), to assist at the rehearsals and to contribute to the success of the Vestale, since that is the opera in question."

inexhaustible in stories swollen with gall and poison. He cannot deny the fact, that the king of Prussia has loaded our great Giacomo with marks of honor, and even thinks of entrusting him with high offices and dignities; but he knows how to impute the basest motives to this royal favor. He ends with believing his own inventions, and he assured me, with an air of deepest conviction, that, one day when he was dining with his Majesty, his Royal Highness confessed to him at the table with good-humored frankness, that he meant to fasten Meyerbeer in Berlin at whatever price, in order to prevent this millionaire from spending his fortune in a foreign country. And since music, the desire to shine as a composer, is a well-known weakness of the rich man, he (the king) seeks to turn this weak side to account, and lure the glory-seeker by distinctions. It is melancholy, the king is supposed to have added, that a native talent, possessed of such great power and almost genius, should have to lavish its good, hard Prussian dollars in Italy and Paris, to win the fame of a composer—"whatever one can have for gold, is also to be had with us in Berlin; in our hot-houses grow laurels too for fools, who are willing to pay for them; our journalists, too, are clever and like a good breakfast or a good dinner; our street porters and our pickle-venders have as hard hands for applauding as the Parisian claque—nay, if our idlers spent their evenings in the Opera house, instead of in the tavern, to applaud the Huguenots, they would gain in culture by it—the lower classes must be morally and aesthetically elevated, and the main thing is, that money circulate among the people, particularly in the capital." In such wise, as Spontini assured me, did his Majesty express himself, by way of excuse, as it were, for sacrificing him, the composer of the Vestale, to Meyerbeer. When I remarked, that it was really very laudable in a prince to make such a sacrifice to promote the welfare of his capital, Spontini broke in: "O, you are mistaken, the king of Prussia protects bad music not on grounds of political economy, but rather because he hates musical Art, and knows that it must go down through the example and direction of a man, who, without any feeling for the true and noble, only seeks to flatter the rude multitude."

I could not help frankly confessing to the spiteful Italian, that it was unwise in him to deny his rival any merit. Rival! exclaimed he furiously; and ten times changed color, until at last the yellow held the upper-hand again—and then composing himself, he asked with a sneering grin: "Are you so sure that Meyerbeer is really the composer of the music that is performed under his name?" I was not a little startled by this mad-house question, and heard with astonishment that Meyerbeer had bought of some poor musicians in Italy their compositions, and prepared operas therefrom, which however had fallen through, because the rubbish they had given was quite too miserable. That afterwards he had got hold of something better from a talented abbé in Venice, which he embodied in his Crociato. That he also possessed the manuscripts left by Weber, which he coaxed out of his widow, and from which he certainly would draw hereafter. That Robert le Diable and the Huguenots were for the most part the productions of a Frenchman, by the name of Gouin, who was heartily glad to get his operas brought out under Meyerbeer's name, lest he should lose his place as chef de bureau in the post-office, as his superiors would certainly mistrust his administrative zeal, if they knew that he was a dreamy composer; the Philistines hold practical functions to be incompatible with artistic endowments, and the post-officer Gouin is prudent enough to be silent about his authorship, and leave all the worldly fame to his ambitious friend Meyerbeer. Hence the intimate connection of the two men, whose interests are complements of one another. But a father is still a father, and friend Gouin has the fate of his intellectual children constantly at heart; the details of the performance and the success of Robert le Diable and the Huguenots claim his entire attention; he is present at every rehearsal, he is continually talking with the opera director, with the singers, the dancers, the chef de claque, the journalists; he runs from morning till evening to all the editors' offices to carry paragraphs in behalf of the so-called Meyerbeer operas, and his indefatigableness astonishes everybody.

When Spontini communicated this hypothesis to me, I confessed that it was not wholly without plausibility, and that, although the robust exterior, the brick-red face, the greasy black hair of the aforesaid M. Gouin reminded one more of an ox-driver or a grazier than of a composer, yet there was much in his conduct to justify suspicion that he might be the author of the Meyerbeer operas. He often speaks of Robert le Diable or the Huguenots as "our opera." He lets slip such expressions as; "We have a rehearsal to-day" — "we must curtail an aria." It is singular, too, that at no performance of these operas is M. Gouin absent, and if an aria di bravura is applauded, he forgets himself entirely, and bows in all directions, as if he would thank the public. I confessed all this to the irate Italian, but yet I added that, in spite of my having noticed all this with my own eyes, I did not consider M. Gouin the author of the Meyerbeer operas; I cannot believe that M. Gouin wrote the Huguenots and Robert le Diable; but if it be the case, the artist's vanity must surely gain the upper hand at last, and M. Gouin will publicly claim the authorship of those operas for himself.

No, replied the Italian with a sinister look, as piercing as a bare stiletto, this Gouin knows his Meyerbeer too well not to know what means stand at his terrible friend's command for putting aside any one who is dangerous to him. He is capable, under the pretext that his poor Gouin is crazy, of having him shut up in Charenton forever, and the poor fellow might be thankful to have got off alive. All who stand in the way of this greedy seeker after honor are obliged to yield. Where is Weber? where Bellini? Hum! hum!

This hum! hum! in spite of all its shameless malice, was so droll, that I could not help laughing as I remarked: "But you, maestro, you are not yet crowded out of the way; neither is Donizet-ti, nor Mendelssohn, nor Rossini, nor Halevy." "Hum! hum!" was the answer, "hum! hum! Halevy does not trouble his confrère, and the latter would willingly enough pay him for just existing as an undangerous foil to himself; and of Rossini he knows, through his spies, that he composes not a note more — Rossini's stomach has suffered enough, too, and he never touches a piano, lest he excite Meyerbeer's suspicion. Hum! hum! But thank God! only our bodies can be killed, and not our minds' productions; these will bloom on in eternal freshness, while with death this mere musical escutcheon with its immortality will come to an end, and his operas will follow him into the dumb realm of oblivion!"

It was with difficulty I could bridle my indignation when I heard with what audacious disparagement the envious Italian spoke of the great and honored master, who is the pride of Germany and the delight of the East, and who certainly must be considered and admired as the true creator of Robert le Diable and the Huguenots! No, no Gouin has composed aught so splendid! To be sure, with all my reverence for high genius, there will sometimes arise in me considerable doubt as regards the immortality of those master-works after the departure of the master; but in my conversation with Spontini I assumed the air as if I were convinced of their duration after death, and, to annoy the malicious Italian, I made a revelation to him in confidence from which he could see, with what far-sightedness Meyerbeer had provided for the thriving of his intellectual children beyond the grave. "This providence," said I, "is a psychological proof, that the real father is not M. Gouin, but the great Giacomo. In fact, he has created an entail as it were in his will in favor of his musical brain-children, leaving to each a capital, the interest of which is to be applied to securing the future of the poor orphans, so that after as well as before the departure of their father, all the necessary outlays for popularity, the expenses of finery, the claque, newspaper puffs, &c., may be met. Even on the yet unborn little "Prophet" the tender progenitor is said to have settled the sum of 150,000 Prussian dollars. Truly, never yet came prophet into the world with such a fortune; the carpenter's son of Bethlehem and the camel-driver of Mecca were not so well off. Robert le Diable and the Huguenots are said to be less richly endowed; they perhaps can live for some time on their own fat, so long as splendid decorations and dainty ballet-legs are provided for; afterwards they will need a subsidy. For the Crociato the bequest need not be so brilliant; here the father justly shows himself a little niggardly, and he complains that the extravagant young fellow cost him too much once in Italy; he is a spendthrift. So much the more magnanimously thoughtful is he for his unhappy, fallen-through daughter, Emma di Rosburgo; she is to be annually re-announced by the press, to receive a new portion, and appear in an édition de luxe of satin velvet; for crippled changelings the loving heart of parents always beats the truest. In this way are all of Meyerbeer's spiritual children well provided for; their future is insured for all time. Hate blinds even the most prudent, and it is no wonder, that a passionate fool like Spontini did not altogether doubt my words. "O!" he exclaimed, "he is capable of anything! Unhappy times! Unhappy world!"

German Music.

From "Truth about Music and Musicians," translated from the German, by SABILLA NOVELLO, for Novello's Musical Times.

It is usual to speak of German, French, and Italian music, although a Music may and does exist, equally popular in all countries. But, as the character of different nations influences music, as it does everything else, Tonal Art displays, in every land where it is cultivated, certain peculiarities, sometimes more, sometimes less salient,—sometimes praised as excellencies, sometimes blamed as defects.

To German music, which forms the subject of my present letter, has been generally ascribed superior qualities; but it also has many deficiencies, which I shall especially mention. Both the excellencies and the defects of German music are fundamentally the same as those of German character, and, on this account, resemble the excellencies and defects of German literature.

The peculiarities of German character which we may even call excellencies are: Universality, which seeks to apprehend and compass all; which endeavors to discover and appropriate to itself the good that exists in other nations and in other ages; which can comprehend and sympathize with anomalous circumstances, &c., &c.: Profoundity, which endeavors to penetrate into the Mysterious, and to ascertain the radical cause of all visible and tangible presentments: Perseverance, which untiringly pursues an object, and relinquishes it not until completely conquered: Seriousness, which, by preference, proposes as its Ideal, all that is great, elevating, and significant: Tenderness, which sympathetically divines the intricate workings of the human soul, but especially yearns after pathetic sweetness, soft emotion, and ardent aspiration.

These characteristic features of the German people are traceable in German music, which is also distinguished by its universality. Not only has it employed all existing forms used by other nations, such as opera, church music, &c., &c.; but it has invented new forms, such as the quartet, the symphony,—in fact, chamber and instrumental music altogether, in the present acceptance of the word; this branch of Art has remained, until now, the special property of Germany.

Neither French nor Italian writers have produced any quartet, symphony, or, in short (with the exception of opera-overtures), any instrumental music worthy to be compared with German works of this class; a few scattered essays in this style have occasionally appeared in France and Italy, but they could obtain no durable success, either in their native land or in Germany.

To German profundity and perseverance in ascertaining the original nature and possible development of Tonal Art we are indebted for that wonderful science,—thematic treatment, which imparts to the different forms of instrumental pieces, technical solidity, clearness, and intelligibility; it offers innumerable resources of ever-interesting change, by which a musical piece, containing but few principal themes, acquires manifold charms, and exhibits the purest unity combined with extraordinary variety.

Of this science, the French and Italians make scarcely any use; they repeat a theme, but almost always in its original shape; altogether, they retain existing forms to a remarkable degree, notwithstanding their otherwise acknowledged inconstancy and versatility. Italians have, as yet, taken no notice of German music, and the French have done so but on few occasions. Germans, on the contrary, have attempted the boldest innovations and reforms. Gluck, who entirely remodelled opera music, was a German; and, although he worked in and for Paris, yet his style did not find any direct imitators there, although the influence of his principles may be traced in later French operas.

The same remarks may apply to the science of instrumentation, in which Germans have far surpassed Italians and French; for, while these latter for ever and ever repeat usual and worn-out combinations, the former for ever seek to discover new and unprecedented effects. This science, as also that of thematic treatment, has been much advanced in France by Hector Berlioz; but, in these efforts, he has abandoned his native French element; by inclination and by study he is German, and is an exception to his countrymen.

German composers have, in a much higher degree than French and Italian writers, rendered musical expression, or the language of Tone, clearly and distinctly intelligible,—have faithfully represented all states of the soul, from gayest sprightliness to deepest melancholy.

Tenderness finds its most perfect, its most thrilling accents in German music. Thus we may justly assert that German music strives more earnestly, more perseveringly, and more zealously, to attain the Ideal of Art,—the harmonious union of Truth and Beauty; and has reached nearer its proposed goal than has the music of any other nation. Germany may therefore be said to possess the worthiest national music.

Those peculiarities, however, of German character, which often are excellencies, and produce excellencies in German music, occasionally lapse into defects, which in like manner produce defects in German music. Thus, inclination towards universality not seldom preponderates in undue proportion to executive power, and leads small talent to fritter itself away. Not all can compass All, and therefore production is great—in quantity, but not in quality.

Profundity leads to hair-splitting and pedantry. Germans, who seek to penetrate deep mysteries, easily become abstruse, unintelligible, and tedious; they bind the wings of Fancy, and do not create, but laboriously concoct their musical works.

Perseverance degenerates into obstinacy, which doggedly and unreasonably retains even obvious errors.

Seriousness will occasionally cause neglect of grace, airiness, charm, and spirit; while tenderness may lead to an objectless yearning after—we know not what,—to a morbid sentimentality,—to vain aspirations towards an undefined Ideal.

All these faults and shortcomings may be detected in German music, and are as essentially its characteristics as the above-cited excellencies. Foreign opinion discerns principally these defects, and sets them prominently forth; having, during centuries, recognized them in our national compositions. German pride, on the contrary, will only discern the excellencies; and thus it ensues that, on one hand, a determined musical Germanomania prevails, which, as all extremes produce antagonism, has elicited an opposite feeling,—a predilection for exotic musical productions.

Germanomania will perceive nothing good or worthy of imitation in the music of other nations; it holds all the weaknesses, deficiencies, errors, and eccentricities of Germans as excusable, or even to be praiseworthy peculiarities, and, on this account, especially cultivates them, employs them pre-eminently, and exaggerates their features. Our many charmless symphonies, quartets, overtures, &c., are crying witnesses of this Germanomania.

Its opposite extreme—predilection for foreign works—merely loves and seeks French and Italian music, which is generally more pleasing to the ear,—and looks down with contempt on all the great and glorious qualities of German music, because it is not always gay—because it demands complete and steady attention, and oft-times thrills the soul with profound emotion. To this predilection may be attributed the prevalence of Italian and French operas on our stage, and the German propensity to imitate modern Italian, and, more especially, the modern French frivolous operatic style,—to exclusively strive after music which may gratify the ear, without any reference to truthful delineation of character, sentiment, or situation.

Mid-way between the extremes lies the sure path.

If we properly encourage our good qualities,—if we pursue the course indicated to us by our great masters in their immortal works, which display all the excellencies without the defects of the German element,—we may still lay claim to the possession of first-rank music, and we may still further cultivate and develop its capabilities.

It is a great, though an oft-repeated fallacy, to assert that French and Italian musicians are incapable of composing scientific, contrapuntal combinations, or of writing in polyphonic style; Germans first learnt this art from Italians, who now, however, choose to neglect it, as they are essentially practical, and have ascertained that such music no longer produces universal effect on the nation,—that the public no longer admires it. Italian composers give merely that which is demanded by the public, or by singers. Should a musician obey his own humors, and not the will of the public for whom he writes, he would be utterly ruined, for in Italy all listeners are equally connoisseurs, although not in our German sense of the word; an Italian audience is not divided into the two sects of initiated and uninitiated, who exercise such hateful dominion in Germany.

The text and music of an Italian opera often enter into an alliance of expediency, or are even entirely mismatched. They are united by force,—they unceasingly protest against their bonds, and mutually injure each other; if one cry, the other laughs,—if she (the text) go one way, he (the music) rushes off in a contrary direction; but no one cares for their quarrels. An Italian composer, in order to be a divino maestro, is not expected to furnish either interesting text, originality, superexcellent instrumentation, characteristic expression (according to German interpretation), or uniformity; the only requisites for his opera are—melody and good singers.

Italian and French operatic poets and operatic composers (when speaking of Italians and French, we never mention other than operatic music) do not, like Germans, set up an Ideal, which they endeavor to reach; their highest, their only lawgiver is the public,—not even the public in general, but the public of their time, their country, their town—nay, even the public of this or that theatre; for instance, in Paris, the public of the Grand Opera, of the Comic Opera, &c., &c.

Their first question is: "For what public?" and according to the answer received, they write their text, or compose their music. For confirmation of what I have adduced, compare the score of the Muette de Portici with that of the Maurer, by Auber. The first is fully instrumented, because it was composed for an opera-house of spacious size; while the second is but sparsely instrumented, because its performance was destined to take place in the smaller theatre of the Opéra Comique.

When the fully-instrumented operas by Auber and Meyerbeer are given in Germany, we blame those composers for superabundant instrumentation; but we judge them through the spectacles of German universal principles, and forget peculiar circumstances and appropriate adaptability,—we judge those operas which were calculated for effect in vast space by the impression they create in our small theatres, of which composers certainly took no thought.

Some injudicious, aping composers, on the contrary, consider full instrumentation as progress in Art, or, perhaps, as a reigning fashion, because it comes from Paris, and imitate this massive construction, even when composing for our small theatres; thus, what practical sense commands as perfectly expedient in one case, becomes an insupportable defect, when blindly employed in another.

We cannot doubt that exclusive consideration of the public of a day and total oblivion of a higher aim occasion many of those blemishes and deficiencies, such as unfaithfulness of expression and want of characteristic appropriateness, which disfigure French and Italian works. But it is equally certain that the contrary fault,—utter contempt for the public, and exclusive endeavor after some Ideal,—is committed by our modern German opera composers; and this may account for the fact that so many new German operas and other works are brought forth, which do not obtain any success.

Goethe has already said: "Germans are deficient in a true sense of what is suitable in the Arts,—that is, they too often neglect what is possible and practical, whilst dreaming and aspiring after Ideality."

In order to win this knowledge inculcated by Goethe, our young scholars should not entirely condemn modern Italians and French, as some rigorists and advocates of Ideality would desire. Art is but Art, and can never become reality. Absolute naked Truth annihilates Art, which must be permitted to show us Truth under a different aspect from that which it bears when proceeding directly from Nature's hand. In reality, no human being sings his anger or his despair; therefore, every song of this kind on the stage is an untruth. But, even supposing that it were feasible to force some individual to really sing forth his anger or despair, in order that such natural expression might be correctly noted, and precisely imitated on the stage, this "truth to Nature" would only be deserving of ridicule. Germans are too disregardful of this fact, and endeavor to approximate Art too closely to Nature; while Italians and French err too far on the opposite side, and pay no regard to Nature.

This is the principal difference between false German and false Italian and French style. German music is not sensuously agreeable enough. French and Italian music is sensuously agreeable merely. He only who can combine sensuous gratification with artistic truth of expression will afford delight to Germany and to all lovers of music, as our great German masters,—Mozart, Winter, Weigl, and Weber,—have done.

Above, I have alluded to the similarity between German music and German literature. French music and French literature are also similar, for French poets write in measures more pleasing to the ear, and in forms more symmetrical than those of our German authors, who often give utterance to their most precious thoughts in formless, unintelligible, and ungraceful diction,—they wish to appear learned, and consider an easy, light style as frivolous, shallow, and unworthy their use. It is precisely the same with musicians.

One more simile. Our German poetry and our German music have pursued a like course, and kept even pace. In Klopstock we find strict, artistic form; in Schiller and Goethe, grace and euphony united to richness and depth of intellect; in moderns, empty verse-tinkling or pedantic verbosity. Thus, also, in Bach we find scientific, artificially-constructed music; in Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, grace and euphony united to richness and depth of intellect; in the moderns, empty tinkling or pedantic tediousness.

TRoubles of a Turkish Music Master.—Mrs. Hornsby, who has recently published a work giving her "Adventures in and around Stamboul," says that when there she became much interested in a young French lady, who, in giving an account of the fallen fortunes of her family, also describes a new trouble. Mrs. Hornsby says: "It seems that her young brother, who is remarkably good looking, and showed a great talent for music, was sent to Vienna in their prosperous days for his education. His piano forte playing is thought much of here, and the Sultan having set the fashion of Turkish ladies learning music, he now gives lessons to the wives and daughters of several Pashas on the Bosphorus. He is married, greatly attached to his wife, and has two pretty children; added to this he is a grave, shy young man. Well, Dhudu's trouble for her brother is this: He goes quietly in the morning to give his lesson. Perhaps there are two or three veiled ladies in the room into which he is ushered by the attendants. 'The lesson begins,' says Dhudu in a melancholy voice, 'and they are generally rather stupid. The men who guard them soon grow tired of looking on, and stroll away to their pipes. They are hardly outside the door when down goes the yashmak of one of the ladies. She is very pretty, but very tiresome; my brother is afraid to look at her. What should he do if the Pacha were suddenly to return, or one of the slaves to enter and report this to him! So he turns his head away and tries to induce her to go on with the lesson. Would you believe it,' says Dhudu, still more indignantly, 'the other day she took hold of his chin, and turning his face to hers, said laughing, 'Wy don't you look at me, you pig?' What can my brother do? The Pacha would never believe that it is not his fault. Sometimes one of them will creep under his piano-forte, and putting her finger into his shoe tickle his foot. Yesterday they slipped two peaches into his pocket, tied up in muslin with blue ribbons, clapping their hands and laughing when he found it out. You know what those peaches mean? They 'mean kisses,' said Dhudu, coloring, 'and it made my brother so nervous, for the men were in the outer room, and might have heard all about it. He would be sorry to have them punished, yet they make his life miserable. That pretty one is the worst of all, she is so daring. I visit at the harem, and went with my brother one morning. Knowing them so well, I took him in at the garden entrance, the way I always go myself. We heard somebody laugh a loud, merry laugh, and—Oh, what a fright I was in—there she was, up in a peach tree. My brother turned his head away, and walked on very fast; she pelted peaches at him, then got out of the tree, and would have run after him if I had not stopped her.' And here poor Dhudu fairly cried. 'What can my brother do?'"

Rossini's Barbieri.

When the celebrated tenor, Garcia, the father of Madame Malibran and Madame Viardot, came to Paris, and presented to the manager of the Théâtre-Italien the score of Il Barbieri di Siviglia, the work of his friend, young Rossini, whose name was beginning to be known on both sides the Alps, he had to overcome a redoubtable opposition, principally on the part of the illustrious Paër, then all-powerful in musical matters, and who, without undervaluing the great talent of the young maestro of Bologna, or rather because he perceived too plainly his rising talent, wished to shut the door in his new rival's face. It was this combat of old Paër against young Art which furnished M. Scribe with the well-known subject of his Concert à la Cour, and the character of the crafty manager, whose intrigues long obstruct and imperil the success of a débutante, destined, of course in the long run, to triumph over the plots of the scheming maître-de-chapelle.

Garcia, without being discouraged, disputed the ground, inch by inch, with the obstinate and malicious author of Agnès, and with such success, that the latter, beaten back to his last entrenchments, offered to be guided in the matter by the decision and well-proved good taste of Habeneck, who then swayed the dictatorial sceptre of the Opéra.

Habeneck, a great musician, and incapable of jealousy, received the score of Il Barbieri. He kept it for a long time, went through it, examined it, and, at length, gave it back to Garcia, stating that, "without doubt, there were some tolerably pretty things in the work, but that a select public, like that of the Italiens, at Paris, required operas of greater strength; that the work in question was all very well as an operetta, manufactured in a hurry for a carnival or an Italian fair" ((it is true the Barbiere was conceived, written, and played in twenty days), "but that no one could think of introducing productions of such slight texture to a Parisian audience," etc.

Paër triumphed, but Garcia, fortunately for Rossini, would not be beaten. His energetic conviction, his devotion to the maestro, and his ardent desire to play before the Parisians the character of Almaviva, which he had created at Rome, and of which he had himself composed the famous serenade, "Io son Lindoro!" triumphed over every obstacle. Taking advantage of the fact that his services were needed as tenor, he would only consent to engage on condition of singing Rossini's Barbiere conjointly with Paisiello's. The rest is known. After a little indecision, the public evinced an enthusiastic admiration for the Barbiere of Rossini, while that of Paisiello was neglected. The revolution, so clearly perceived and obstinately combated by Paër, took place in musical art, and Rossini reigned, as he does still.

This anecdote was related, long afterwards, by Habeneck himself, as a striking example of the fallibility and uncertainty of human judgment.

Rossini's Summer Residence.

Rossini has just left the Boulevard des Italiens, and the Chaussée d'Antin, to take possession of his summer retreat at Beauséjour, a spot connected with some of the most pleasing reminiscences of his life.

The illustrious master resided there at the time when Madame Récamier, the Princess de Lieven, M. Guizot, and a host of other celebrities made it their place of meeting. You might have saluted Châteaubriand and Rossini in the same alley.

The old pavilion, honored by being the birthplace of more than one inspiration of the author of Guillaume Tell, has made way for a new building, without sacrificing anything of the green foliage, which sheltered the residence of the illustrious master. There are still the same lilacs in blossom every spring, and, within two or three generations, the same linnets and the same nightingales, which seek a refuge and indulge in a concert there every morning. It is within two paces of this old residence, within the same walls, and at the entrance of the Bois de Boulogne, that Rossini has come to seek the air of other times, the breeze wafted from Bellevue and from St. Cloud, that is to say, the perfume of the fields, without leaving Paris or his Boulevards, from which he could not tear himself away even exceptionally.

The pavilion of the Princess de Talleyrand, to whom Beauséjour belonged nearly half a century ago, has flung open its doors to him. From its proximity to the Bois de Boulogne, the celebrated composer is enabled, every morning, to take his first walk to Passy and Auteuil, passing, like a schoolboy, near the Artesian well in the plain, that gigantic work whose subterranean wonders interest in the greatest degree his inquiring mind. The slightest pulsations of this incessant boring process are interrogated by him, and his most lively wish is to be one of the first, if not absolutely the first, at the marvellous spectacle of the water gushing and springing forth, torn by the hand of man from the deepest entrails of the earth. It is still the great German borer, M. Kind, who, under the direction and with the assistance of M. Alphand, the chief engineer of the Bois de Boulogne, is urging forward, night and day, the deliverance of the sheet of water, destined soon to spread its hurrying waves towards Passy, Neuilly, Auteuil, and Boulogne. This gentleman only understands his ultra-Rhenish idiom, the only one, perhaps, not familiar to Rossini. Consequently, the celebrated master obtains from him the short but expressive reply, "Mal-hour" or "Bon-hour," according to the exciting oscillations of the interminable process of boring, which promises, however, to be brought to a successful termination, like all the great enterprises of the age.

Although, at the first dawn of day, Rossini strides with a firm and light step through the alleys of the Bois de Boulogne, he is only the better disposed every evening to take part in the most varied and sparkling conversation. His Parisian friends do not desert him; he has an amiable remark for every one, and something to say on every thing. During the day he willingly sits down to the piano, and extemporizes adorable bagatelles. From time to time, "the noble game of billiards"—as it used to be called—has the privilege of engaging his attention. Such days are festive days to the neighbor who has the honor of receiving him—together with Levasseur, Ponchard, Mesdames Rossini and Fodor—and of sometimes hearing Nadaud's songs, of which Rossini is particularly fond. A cue of honor, touched by no hand but the master's, and surmounted by a crown with gold leaves, while opposite it is the bust which inspired the chisel of Dantan—such is the coat-of-arms of the highly privileged billiard room. The conversation never languishes, and the "Swan of Pesaro" is always the hero, as a matter of course.

Such is the way in which Rossini spends his summer, loved and venerated by every one, loving all around him, and happy at having again found France and his friends of former times, and at having returned to Paris, after which he had sighed for twenty years. —Moniteur.

A Musical Retrospect.

(From the Philadelphia Bulletin.)

Looking over an old volume of the Inquirer, for our neighbor has attained to a mature age for a newspaper, and can look back over a career of more than a quarter of a century—our attention has been attracted to the notices of the Italian Opera Company, then performing in Philadelphia. It was in the winter and spring of 1833, more than twenty-five years ago. There had been but few attempts here at Italian opera before this; indeed the Garcia company, that performed here in 1825, and in which poor Malibran was the prima donna, was almost the only one worthy of much consideration. The company of 1833 is remembered still by many veteran opera-goers, and there are not a few who still refer to the days of Pedrotti, Montresor, and Fornasari, as the "palmy days" of Italian music here; just as the days of Jefferson, Wood and Warren are talked of as the "palmy days" of the drama, and those of the Woods as the "palmy days" of English opera. We have faith in the steady progress of Art, and we have no idea that the performances of 1833 were nearly as good as those that we have had in 1857 and 1858. Nor do we believe that the performances of 1858 are nearly as good as we or our successors shall have in 1868 or 1878.

But this has nothing to do with our purpose, which is simply to note the opera season of 1833 as a bit of our musical history. The arrival of the company is announced as having occurred on the twenty-first of January, and with them came "the celebrated poet Da Ponte. This is the worthy old gentleman who was the contemporary and friend of Mozart, and wrote for him the words, now immortal, of Don Giovanni. The poor fellow died in poverty in New York, some years ago. The director of the Company was Signor Baglioli, who is, or was quite lately, still teaching singing in New York. The leader of the orchestra was Rapetti. The women of the company were Pedrotti, Salvioni and Marozzi; the men were Montresor, Fornasari, Orlandi, Sappignoli, Placi and others. The company opened at the Chestnut Street Theatre, on the evening of Jan. 23d., the prices of tickets being one dollar for the boxes and pit and fifty cents for the gallery. The opening opera was Mercadante's Elisa e Claudio, which was not a new opera then; for Mercadante, although still living and still composing at Naples, had begun to write in 1818, and Elisa e Claudio was first produced in 1821. It was a weak imitation of Rossini, with some very pretty melodies; but it has long since been banished from the stage. During the season, which continued, for four nights in a week, from January 23d till March 19th, the only operas produced were Elisa e Claudio, Bellini's Il Pirata, and Rossini's Italiana in Algeri, Cenerentola, Otello, and Mose in Egitto—the last produced at the Musical Fund Hall as an oratorio. The greatest hit seems to have been made by Il Pirata, which was comparatively new then, and was the first bold attempt to depart from the Rossini style, that was then so universally imitated. The principal singers, Pedrotti, Montresor and Fornasari, are the subjects of much enlogium, and doubtless it was all well deserved, for their after fame was great, in Europe as well as in this country. Still the profits of the season were not large, for at its close the editor says of the company:

"Their visit to this city, although not so successful as they anticipated, has not brought the company into debt, while it added to the funds of all the members who took benefits. Had the money received at benefits been deposited in the general fund of the company, there would have been several thousand dollars received beyond expenses. Considering the season, therefore, and the attractions of other theatres, we think they have no reason to complain of a want of liberality on the part of Philadelphia. If they choose to pay their principal singers enormous salaries, and to give them free benefits, always taking care to render the attractions of a benefit night far greater than any other night, they cannot expect to enrich the managers and the "stars" also.

Here we have the complaint, which is still reiterated everywhere even now, of inordinately high salaries for the leading artists. It was damaging to the managers in the little, dingy, old Chestnut street Theatre, which had only room for some fourteen hundred people. It is equally damaging now in the superb Academy of Music, where there is room for over three thousand people.

The poverty of the repertoire of the company of 1833 must strike every one, especially as novelty and variety are so imperatively demanded at every opera season of the present day. During nearly two months only five operas were played, and of these none possess the dramatic interest that is necessary to make an opera succeed before a modern audience. But the demands for novelty have done much for the art of music since 1833, and the number of successful operas produced since then is surprising. Nearly all of Donizetti's numerous successful operas were written after 1833. Anna Bolena was the only one that had made any sensation previously. Bellini had not then written his Sonnambula, his Norma or his Puritani. Meyerbeer had written his Crociato, but his great works and the only ones now performed—Robert, the Huguenots, the Prophète, and L'Etoile du Nord—were all written subsequently. Rossini had written his William Tell, which was like the birth of a new genius, totally distinct from that which produced the Barber, Cenerentola, &c; but it was monopolized by Paris, and its production in America could not have been dreamed of. Auber, also was too exclusively French to be much thought of then in this country, and the same may be said of Halevy, and the other writers for the Paris stage. The writer of the most popular and successful modern operas—Giuseppe Verdi—was in 1833 only 19 years old and was of course totally unknown to the musical world at large. Reflecting on the immense additions that have been made since then to the stock of operas that please the public, by the few composers we have named, one is surprised to hear that the season of 1833 should even have been as successful as reported. It must be remembered, too, that Philadelphia then had only about 180,000 inhabitants, or less than one in three of the present population. But it must also be remembered that the opera was a much greater novelty then than it is now, and that short seasons, occurring at intervals of several years, might succeed much better than long seasons, such as are undertaken now in Philadelphia and New York.

William Horsley.

(From the London Athenæum, June 19.)

The long life of Mr. HORSLEY, one of the patriarchs of English music, and certainly one of the best composers this country has ever produced, closed a few days since. He was in his eighty-fourth year; and for something like three parts of a century had kept a distinguished place among our professors, having only retired from the organ at which he presided a very few years since. It would be too much to expect one trained and occupied as he was to have kept pace with a time which successively flung out varieties and novelties so great and distinct as Beethoven, Signor Rossini, Weber—not to speak of the Liszts and Chopins and Thalbergs, who for awhile pushed aside the smoother and simpler pianoforte music of elder dynasties. But Mr. Horsley's moral worth and uprightness would have always kept him in a place of credit among his brethren; if even he had not deserved well of old and young among them by writing some of the most beautiful part-music in being. His glees in every respect merit this epithet. The words are mostly chosen with a refinement of taste in itself significant; the melody in them has generally a grace and distinctness, and the harmony is always pure, rich, and delicate. It is almost superfluous to name "By Celia's Arbor," and "See the Chariot." In the stricter forms of composition Mr. Horsley, too, was fortunate and free. His vocal canons are excellent of their kind. It is pleasant to think that competence, respect of friends, and the domestic ministrations of those who without indiscretion may be characterized as a remarkable artist-family, made the latter days of his life easy and cheerful.

(From Moore's Encyclopedia of Music.)

WILLIAM HORSLEY was born in London, in 1774. In his youth he was remarkably unhealthy, and, owing to this circumstance, to family misfortunes, and to other causes, his general education was neglected and he arrived at the age of sixteen before it was finally resolved that he should pursue music for a profession. At that period he was articled for five years to Theodore Smith, who was esteemed to be a good piano-forte player, and who claimed to be the first who introduced duets for that instrument into England. Smith's theoretical knowledge was very limited. He was, besides, passionate and indolent to an extreme degree, and entirely neglected the instruction of his pupil, who was, at all times, most happy to escape from his violence.

However, while with Smith, the subject of our present article made several valuable acquaintances, who had a vast influence on his future pursuits. In particular, he became very intimate with the three brothers, Jacob, Joseph, and Isaac Pring, and from them he first imbibed that love for vocal music which he ever after cherished. Joseph Pring, having obtained the situation of organist in the cathedral at Bangor, removed thither, and his brother Isaac soon afterwards went to Oxford, where he died, after having been organist at the new college for some time. Horsley's great intimacy, therefore, was chiefly confined to Jacob Pring, from whose kindness and friendship he derived advantages which he has never failed to acknowledge. In 1799 he had the misfortune to lose his estimable friend; but previously he had procured an introduction to Dr. Calcott; and the example of these two excellent musicians, and his constant intercourse with them, had determined him more particularly to the practice of glee writing. At this time his ardor for composition was very great and every moment which he could spare from his occupation, as a teacher, was devoted to it. Besides glees, he wrote services in five, six, seven, and eight parts, "Two Anthems," in twelve real parts, and a "Sanctus," for four choirs. He also employed himself much in the construction of canons, and found considerable improvement in the exercise of that difficult species of writing. In 1798 he suggested to his friends, Dr. Calcott and Pring, a plan for the formation of a society, the object of which should be the cultivation of English vocal music. The members met for the first time in that year, and, on the suggestion of Mr. Webbe, took the name of Concortores Sodales. The establishment of this society was a great advantage to Horsley. It introduced him to an acquaintance with several eminent professors; and as each member was to preside in turn, and furnish music for the day, it gave a new stimulus to his exertions. About the same period, he was introduced by Dr. Calcott to the committee of the asylum for female orphans, and was accepted by them as assistant organist of the institution. On this occasion, he resigned his situation of organist of Ely Chapel, Holborn, which he had held for some years. He now began to employ himself in vocal compositions with instrumental accompaniments, and set, among other things, "Smollet's Ode to Mirth," "The Cantate Domino," and an anthem to words beginning, "When Israel came out of Egypt," with which he took his bachelor's degree in 1800, at Oxford. His time was now much occupied by his pupils; nevertheless, when the vocal concerts were revived, in 1801, he applied himself with fresh diligence to composition, and furnished the managers of those concerts with many new works. This he was particularly induced to do, not only from his love to the art, but from his great intimacy with Harrison and Bartleman; and, till the death of the former, he was the most copious and the most successful among the native contributors to their undertaking. In 1802 Dr. Calcott resigned his situation at the Asylum, and Horsley, having been recommended by the committee to the guardians at large, was chosen to succeed the doctor, without any opposition. He continued to perform the whole duty at the Asylum till 1812; when Belgrave chapel, in Halkin Street, Grosvenor Place, being finished, he accepted the office of organist in it. For many years, a very large portion of his time was occupied in giving instruction; but the remainder he devoted, with unabated assiduity, to the study of his art, and to the practice of composition. His published works consist of the services, odes, and anthems already mentioned; "Three Symphonies for a full Orchestra," which were several times performed at the vocal concerts; several trios for violin and violoncello; and a great collection of single pieces, consisting of glees, canons, songs, duets, &c. Of these have been published: "Three Collections of Glees, Canons, and Madrigals, for three, four, five and six voices"; "Six Glees for two Trebles and a Bass"; "A Collection of forty Canons, of various species." This work the author has inscribed to his friend Clementi, in language which shows his respect and admiration for that great master. He was likewise a great contributor to the "Vocal Harmony," published by Clementi & Co. That splendid work contains fifteen or sixteen glees, which were purposely composed for it by him. To these publications may be added single glees, songs, &c. Horsley occasionally employed himself in writing for the piano-forte, chiefly, however, with a view to the improvement of the younger class of students. His works for that instrument consist of "A Set of Easy Lessons, containing Familiar Airs." "Six Sonatinas for the Use of his Pupils, with the leading fingering carefully marked." "Three Sonatas, composed for the Hon. Miss Ponsonby." "Sonatas, Nos. 1 and 2." These were intended as part of a series, to be published from time to time. He has also printed "An Explanation of the Major and Minor Scales," accompanied with exercises calculated to improve the hand.

FREE PLAYGROUND FOR THE PEOPLE.—Mr. C. P. Melly, a young merchant of Liverpool, and a partner in the house of Melly, Romilly & Co., after having beautified that town with numerous wall fountains, at which thirsty pedestrians may help themselves without let or hindrance, has recently fitted up a piece of land in the suburbs belonging to the corporation, as a free Gymnasium and playground for the people. Its opening was numerously attended. The following sensible address was freely distributed:—"Friends,—This playground is intended for your enjoyment, and is placed under your care. The poles, ropes, ladders and chairs will bear any fair usage. It will be for you to protect them from wilful damage. The trees will adorn your playground if they are allowed to grow up, and you will, I am sure, prevent them from being destroyed. This playground is hereby placed in your hands; let it be used for the purposes for which it is obviously intended. Let good humor and good temper prevail. Let there be no quarrelling among yourselves, and allow no stone-throwing or fighting among your younger members. It rests with you whether the first attempt at free out-door amusement in our town be a success or a failure. Charles P. Melly."

The fancy for providing playgrounds appears to be extending. Mr. Dickens lately presided at the first anniversary festival of the "Playground and General Recreation Society." On this occasion a hundred persons sat down to an excellent dinner.

The object of the society is to seek out and provide available open spots for playgrounds in populous places in which the children of the poorer classes may disport themselves in healthful games, instead of playing at hide-and-seek in dens and alleys. The present movement originated some months ago with the Rev. Dr. Laing, to whom all honor is due.

In proposing the toast of the evening, "Success to the Playground and General Recreation Society," the Chairman drew a racy picture of his encounters with the children playing in the streets on his way from his house to the London Tavern. He next descanted upon the desirability of providing suitable places of recreation for the children in question, and wound up by saying that, though it was impossible to provide at present for all the wants of the metropolis in this respect, yet that, with respect to two parishes, two benevolent ladies had come forward and pledged themselves to subscribe £100 each, provided the remaining necessary funds could be obtained from other sources. It was in fact therefore, with a view to a trial of the experiment of these two parishes that he appeared before them that evening, and he hoped to see the experiment fairly tried before long. The health of the chairman, and of the ladies, were the two concluding toasts. The last toast was proposed by the chairman, who vowed and declared he would not preside at another dinner unless the ladies also dined, an announcement which was received with enthusiastic cheers.

The list of subscriptions during the evening amounted to £578 6s.

YANKEE DOODLE.—We find the following in the National Intelligencer:

"The following letter has been received by a gentleman of this city from our accomplished secretary of legation at Madrid:

Madrid, June 3, 1858.

My Dear Sir,—The tune Yankee Doodle, from the first of my showing it here, has been acknowledged by persons acquainted with music to bear a strong resemblance to the popular airs of Biscay; and yesterday a professor from the north recognized it as being much like the ancient sword dance played on solemn occasions by the people of San Sebastian. He says the tune varies in those provinces, and proposes in a couple of months to give me the changes as they are to be found in their different towns, that the matter may be judged of and fairly understood. Our national air certainly has its origin in the music of the free Pyrenees; the first strains are identically those of the heroic Danza Esparta, as it was played to me, of brave old Biscay.

Very truly yours, BUCKINGHAM SMITH."

Kossuth informed us that the Hungarians with him in this country first heard Yankee Doodle on the Mississippi river, when they immediately recognized it as one of the old national airs of their native land,—one played in the dances of that country,—and they began immediately to caper and dance as they used to in Hungary. It is curious that the same air should be found in old Biscay.—Post.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JULY 20, 1858.—The Musard concerts have suddenly ceased. After a week's trial it was found impossible to draw paying audiences to the Academy of Music, at this time of the year, and the enterprise has been abandoned. The Academy will now remain closed until September, when Maretzek promises a short operatic season, with Gazzaniga, Brignoli, Amodio, and Miss Philipps. Madame and Monsieur Gassier are also engaged. The lady I had the pleasure of hearing a few months ago at Rome, where she is a great favorite. Madame Gassier is a lady of considerable personal beauty, looks like an Italian, with her dark eyes and hair, is perfectly familiar with the stage, sings with sweetness and flexibility, and altogether holds a very fair rank among European prima donnas. She is favorably known to the English as well as the Roman public, and if she comes to America will undoubtedly be successful, though I do not think she will create a furore or rival La Grange or Gazzaniga in the affections of our opera-going public. For light and comic roles, she will be a pleasing relief to our heavy tragedy queen, Gazzaniga. After a short season, Maretzek with his company will depart for Cuba, while his place at the opera house will be filled by the Ullman troupe. Who will be the members of this forthcoming company has not yet transpired, but I learn it is the intention of the manager to leave the beaten track of Italian operas and produce German and French works comparatively unknown here. The Huguenots will be revived, with Meyerbeer's other operas, and Halevy's La Juive is also mentioned. At Niblo's we shall have this fall, a French company for the production of light operas and vaudevilles.

Maretzek and Anschutz are getting up a curious musical open air Festival for the inauguration of the Jones' Wood Park, to take place on the 2d, 3d, and 4th of August. Two hundred performers will take part, and there will be balls, and fireworks, and balloon ascension, and Turners, and magnificent prizes (!), and Sing-Vereins, and probably Lager Beer. The admission will be 25 cents, which will include everything except the Lager.

Our Philharmonic Society holds a rehearsal Saturday evening to test the acoustic qualities of the new Music Hall under the Cooper Institute. Should the result of the experiment be satisfactory, the room will probably be engaged for the regular rehearsals of the Society.

Brignoli and Amodio are at Saratoga, concertizing in the train of Miss Fay, one of the innumerable host of "American prima donnas." By the way, talking about American singers, I may as well mention that Mrs. Cora Wilhorst has been engaged to sing in opera this fall at the Academy. It is said that the reports of her not being able to obtain an engagement in Europe were false—that she was offered engagements both at the opera at Paris and elsewhere. Certain it is, that I have heard worse singers than she occupying prominent position in the lyric world on the other side of the water. TROVATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, JULY 20, 1858.—Not many miles from the city of Philadelphia, ensconced amid the noble hills which surround the valley through which meanders the placid Lehigh, is found the time-honored town of Bethlehem, the mother-congregation of that zealous and devoted band of Christ's followers, ye leapt, the Moravians. Romantic to a fascinating degree in location, rich beyond measure in historical and aboriginal associations, endowed with most excellent schools, embracing within its limits a population of superior intelligence, Bethlehem has lured hundreds of summer tourists from the gay dissipations of Saratoga, Cape May, and other kindred resorts, and has, in point of fact, especially since the completion of the North Pennsylvania Railroad, constituted itself the favorite watering place of the pent-up denizens of the Quaker City. The peculiarities of the Moravian Church, its early origin in Bohemia, its fearful struggles against the persecutions which reigned rampant in the middle ages, its final overthrow and subsequent renewal, its untiringly faithful and self-sacrificing efforts in the mission cause in all parts of the globe,—these are doubtless familiar to all such of your worthy readers, as chance to take even a superficial interest in general church history, and it is not my design to touch upon these prominent features of Moravianism. My object is rather to point attention to the musical culture of this body of Christians, who foster the "divine Art" with all the inherent enthusiasm and assiduity peculiar to the Germans and their descendants. Sacred and secular music seem to be cultivated with equal zeal by them, and all of the light, flippant, modernized style of composition is scornfully spurned from both departments.

Every Moravian church lays a peremptory stress upon congregational singing, and the children are trained with a view to this from the earliest infancy. They are, if I may use the expression, inoculated with the rich harmonies and graceful movements of the church chorals, and these settle firmly into their systems. Apart from all this, however, there is attached to each church a regular choir, trained to the execution of difficult sacred music, and brought into active requisition upon festival days and solemn occasions. This body of vocalists usually finds its accompaniment in a fine orchestra, which, in connection with the village organ, very materially heightens the general effect, rendering this more imposing and swelling in anthems of glorification, and per contra, more impressively solemn in the requiem over the departed or in the holy ceremonies of the Passion Week. The choir and orchestra of Bethlehem have been very celebrated for well nigh a century past. Years ago, when, in the gradual growth of Philadelphia, amid the slow development of its internal resources, music first assumed a living shape in the formation of the Musical Fund Society, and when this now powerful corporation was in its puling infancy, it was very customary, upon concert occasions, to borrow from Bethlehem the material wherewith to fill up its orchestra to suitable dimensions. The village musicians, enthusiastically devoted to the "divine Art," practically, theoretically, and aesthetically, were never tardy to respond to such invitations; and although Philadelphia in those days of rickety mail stages, seemed almost immeasurably far off, and access thereto proved really laborious, the names of such staunch musicians as the brothers Weiss, the Crists, the Beckels, the Rauchs, and others, almost invariably graced the poster-announcements of concerts in the city.

But I am digressing from my remarks upon the sacred music of the Moravians; I shall enlarge upon their cultivation of the secular department in another letter.

The repertoire of every Moravian congregation comprises within its limits the works of the greatest masters, from Mozart to Spohr, besides numerous contributions of great merit from the pens of church-members, who, with less of retiring humility and more of worldliness, might have carved out for themselves prominent niches in the temple of Fame.—There are now in constant use and practice among this small body of Christians, anthems, motettos, &c., from the works of their own brethren (such as Beckler of former times,—Bishop Wolle and Rev. Francis Hagen of the present day,) which exhibit unmistakably that deep-searching, mathematically constructed cultus, that intellectual, ideal, aesthetical conception of music, which causes the rigorous German school of composition to be regarded as the broad foundation upon which the entire Temple of the Muses stands firm.

The rehearsals of Moravian choirs are very faithfully and judiciously held at stated times throughout the entire year; in fact, so punctually did the individual members attend them at the time when your humble correspondent was a viola performer amongst them, several years since, that neither a drifting snow-storm, nor a driving rain deterred the hardy, buxom damsel, from donning a pair of boots, if the occasion demanded this, and hastening to the old church to mingle their voices in preparation for some coming festive Sabbath.

Another feature of the sacred music department, among the Moravians, is the trombone choir, which announces from the steeple of the village church to the quiet inhabitants beneath, the deaths of individual members, as these chance to occur; and which usually precedes, with solemn chorals, the funeral cortege, as it winds its noiseless way towards the lovely, peaceful graveyard, not many paces from the church. This so-called trombone choir also performs upon other occasions, but its services are chiefly brought into requisition as above mentioned; in fact, when a death occurs, and the rich harmonies of the quartet float over the undisturbed village in announcement of the melancholy fact, the mechanic lays aside for the moment his implements, and feels as though distant strains from another world were approaching him. By a systematic arrangement, he is furthermore enabled to distinguish accurately the sex and progress in life of the deceased, by the particular hymn-tune which comes to his ears. However, I greatly suspect myself to have wearied your patience with this subject, by spinning my story unduly. In my next letter, I propose to afford to your readers some idea of the secular music of Bethlehem, as cultivated by its Philharmonic Society, its excellent Brass Band, and in its individual private families. MANRICO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 24, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Conclusion of the "Chorus of Peasants" from Bellini's Sonnambula. The plates are borrowed from Messrs. Ditson & Co's beautiful and cheap vocal and piano score of this ever fresh and popular opera.

The musical gossip, of which we translate this week a third specimen from that brilliant and satirical dog, HENRI HEINE, is gleaned from his various series of letters from Paris, which treat of all the topics of their day, political, philosophical, artistic, literary, &c. It is gossip merely; yet it contains not a few just and sharp perceptions in the sphere of music and musicians. We give them rather as amusing, characteristic observations of one of the most original and piquant writers of our century, than as musical criticisms of much real value. Heine certainly is no musical authority; but Heine's whims and fancies and quaint, saucy comments on the musical world, so far as he could know it there in Paris,—though to be taken always cum grano—may furnish a few hours of pleasant and not entirely worthless summer reading.

We trust none of our readers, who are interested on either side of the vexed question of German or Italian music, or who have felt bored and sick with the unprofitable vagueness of the controversy, will fail to read the very candid and judicious statement of the excellencies and the faults of "German Music," which we copy on another page. We think it contains the essence of the matter in a nutshell. Such analysis leads to something like definiteness of ideas, as to wherein the real difference lies between German music in its best sense and the current Italian music, which of course means simply Italian Opera, of a fashion so exclusively modern as scarcely to include Rossini. At the same time it shows how much poor German music there is, growing out of zeal beyond discretion (and beyond inborn talent) for German ideals; and how much of still poorer music, which is only German because manufactured by Germans, but in feeble imitation of feeble Italian models. But this reminds us of a piece of news we have just found in a foreign paper, which we hope is not too good to be true. Here is the paragraph, which we may make a text for more remark hereafter:

ROSSINI'S OPERAS.—According to the Italian papers, the people throughout the entire peninsula are returning to their ancient love for Rossini's music. At Rome, the Siege of Corinth is now the operatic rage; whilst at Florence and Genoa, Guillaume Tell and Moïse are being performed with the utmost enthusiasm. A few vocalists of the old school alone are wanted to make Rossini's operas as popular as ever. Verdi's music not only wears out the singers, but the hearers, while the music of the Swan of Pesaro, like port wine, is rendered more palatable by age. One bottle of old Rossini is worth a pipe of Verdi.

The newspapers all round are complimentary to our "Diarist" and notice his departure on his third visit to Germany, to complete his Life of Beethoven, with cordial interest. This is from the Courier:

MR. ALEXANDER W. THAYER, a gentleman of most cultivated musical taste and large knowledge of musical history, sailed last Wednesday from New York for Germany, with the intention of there devoting a year to the completion of his Life of Beethoven and Weber. The Life of Beethoven has long been a cherished object of Mr. Thayer's ambition, and for many years the greater part of his studies has been directed to that end. Mr. Thayer's course has not been a path of roses. He has had to encounter obstacles that would long ago have discouraged any man of less enthusiasm and determination. But we believe that this time he leaves our shores happy in the hope of concluding his long labor of love. His work, when finished, will be the most valuable record of events of the life and time of the great master that has ever been produced in any language, and will absolutely leave no room for improvement in the matters of completeness and detail. What literary attractions it may possess cannot of course be determined in advance, but we do not doubt that it will earnestly appeal to every lover of the divine art. We hope Mr. Thayer may be as successful in his final researches as he deserves to be, and that uninterrupted good health—which has not always been his portion—may enable him to prosecute his labors without discouragement or pain. We bid him an affectionate God-speed. Mr. Thayer, we may observe, is very well known by his writings in Boston, as the "Diarist" of Dwight's Journal of Music, and somewhat also by his "Letters from a Quiet Man," published in this paper.

Here is another from the Worcester Palladium, which does justice to our friend's story-telling faculty, under his other name as "Mr. Brown":

A GOOD STORY.—We would call attention to the story on our first page, copied from Dwight's Journal of Music. It is a model for the story-writers of the day; one of its merits being the perfect concealment of the art used in its composition. It is a popular error to believe that nothing is easier than to write a story as this is written. On the contrary nothing is more difficult; involving more concentration of thought, more study of the power of language. It is from the pen of A. W. Thayer, Esq., the well-known "Diarist" of Dwight's Journal, who has recently sailed for Europe, to complete in Berlin and Vienna, his Life of Beethoven.

FLOTOW's Martha has been successfully performed in the Russian language, at St. Petersburg SPOHR has accepted an invitation to be present at the Jubilee of the Prague Conservatory; he has been asked to conduct the performance of his own opera, Jessonda.

LISZT's plan for establishing a musical conservatory on a grand scale in Vienna, it is said, will be carried out, under the patronage of a very high personage, and only waits the new arrangements for re-building a portion of the city. . . . The three hundred and first representation of Der Freyschütz, which was to have taken place in Berlin on the 18th of June, (the anniversary of its first performance), in aid of the fund for a monument to WEBER, was postponed, on account of the great heat, until the autumn.

The London Musical World does not at all agree with the Athenæum (copied on page 132), in the opinion that the late Mr. HORSLEY was "one of the best composers England has produced," and thinks he was decidedly an old fogey, who never could learn to admire anything after Haydn and Mozart and the earlier works of Beethoven. FRANZ ABT, the popular German song composer, has arrived in London. Mme. SZARVADY (Wilhelmina Clanss) left London for Paris the last week in June.

A German Singers' Festival was held in Davenport, Iowa, on the last three days of June. Herr ROHR, of Philadelphia, a chance visitor, conducted, in the unexpected absence of Herr BALATKA, of Milwaukee. A small orchestra, of twenty, played the overtures to Oberon and the Huguenots; the various Männerchöre sang part-songs, Mozart's O Isis und Osiris, &c., with fine effect; one of Beethoven's early Trios for piano, violin and 'cello was played; and various solos, German and Italian, such as Adelaide, Ah non credete, Casta Diva, &c., were sung with much acceptance.

FERDINAND HILLER's new oratorio, Saul, is spoken of both by friends and enemies as Wagnerish and Lisztian! RICHARD WAGNER's operas, which since 1849 have been tabooed in Dresden, have recently received permission to be performed again. Tannhäuser will lead off, and will derive new interest from the appearance of JOHANNA WAGNER, the composer's niece, in the part of Elizabeth. The HANDEL monument at Halle is approaching its completion; the plaster model, by Professor Heidel, of Berlin, is already finished. The statue of the composer, eight feet high, will, it is said, be an ornament to German Sculpture, with such beautiful simplicity, such truth and boldness is it executed; it will be placed on a granite pedestal of five feet in height. The desk, on which Handel leans, has carved upon its feet the figures of Orpheus and David; and the leaf, which bears the score of the "Messiah," shows on the outside St. Cecilia, in which the portrait of Jenny Lind is recognized.

Musical Review.

Juvenile Sonata, for Piano. By HENRY SCHWING (Oliver Ditson & Co.); pp. 7.

We are glad to see any disposition among piano teachers to familiarize their pupils with the Sonata form,—the most pregnant, most complete and interesting of all the forms of instrumental music, and the form in which more fine musical inspirations have embodied themselves than in any other. Of course form and spirit ought to go together; exercises should not be dry and empty; there should be the soul, the charm of real music in them; and therefore it were well, as soon as practicable, to have the young pianist study the easier Sonatas of the great masters that have poetry and beauty in them. But there is, also need of very simple, easy pieces in Sonata form by way of preparation. We have seen a couple by Schumann, which are interesting, perhaps not much too difficult, but hardly child-like in their spirit. Here is one, expressly juvenile, which promises to be quite useful. The first movement, Allegro moderato, develops a cheerful little theme and counter-theme in right Sonata fashion, and will not interest a child the less for its strict unity of idea and treatment. The other movements are a pretty enough little Scherzo and Trio, and a finale in the usual Rondo form. The omission of a slow movement, by way of contrast and completeness, seems one that ought to be supplied.

From the same publishers we have a variety of pieces arranged for practice of four, six, eight hands upon one and two pianos. For the formation of habits of greater unity and precision teachers sometimes like to combine and concentrate their pupils in this way; and for their own satisfaction two or three amateurs like sometimes to try the effect of parts of operas, overtures, &c., transcribed with such full harmony for the piano. We mention here:

1. The Three Amateurs, a collection of Six Trios for three performers on one Piano-Forte. Arranged by CARL CZERNY, op. 741. The one before us is a Fantasia of twenty-seven pages on airs from Mozart's operas, including "Batti, batti," "Non più andrai," airs from the "Magic Flute," Così fan tutte, &c. We have not heard them tried, but Czerny's name is good for all arrangements.

2. Grand Duet for two Pianos, (four hands), No. 3. Coronation Duet ("God save the Queen" and "Rule Britannia.") By HERZ and LERARRE. pp. 11. Wrought up in brilliant concert style, with variations.

3. Overture to Zampa, for eight hands (four performers) on two Pianos. Arranged by LATTENBERG.

4. Of a much easier and simpler sort are a collection of four-hand arrangements of things good, bad, and indifferent, but all popular, styled the "Constellation." No. 18 is ANT's song: "When the swallows homeward fly," arranged as a pianoforte duet by MUELLER.

Music Abroad.

London.

The three Opera Houses go on with the usual style of entertainment. At Her Majesty's it has been Lucrezia Borgia, Travatore, Luisa Miller, &c., with (by way of variety for a morning performance) Paesello's operetta, La Serva Padrona, so good an impression did it make at Benedict's concert. Mlle. Titiens continues to be the star.

At the Royal Italian they have had Fra Diavolo, Traviata, Martha, the Huguenots, and finally Otello, in which Tamberlik appeared in his great part of the Moor. Grisi was Desdemona, and Ronconi Iago.

At Drury Lane, I Puritani, Il Barbiere, and La Sonnambula have been performed. Mme. Persiani, Viardot Garcia, and Sig. Badiali are the attractions.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The sixth and last concert had the following programme:

Overture, "The Ruler of the Spirits;" Weber.
Aria, "Parto," Miss Louisa Pyne, clarinet obligato, Mr. Williams (La Clemenza di Tito); Mozart.
Concerto, violin (No. 8, scena cantante), Herr Joachim; Spohr.
Duetto, Misses Louisa and Susan Pyne, "Come, be gay" (Der Freischütz); Weber.
Overture, "Leonora;" Beethoven.

Sinfonia in B flat (No. 4); Beethoven.
Prière et Barcarole, Miss Louisa Pyne (L'Etoile du Nord); Meyerbeer.
Concerto, violin, Herr Joachim; Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Tannhäuser;" Wagner.
Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. Doc.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The programme of the fifth and last concert, June 14th, was as follows:

Overture (Medea); Cherubini.
Concerto, No. 6, piano-forte, Miss Arabella Goddard; Dussek.
Sonata, No. 5, violin, Herr Joachim; Bach.
Symphony Eroica; Beethoven.

Overture (Oberon); Weber.
Duet, "Schönes Mädchen," Madame Rudersdorf and Herr Reichardt; Spohr.
Romance in F, violin, Herr Joachim; Beethoven.
Overture (Ruy Blas); Beethoven.
Conductor, Dr. Wylde.

CHARLES HALLÉ. After helping, by his classical playing, to make the fortune of the Musical Union, M. Hallé has seceded from that institution and set up for himself. The concerts he is now giving at Willis's Rooms are of first-class interest, and attract brilliant and fashionable audiences. The programme of the first (Thursday afternoon, June 17) was as follows:

Trio in E major; Haydn.
Solo, violin, Praeludio, Loure and Gavotte in E major; S. Bach.
Grand Sonata, piano-forte and violin, in A minor, op. 47, dedicated to Kreutzer; Beethoven.
Stücke im Volkstone, piano-forte and violoncello, op. 102, No. 1, "Mit Humor," in A minor; No. 2, "Laugsam," in F; No. 4, "Nicht zu rasch," in D; Schumann.
Solo, piano-forte, Nocturne in F sharp, op. 15, "Berceuse," op. 57; Chopin.
Grand Trio in E flat, op. 70, No. 2; Beethoven.
Executants—Piano-forte, M. Charles Hallé; violin, Herr Joachim; violoncello, Signor Piatti.

That of the second (Thursday evening, June 24) was as follows:

Quartet, two violins, viola, violoncello, in F minor, op. 80 (Posth.); Mendelssohn.
Sonata, piano-forte and violoncello, in D, op. 102, No. 2; Beethoven.
Rondeau Brillant, piano-forte and violin, in B. minor, op. 70; F. Schubert.
Solo, piano-forte, "Promenades d'un solitaire," Nos. 1 and 4; Valses in C sharp minor and D flat; Heller and Chopin.
Grand Trio, piano, violin, and violoncello, in D, op. 70, No. 1; Beethoven.

Executants—Piano-forte, M. Charles Hallé; violins, Herr Joachim and Herr Pollitzer; viola, Mr. Webb; violoncello, Signor Piatti.

At the third and last (July 8) the programme will include Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for two pianofortes, performed by Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Charles Hallé, with orchestral accompaniments.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The great musical event of the season was fixed for the 2nd instant, to consist of a grand demonstration by the Great Handel Festival Choir, with orchestral and military bands, all numbering 2500. The 1400 London amateurs have been kept in constant practice and were to be reinforced by deputations from the provinces and from the continent. Costa was to conduct, Clara Novello and Sims Reeves to sing, and Mr. Brown-smith to preside at the great Handel Festival Organ. Here is the programme:

Chorale, The Hundredth Psalm.
Chant, "Venite, exultemus Domino;" Tallis.
Trio "Lift Thine eyes" (Elijah); Mendelssohn.
Chorus "He, watching over Israel;" (Elijah); Mendelssohn.
Chorus "When His loud voice;" (Jephtha); Handel.
Chorus "The Lord is good;" (Eli); Costa.
Quartet and Chorus, "Holy, holy, holy;" (Elijah); Mendelssohn.
Motet, "Ave verum corpus;" Mozart.
Song and Chorus, "Philistines, hark!" (Eli); Costa.

Chorus, "Oh, the Pleasure of the Plains;" (Acis and Galatea) Handel.
Part-song, "Farewell to the Forest;" Mendelssohn.
Chorus, "To thee, O Lord of all;" (Prayer—Mose in Egitto); Rossini.
Trio and Chorus, "See the Conquering Hero comes;" (Judas Maccabæus); Handel.
Solo and Chorus, "Calm is the glassy ocean;" (Idomeneo); Mozart.
Chorus, "Hear, Holy Power;" (Prayer—Masaniello); Auber.
Song and Chorus, "God save the Queen."

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD. On Saturday afternoon Miss Arabella Goddard gave one of her most interesting performances of classical piano-forte music, and achieved perhaps her greatest success before the public. The following was the programme:

Quartet in E flat, for piano-forte, violin, viola and violoncello, op. 53—Miss Arabella Goddard, Herr Joseph Joachim, Herr Goffric, and Signor Piatti; Dussek.
Grand Sonata in A minor, op. 42, first time in public—piano-forte, Miss Arabella Goddard; Franz Schubert.
Variations on an Original Air, for tenor and piano-forte—Herr Joseph Joachim and Miss Arabella Goddard; J. Joachim.

Suite de Pièces, in F ("Suites Anglaises," No. 4)—piano-forte, Miss Arabella Goddard; J. S. Bach.
Grand Sonata in A minor, for piano-forte and violin, op. 47, dedicated to Kreutzer; Miss Arabella Goddard and Herr Joseph Joachim; Beethoven.

Germany.

SCHWERIN. The only novelty here has been Flotow's operetta, Pianella. There has been great operatic activity during the past season, especially in the production of German works. Mozart's Figaro and Belmont and Constanza have each been given twice. Also Oberon twice; Freyschütz; Fidelio twice; Robert de Diable and the Huguenots; Mendelssohn's Loreley fragment; Marschner's Hans Heiling; Flotow's Martha twice, Andreas Mylius twice, Pianella three times, and Stradella; Kreutzer's Nachtlager in Granada twice; Wagner's Tannhäuser twice; and Schenk's Dorfbarbier. Of French and Italian compositions we have had Mehul's Joseph in Egypt twice; Auber's Maurer und Schlosser; Herold's Zampa; Halevy's Juive twice; Rossini's Barbiere, Tell twice, Otello; Bellini's Sonnambula, and Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia. In all 38 performances of 22 largo works.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE. The Whitsuntide committee has just presented Dr. Franz Liszt with a silver medallion portrait of himself, as a memento of his direction of last year's Whitsuntide concert. The artist, to whose chisel we owe the portrait, is Mohr, the sculptor, in Cologne, who has really produced a master-piece, as far as regards characteristic resemblance, speaking expression, and delicacy of modelling.

STUTTGART. Mozart's only buffo opera, Così fan tutte, was revived here in the middle of May, after a pause of thirty years. A new and excellent libretto had been prepared in place of the licentious nonsense of the old one. The principal singers were Mme. Leisinger, Fr. Mayerhöfer, Fr. Marschalk, Herren Pischek, Jäger and Schlütty. The whole performance is said to have been worthy of Mozart.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE. — May 20th. — Yesterday, the Cäcilien-Verein brought its regular meetings for practice to a close, with a little extempore concert for its passive members and subscribers, in a highly satisfactory manner. The works selected were, partly, such as had not been sung for several years, and were perfectly new to no inconsiderable portion of the younger members. In spite of this, the execution of them was very creditable and pleasing. Only a few of the more difficult choruses were repeated, for the sake of greater finish. We had the choruses of Mozart's Requiem, at least as many as are undoubtedly his, a grand "Crucifixus" for eight voices, by Lotti, Mendelssohn's wonderfully fervent "Ave Maria," Hauptmann's Cäcilien-Cantate, so rich in harmony, and Mendelssohn's fresh and dramatically effective first Walpurgisnacht. Such evenings, when smaller works, which have not been given for a considerable time, are sung at sight, are, leaving out of consideration the gratification they afford the singers and their audience, of the greatest use, especially to the singers, since the latter are exercised in singing at sight, and made acquainted with the rich stores of classical music possessed by the Verein. Unfortunately, they can seldom occur, on account of the rehearsals and practice requisite for the grand public concerts. The Cäcilien-Verein gave in all four concerts with a full band for the first time this winter. The pecuniary sacrifice involved was by no means inconsiderable, and it is reported that, in the opinion of the members, the experiment will scarcely become a permanent fact, principally owing to the want of accommodation. A cheering prospect of an interest being taken in such concerts by the general public is afforded by the hope of the society's building a concert-room of its own. The Mozartstiftung, set on foot here by the Liederkrantz, at the vocal festival of 1838, has taken the initiative. It has come forward with its funds, amounting to 38,000 florins, and founded a new society, called the Mozart-Verein. The sale of the shares has begun during the last few days, and been so brisk, that we can no longer entertain any doubt as to the realization of the plan. A very large plot of ground, conveniently situated opposite the old Bürger-Verein, has been obtained, and there is every chance of the new edifice being one worthy of our city, and fully adapted for its purpose. At the first public concert the High Mass of J. S. Bach, which has already been noticed in these columns, was performed. This was followed, on the 20th January, by Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, Mozart's "Ave verum," and Cherubini's Requiem, for mixed voices. The selection was extremely good. The psalm, though not one of the composer's greatest works, contains some magnificent choruses; the "Ave verum," with its heavenly clearness, and the grand Requiem, with its moving magnificence and loftiness, are too well known for us to say a single word about them in a paper destined for persons acquainted with serious music. The performance was, in every respect, admirable. While, in Mozart's prayer, the chorus of 175 male and female voices, swelled in flowing gentleness and died away in the softest strains, it rose, especially in the introduction to the "Dies Irae" to overpowering grandeur. Many persons were inclined to blame the employment of the gong in the latter piece, but if the employment of this instrument can be justified anywhere, it is certainly in this instance, where it is used once only, at the announcement of the Last Judgment.

On the 2nd April (Good Friday) followed, as on the preceding year, a performance of J. S. Bach's grand "Passion-Musik," according to St. Matthew, in the German Reformed Church. The organ again supported the chorales and grand choruses. The recitatives, on the other hand, were accompanied by the piano, gaining considerably and manifestly in quiet effect thereby. The solos were very well cast; Herr Carl Schneider sang the part of the Evangelist entirely according to the original version with a degree of perfection we never heard before. The chorus of nearly two hundred persons was supported in the Cantus firmus of the opening, and also, in the grand chorales, by one hundred and fifty pupils, male and female, of the Musterschule. This produced an unparalleled effect in a building so well adapted for the purpose as the church is. We can joyfully assert that, owing to this combination, the performance of the Passion was one of the greatest musical treats we ever had, and a real consecration of the religious festival for very many persons.

The last concert, on the 14th May, introduced to us Handel's Jephtha, for the first time with a full band. This last oratorio of the above master, which is sung scarcely anywhere in Germany, was incorporated by Messer, as early as 1841, in the repertory of the Cäcilien-Verein, but executed only once since, in 1844, and on both occasions with a pianoforte accompaniment. We have already severely criticized, in these columns, Von Mosel's orchestration, which, it cannot be denied, is not totally in keeping with the spirit of Handel's music. Nor can the violence with which choruses from Deborah are introduced in it, and material portions of the work itself omitted, be at all justified. But Herr Messer, who is thoroughly acquainted with Handel, has changed and simplified a great deal of the instrumentation. He has, also, restored, with instrumentation of his own, Jephtha's aria in G major, in the third part, "Schwebt, ihr Engel," as being one of the finest pieces, and quite indispensable for the connection of the whole. This piece sung in a masterly manner by Herr Carl Schneider, produced a profound impression. Both on account of its admirable and highly-poetical subject, which, by its strong contrasts, was excellently adapted for the composer, as well as on account of the freshness and great animation of the composition, expressing the most varied feelings, from the softest and gentlest to the most elevated, in the wonderful recitatives and mighty choruses, we place Jephtha side by side with Judas Maccabäus, Samson, and Israel in Egypt. The chorus in the second part, "Verhüllt, O Herr!" with its four motives, is, perhaps, one of the greatest choruses Handel ever wrote. Besides Herr C. Schneider, and Mad. Nissen-Saloman, who, with highly laudable readiness, undertook, on the day of the concert itself, the part of Ipsis, with which she was totally unacquainted, in the place of Fräulein Veith, suddenly taken ill, the members of the Association sang the other parts exceedingly well; and this performance, also, despite the oppressive heat of the densely crowded room, was perfectly successful. The Cäcilien-Verein now possesses in its repertory all the oratorios of Handel known in Germany, except Balsazar and Deborah. We trust the Handel-Gesellschaft will shortly enable the Association to study his other oratorios. The summer vacation will now commence; after that, Bach's Wah-nachts-Oratorium will be put in rehearsal. It will be performed at Christmas, and will, no doubt, take as firm root among us as the Matthäus-Passion. — Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

PRAGUE.—Programme of the 50th anniversary of the Prague Conservatory, to be held from the 7th to the 10th July, 1858. On the 7th July, at ten o'clock, A. M., a solemn high mass and Te Deum, in the St. Jacobskirche, in the Altstadt. At six o'clock, P. M., a grand concert of the Conservatory in the Ständisches Theater. The concerted pieces will be performed exclusively by pupils now in the institution, and the solos by artists educated there. On the 8th July, at seven, P. M., a grand performance in the Ständisches Theater. On the 9th July, at seven, P. M., a grand concert of sacred music, in the Ständisches Theater. A. The 100th Psalm, by Handel; B. The Ninth Symphony, with chorus, by L. van Beethoven, executed by the pupils of the Conservatory, the members of the Cäcilien-Verein, and of the orchestra of the Ständisches Theater, assisted by several artists and amateurs, as well as by such visitors as may choose to take part in the proceedings. On the 10th July, a grand dinner, given by the Association for the Advancement of Music, to the visitors and persons engaged in the Festival, namely — A. Persons specially invited, Conservatories of Music, and former pupils at the Conservatory at Prague. B. All working-members of the Association for the Advancement of Music in Bohemia. C. The professors and teachers of the Prague Conservatory. D. All musical amateurs who may signify their wish to be present, and pay ten florins currency for their tickets.

VIENNA.—Herr Eckert, who has returned from Paris, has engaged Mdle. Brand, from Brunswick, for play-operas, and Mdle. Prause, who achieved her first success, years ago, at the Imperial Opera, as bravura singer. As we hear, Mdle. Titiens will leave the Imperial Opera, having accepted a brilliant engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre, London. Signor Giuglini, Imperial Austrian chamber-singer, is again engaged as first tenor at the Imperial Opera, for the season of 1861. He will previously proceed to America, where he is engaged for seven months, at the rate of 16,000 florins a month. Mad. Charton-Demeure the graceful representative of Susanne, has been appointed chamber-singer by his Majesty the Emperor. The Italian operatic company has, at present, no less than six Cantante e Cantanti di Camera di S.M.I.R.A., namely, Mesdames Medori, Brambilla, Charton-Demeure, MM. Bettini, Carion, and Debassini. The well-known Mecenas of Art, Count Dietrichsen, has made Mad. Demeure a valuable present, consisting of two rare autographs MSS. by Mozart, an aria of a serious kind, and an arietta to — an aching tooth.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

- Highland blossom. Song. W. V. Wallace. 50
This is a beautiful song in that refined imitation of the Scotch style, for which the Composer is famous. The Titlepage has a charming vignette in colors.
- Norah, darling, don't believe them! Ballad. Balfe. 25
A simple, very touching appeal of a lover. Balfe's prolific pen sometimes runs in a highly popular vein, as in this instance.
- Little Norah. Ballad. E. T. Baldwin. 25
A plaintive, simple little Song.
- My home o'er the deep blue sea. Song and Ch. Della Dean. 25
Pretty, with a chorus of fine effect, written in sixteenth time, the genuine time for all Water-Songs. Recommended to social gatherings of musical people, either in the parlor or on board of a pleasure-boat, homeward bound.
- Give, give us light. Cho. in "The Buccaneer." Stratton. 25
May be tried with success by Singing Societies. Will remain effective when sung by a well-balanced Quartet.
- Morning wandering. Duet for two equal voices. Gumbert. 25
This is the second of a series of eight little Duets, which are written and composed expressly for the young folks. Modern German composers have written very felicitously for children. There is nothing commonplace in these melodies. Each song has an individual charm of its own, which will be readily understood and appreciated by musical people.
- The May Queen. Chorus for 3 female voices. Concone. 30
Concone, a teacher of singing in Paris, who has made his name celebrated by a number of Vocalises and Sol-feggios, which are extensively used here as well as in Europe, has arranged a number of concerted pieces for the use of young misses at Seminars or Colleges. They are mostly for 3 voices, and may be sung by one or fifty voices on a part; some very easy, and a few difficult. All of them are pleasing and of acknowledged merit. The "May queen" is one of the most simple ones. This Collection will be found truly invaluable by Teachers in Ladies' Schools. Other numbers will follow soon.

Instrumental.

- Practical Five-Finger Exercises. Opus 802. Czerny. 75
Czerny designates this work of his an "indispensable Companion to every Pianoforte School." Among the various compilations of Finger Exercises which are now in use, Czerny's is certainly one of the best. It shows everywhere the Teacher of vast experience and the Pupil of sound judgment. It has long been conceded that these technical exercises, dry as they are, are absolutely necessary to obtain an even touch and that equality of Fingers, which is so very desirable in the execution of classical music.
- Daily Studies in the major and minor Scales, for Teacher and Pupil. Opus 107. Book 1. I. Moscheles. 2,50
Here is a work of sterling value, showing in every particular the hand of a master. These so-called daily Studies embrace "59 Characteristic Pieces," Duets for Teacher and Pupil. The peculiarity of these duets is, that the part of the pupil consists of nothing but scales, ascending and descending, both hands in unison, and of an infinite variety in rhythm. With the part of the teacher a new element is introduced. This part is so full of melodic and harmonic beauties, of striking and original ideas, that it is difficult to conceive, how two parts, so utterly different in everything, should nevertheless be firmly linked to each other by the subtle laws of harmony. These duets furnish the means to make even the study of the Scales agreeable, interesting and instructive.
- Hoop de dooden do Galop. D'Albert. 30
- English Polka. " 25
- Young Canadian Schottisch. Bretzger. 25
Late Dance music, fresh and spirited, and arranged for the Piano in an easy style.

BERBIGUIER'S METHOD FOR THE FLUTE.
To which are added Drouet's Twenty-Four Studies in all the Keys. Price $2.50.

This is a course of lessons of real, practical ability; one which is prepared, not merely for the object of getting up a book, but with the far higher aim of furnishing to all who wish to acquire a good knowledge of the use of the Flute a means of doing so in a thorough, masterly manner. The book has been successfully employed by the best teachers in Europe, and to beginners, as well as to those who, having some acquaintance with the Flute wish to obtain a better knowledge of it, we recommend this Method as one of unusual excellence, and one that cannot fail to give them entire satisfaction.

Song.

(From the German of FR. KUHLER.)

Thou'rt like unto a still and starry night—
Upon thy lips a tender secret lies,
And in the silent depths of thy dark eyes,
I know it well and honor it aright.

Thou'rt like unto a still and starry night—
My eye is weary of the daylight's glare,
And with a stranger's heart I wander there,
Bewildered by its shifting forms of light.

Thou'rt like unto a still and starry night—
Oh, hold me wrapped in thy encircling arms!
There can unfold, within those sacred calms,
My heart's pale flowers, that daylight's beams affright.

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

IV. MUSIC AND THE ARTS—LISZT—"L'AMI DE BEETHOVEN"—DOEHLER—VIEUXTEMPS AND OTHER BELGIAN VIOLINISTS—Mlle. LOEWE—"ADELAIDE"—MEYERBEER.

PARIS, April 20. 1841.

Soon after the July revolution, Painting and Sculpture, and indeed Architecture, received a joyful impulse; but their wings were only fastened on externally, and their forced flight was followed by the most pitiable fall. Only the young sister Art, Music, had risen by her own original and native force. Has she already reached her highest point of light? Will she long sustain herself there? Or will she quickly fall? These are questions which only a later generation can answer. It seems, at all events, as if in the annals of Art our present age would have to be distinguished as preëminently the age of music. With the gradual refinement of the human race the arts keep even step. In the earliest period Architecture necessarily stood forth alone, glorifying mere rude unconscious mass, as we see, for instance, with the Egyptians. Afterwards we see in the Greeks the blooming period of Sculpture; and this already announces an outward control of matter: the soul chiselled a prophetic sense in stone. Still the soul found the stone much too hard for its need of revealing itself in higher and higher expressions, and it chose color, mingled light and shade, to represent a glorified and twilight world of love and sorrow. Then arose the great period of Painting, which unfolded in full splendor at the end of the Middle Age. With the development of self-conscious life in men, the plastic gift first disappears, and finally the sense of color, which is always bound to definite form and outline, also goes out; and the heightened spirituality, the abstract power of thought, grasps after sounds and tones, in order to express a stammering transcendentalism, which perhaps is nothing but the dissolution of the whole material world. Music is perhaps the last word of Art, as death is the last word of life.

I have made this short prefatory remark, to show why the musical season causes me more pain than pleasure. That we are almost drowned here in mere music; that there is hardly a single house in Paris in which one may find an ark of refuge from this sounding deluge; that the noble tone-art overflows our whole life,—this, for me, is a suspicious sign, and often it affects me with an uneasiness which aggravates itself into the most morose injustice towards our great virtuosos and maîtres. Under these circumstances one must not expect from me too blithe a song of praise for the man about whom such delirious, enthusiastic jubilee is kept up here, just now, by the fine world, especially the hysterical lady-world, and who is, in fact, one of the most remarkable representatives of the musical movement. I speak of FRANZ LISZT, the genial* pianist. Yes, the genial one is here again, and giving concerts, which exert a charm that borders on the fabulous. Beside him, all piano-players vanish—with the exception of a single one, of CHOPIN, the Raphael of the piano-forte. In fact, with this single exception, all the other pianists that we have heard in countless concerts this year, are mere piano-players; they shine by the facility with which they handle the wire-strung wood. With Liszt, on the contrary, you think no more of difficulties overcome; the keyboard vanishes, and Music is revealed. In this respect Liszt has made the most wonderful progress since we heard him last. With this excellence there is coupled a repose, which we formerly missed in him. Then, when he played, for example, a storm on the piano, we saw the lightnings quiver over his own face, his limbs shook as before the storm-wind, and his long locks dripped as if it were with the splashing rain he represented. Now, let him play the most violent thunder-storm, he rises high above it all himself, like the traveller who stands upon the summit of an Alp, while it is storming in the valley: the clouds lie deep below him, the lightnings writhe like serpents at his feet, his head uplifts be smilingly into the pure ether.

In spite of his geniality, Liszt meets with an opposition here in Paris, which consists of serious musicians for the most part, and which reaches the laurel to his rival, the imperial THALBERG. Liszt has already given two concerts, in which, contrary to all custom, he has played entirely alone, without the aid of other artists. He is now preparing a third concert, in aid of the monument to Beethoven. This composer must, in fact, best suit the taste of a Liszt. For Beethoven drives spiritualistic Art to that sounding agony of the phenomenal world, to that annihilation of Nature, that fills me with an awe which I cannot conceal, although my friends shake their heads about it. To me it is a very significant circumstance, that Beethoven, in his last days, was deaf, and that the invisible tone-world had actually no sonorous reality any longer for him. His tones were only reminiscences of a tone, ghosts of sounds died away, and his last productions bear an unearthly death-mark on their brow.

*The word geniale, in German, means full of genius, the adjective retaining the sense of the noun.—Ed.

Less awful than Beethoven's music was, for me, the friend of Beethoven, L'Ami de Beethoven, as he here everywhere announced himself, I think even on his visiting cards. A black hop-pole of a man, with a terrible white cravat, and the mien of one who bids people to funerals. Was this friend of Beethoven really his Pylades? Or was he one of those indifferent acquaintances with whom a man of genius sometimes is all the more fond of associating, the more insignificant they are, and the more prosaic their babble, since it gives him refreshment after exhausting flights of the poetic soul? At all events, we saw here a new way of exploiting genius, and the small papers jested not a little over the Ami de Beethoven. "How could the great artist tolerate such an unquicken, insipid friend!" exclaimed the French, who lost all patience over the monotonous twaddle of that tedious guest. They did not consider that Beethoven was deaf.

The number of concert-givers, during the past season, has been legion; and there has been no lack of mediocre pianists, who have been praised as miracles in the public prints. Most of them are young people, who, in their own modest persons, beg these praises of the press. Self-deifications of this sort, the so-called reclames, form very entertaining reading. A reclame which recently appeared in the Gazette Musicale, announced from Marseilles, that the celebrated DOEHLER had there too captivated all hearts, and particularly through his interesting paleness, which, being the consequence of a dangerous illness, had claimed the attention of the beau monde. The celebrated Döhler has since then returned to Paris, and has given several concerts. He plays, in fact, finely, neatly, and daintily. His delivery is charming, shows an astonishing nimbleness of fingers, but betokens neither strength nor soul. Ornate feebleness, elegant impotence, interesting paleness.

Among the concerts of this year, which still ring in the ears of Art-lovers, belong the matinées given by the publishers of the two musical journals to their subscribers. The France Musicale, edited by the brothers Escudier, shone in its concert through the coöperation of the Italian singers and the violinist, VIEUXTEMPS, who was considered one of the lions of the musical season. Whether under the shaggy skin of this lion was concealed a true king of beasts, or only a poor donkey, I am unable to determine. Honestly, I can give no credence to the excessive praises that have been bestowed on him. It will seem to me as if he had not yet climbed to any great height on the artistic ladder. Vieuxtemps stands somewhere about the middle of that ladder, on whose summit we once beheld Paganini, and on whose last and lowest round stands our excellent Sina, the famous watering-place guest of Boulogne, and possessor of an autograph of Beethoven. Perhaps M. Vieuxtemps stands much nearer to M. Sina than to Nicolo Paganini.

Vieuxtemps is a son of Belgium, and most of the important violinists proceed from the Netherlands. There the fiddle is the national instrument, cultivated by both great and small, by man and woman, from of old, as we may see by the Dutch pictures. The most distinguished violinist of this origin is unquestionably DE BERIOT, the husband of MALIBRAN. I cannot help imagining that the soul of his deceased wife sits in his violin, and sings. Only ERNST, the poetic Bohemian, knows how to woo from his instrument such melting, bleeding tones of sweet complaint. A countryman of De Beriot is ARTOT, also a distinguished violinist, but in whose playing one is never reminded of a soul: a trim and well-turned fellow, whose delivery is as smooth and shining as oil cloth. HAUMANN, the son of the Brussels book pirate, drives his father's trade upon the violin; he fiddles you neat copies from the most excellent violinists, the text here and there garnished with superfluous original notes, and enlarged with brilliant misprints. The brothers FRANCO-MENDEZ, who also have given concerts this year, in which they have shown their talent as violin-players, certainly hail from the land of drag-boats and Dutch dolls. The same is true of BATTÀ, the violoncellist; he is a born Hollander, but came at an early age to Paris, where he charmed the ladies by his boyish youthfulness. He was a dear child, and wept upon his violin like a child. Although he in course of time became a young man, yet he never can leave off the sweet habit of crying. Lately, when he could not appear in public on account of indisposition, it was a common saying, that through his childish weeping on the violoncello, he had finally played himself into an actual child's disease, I think the measles. But he seems to have quite recovered, and the newspapers announce that the celebrated Battà will next Thursday give a musical matinée, which will compensate the public for the long absence of its favorite.

The last concert, given by M. Maurice Schlesinger to the subscribers of his Gazette Musicale, was, as I have said, one of the most brilliant of the season, and of peculiar interest to us Germans. Here, too, all our countrymen were assembled, eager to hear Mlle. LOEWE, the admired singer, who sang the beautiful song of Beethoven, Adelaide, in the German tongue. The Italians and M. Vieuxtemps, who had promised their assistance, sent in their excuses during the concert, to the greatest confusion of the concert-giver, who, with his peculiar dignity, stepped before the public and explained: that M. Vieuxtemps would not play, because he did not consider the place and the public suited to him! The insolence of that fiddler deserves the sharpest censure. The place of the concert was the Musard hall, in the Rue Vivienne, where the Can-can is only danced little during the Carnival, but where, all the rest of the year, the most respectable music of Mozart, Giacomo Meyerbeer, and Beethoven, is executed. To Italian singers, to a Signor Rubini, or a Signor Lablache, one pardons such humors; in nightingales we must put up with the pretension, that they will only sing before a company of eagles and gold-pheasants. But Meyerbeer, the Flemish stork, must not be so dainty, nor despise a company among whom are found the honestest sort of birds, peacocks and guinea hens, and among the rest, the most distinguished German dunghill cocks. But what was the success of Mlle. Loewe's debut? I will tell the whole truth briefly: she sang admirably, pleased all the Germans, and made a fiasco with the Frenchmen.

As to this last misfortune, I might console the respected singer with the assurance that it was her very excellencies that stood in the way of a French success. In the voice of Mlle. Löwe there is German soul, a quiet thing, which so far has revealed itself to but few Frenchmen, and finds but gradual admission into France. Had Mlle. Löwe come some decades later, she would perhaps have found greater recognition. But to this day the mass of the people are ever the same. The French have esprit and passion, and they enjoy both most highly in an unquiet, stormy, and exciting form. Such they missed entirely in the German singer, who moreover sang to them Beethoven's Adelaide. This tranquil sighing forth of the soul,—these blue-eyed, languishing tones of forest solitude,—these linden blossoms turned into song, with moonlight obligato,—this dying away in super-earthly longing,—this real German song, found no echo in the French breast, and was in fact, sneered at as trans-Rhenish sentimentality.

Although Mlle. Löwe found no favor here, yet all possible means were used to procure her an engagement for the Royal Academy of Music. The name of MEYERBEER was used more frequently on this occasion than was perhaps agreeable to the honored master. Is it true that Meyerbeer would not suffer his new opera to be performed unless they engaged Mlle. Löwe? Has Meyerbeer really made the fulfilment of the public's wish dependent on so trivial a condition? Is he actually so overmodest that he imagines the success of his new work depends on the more or less flexible throat of a prima donna?

The numerous worshippers and admirers of this admirable master are grieved to see what unspeakable pains he takes with every new production of his genius, to secure its success, and how he squanders his best powers upon the most minute details of that sort. His delicate and feeble physique must suffer under it. His nerves are morbidly excited, and with his chronic difficulties he is often attacked with the prevailing mild form of cholera. The intellectual honey that drops from his masterworks of music, to inspire us, costs the master himself the most fearful bodily pains. When I last had the honor to see him, I was frightened at his miserable aspect. Heaven send our honored master better health, and may he never forget that his life's thread is very thin, and the shears of the Parcæ all the sharper! May he never forget what high interests are bound up in his good care of himself! What would become of his fame, should he, the highly-honored master, (which may Heaven forbid!) suddenly be torn from the theatre of his triumphs by death? Will his family continue it, that fame of which all Germany is proud? The family, to be sure, will not lack the material means, but it may lack the intellectual. Only the great Giacomo himself, who is not only general music-director of all the royal Prussian institutions, but also chapel-master of the Meyerbeer prestige,—only he can direct the monster orchestra of this same prestige.

He nods with his head, and all the trombones of the great journals resound unisono; he winks with his eyes, and all the violins of praise fiddle as for a wager; he moves but slightly the left nostril, and all the feuilleton flageolets flute forth their sweetest, most caressing tones. Then, too, there are unheard-of antediluvian wind instruments, Jericho trumpets, and yet undiscovered wind-harps, stringed instruments of the future, whose use betokens the most extraordinary gift of instrumentation. Indeed, no composer in so high a degree as our Meyerbeer, has understood the art of instrumentation, especially the art of using all possible men as instruments, the smallest as well as the greatest, and, by their coöperation, of conjuring forth a harmony of public recognition, bordering on the fabulous. That is what no other ever understood. While the best operas of Mozart and Rossini fell through at the first performance, and years passed away before they were truly appreciated, the masterworks of our noble Meyerbeer find already the most undivided favor on their first production, and on the very next day all the journals furnish the desired articles of praise and glorification. This is done by the harmonious co-working of instruments; in melody, Meyerbeer must yield the palm to the two masters above-named; but he surpasses them through instrumentation. Heaven knows that he often makes use of the meanest instruments; but perhaps by this very means he brings out grand effects upon the multitude, who admire him, worship him, and even esteem him. Who can prove the contrary? On all sides fly to him the laurel crowns. He wears upon his head a whole grove of laurels; he hardly knows how to leave them, and he pants under their green burden. He ought to buy himself a donkey, that should trot behind him, carrying the heavy wreaths. But Gouin is jealous, and will not suffer any other to accompany him.

I cannot refrain from mentioning here a bon mot, which is ascribed to the musician FERDINAND HILLER. When some one asked him what he thought of Meyerbeer's operas, Hiller, with a bored and evasive manner, answered: "Oh, let us not talk politics!"

Musical Music.

The first requisite of music certainly is,—that it be musical. We hear, nevertheless, much, very much, music now-a-days that has not this essential quality. In the drawing-room, in the church, in the concert-room, may be heard very unmusical music. So many notes in a measure, so many notes on a page, we are fast being taught do not by any means signify music—properly so considered.

And yet, musical music is not so very difficult to define. It has three essential qualities: first, melody—fresh and pure from the living springs. Second, harmony—chaste and refined. Third, rhythm—tasteful and varied. The composer of music, then, must, perforce, in its truest sense, be first a melodist; second, a harmonist; third, a time-ist. Of these necessary qualifications the first is indispensable—and yet how very rare the melodic gift! The second is more a matter of education and training. The third is a universal talent, denied to comparatively but few.

Now, if we investigate what may be termed unmusical music, we shall find lacking chiefly the first two of these essential requisites. Fresh, salient melody is nowhere to be discovered. Rich—even passable harmonies, are equally lacking, and in their place very unchaste and crude harmonies.

A composition without fresh and definite melody is like a poem without a new thought—no sparkle in it, no life. A composition, again, abounding in such positive dissonances as we hear now-a-days, is like a dish of red pepper, salt, and vinegar, with no assuaging oil and no salad to make it go down easy.

Now, that a composer is not a natural melodist, is hardly his own fault—he cannot help it. Melody is the soul of musical art, and the soul of anything is inspired—it is a sparkle of divinity. Not being a melodist, he ought, of course, never to have been a composer. But that is his mistake—generally an unconscious mistake with all such men. But that he is a dissonant and impure harmonist is his fault—because proper education and proper training of the ear ought to have provided against this. The rage for dissonances—positive, downright dissonances—is, strange to say, the musical mania of the present day. The auditory sense of composers has become so morbid and unhealthy in its appetite for spices, that it is all red pepper and vinegar, and nothing else. Listen only to some of the music of otherwise fine composers, like Robert Schumann, and the still more rampant Wagner—why, the men seem sometimes dissonance-crazy.

Now, a dissonance is, in itself, a painful thing. It is only pleasant after it has passed—that is, when the discord becomes a concord. But dissonances to such men seem per se, in and of themselves pleasant. They accumulate and multiply them; they dwell on them; they brood morbidly on and among them; no sooner happily out of one than they pop you upon another.

Why do they this?—one might reasonably ask. We really believe, for our own part, because, not having, to any great extent, the gift of melody, they labor to make this good by arresting and retaining people's attention with strange and bizarre harmonies. Their best quality is, that they are generally ingenious time-ists. Their rhythms are often new, piquant, and attractive. They have also fluency—there is no lack of notes: we often wish, before they get through, that they had much less of them.

Now, setting aside melody, which there is no use in talking about—if a man have it not he can never get it—if one would see what can be done with harmony, let one listen only to Mozart's orchestration; or even observe his harmonies in simple piano-forte music. How charmingly everything sounds! How round, how smooth, how clear! How entirely satisfactory to the ear; how grateful to the most sensitive musical organization! If a dissonance come, it seems but a round pebble in the bed of the brook; so fitly is it introduced that it makes the stream of melody gurgle only the sweeter. We have often asked ourselves why these harmonies sound so well; and one great secret, we think, is, that they are so well-dispersed. But this is a point which would lead us to too great length here to enlarge upon. Musical music, however, is, par excellence, the music of Mozart. There never has been, and we venture to say that there never will be, any music so absolutely musical as that of this wonderful man. It is a balm for wounded ears, after Schumann, Wagner, and all the painful rest of it, to revel in a small instalment of Mozart. Try it, suffering musical soul, try it!

One reason of our modern unmusical music lies in a melancholy fact, to which we will briefly advert. There is such a thing as manufactured music. Art, generally, in all its departments, as artists sadly know, can be, and is, manufactured. We will cite a case in which the manufacture of music is too often induced.

A composer, for instance, has made a happy hit in a composition which has commanded a large sale. He soon receives a proposition from a publisher to furnish him with compositions for the market; and he entertains this proposition. Very well—thus far there is nothing incompatible with Art, or the high ends and aims of a true artist. An artist must live, like any other man; and the most elevated art is a thing to be bought and sold. If the proposition of the publisher, therefore, prove but a spur and healthy encouragement to the artist, and he go on composing in his own way, and following the bent of his own genius, the publisher taking all he produces and bringing it before the public eye—why, this is all legitimate and right. But if the artist, on receiving the proposition, leave the upper world of Art, where his fancy has always freely revelled, and descend to the world of trade—or otherwise, if the publisher step in between the artist and his genius, if he lay a fetter on his wing, and say: "Now, I want you to compose for me, and not for yourself; I want wares for the market—saleable things. Give me the things not that you want, but that I want. Compose popularly, furnish polkas, mazurkas, negro minstrel songs with choruses, &c. &c. &c.;"—why, then the composer forfeits his position as an artist and becomes a music manufacturer—awaiting orders from the music merchant, who disposes of his wares.

No! In case such a proposition be made to an artist, he should say to the publisher: "My friend, it is very natural for you to wish to put my fancy in harness, you holding the reins and driving it to such artistic gold diggings as seem to promise the greatest yield. This is natural in you, because music with you is a business—and I suppose business means money; but music, with me, is an art. It is, first of all, an art; second, it is name and fame; third and last, it is money. I cannot invert this view of it, and consider it first as money, without inverting my nature. When I set about composing, if I be true to myself and my heaven-imparted gift, I must forget you and trade altogether. I cannot compose with a gold dollar in the palm of my hand, or with its image in my heart. The moment I should try to do this; the wing of my fancy would be lamed. I could not soar. No; it is very civil of you to make this offer, but you mistake me. Let me follow the bent of my own wayward fancies. I will then submit to you the result; you can thereupon, if you will, pass judgment upon it as merchandise. I, and others perhaps, will have our artistic opinion; each will judge from his own stand-point, and each will be right in his way. Take my apparently saleable compositions, then—but take the others, too; for it is best that you should do something for the credit of your house as a publisher—something for Art, as well as for money. Besides, publishers cannot always tell what will eventually prove most profitable. The lighter fancy wares which command the quickest sale, command also the shortest sale. Things of slow, continuous sale are always in the end most profitable—and such productions are always the most meritorious. Think of this. Let me continue to be an artist, while you continue to be a very excellent merchant. The interest of each lies in the perfect independence and apart-ness of the other."

This is the way that an author and publisher, in our view, should talk together. But this is not always the way they do talk. The poor artist—Heaven help him!—the moment he catches a glimpse of gold, or even assured daily bread-and-butter—is but too willing to sell his noble birthright; to yield to any commercial fetter, and to be ad captivandum to the publisher's content; thereby sacrificing, in too many instances, his independence, his self-respect, and the respect of his fellow-artists.

It would not be at all a difficult matter to lay editorial finger on quite a number of music-manufacturers in this country—men who are really artistically compromised, having sacrificed their birthright; who are much more wronging themselves, however, than they are wronging the public or the world of Art. But this would be a very obnoxious task. Besides, such men themselves know it better than any one else can inform them of it; they know it, in some instances, we doubt not, sadly, bitterly better than they could ever be told—for gold-enslaved genius is always a very humiliated and wretched genius.

Music at the N. E. Institution for the Blind.

MR. EDITOR:—On my arrival in Boston I happened to have a ticket offered to me which would admit me, to-day, at the Institution for the Blind. Having always taken an interest in charitable schools, and being somewhat acquainted with the Institutions for the Blind in New York and Philadelphia, I gladly accepted the offer. The building has a fine and elevated situation in South Boston. Its beautiful view over Boston and her harbor is lost to the inmates, but not so the oxygen contained in the winds which have free access on every side. A spacious playground invites the boys to run about, and the large attic story in the house, with swings and other contrivances, is open to the girls for gymnastic exercises. Baths in fresh and salt, cold and warm, water, are regularly taken, and the physical health of the pupils is apparently well cared for. There are neither public examinations nor strict exhibitions at this institution. Those who get a "permit" are free to visit it on Thursday, at a set hour, and then the teachers offer such entertainment as is thought best. The time allowed to visitors is very short (from eleven to half past twelve o'clock,) fully taken up, and leaves to the guest hardly a minute to put a few questions for information to her who shows the company around. Very little idea can be got of the method and course of teaching, and the progress of single scholars cannot be observed at all, even by those who should happen to go there on a visit quite often. The girls' school-room offered, to-day, nothing new, or even as good as can be seen at any of the weekly exhibitions at Philadelphia; but it is justice to observe that scholars are here admitted when quite young. We saw several girls who could hardly be seven or eight years old. Many were apparently under twelve, an age which, in other similar institutions, is one of the conditions for admittance. We were told that considerable attention is given to plain sewing and general housework, two points certainly very useful to all, but more so to those of the poorer and foreign classes, who, after leaving this house, will have to depend on the work of their hands. We should have liked to purchase a little head chair or basket, but they were carefully locked up in a showcase; and when finally the case was opened we found ourselves in the midst of a stream of human beings, who followed their guide to another part of the house. Neither Oliver Caswell nor Laura Bridgman could be seen. The former left the institution several years ago; the latter has not been here for four months, but may be expected back at some future time. On our journey to the library we observed telegraph wires leading to a bell. On inquiry, we were told that this telegraph apparatus was put up a few months ago, but failed to work, and was superseded by a large hand-bell, the powerful sound of which we had occasion to experience.

The library is connected with two large rooms by folding doors, which were thrown open. A violin class, numbering fourteen lads, were performing some pieces. The first violin part had all the melody, which was in a simple way accompanied by the three lower parts. The execution, the position of the body, and the bowing, showed that a good and systematic beginning had been made, which was put to practical use as soon as possible. We always have pitied primary-school teachers on account of their monotonous task; but to-day we pitied still more the gentleman who taught this class. The former have at least plenty of time, and the hope that the work will be continued in higher classes; while this class of players, with but three hours' time a week for instruction and practice, can have but little hope of great advancement. On inquiry, the teacher told us that the more advanced players commenced taking lessons three years ago; that of a class of fourteen boys who began eighteen months ago, only four remained to play the second violin; the others had left the institution, were dismissed from the class, or were absent on account of sickness. Whether under such depressing circumstances it would not be better to give up all instruction on the violin entirely, as it is done in the New York Institution, is difficult to decide. We were told that there also exists a brass band, numbering twenty players, but we did not hear them play.

At a quarter before twelve o'clock we were led to the Chapel, which was well filled with visitors. It is well ventilated, light, and pleasant. The organ in the midst, with two busts of benefactors of the institution at the sides, decorate the scholars' platform. While we were snugly seated there, we examined the state of our feelings, in order to ascertain among which of the ten classes of listeners the editor of the New York Musical World would count us. We resolved to behave like one of the tenth, if we could. During a solemn voluntary, finely played by a young lady, on the organ, all the pupils, numbering about seventy, took their seats. Then the teacher came forward, struck a few chords on the grand piano, and all the scholars sang the beautiful four-part song by Mendelssohn: "Deep silence reigns," entitled "Morning Prayer." This was immediately followed by the chorus: "Awake the harp," from Haydn's "Creation." Both pieces were rendered without fault, and produced a deep effect upon the assembly. Four pieces were played upon the piano; two sets of variations by Herz, one duet, and a waltz. They were all rendered in good time, and with much expression, but not without considerable nervous excitement and some marked difference in the touch. All the players labored hard to do well, and seemed to rejoice when their task was done. A little song, "The Fly and the Spider," was sung well by a little colored girl, who, with her sweet and rich voice, may become a fine singer. She seemed to be perfectly self-possessed and happy during the singing. Two more four-part songs by Mendelssohn, "Farewell to the Forest," and "Take a last Farewell," (Comitat), were given; the latter with a great deal of expression and feeling, and in excellent time and tune; while in the former the contralto was too prominent and the bass too feeble. A vacation song, composed by one of the teachers, (Miss Mitchell,) with music by Miss Browne, a former pupil of this institution, was sung without accompaniment, with very good effect. The "Gloria in excelsis Deo," from one of Haydn's Masses, was sung in Latin words. The singers did very well, but it would have been better if the teacher had played the organ instead of the piano-forte. The exercises were concluded and crowned by the last choruses of Handel's "Messiah," "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." Well did the full organ, with its loudest strains, come in to sound the praise of our Redeemer. Well did the countenances of the singers brighten as the concluding words, "Forever, Amen," were sung. They felt what they were singing, and seemed to be sure that others must feel it also. Truly, good influences must be planted in the hearts of the pupils by such singing; and hard as the teacher's task is, he must feel glad to see such results. Such a performance would have been acceptable in any concert-room in our land, even if these pieces had been especially prepared for the occasion. We lingered in the chapel as long as we could, and succeeded in getting some additional information. The pupils have a lesson in singing every day. They sing, at present, thirteen choruses by Haydn, Handel, Mozart, and Rossini; thirty-six glees and songs for two, three, or four parts; and forty sacred tunes in four parts, for which the hymns have been printed in raised letters. The farewell song was sung with more than common feeling, from the fact that the present teacher of music, Mr. ANSORGE, leaves the institution at the end of this month. Mr. CAMPWELL has been appointed as his successor, and from his long experience in teaching the blind, it is hoped, will succeed in carrying on the work so nobly begun and continued by his predecessors.

"Old Hundred."

In a rustic old church opposite, while we write, a company of worshippers are singing the old, old hymn, "Be thou, O God, exalted high." The air is old, also; the immortal "Old Hundred."

If it be true that Luther composed that tune, and if the worship of immortals is carried on the wings of angels to heaven, how often has he heard the declaration: "They are singing 'Old Hundred' now."

The solemn strain carries us back to the time of the Reformers—Luther and his devoted band. He, doubtless, was the first to strike the grand old chords in the public sanctuary of his own Germany. From his own stentorian lungs they rolled, vibrating not through vaulted cathedral roof, but along a grander arch, the eternal heavens. He wrought into each note his own sublime faith, and stamped it with that faith's immortality. Hence it cannot die! Neither men nor angels will let it pass into oblivion.

Can you find a tomb in the land where sealed lips lay that have not sung that tune? If they were gray, old men, they had heard or sung "Old Hundred." If they were babes, they smiled as their mothers rocked them to sleep singing "Old Hundred." Sinner and saint have joined with the endless congregation, where it has, with and without the pealing organ, sounded on sacred air. The dear little children looking with wondering eyes on this strange world, have lisped it. The sweet young girl whose tombstone told of sixteen summers, she whose pure and innocent face haunted you with its mild beauty, loved "Old Hundred," and as she sang it, closed her eyes, and seemed communing with the angels who were so soon to claim her. He whose manhood was devoted to the service of his God, and who with faltering steps ascended the pulpit stairs with white hand placed over his laboring breast, loved "Old Hundred." And though sometimes his lips only moved, away down in his heart, so soon to cease its throbs, the holy melody was sounding. The dear white-headed father, with his tremulous voice! how he loved "Old Hundred." Do you see him now, sitting in the venerable arm-chair, his arms crossed over the top of his cane, his silvery locks floating off from his hollow temples, and a tear, perchance, stealing down his furrowed cheeks, as the noble strains ring out? Do you hear that thin, quivering, faltering sound, now bursting forth, now listened for, almost in vain? If you do not, we do; and from such lips, hallowed by fourscore years in the Master's cause, "Old Hundred" sounds indeed a sacred melody.

You may fill your churches with choirs, with Sabbath prima donnas, whose daring notes emulate the steeple, and cost almost as much, but give us the spirit-stirring tones of the Lutheran hymn, sung by young and old altogether. Martyrs have hallowed it; it has gone up from the dying beds of the saints. The old churches, where generation after generation has worshipped, and where many scores of the dear dead have been carried, and laid before the altar where they gave themselves to God, seem to breathe of "Old Hundred" from vestibule to tower top—the very air is haunted with its spirit.

Think, for a moment, of the assembled company who have, at different times and in different places, joined in the familiar tune! Throng upon throng—the stern, the timid, the gentle, the brave, the beautiful, their rapt faces all beaming with the inspiration of the heavenly sounds!

"Old Hundred!" king of the sacred band of ancient airs. Never shall our ears grow weary of hearing, or our tongues of singing thee!—And when we get to heaven, who knows but what the first triumphal strain that welcomes us may be—

"Be thou, O God, exalted high!"

The Nightingale.

A German writer has essayed to give us the notation of the song of the nightingale, or rather an imitation of the sounds in words, which, though they fail to give an idea of the notes to one who has never heard them, are perfectly traceable by such as know the song well, and are correct as to the order of succession. Daines Barrington has recorded the names by which the English bird-fanciers of the last century distinguished every separate note of the song, many of them being almost identical in sound with those of the German essayist. Most of the names mentioned by Barrington are still in use among connoisseurs, and are very expressive, especially the "Jug," as applied to a note which, in a clear and brilliant tone, repeats the sound "Djug! djug! djug! djug!" sometimes as many as sixty or seventy times, finishing with a brilliant shake or rattle. Then there is the "Sweet jug," being a similar note in a more finely-drawn and sweeter tone; then follow the "Bell-pipe," the "Scroty," the "Rattle," the "Pipe-rattle," and the "Water-hubble," the last being a delicious note, resembling the trickling of water through a deep and narrow channel in a brook when swollen by a summer shower. The names of many other notes are recorded; but I do not recollect that the one known by the present race of fanciers as the "Doane," or "Done," is mentioned. It is one of the most characteristic, and the most entirely unlike anything in the song of other birds. It commences in a deep, rich contralto tone, long drawn out, and getting gradually fainter; then it is repeated half a tone higher, and rises a semitone each repetition, till a brilliant pitch of the voice is reached; when it suddenly quits the plaintive adagio in which the gradual rising was performed, and bursts into a short brilliant cadence that gushes forth like the last notes of a passionate bravura, or like one of those glittering codas of Beethoven that terminate suddenly, with a few daring notes, some wild and fantastic scherzo.

With regard to singing only at night, I can state from my own experience that the nightingale sings with the greatest power and brilliancy at about nine in the morning; but so many other birds are then joining in the woodland concert, that only experienced connoisseurs stay to distinguish the melody of the nightingale from the general buzz of song, though it is, in fact, distinct enough, rising above the accompanying chorus like the notes of a prima donna, whose brilliant and passionate bursts of declamation ring out clear and distinct above all accompanying sounds of voice or orchestra. It is not, as Barrington ingeniously observes, that part of the charm of the song arises from being heard at night, when all other birds are silent, but that then it receives its chief attention from those who are ignorant of the fact that the night-song of the nightingale is not its only song, and, in fact, only a continuation of the one generally commenced shortly before twilight.

Occasionally, in the warm, still, balmy evenings of high summer, the nightingale will burst into a new song after dark, which, however, seldom continues later than eleven o'clock, though on such evenings I have heard occasional brief outbursts till after midnight, when, on account of the general stillness, it is heard for a considerable distance; for the volume of sound, it has been calculated, fills something more than a mile in diameter, or quite as much as the human voice. Our great surgeon, the celebrated William Hunter, and more recently Dr. Troschel, in his essay on the muscles of the throat in singing-birds, sought to account for this extraordinary power in so small a bird by anatomical investigation, and found that the muscular tissues of the throat were much stronger in proportion to its size in the nightingale than in any other bird.

On Musical Form.

From "Truth about Music and Musicians," Translated from the German by SABILLA NOVELLO.

"Every form, however beautiful, has some defect, yet it serves as a lens, through which we collect the sacred rays of universal Nature, that they may irradiate and quicken the heart of man.—GOETHE."

I quote the following from Laube, who says: "Our contempt for Form destroys a number of valuable talents. I do not believe that out of Germany there occur so many literary and artistic suicides as in our country. An unhappy conceit causes some of us to consider it unworthy our dignity to act according to established customs; we treat the idea of Form with contempt, and consider as almost an indignity, whatever may be termed, in the widest sense of the word, technical. It is in vain that we are shown, by the correspondence between Schiller and Goethe, how deeply both these great authors respected the study of Form. We praise the works of these men, but we follow not their footsteps. We readily comprehend that a wealthy man may possess land, stone, lime, wood, meadows, and trees in plenty, and yet be unable to create a castle and park until he have sketched out a plan, and proceeds to work with due consideration,—until he can command the necessary aids of labor, skill, and art. But authors (and composers) apparently do not perceive that the possession of rich and plentiful material is not sufficient to compass success."

Again, we may read, in Eckermann's Aid to Poetry, the following:—"Form has been established by the unceasing exertions of our greatest masters, and, therefore, succeeding authors should at once attain perfect knowledge on this point. It would be a highly ridiculous fancy of misunderstood originality, should each individual desire to grope his way in search of that which already stands clearly discovered in full perfection. Form has been transmitted to us, already improved and developed; we must accept it, and make ourselves masters of it,—else it would be vain to talk of study or of progress in Art; every man would have to recommence anew. But Art is long and life is short; therefore, those who will do well who squander not their powers in unnecessary labors."

These truths are ignored and unheeded by our modern composers and critics, who fancy that progress in music may be effected by changed forms, instead of new musical ideas. The result of this opinion is, a monstrous form, or, rather, want of form; the fact is, the want of study induces ignorance of form; so, in order to conceal this deficiency, modern writers have declared recklessness of form to be a sign of genius. These good gentlemen (but bad musicians) do not remember that our great teacher, Goethe, says: "What most justifies us in maintaining the necessity of strict rules and stringent laws is, that men of genius are the first to comprehend them, and willingly yield them implicit obedience. Mediocre talent only would desire to substitute its circumscribed singularity in the place of enlarged and cultivated intellect, and to conceal its insufficiency under the cloak of pretended insuperable originality and spontaneity."

In music, or painting by tones, which rapidly succeed each other, and flit across the sense of hearing, a distinctly recognizable and familiar Form is absolutely requisite, in order that listeners should, so to speak, be placed in a convenient situation from whence to perceive and review the separate components of a whole piece.

Every Form of Art, however, should possess three qualities:—appropriateness, or faithfulness, in order that the subject represented may be duly expressed, both in mass and in detail; comprehensibility, in order that different individual parts should easily unite themselves into a whole, and be recognized as generic sections; beauty, in order that each individual part may appear in well regulated proportion, and agreeable relation to the whole structure.

Voss, with justice, demands that a consummate work should contain—beautiful sounds, graceful movement, and harmoniously phrased construction; these emanations of creative genius will faithfully, and at the same time agreeably express the inly-felt inspiration of a composer.

The greater error of our young Art-world is the constant effort after a new form. When is a form new? When a tonal piece is spun out to such extent that listeners are wearied, and yearn for its conclusion? When phrases are so lengthy that their commencement is forgotten before their termination is accomplished,—or are so short that they merely indicate, but do not satisfactorily express a meaning? When the end of one phrase and the beginning of another are so smeared into each other, that their separate identity cannot be traced? When each bar is completely heterogeneous to its neighbor? When a piece modulates, or blindly wanders through every possible key? When idea is patched to idea, without any principal phrase or phrases which should unite all components, and give to the whole a distinctive character? Such and similar peculiarities may be found plentifully enough in the works of several modern heroes; but I have not, as yet, discovered any other novelties in their productions.

"Genius," says Goethe, "accommodates itself respectfully even to that which may be termed conventional; for, after all, what else is conventionality but the unanimous decision of leading minds, to acknowledge all which is necessary and inevitable, to be best?"

If we carefully analyze any really meritorious works, we shall clearly discern that, however novel they may at first appear, each component idea, individually and relatively to the whole, is constructed, connected, regulated, and restricted by established laws; and that only the ideas themselves are original.

The first eight Symphonies of Beethoven always afford delight, although they all bear a similar form; in the same manner as the dance-music by Laener and Strauss pleases, although its form be well known and ever recurring.

If a piece do not please, its want of success cannot be attributed to the fact of its being presented in a traditional form; but blame must rest on the ideas contained in it, which may not be faithful, or not be beautiful. Such untrue, half-true, or indistinct ideas will not please in any form,—even in the most fantastic; while really original, striking ideas, clothed in the simplest and most usual form, will surprise, delight, and impress all hearers. On the other hand, the most glorious ideas, presented in an ungainly form, will produce no effect, because either they will be unrecognizable or utterly impaired.

I cannot help believing that all those who are constantly occupied in searching after new forms, and in attempting to abandon those which great masters have fashioned into the aptest and most beautiful by the labor of centuries, possess no real creative fancy, and seek to conceal their want of original thought by zealous search after new form. They remind me of those insignificant authors, who unceasingly clamored against censorship, and announced to all readers the wondrously fine ideas they could make public, did not the censure (i. e. Form) exist, to cramp their efforts. When censorship was abolished, they knew not how to write!!

Insignificant ideas, clad in easy, homogeneous form, will more readily find favor than better matter in bad attire; this fact is known to and acted upon by French and Italian composers, who take the greatest pains to render Form simple and intelligible, while our writers, on the contrary, seem purposely to disfigure Form, much to their own injury.

Of course, by the above observations, I do not imply that long-existing musical forms are to be slavishly retained; for instance, that, without exception, the first part of a symphony must be repeated, &c. I merely maintain that the time will never arrive in which unconnected, planless, hap-hazard composition can be preferable to that which is regular, well-planned, and duly reconsidered.

Moderns have progressed only in harmonic weaving, and various use of chords; they allow of bolder combinations of chords in remote keys, hazardous modulations, anticipations and suspensions, &c.,—more rapid passages, peculiar and uncommon rhythms; but this same progress was made by former masters relatively to their predecessors. This is no "opening new paths,"—no bursting asunder of shackles,—but merely a step forward on already well-worn tracks.

New paths can only be discovered by diverging from the acknowledged right road, and such diverging from the right road is apt to lead to a—quagmire!

Illiterate Music.

(From the New York Musical Review.)

There is such a thing as illiterate music; rude, low, vulgar, it is made up of cant phrases, disconnected melodies, usually, not necessarily erroneous harmony; it has a kind of "hum-drum" rhythm, all of which are offensive to good taste and refined musical sensibilities. It is generally found among the ignorant and rude; always among the low and vulgar; in grogeries and drinking-shops; at the revels of the libertine and drunkard; in scenes of debauchery and beastliness, and in the haunts of licentiousness and vice of every description—it pleases and excites the sensualist and debauchee in their vile orgies, inflames and intensifies their brutal passions, and gives zest to their polluting practices; this seems to be its natural tendency, aside from collateral circumstances and associations. No doubt these augment the power of the music; there is a reflex influence, each helps the other; but the music alone, aside from other circumstances, tends to excite and inflame the low animal passions, and enkindle sensual desires.

I am aware that some writers make the music merely accessory, and ascribe the entire origin of the evil to the place, circumstances, and surrounding influence, asserting that the music only acts upon unholy passions already excited, and is but an accomplice to iniquity already existing. However this may be, I think it will be found almost universally, that the music used in scenes of debauchery and vice is usually constructed in a form or style, which in other literature would be considered low, coarse, and vulgar; and those who maintain that there is no kind of music which will originate the low and sensual passions, but that, on the contrary, all music naturally tends to refine, as well as excite the feelings, must, if they admit that music under any circumstances ministers to evil, which I presume no one disputes, follow out their premises, and take the position that, under the same circumstances, a higher order of music would produce still more deplorable results by exciting stronger emotions.

This position, however, begs the question, which is not whether music, even illiterate music, when allied to pure and exalted poetry, and introduced into an atmosphere already undulating with refined and holy emotion, will not in all cases and always intensify the feelings already existing; but, is there not a style of music, the tendency of which is to inflame the lower and animal passions, and thus exert a baneful influence (more or less) wherever it is introduced?

The facts in the case show also that their argument lies directly across their own path, for if music universally in all cases tends to elevate and refine the senses, then surely, if it can only be introduced into the haunts of vice and debauchery, it would be a direct, sure, and effectual means of reformation, whereas we know that it is introduced into such places for the very opposite end.

Again, it may be asked, how shall we account for the fact, that in all places of excessive sensual indulgence at feasts and carousals, not only among the illiterate and coarse, those who have never been in circles of refinement, but also (as is often the case) those among the intelligent and learned, whose tastes have been cultivated and refined, indulge in bacchanalian revels and sensual excesses? How is it that with such persons a kind of music is almost universally heard in their drunken frolics, partaking of the same general characteristics as that which is found in the lowest brothels of the confirmed drunkard and debauchee? Why is it that they seldom or never introduce into their scenes of revelry, the songs and ballads which they hear and admire in their sober moments, and in their refined and genteel amusements?

Again: How is it that when a solitary individual—one who has had the advantages of education, and enjoyed the privileges of elegant and refined society—falls into confirmed habits of intemperance and vice, he never carries with him into his scenes of debauchery those melodies which have been his delight in his better days, but invariably takes what he finds among his degraded associates? These questions refer to those only who have moved in circles where truly refined, correct, and educated taste prevails—not to those whose views of what is correct have been formed by hearing some "professor's" "easy arrangement" of a few melodies and extracts from Rossini, Bellini, and others; nor to those whose taste has reached no higher than the thousand and one waltzes, polkas, marches, and negro melodies, which are weekly thrown out from the presses of this country, and cover the land like the frogs in Egypt. Again, it has been said, and perhaps universally conceded, that when hostile armies approach each other for battle, the music inspires courage, fills the soul with exalted emotions, and impels the soldier to deeds of heroic valor.

Among those in authority, and whose rank in office does not require them to be in the midst of the fight, or in personal rencounter, and possibly with very few who are actively engaged, it may be so; but if we judge by the testimony of those who have given us their experience as private soldiers, we shall find, as they marched up with a bold front to the cannon's mouth, or rushed on the point of bristling bayonets, they were filled with wild, ungovernable fury; anger, malice, revenge, ruled without resistance or restraint; the whole man was given up to the most violent and revengeful passions, and, to use the language of an American soldier, in his description of one of the battles in Mexico: "We felt and acted like the very devils incarnate."

It may be a matter of doubt whether or no there is a kind of music, the natural tendency of which is to excite unholy or sinful passions, that is, without the aid of outside influences; but that there are certain musical combinations and movements which are illiterate and low in conception, and which more or less, according to circumstances, always address the base and animal passions, and are at least of doubtful moral tendency, is, I believe, generally acknowledged by refined and intelligent musicians. We may therefore leave the nicer and more difficult point for future discussion, (if need be,) but the fact that there is a kind of music which appeals to the baser passions, and intensifies animal appetites and sensual desires, always too strong, ought to awaken an interest in this matter, and not allow it to slumber until the thing is understood, and the church, the parlor, the school and concert room, are purified from its contaminating influence.

That such music exists in all these departments of sacred, domestic, and social life, we have only to turn to the various books of popular music used in the church choirs and congregations, by all the various denominations in the land; to the bound and sheet-music on the pianos of the rich, as well as those in more moderate circumstances; to the school song-books, the programmes of concerts and musical exhibitions, and to the music which (with the exception perhaps of two or three large cities) we generally hear at our social gatherings and public assemblies. Examine it by the light of science; test it by the standards of the greatest musical geniuses that have ever lived, we shall find a major part of it is trash, much of it low and vulgar. But (says many a good Christian minister and layman) much of the very music which science and musical taste and genius condemn as wanting in scientific accuracy, and as coarse and illiterate, moves us to religious and holy aspirations—there is a consciousness of increased holy emotion in hearing and singing it ourselves, and we see the same effects produced by it in others. How, then, can its influence be otherwise than good? And, besides, if some of those compositions which science decides are erroneous, low, and vulgar, will send the warm heart's blood coursing with increased vigor through the system, your science must acknowledge "she is not true to nature," and seek for further developments before she condemns that to which the heart in its most holy emotions responds.

'Tis true science is founded in nature; its principles and rules are derived from nature; and she must be true to her origin. And now suppose the world were in total ignorance of any rules or order for harmonic combinations and progression. Suppose, also we find two youths, of the same age, dispositions temperaments, attainments, general appearance, desires, etc.; suppose that one listens with admiration and delight to certain successions of musical tones, and feels an almost heavenly rapture as he follows peculiar harmonic progressions and resolutions; while other combinations and other progressions grate upon his ear, jar his nerves, and fill him with agony. The other youth listens to all these changes without emotion; he thinks some parts of both are pretty and pleasant, and some of each unpleasant and disagreeable: he has, however, but little choice.

Now which of these two shall decide what is and what is not scientific music?

Which shall be considered as nature's test for right and wrong?

Which would be taken for authority in any other department of science or taste?

It is not, however, by the testimony of a single youth of extraordinary musical sensibilities, that the beauties of peculiar harmonies and melodies have been discovered, while other combinations and progressions have been pronounced disagreeable; but by hundreds of such, who have listened and analyzed, studied and compared, in youth, and up to manhood, and through old age—men of large and highly-cultivated intellects, of well-balanced minds; men of profound thought and refined sensibilities; men who have commanded the respect and admiration of the world for ages. This is the testimony of history and biography, and is as well authenticated as any other biography or history whatever. Tens of thousands, in almost every condition of life, and in almost every land, taught by their own experience, and the writings of others, have attested to the truth of the science as it now is; many of its principles have been mathematically demonstrated, and we may as well deny the astronomical theory of Sir Isaac Newton and his compeers, or Harvey's theory of the circulation of the blood, as to reject the authority of Bach, Albrechtsberger, Handel, and a host of others.

In reply to the fact, that many a good Christian finds his holy aspirations ascending with more fervor and stronger gratitude while he sings the very tunes which science most unequivocally condemns, I remark: We are the creatures of association and habit, and our passions are excited or restrained by circumstances, many of which are not only beyond our own control, but have existed beyond the reach of our memories. Our associations with music are connected with our childhood; we have heard certain tunes sung by our fathers and mothers, perhaps by our grandfathers and grandmothers; they are interwoven with the pleasures of youth, are strengthened by the more substantial joys of domestic life, and the still higher emotions of the family altar and the public worship of God; we have seldom, perhaps never heard them except in our moments of cheerfulness or solemnity, and always connected with that which was pure and pleasant, and usually with poetry of a correct moral and somewhat literary character—hence the strongest and holiest emotions of the soul are associated with them, and have been tied to them from infancy, and when we hear these tunes, or others of a similar style and character, all these associations cluster around us. Here is the true reason why so many Christians, with tastes more or less cultivated on other subjects, are satisfied with a style of church music, low, illiterate, vulgar—in one word, it is association.

Memory cannot reach the time they first heard it, and always associated it with divine and spiritual hymns; the spirit and sentiments of the poetry have first moved their thoughts heavenward, and stirred their souls to some degree of devotion, and the music turned from its natural tendency, by the thoughts and spirit of the hymn, has, to a limited extent, increased the already excited emotion. The two, however, if not antagonistic, travel in different directions, and it is only by the power of holy aspirations, already excited, together with association, and the time, place, and circumstances, that the stronger is made subservient to the weaker.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 31, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Chorus of Pilgrims returning from the Holy Land, from Wagner's Tannhauser, arranged for four parts.

Festival of the Boston Public Schools.

Wednesday was a great day with the thirteen thousand children of the twenty grammar and high schools of Boston; being the sixty-fifth annual exhibition and festival of the medal scholars. In accordance with a resolution of the School Committee, which we have already mentioned, the festive part of the exercises, hitherto held in Faneuil Hall, was this year transformed into a Musical Festival at the Boston Music Hall. It was a first experiment, tried in the face of not a little scepticism, and with but a few weeks' time for training the voices and maturing plans.

To secure unity of effect, a few plain old chorals had been practised, in unison, in the same key, rate of time, &c., in the different schools; and then twelve hundred voices were selected for the public performance, who, as the time approached, held several rehearsals together in the Music Hall, under the conduct of Mr. CARL ZERRAHN and Mr. CHARLES BUTLER, one of the music teachers in the schools. These rehearsals, in themselves, made a protracted feast, novel and of still-increasing interest, to the children.

At four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, there was a sight to behold, which no one who beheld it ever can forget. Entering the Hall, you saw before you a towering amphitheatre of twelve hundred boys and girls, rising rank above rank, from the platform of the stage, which had been brought forward, to the upper gallery. The girls in their pure white dresses looked like a field of lilies; and the colored ribbons, blue and pink, violet and green, the darker tone of the boys' costume, the fresh and bright young faces, piled up in such multitudes before you, every form alive with joy and expectation, made a scene as unexampled here as it was beautiful and touching. It was some time before one began to look around him to see what else the Hall contributed to this rare feast for the eyes. First, in the opening at the middle of the stage, before the organ, was the bronze Beethoven statue,—in the background and in the centre of that mass of young life,—relieved upon a green ground, with a floral lyre over his head, and wreaths of flowers in the hand and at the feet of the composer. The statue never looked so finely. The fronts of the two galleries, which were filled with the medal scholars, were festooned with the usual national bunting—scarlet, blue, and white—which would have had too hot and military an aspect, but that it was relieved by ovals (purple ground, surrounded by green civic wreaths,) bearing the names of the different schools and dates of their foundation. Above, upon the walls, were shields bearing the names of the successive Mayors of the city. The niche opposite the stage was draped with flags, surmounted by the city seal. Scrolls and mottoes, showing the date of the Franklin and the City medals, &c., completed the very chaste and tasteful scheme of rich yet simple ornamentation, which the live presence of guests, parents, and citizens, upon the floor, with children in front, and children all around, above, enhanced to an ensemble of beauty and magnificence that made one again think what a blessing to our city is that Music Hall, which lends itself so admirably to such uses.

The exercises commenced with a good solid voluntary on the organ, at which Mr. J. C. D. PARKER presided. Then a prayer by the Rev. Dr. BLAGDEN.

Next came the Lord's Prayer, chanted in unison by the twelve hundred children, conducted by Mr. Butler. It was a grand, rich, fresh mass of tone; all in good tune and time, every syllable distinct, and the effect quite imposing. But it was all of one uniform degree of loudness; and as this old Gregorian chant is, in itself, monotonous, consisting of but three notes, it seemed to require every art of light and shade to lend variety. The final Amen, however, was beautifully swelled up.

After the chant came a piece, singularly well chosen, called, we understand, a Spanish chant, by the Germania Band, which occupied the space between the statue and the seats of the committee and distinguished guests in the front of the stage. The band had reed instruments as well as brass, and discoursed light and appropriate music at intervals, with very fine effect.

Next followed short addresses by the chairman of the festival Committee, Rev. Dr. CHANDLER ROBBINS, by Mayor LINCOLN, and by Dr. J. BAXTER UPHAM, who, as the originator of this fine experiment, and the one most full of its spirit and its policy, was called upon to explain. Happily, the reporters of the daily papers have caught for us his speech in full, which is too interesting and instructive not to be placed here.

REMARKS OF DR. J. B. UPHAM.

A few words may very properly be demanded of some of us, as to the why and wherefore of this new feature—this innovation, as some may be disposed to call it, in the good old established routine of the annual school jubilee. A full explanation would involve the history of music, as connected with the system of public school instruction, in other countries and in our own. But I shall not take up time for that any further than barely to allude to one or two facts and dates.

Passing over this history, then, as connected with Germany, where the system originated, and whence it spread into Holland, into Switzerland, and later into France, we find it, at a comparatively recent date, engaging the attention of educationists in Great Britain. Not there, indeed, without serious and strong and strenuous opposition at first; for our English brethren are never too ready to espouse any innovation, however much they may be convinced of its utility. So when Mr. Wyse, a prominent member of Parliament, first ventured to hint in the House of Commons that singing should be taught in all the schools, as in Germany, the suggestion was received with ridicule and with laughter only.

The same spirit of opposition afterwards elicited from the celebrated John Hullah, who engaged early and fought long and successfully as a champion in this cause, the quaint but forcible remark, "Yea, verily, thanks to the arduous labors of those who well addressed themselves to ears once as deaf as stone walls on the subject, the principle is now recognized by all the educational societies in the realm." Once recognized, it spread rapidly over the country. In Scotland, even, in spite of her national prejudices, among the followers of the sturdy old Covenanters, who had been wont to shake their fists in the face of all such pagan practices, it was shortly acknowledged as a fitting element in the education of youth.

And in Ireland, it followed, as a matter of course, for Ireland is the Italy of the British dominions in the North. In her the genius of music and the arts exist naturally, in greater degree of perfection than in either of her more favored sister realms. The harp is her rightful emblem. The patriot poet, Tom Moore, well knew, as he penned those lyrics and songs which are to Ireland as household words, that he spoke to hearts as readily responsive to the melody of his muse, as are the chords of the Æolian lyre to the wooing of the winds.

About the same time with this movement in Great Britain, occurred the introduction of music into our Boston schools. Just twenty-one years ago, at the recommendation of the Boston Academy of Music, it was tried as an experiment, in four only of the grammar schools, at first. I need not say the trial was satisfactory, and that ever since music has been recognized as a part of the Boston system of school instruction. A little more than a year since, a series of orders was offered in the School Board by the present efficient chairman of the Music Committee, Dr. Read, having for their object to raise this department to a nearer level in importance with that of other branches of study. They were passed by a large majority.

It is the more effectually to carry out the spirit and intention of these orders, that the performance of choral music is to take so prominent a part in the festival exercises to-day; and on this, the becoming of age of the system, so far as Boston is concerned, to inaugurate an advanced and permanent step in its progress; for if the present experiment—and experiment it must be called—shall prove in any adequate degree satisfactory, it is our hope—I speak, at least, for myself—I believe, also, for every member of the Music Committee, and, I trust, the whole School Board—that, hereafter, a distinct and separate exhibition of the musical department of the schools will be annually held, which, from small beginnings, shall grow, at length, into an important and permanent institution.

I have not time to go now into a discussion of all the objects, influences, and expected results of such measure, if adopted and carried out.

I might, indeed, enter into a computation, if necessary, to show what proportion of the twenty-four thousand scholars in our schools may, when the recently adopted system of a more thorough and extended musical instruction shall have come fully into operation, be fitted to take a creditable part in such public exercises. Suffice it to say now, that, judging from promises in the fifty or sixty primary and grammar schools, which, in the distribution of duties, it has fallen to my lot personally to visit and examine, the force will ultimately be limited only by the capacity of a building to contain them.

I am aware of the popular objection against this and all measures of a similar nature proposed in connection with our schools. They tend, it is said, to pre-occupy and engross the minds of the pupils, to the exclusion of more practical things. More than this, it has been asserted that a high degree of proficiency in music is inconsistent with an exalted standard of scholarship. I say this is the common and popular objection; but, like many other popular and traditional sayings, I believe it to have been too readily taken for granted, without due inquiry as to whether the assertion be founded in fact.

In my own school experiences I remember that many of those who were skilled in music, and largely devoted to the practice of it, were also the first in rank on the merit roll. And I appeal to the worthy and efficient Superintendent of the Boston Schools, with whom I had the honor to be associated as a classmate in college, as to whether his recollections do not tally with mine in this particular. The distinguished scholar, the statesman and orator, to whose eloquence we hope soon to listen, whose eminent taste in music and in art we all acknowledge and admire, and who himself once played a very acceptable trombone in the Pierian Sodality at Cambridge, can answer for himself and for Harvard. And the number of medal and diploma scholars in these choral ranks is a sufficient refutation of the error, as regards our Boston schools. I take it for granted for the present, then, that music is, in itself, a benefit as a study.

The advantages of the plan which we now inaugurate to the schools themselves, so elevating and advancing the standard of musical instruction, are, I think, self-evident. I need not take up the time to recite them.

Let me allude, however, to one of its natural results, extrinsic to the school, and in my own mind a most interesting and important one, which is this: In the course of a few years, a generation will thus be trained up to engage acceptably in the music of the church, in the form of congregational singing, which, when properly done, I hold to be the best and most impressive form of devotional music. Says the good old Roger Ascham, in writing from Augsburg, about the middle of the sixteenth century, on this point: "Three or four thousand singing at a time in a church here, is but a trifle." I could wish such trifles might obtain in the middle of this nineteenth century, in our churches. This, indeed, is what we have been aiming at, and attempting, for so many years, in this country, in vain to accomplish—not because, as has sometimes been said, we have no congregations, nor altogether because our congregations cannot sing, but because, for lack of previous methodical training, they cannot sing together. Now once establish this movement, and, in a few years, the rising generation will have in their heads, in their hearts, and upon their tongues, a repertoire of sacred music, always ready, always adapted to the singing of a great congregation, and such as will never wear out. Once establish this measure as a distinct and annual institution, and you make the congregational music of the church as much the property of Massachusetts, and ultimately of New England, as it is now, in its perfection, almost exclusively that of Holland and certain parts of Germany.

A word as to the impression, the legitimate impression and effect of the occasion itself, if carried out in its integrity, on both participants and hearers. The plan, though never to my knowledge attempted here, at least on so large and complete a scale as we propose, is not without a precedent abroad. Haydn once expressed himself as having been never more affected than by the simple singing in unison of the four thousand charity children, under the dome of St. Paul's in London. This was more than half a century ago. The good old custom remains there yet, and in the same form. Nor is it alone in the great and sensitive heart of Haydn, but upon the masses and men of ordinary musical susceptibilities as well, that such effects are produced.

I shall long remember, indeed I shall never forget the impression left on my own mind, on one of these occasions, at which it was my good fortune to be present, a few years since. And I speak of this experience in immediate connection with that of the great composer, to illustrate the effect, the similar effect, from the same cause on human natures, though the very antipodes of each other in all things else. There was, on the occasion to which I allude, an audience of some fifteen thousand persons, extending out into the nave and transepts of the church. The children, now increased to eight or ten thousand in number, were ranged on benches, rising and receding in amphitheatrical form, from the floor to near the springing of the arch of the dome. They were, in age, about the average of the scholars in our grammar schools, though far inferior to them in point of intellectuality and acquirement. They all sang together in unison, with the harmony only of a powerful organ as a basis, the simple melody of the old Gregorian chants and German chorals mostly, though ending, as I well remember, with the sublime Hallelujah Chorus of Handel.

Now, how much of that effect may have been attributable, in my own case, to the associations of the time and place, I will not attempt to decide; but of all my musical experiences, before or since—whether of the choicest instrumentation or the grandest combinations of choral harmony—whether I should mention the efficient rendering, by six hundred picked voices, of the Elijah and Messiah, in this, our own Music Hall, a year ago—the great choral performances on the opening of the Industrial Exhibition in Dublin—and in various parts of England—the clash and clang of collected scores of military bands in France—in the celebration of the high and festal Mass in the Cathedral of Cologne—the shoutings of the huge congregations in the fine old Lutheran temples of worship at Dresden, at Leipzig, and elsewhere—or in the sple did achievements, vocal and instrumental, of those great musical gatherings in the Valley of the Rhine, in the vintage time;—all, all, I say, have failed to leave in my memory an effect so deep, so solemn, so impressive.

And, if such things can be done in London, they can be done here; if success, such as this, can be achieved out of materials which make up that choir of charity school children in the cathedral of St. Paul; much more can it be accomplished, in connection with our liberal and enlightened system of public school instruction, in Boston; not in these first feeble experiments, indeed, but by patent and systematic, and well-directed and constant and continual effort.

But this is only an immediate and pleasing accessory of our plan, a gratifying success, indeed, if obtained—and, in my own mind, a desirable one, if it but lead to the addition, in the limited calendar of our festival days, of another and that so esthetic and rational a jubilee.

And here again we may be met with the utilitarian objection, cui bono? which, by a somewhat liberal translation, might justly be interpreted, in the New England tongue, will it pay?

But what,—I would ask, in answer to this inquiry, is the end an object of education? Is it to develop the intellectual part of our natures only, the working faculties merely, to the neglect of the moral and physical,—leaving the emotions and affections to run riot or take care of themselves as best they may? Would this be rational, would it be philosophical in this our land and in our day? Consider, for a moment, the spirit and tendencies of our country and the characteristics of its people—a toiling, speculating, money-getting, fast living, excitable race—wearing themselves out with labor or with thought, reckless and impatient always. Was there ever a nation more requiring the amenities of life, more needing an infusion of the æsthetic among the harsh and discordant elements of their composition? Story, in his appropriate ode at the inauguration of our noble statue of Beethoven, well expressed this idea, when he said: "Never is a Nation finished, while it wants the grace of Art: Use must borrow robes from beauty; life must rise above the mart;

Here, as yet, in our Republic, in the furrows of our soil. Slowly grows Art's timid blossoms, 'neath the heavy foot of toil.

Spurn it not! but spare it—nurture it, till it gladdens all the land."

And this is what, as a nation, we are just beginning to do. In the cities along our Atlantic shores, at any rate, the galleries of our Athenæums, the recent meritorious collections of pictures, public and private, the growing disposition to ornament with groups of statuary our squares and public buildings, and our National Capitol, and the increasing beauty of our architecture, are witness to it.

Says the poet I have already quoted—

"Topmost crown of ancient Athens toward the Phidean Parthenon.

Upon Freedom's noble forehead, Art, the starry jewel, shone."

I would, sir, it might sparkle in the front of this Modern Athens as well.

Now, music, it has been well said, is the handmaid of painting and sculpture—their gentler sister, more refining and humanizing in its influences upon the hearts of the people.

Shall we pause, then, or retrograde in this movement which introduced and recognized it in our schools? I do not believe it. I look rather, in the future, though the time is not yet, for the completion of the work, by the establishment, in connection with our system of public school instruction, of a Conservatory of Music, vocal and instrumental, on a scale commensurate with that of kindred institutions abroad.

The sweet old tune of "Dundee" was now sung by the children, with organ accompaniment, Mr. Zerrahn taking the conductor's stand; and it was soon evident what pleasant and complete control he had in this short time acquired over his young army. The first verse was sung by the girls alone, whose soft, sweet voices had a peculiar and religious charm. The second verse by boys, whose more metallic timbre made fine contrast; the third by all united, when the sonorous volume was superb. Throughout the whole, there was pure, sustained, truly musical tone, and such fine effects of loud and soft, crescendo, &c., as one would have hardly expected from a mass of children. It was a kind of glorified, transfigured canto fermo; as superior to any church psalmody we have ever heard, as that hall to a prosaic country meeting house. The problem of producing grand and edifying musical effects by combining thousands of children's voices in such very simple choral strains as they can easily be taught to sing in common primary and grammar schools,—with no injury but with much help to their general education—was now already fully solved.

"Dundee" was followed by a very pertinent and happy address from the Hon. R. C. WINTHROP, which we have in type for next week.

There were also addresses by Mr. PHILBRICK, the superintendent of the schools, and by His Excellency, Governor BANKS, who made some capital remarks upon the benefits of singing, as a branch of physical culture.

"Luther's Judgment Hymn" was the next choral, sung in the same manner with "Dundee," but with the additional accompaniment of the Band, whose trombones and other brass told with sublime effect in such a piece. Here was where brass performed its true, legitimate function; here it was altogether grand; and the ensemble of voices and instruments was one of the most sublime we ever witnessed. We were only troubled somewhat by the not very dignified expression of those trumpet blasts which followed up each strain; the idea in itself was good, and we believe traditional; but the phrase lacked right rhythmic form; it did not seem to grow naturally out of the choral movement, but sounded far-fetched and intrusive. We might question, too, the wisdom of having children sing at such a time to such lugubrious and dreadful words.

The presentation of bouquets by the Mayor to the two hundred medal scholars, accompanied by music from the band, and followed by a few words of wise and tender counsel to the happy winners of these honors, by Dr. Robbins, formed the next act of the spectacle. It was a fine scene, as the medal-wearers, girls and boys, filed through the front seats of the first balcony, around three sides of the hall, ascended the stage at the foot of the statue, from the rear, to receive their floral honors, and with these emerged one by one again at the opposite corner, into the balcony.

The "Old Hundredth Psalm," sung with an effect musically and morally sublime and beautiful, the whole audience joining in the last verse, worthily concluded the inspiring festival.

How little faith we have in true ideas! Who was there, even of those well convinced in reason of the goodness of the plan, that had at all anticipated a success so beautiful and so inspiring? How far the reality transcended the imagination of the most sanguine advocates of the idea! We have only room left now to chronicle the complete success of the first Musical Festival of the Boston Public Schools, leaving our reflections on its educational and moral aspects to next week. For the present, we will only say, that it was in the highest degree creditable to the committee, to the conductors, teachers, and the schools, and that it contains a future in the matter of the blending of musical with the intellectual and moral culture of our youth. It was precisely the right kind of a school festival. Music, music in large, simple choral strains, music by the vast choir of fresh, unbroken children's voices, was the most practicable, most expressive and inspiring utterance of all the sentiment of such a day. It was the word that summed up all words. It was prayer, and it was eloquence, and joy, and hope, and aspiration, so that all felt that the only fault was a little too much speaking, pertinent and good as all the speeches were. But the mind was weary with attention and excitement, and the heart mainly wanted utterance. The children had just come through their trying school examinations; they had heard speeches in abundance; a unitary, universal, heavenly language, which refreshes and exalts, but does not task the mind by close attention to new trains of intellectual statement, was the language for that hour; and we all saw and heard how easily and cheaply, by a right and simple plan, this large and lovely language can be furnished.

There certainly was very little skill in singing; there was room enough for criticism in details; but the effect, one of the most beautiful effects of Music in its grandeur and simplicity, was there.

Music Abroad.

London.

The Athenæum furnishes the following items:

This day week Messrs. Puttick & Simpson are about to bring to the hammer the music-books and MSS. of the late Mr. W. Ayton,—a musical amateur who had tastes and associations connected with other arts than music, (being one of Elia's set), who for some years edited the Harmonicon, who later wrote on the art in the Examiner, and whose collections were miscellaneous (to judge from the Catalogue), but comprised some precious and peculiar items. Among these may be mentioned a copious (we almost imagine unique) asse-blage of opera-books; ranging from Handel's days to our own. This should be kept together, in the hope that some day we may have a public musical library, as such thought meriting gradual enrichment.

Another report is curious indeed, being none other than one more last appearances of Signor Tamburini, who, it is said, may possibly join the opera company at Drury Lane, there to sing Don Giovanni. This we hope—in gratitude for much pleasure given us by the veteran in his young and maturer days—is not true. Rumor the third (and a good one it is) mentions that Mr. Hullah is about to give a concert consisting of Mr. Horsley's music. This—respectively to both dead and living—ought to have the warmest support from every one that talks of "native talent."

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT.—The elaborate and excellent programme, equally remarkable for quantity and quality, which Mr. Benedict issued on the occasion of his annual concert, attracted an exceedingly brilliant audience to Her Majesty's Theatre, on Monday. A glance at some of the items comprised in this long musical carte will show that the beneficitaire had catered most liberally for his friends. The overture to the "Gipsy's Warning" appropriately opened the first part, and was followed by the familiar "Suoni la tromba," from the "Puritani," and the cavatina "Languir per una bella," from "L'Italiana in Algieri." Miss Louisa Pyne sang charmingly Rode's air; Madame Ortolani displayed to advantage her peculiar style and accomplishments in the aria "Qui la voce," and then the great feature of this portion of the concert followed, Madlle. Titiens, Madame Sherrington Lemmens, and Madame Viardot rendering, in the most effective and delightful manner, two unaccompanied trios for female voices, written by Mr. Benedict, and which, possessing melodies at once original and artistic, are most gracefully and vigorously wrought out. Bach's somewhat curious and decidedly interesting concerto for three pianofortes, with accompaniments added by Moscheles, exhibited the remarkable proficiency of Herr Rubinstein, Mr. Benedict, and Herr Alois Schmitt, a new and highly successful candidate for pianoforte honors and the son of a well-known Frankfort musician of that name. The "Miserere" from the "Trovatore," executed in the most brilliant style by Madlle. Titiens, Signor Giuglini, and the chorus of Her Majesty's Theatre, won an enthusiastic encore, and similar honors were paid to Madame Alboni's delicious rendering of "Non piu mesta." In the performance of Maurer's concertante for six violins, Messrs. Molique, Joachim, Maurer, Deichmann, Viotti Collins, and Blagrove, sustained their high reputation as exponents of a composition that must be pronounced eccentric rather than enlivening; and Herr Pischek appeared in costume as Hassan, and sang a scena and aria from Benedict's opera, "Der Alte Vom Berge." We have not space to run in detail through the remainder of the pieces of vocal and instrumental interest comprised in the lengthy programme, but we must not omit mention of the great treat afforded by Madlle. Titiens, who sang the grand scena from Weber's "Oberon," "Ozean du Ungeheures," and the performance, for the first time in this country, of an operetta by Paesello, "La Serva Padrona," in which Madlle. Piccolomini, and Signori Rossi and Cazoni appeared. It is a quaint and fanciful little work, full of graceful melody, and was interpreted with consummate ability by the leading songstress. The only disappointment arose from the absence of Signor Belletti, who was prevented from attending by indisposition.

THE TONIC SOL-FA CONCERT.—Three thousand five hundred little vocalists, drawn together from seventy-four schools, of all Christian denominations, and without having had the advantage of a single rehearsal in combination, all singing admirably together, and heard by an audience of some thirty thousand people, formed a delightful scene at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday, not easily to be forgotten by those who had the good fortune and the good taste to be present. The concert was conducted in a very spirited manner, and with the smallest possible amount of interruption between the several pieces. The first encore was won by R. A. Smith's anthem, "How beautiful upon the mountain," the second by "The Echo," the third by Spofforth's glee, "Hail! smiling morn," and the fourth by the National Anthem. Among the other pieces which created a great sensation, though they were not encored, may be mentioned "Old England," "Bells Ringing," "Mark the Merry Elves," "The Quail Call," "Auld Lang Syne," "Hail Judea, Happy Lan!," "Wild Wood Flowers," and a Pie-nic glee. Of the concert generally we have much pleasure in reporting favorably. It passed off most successfully, and the cheer of the children at the close of the National Anthem, coupled with an enthusiastic waving of their colored banners, was alone worth a journey of ten times the distance from London to Sydenham. There was a heartiness about it which was perfectly irresistible, and it need excite no wonder, therefore, that the National Anthem, in which the audience joined, was repeated. The only wonder is, that it was not repeated half-a-dozen times, for neither children nor adults seemed to know when to stop. Miss Stirling relieved the vocal portions of the concert by some admirable performances upon the Handel Festival organ, and we may add, as a matter of interest, that the vocal music could be heard without difficulty in the Rosary, and that words, as well as music, could be distinctly heard in the vicinity of the central fountain in the grounds. The performances were most ably conducted by Messrs. Sarll and Young. Had the tenors and basses not been over-weighted by the trebles of the children, the effect would have been much greater, but as it was, the entire performance was such as to reflect the greatest credit upon the instructors, and give the fullest assurance of the success of the system.—Sunday Times, June 27.

Mr. HULLAH gave an interesting concert of vocal and instrumental music, with organ and piano-forte accompaniments, on Wednesday evening, which we were sorry did not attract a larger audience. The heat, however, was intense enough to render it a matter of surprise that there should be any one present. The concert began with the solemn and pathetic motet in F minor, "I wrestle and pray," for two choirs—which, in the act of setting down to J. S. Bach, Mr. Hullah should have stated had been variously attributed to Bach's uncle, Christopher, and to Bach's son, Emanuel. All we can say is, whoever did write it was a very clever fellow. Miss Palmer then sang two sacred songs of Beethoven, which showed that Beethoven could at times be dull. Dr. Crotch's motet, "Methinks I hear the full celestial choir" (Mr. Santley and chorus, unaccompanied) was remarkably well given; nevertheless, the composition itself is little better than twaddle. After this came Miss Freeth, with Beethoven's solo sonata in E, Op. 109, the performance of which showed that the young lady had greatly over-estimated her powers. Mendelssohn's convent motet, "Laudate Pueri" (Misses Banks, Fanny Rowland, and Palmer, with female chorus), and the gloomy but splendid psalm of the same composer, "Why rage fiercely the heathen?" were both included in the first part; and both suffered much from the occasionally false intonation of some of the singers. M. Gounod's Christmas song, "Nazareth," for Mr. Santley and chorus, was capably executed; but we have seldom listened to anything less attractive. Mr. Hullah conducted, and Mr. Hopkins presided at the organ.

At the end of the first part we were compelled to leave. What was lost may be seen below:

Madrigal, "Die not, fond man, before thy day;" Ward.
Duet, "The Starlings," Miss Fanny Rowland and Miss Palmer; Hullah.
German songs, "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" and "Durch den Wald," Madlle. Maria de Villar; Mendelssohn.
Part song, "Song should breathe of scents and flowers;" Hullah.
Capriccio, piano-forte, Miss Freeth; Clementi.
New song, "The wind is fair, good bye," Miss Banks; Hullah.
Part song, "Where the bee sucks;" Arne and Jackson.

The rooms (Willis') were crowded to suffocation, with members of the aristocracy and fashionable world, distinguished professors and well-known connoisseurs. We have rarely seen such an audience assembled at a concert—never at a mere chamber concert. Nor have we ever witnessed greater, more sustained, or more richly warranted enthusiasm. Every piece in the programme had a special interest, and every piece was thoroughly appreciated. As we have written a great deal about Dnssek and Schubert lately, not to mention Bach and Beethoven, we are at a loss for further sentences. Moreover, we can find nothing new to say about Miss Goddard's playing (unless perchance she would, for once in a way, lay herself open to criticism, to which she seems perversely disinclined). Under these circumstances we must be content to sum up at once in a verdict of unqualified approval. The great novelty was the picturesque and very original sonata of Franz Schubert, whose numerous works will afford our young English pianist a new and wealthy mine to explore—and especially his six grand solo sonatas, of which this one in A minor is the first. The next in importance was the interesting and thoughtful composition of Herr Joachim, in which the variation form is developed in a very elaborate and ingenious manner. The quartet of Dnssek, a master-piece of grace, was also almost as good as a novelty, so rarely is it publicly performed. Bach's suite is one of the freshest and most vigorous from the Suites Anglaises; and about the Kreutzer sonata we need say nothing. Herr Joachim played superbly, both on the viola, in his piece, and on the violin in Beethoven's sonata, which was a triumph of skill and expression, on the part of both executants, and created nothing short of a fuore.—Mus. World.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

I'll try my luck again. Ballad. L. Heath. 25

A fresh little song, serio-comic in style, by a popular author. The words express very happily that truly American spirit of enterprise and energy, which knows no such word as "fail." Add to this an easy, pleasing melody, with a charming peculiarity in the refrain: "I'll try my luck again," and it is safe to predict a great popularity for this song.

Many changes I have seen. Song. H. Russell. 25

In Russell's well-known vigorous style.

The Chamois Hunter. H. A. Pond. 25

A merry hunting song, full of spirit and life.

'Tis the moonlight sleeping. Wrighton. 25

A mother's last farewell. Wrighton. 25

Two beautiful ballads by the composer of "The dearest spot on earth, to me, is home." The first has a very telling accompaniment in Arpeggios. The melody of both is simple.

Instrumental.

Spring Song. Mendelssohn. 25

Among those forty-two charming Tone-poems which Mendelssohn has written under the name of "Songs without words," there are some which have excited a much more general admiration than others. Perhaps the most distinguished of these is the Spring Song in the Fifth Book. Thalberg seemed to have conceived a particular liking for it. It is the very ideal of grace and neatness. The issue of this number, separately, will be welcomed with pleasure by those who deem the whole of a series too heavy for their tasks. Other prominent numbers will be issued shortly.

Weber's Theory of Musical Composition. Treated with a view to a Naturally Consecutive Arrangement of Topics. By Godfrey Weber, Doctor Honorarius, Knight of the First Class of the Hessian Order of Lewis, Honorary Member of the Royal Swedish Academy in Stockholm, of the Hollandic Union for the Promotion of Music, &c. Translated from the third enlarged and improved German edition, with Notes. By James F. Warner. 2 vols. $4.

Weber's work is pre-eminently adapted to this country. Its admirable clear and simple style, taken in connection with the copious detail of its matter, renders it, as the author himself very justly observes, peculiarly appropriate to those who have but little or no present acquaintance with the subject. It is truly the book that we need. On the one hand it is the best authority that the world contains; on the other, it is simple and easy to be understood. And welcome indeed to our shores should be a work so well adapted as is Weber's to the condition and wants of our country. * * * The word "Theory" seems rather an unfortunate one to be used in this connection. To the apprehension of many, it carries the idea of something that is far removed from the practical and useful, and that is attended with no real, substantial advantages; while in point of fact, the term, as employed in the present instance, designates a body of principles and a mass of knowledge which is practical in the highest degree, and which sustains very much the same relation to musical action, as a helm does to a ship, or a guide to a traveller, or subbeams to all our operations in the external world.

Technical Studies, (Technische Studien,) For Piano-forte Playing. By Louis Plaidy. Teacher in the Conservatory of Music at Leipsic. Translated from the German by J. C. D. Parker. $2.

The author remarks concerning this book:—"Notwithstanding the many schools already written for the piano-forte, I have still felt the want of a work which I could thoroughly recommend to my scholars as the ground work of their technical studies. The large works are on the one hand inaccessible to many on account of their cost, and on the other contain much that is calculated only for beginners, but which would be of little use to those for whom this guide is especially intended. I have thought that many useful hints might be given, which are undoubtedly well known to all good teachers, but which I have, thus far, missed in all schools. It is hoped that this guide may facilitate the studies of artists as well as amateurs, and at least contribute something to the cause of solid piano-forte playing."

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

V.—MUSICAL SEASON OF 1844—BERLIOZ—MENDELSSOHN—FERDINAND HILLER—PIANISTS—LISZT.

PARIS, April 25, 1844.

A tout seigneur tout honneur. We begin, to-day, with BERLIOZ, whose first concert opened the musical season, and might be regarded as the overture thereto. The more or less new pieces that were here brought before the public met with due applause; and even the most sluggish souls were carried away by the impetus of genius that reveals itself in all the creations of the great master. Here is a flapping of wings that indicates no common song-bird; it is a colossal nightingale, of eagle's size, such as may have existed in the primeval world. Yes, the Berlioz music has for me something primeval, if not antediluvian; it reminds me of fabulous kingdoms and of monstrous sins, of high-heaped and towering impossibilities; of Babylon, of the hanging gardens of Semiramis, of Nineveh, of the wonder-works of Mizraim, such as we see in the pictures of the English Martin. In fact, if we look round for an analogy in the art of Painting, we find remarkable resemblance and affinity between Berlioz and the mad Briton; the same feeling for the monstrous, for the gigantic, for material immeasurableness. In the one, sharp effects of light and shadow; in the other, screaming instrumentation; in the one, little melody; in the other little color; in both, little beauty and not any soul. Their works are neither antique nor romantic; they remind you neither of Greece nor of the Catholic middle ages; but they point much farther back, to the Assyrian-Babylonian-Egyptian period of architecture, and to the mere massiveness that is expressed therein.

What a regular modern man, on the contrary, is our FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTOLDY, our highly-honored countryman, whom we mention next on account of the Symphony which was brought out by him in the concert hall of the Conservatoire. We owe this enjoyment to the active zeal of his friends and patrons here. Although this Symphony of Mendelssohn was very frostily received in the Conservatoire, yet it deserves the recognition of all true connoisseurs in Art. It is a work of genuine beauty, one of the best of Mendelssohn. But how comes it that since the Paulus was presented to the public here, no laurel crown will bloom on French soil for an artist so deserving and so highly gifted? How comes it that here all efforts go to wreck, and that the last desperate resource of the Odeon theatre, the performance of the chorusses to Antigone, was followed by the same lamentable result? Mendelssohn always affords us an occasion to reflect upon the highest problems of æsthetics. Especially are we always reminded in him of the great question: What is the distinction between Art and falsehood? We admire most in this master his great talent for form, for stylistics, his gift for assimilating what is most extraordinary, his exquisite invoice, his fine lizard's ear, his delicate feelers, and his earnest, I might almost say passionate, indifference. If we seek in a sister art for an analogous appearance, we find it this time in poetry, and its name is LUDWIG TIECK. This master, too, knew always how to reproduce what was most excellent, whether in writing or in reading aloud; he understood how to produce the naïve, and yet he has never created anything which subdued the multitude and lived on in their hearts. The more gifted Mendelssohn would be more likely to succeed in creating something lasting, but not on the ground where truth and passion are the first requirements, not upon the stage; so Ludwig Tieck, in spite of his most ardent longing, never could bring it to a dramatic performance.

Besides the Mendelssohn symphony, we heard with great interest, in the Conservatoire, a symphony of the blessed MOZART, and a no less talented composition by HANDEL. They were received with great applause.

Our excellent countryman, FERDINAND HILLER, enjoys too great an esteem among the intelligent friends of Art to make it necessary for us, great as the names are which we have just named, to mention him among the composers whose works have found deserved recognition here in the Conservatoire. Hiller is more a thinking than a feeling musician, and too great learnedness is even made an objection to him. Mind and science may frequently, perhaps, impart a certain coldness to the compositions of this doctinaire, yet they are always graceful, beautiful and charming. Of wry-mouthed eccentricity there is here no trace; Hiller has an artistic affinity with his countryman, Wolfgang Goethe. Hiller, too, was born at Frankfort, where, when I last passed through, I saw his paternal house. It is called "Zum grünen Frosch," (the Green Frog,) and the image of a frog may be seen over the front door. But Hiller's compositions never remind one of such an unmusical beast, but rather of larks, nightingales, and other sorts of singing birds of Spring.

There has been no lack of concert-giving pianists here this year. The ides of March, especially, were notable days in that particular. Everything jingles away, and will be heard, if only for a show, that one may put on airs as a great celebrity beyond the barriers of Paris. These artist youths, especially in Germany, know how to speculate upon the begged or stolen rags of feuilleton praise; and in the newspaper puffs there we may read how the celebrated genius, the great RUDOLPH W., has arrived—the rival of Liszt and Thalberg, the piano-forte hero, who has excited such a great regard in Paris, and has even been praised by the critic Jules Janin. Hosanna! Now, one who has chanced to see such a poor fly in Paris, and who knows how little notice is here taken even of more important personages, finds the credulity of the public very entertaining, and the coarse shamelessness of the virtuoso very disgusting. But the sin lies deeper, namely, in the condition of our daily press; and this, again, is only a result of worse fatalities.

I must still come back to the conviction that there are but three pianists who deserve a serious consideration, namely: CHOPIN, the gracious tone-poet, who unfortunately has been sick, and seldom visible this winter; then THALBERG, the musical gentleman, who, in fact, would have no need to play the piano in order to be greeted everywhere as a fine appearance, and who actually seems to consider his talent merely as an appanage; and then our LISZT, who, in spite of all his perverseness and his sharp corners, still remains our dear Liszt, and at this moment has again thrown the beau monde of Paris into excitement. Yes, he is here, the great agitator, our Franz Liszt, the knight-errant of all possible orders, (with the exception of the French Legion of Honor, which Louis Phillippe will not grant to any virtuoso;) he is here, this Hohenzoller-Heckingen state counsellor, this Doctor of Philosophy and miraculous Doctor of Music, this resurrected rat-catcher of Hamelin, this modern Faust, who is always followed by a poodle in the figure of Belloni, this ennobled and yet noble Franz Liszt! He is here, the modern Amphion, who, with the vibrations of his strings, set stones in motion at the building of the Cologne Cathedral, so that they fitted themselves together like the walls of Thebes! He is here, the modern Homer, whom Germany, Hungary, and France, the three greatest countries, claim as their child, whereas the minstrel of the Iliad was only claimed by seven small provincial cities! He is here, the Attila, the scourge of God to all Erard pianos, which tremble at the first news of his coming, and which now again quiver and bleed and whimper under his hand, till it becomes a fair case for the society for preventing cruelty to animals! He is here, the mad, beauteous, hateful, enigmatical, fatal, and yet withal the very childlike child of his age, the gigantic dwarf, the furious Roland with the Hungarian sabre of honor, the genial harlequin, whose mad pranks turn our own head for us, and to whom, in any case, we render loyal service in here publicly reporting the great furor he has been exciting. We candidly confirm the fact of his immense succès; how we interpret this fact to our private thinking, and whether we accord or refuse our own private approval to the admired virtuoso, must be a matter of indifference to him, since our voice is only that of a single individual, and our authority in the art of music is of no especial significance.

When I heard formerly of the giddiness, which broke out in Germany and especially in Berlin, when Liszt showed himself there, I shrugged my shoulders and thought: That still and sabbath-like Germany will not be slow to improve the opportunity of a bit of permitted movement; it will shake its sleep-paralyzed limbs a little, and my Abderites upon the Spree will gladly tickle themselves into a given enthusiasm, one declaiming after the other: "Love, thou ruler of both men and gods!" Their interest at a spectacle, thought I, is in the spectacle itself, in the spectacle for itself, no matter what the occasion thereof may be called, whether George Herwegh, Franz Liszt, or Fanny Elssler; if Herwegh is forbidden, they will cleave to Liszt, who cannot harm or compromise them. So I thought, so I explained to myself the Liszt-omania, and I took it for a sign of the politically un-free state of things beyond the Rhine. But I was mistaken, and that I remarked some weeks since in the Italian Opera House, where Liszt gave his first concert, and indeed before an assemblage which one might call the flower of Parisian society. At all events they were wide-awake Parisians, men quite familiar with the highest manifestations of the present; men who, for a greater or less period, had been contemporaries of the great drama of the time; among them so many invalids to all artistic enjoyments, the weariest men of action, women equally weary, after having danced the polka all the winter through, an innumerable crowd of preoccupied and blasé minds—that surely was no German sentimental, no Berlin sensibility-affecting public, before which Liszt played, all alone, or rather accompanied only by his genius. And yet how powerfully, how thrillingly his mere appearance operated! How impetuously all hands clapped applause! Bouquets were thrown, too, at his feet! It was a sublime moment, when this triumphator, with a calm soul, let the nosegays rain upon him, and at last, smiling graciously, drew a red camelia from one of the bouquets, and stuck it in his breast. And this he did in the presence of some young soldiers who had just come from Africa, where they had seen no flowers, but only leaden bullets, rain upon themselves, and had adorned their breasts with the red camelias of their own hero-blood, without attracting much notice either here or there. Strange! thought I, these Parisians, who have seen Napoleon, who had to give them battle after battle, to fix their attention—these men now go into jubilation over our Franz Liszt! And what a jubilee! A kind of madness heretofore unheard of in the annals of furor!

But what is the ground of this phenomenon? The solution of the question belongs more, perhaps, to pathology than to æsthetics. A physician, who makes female diseases his speciality, smiled very strangely, and then said all sorts of things about magnetism, galvanism, electricity, of the contagion there is in a close room, filled with innumerable wax-lights and with some hundreds of perfumed, perspiring men, of histrionic epilepsy, of the phenomena of tickling, &c., &c. But perhaps the solution of the question does not lie so adventurously deep, but on a very prosaic surface. It will continually seem to me, that the whole witchcraft of it is explained by the fact, that no one in the world knows so well how to organize his successes, or rather the mise en scène thereof, as our Franz Liszt. In this art he is a genius, a Philadelphia, a Bosko, nay, a Meyerbeer. The most distinguished persons serve him as compères, and his hired enthusiasts are models in good dress. The crack of champagne bottles, and the fame of lavish generosity, trumpeted through the most reliable journals, win recruits in every city. Nevertheless, it may be that our Franz Liszt was actually by nature much inclined to spend, and free from avarice, a shabby vice, which cleaves to so many virtuosos, especially to the Italians, and which we find even in the sweet and flute-like RUBINI, of whose niggardliness a very funny anecdote in all respects is told. The celebrated singer, it seems, had, in connection with Franz Liszt, undertaken an artistic tour at joint expense, and the profits of the concerts, which they were to give in various cities, were to be divided. The great pianist, who takes everywhere about with him the general-intendant of his celebrity, the before-mentioned Signor Belloni, delegated to him on this occasion all the business matters. But when Signor Belloni gave in his account after the business was closed up, Rubini, with dismay, remarked that among the common expenses also was set down a considerable sum for laurel crowns, bouquets, eulogistic poems, and other costs of an ovation. The naïve singer had imagined that these tokens of approval had been thrown to him on account of his fine voice; he fell now into a great rage, and swore he would not pay for the bouquets, in which, perhaps, the costliest camelias were found. Were I a musician, this quarrel would afford me the best subject for a comic opera.

But ah! let us not investigate too curiously the homage paid to famous virtuosos. After all, the day of their vain celebrity is short, and the hour soon strikes when the Titan of music perhaps shrivels up to a poor town musician of very subordinate stature, who, in his coffee-house, tells his fellow guests, and assures them on his honor, how once bouquets were hurled at him, with the most beautiful camelias, and even how, on one occasion, two Hungarian countesses, to get his snuff-box, threw each other down upon the ground, and fought till they were bloody! The ephemeral reputation of the virtuoso soon exhales and dies away, lonely and trackless as the camel's scent upon the desert.

Illiterate Music.

(From the New York Musical Review.)

(Concluded.)

Again it is asked, if the spirit of the poetry can so overpower the debasing tendency of the music, and make it really add to the good influence of the hymn, is there not a real gain in the use of the music, and if so, why break up all these hallowed associations and reminiscences? I answer, there is more lost than gained. If this should not prove true when applied to the aged and middle aged, it is certainly true with regard to the children, youth, and young persons now living, and to all posterity. And shall we withhold from our children and our children's children, the vast, ecstatic joys which they may receive during a whole life-time, in order that the aged may receive a limited pleasure during their few remaining days here below?

The sincere Christian, when first brought to a true knowledge of God in Christ, finds that his former associations and feelings have all been wrong, and the longer he has lived in impenitence, the stronger these feelings and associations have become. At his conversion he resolves that they shall be overcome and slain: but they will not be; they force themselves upon him in his most sacred moments; unbidden and unwelcome, still they come. They may be necessary here below, to keep him of an humble and contrite spirit, and thus be made to help him in his heavenly road; but suppose, if wholly purified from them, he could still be humble and penitent for the past, enjoying at all times a perfect peace of conscience and the full assurance of hope, how much more rapidly would he advance in holiness! How much joy would he gain! How much sorrow and grief would he avoid!

So it is with these holy and divine hymns, which, although consecrated to the service of Christ by their authors, have been wedded to base and vulgar tunes by the churches. Divest them of the clogs and hindrances with which they have to contend in their unholy union; free them from their association with a class of tunes fit for nothing, unless it be to help the drunkard and debauchee in their way to destruction; and associate them with the many heart-stirring melodies, with which they are in perfect sympathy, so that both music and poetry will cordially unite their influence for good, and the devotion of the Church will rise until she shall realize in her own experience, that "the highest exercise of the powers of man is the praise of God." (Doctor Alexander.)

We admit that tunes of an illiterate and vulgar cast do excite the passions, and so also do ribald rhyme and vulgar verse; so do rum and whiskey; but this is no reason why these things should be admitted into the Church, nor for continuing them when they are in. Heretofore our argument has had reference to the influence of music alone; that is, the natural tendency of musical tones arranged in a certain tune form, but sung (or played) without words, and we think the facts sustain us in the position that there is a style of music, which is adapted to low, vulgar scenes, and which, aside from all associations, has a deleterious effect upon the mind and heart, and when allied to low and vulgar rhyme, intensifies its power for evil, and thus becomes the handmaid of vice. We believe tunes of this description are found in many books of church music, and they are not unfrequently sung by choirs and congregations in the sanctuary on the Sabbath, and their influence, to say the least, is not good—but musical tones, however beautifully and scientifically (or otherwise) arranged in the form of tunes, or other compositions, cannot of themselves suggest particular ideas—in other words, music alone, without words, however perfect the composition and execution, will not suggest the same ideas in different minds: if accurately performed and with proper expression, it will excite similar emotion in various persons, but not necessarily the same ideas; for this, we must depend upon the words. Thus, if two persons listen to the same gentle, tranquil strains, both will feel the same quiet, placid emotion, though the thoughts of one are fixed upon the calm, still beauty of a summer sun-set, while the mind of the other is stretching far away to the serene and peaceful circle around the family hearth-stone in a distant home. A cheerful strain might intensify the anticipated pleasure of a coming party or ball in the one, while in the other it might revive the joy experienced in hearing new-born souls tell of their happiness and peace in their newly-discovered love of Christ.

These illustrations show that while music alone can excite similar emotions in different individuals, it is dependent upon poetry to elicit the particular subject of thought.

By the power of association, therefore, these illiterate and vulgar tunes may in a very limited degree enhance the pious aspirations of devout Christians; but it is doubtful, even with their best associations, if their effect on the impenitent is not otherwise than good when used in the worship of God.

There is still another class of tunes, which, although good in themselves and in their place, are yet decidedly out of place, and deleterious in their influence when used in the house of God, simply in consequence of their associations—I refer now to such tunes as Lily Dale; Coming through the Rye; Nid, Nid, Nodding, and all other secular melodies which are associated with certain secular words by a large majority of the community. These associations are quite as strong in the minds of most people as are those of some Christians with the style of music heretofore discussed; and after having heard these and other ballads, airs, etc., where they belong, it is impossible to hear them in the church, and not be carried directly to the parlor and drawing-room, the party and concert. The effects of these associations, although unobjectionable in themselves, (because music of this kind is useful as an amusement), are in reality worse, under the circumstances, than those of the other class; those in most instances will exert but a negative influence, preventing that high attainment in religious emotion which would be obtained by the devout worshipper, in the use of good tunes adapted to the sentiment of the hymns, and leaving the minds of the careless inactive, or at most engaged in the scenes around them; while these have a direct, positive, and almost universal tendency to divert the thoughts entirely from heavenly things, and turn them wholly into another and (under the circumstances) a sinful channel.

If these things are so, what is the remedy? I answer: ministers and others—but particularly ministers—must give more attention to the subject, not in order to complain and find fault with their choristers, choirs, and tunes, and yet not be able to tell what kind of a change they want; but they must be willing to learn; and if there is no better way, to learn from those who, although comparatively ignorant of many other things, have yet so studied and pondered upon this subject, that they understand not only the powers and uses of musical tones and phrases, as the scholar understands the powers and uses of words and sentences, but also its relations and adaptation to the wants of man as a social, religious, and immortal being. They must be willing to forego the satisfaction they receive in the use of certain tunes, only because they have heard them from childhood, and associated them with the house of God and revivals; and if knowledge, science, cultivated taste, and experience have discovered a more excellent way, they must be willing to see it and turn to it, and give their influence for it. There are many good men, both ministers and laymen, who, from ignorance and heedlessness, and some I fear from stubbornness, continue to carry their grist to mill in one end of the bag, with stones in the other, who ought to know and do better.

Ministers must be willing to give a little time to the study of musical history, and the reading of such books as "Latrobe's Music of the Church," "Hasting's Dissertation on Musical Taste," "Mason's Letters," etc. They must read the biography of some learned musicians, and, whenever they have an opportunity, listen to the music of those who are acknowledged by all to be masters in the science. Surely, so long as music holds such an important position in the public worship of God, it is the minister's duty to understand it—so far, at least, as not to compel it by the selection of inappropriate hymns, nor allow it, by the whims and caprices of an impatient chorister, to become a foul blot on the sacrifices of the Sabbath, and an hindrance to the progress and success of the gospel.

Jehovah says, "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me," (Psalm 50: 23,) but He requires a perfect sacrifice and a free-will offering.

Is not the object well worthy the labor necessary to accomplish it? T. B. M.

How People Listen to Music.

(From the N. Y. Musical World.)

Many with their thoughts on something else—like Napoleon, who used music to amuse his ear, while his mind was busy with ambitious dreams and schemes:—just as some people smoke a cigar, while writing, to give their body something to do while their mind is employed. But music, in such a case, must not prove more attractive than a cigar, otherwise the design is thwarted, the mind being withdrawn from the occupation to the amusement. It was for this reason that Napoleon disliked Cherubini; for that great master's music had something about it which irresistibly attracted the attention, and from which there was no getting away; the Emperor therefore preferred the more negative and less strongly-marked compositions of Mehul.

While many persons are thus thinking of something that has no connection with the music, others are busy with thought actually suggested by the music. We doubt not that in many minds a parallel course of thought is carried on while listening to music—consecutive thought we mean—such thought following the light and shade and constantly-varying coloring of the tones.

Another class of listeners is composed of such as have acute musical sensibilities, who float off upon musical strains as upon balmy breezes, which waft them to some upper and happier realm. They have no clear and well-defined thought, like the former class just mentioned, but they are indulging in a merely sensuous delight; their thought, if they have any, being vague and rambling. The pleasure of such persons is a kind of refined, nervous pleasure, music sweeping over their nervous organization like electricity and producing a species of musical incubation.

Another class embraces those who are more self-collected and who distinguish the music much more nearly. These persons are chiefly pleased, however, only with pretty melodies when they occur in a composition; that which intervenes being meaningless and listened to only because something enjoyable is momentarily expected. This embraces a very large class of persons—such as have an appreciation only of tunes; that is, of a single clearly-expressed melody, floating on a thin basis of harmony. This harmony best pleases such persons, when it is most negative—not distracting their attention from the tune. For this reason Italian music is, and always will be, most popular, because it consists so much of a simple melody, floating on thin and trivial harmony.

A fifth class embraces those persons who chiefly enjoy music from seeing the manipulation thereof. They must see the fingers of the pianist, the bowing of the violinist, the face and features of the singer. Their delight is a mechanical one. If prodigious difficulties seem to be overcome, their pleasure is by so much the more enhanced. If great difficulties actually are overcome, but the artist be of that superior class of men who conceal even the appearance of difficulties from the audience, the delight of such listeners is proportionably diminished. They believe their own eyes in music—they have no cultivated each wherewith to believe. Ole Bull is an immense genius with such persons—Henri Vieuxtemps a fifth-rate artist.

A sixth class embraces those who listen to music by looking at bonnets, and dresses, and faces, and looking at beaux and belles; who talk, and smile, and coquette and flirt, just such as one may see by scores at any Philharmonic rehearsal or concert—those sweet pets of fashion and society, who are assassinated fifty times an evening with daggers fiercely looked at them by indignant musical Orsinis right and left.

A seventh class embraces those who listen to music with critical ears only. Such are chiefly reporters and critics of the public press. They listen (much too often) to be displeased, rather than to be pleased. A false tone, a sin of musical omission, or commission, are instantly "made a note of." If commendation be expressed, it must be followed by a "but"—and the place where the "but" comes in, is to them a very important place. People sometimes eat bread for the sake of its accompanying fresh spring-butter—critics often commend for the sake of half that oleaginous word, the inevitable "but," which is to follow thereupon.

An eighth class consists of those liberal minds who take music into their breasts like a gentle dove, who willingly suffer it to nestle and coo there, who warm it into still fresher vitality by a kindly reception and who are warmed in turn by it: who never question its right to come, or to stay; who keep it as long as they can and only reluctantly allow it to depart: who live long on its recollection afterward, and think of it as sweet, departed fragrance.

A ninth class of listeners comprises those who are fond only of such music as is familiar to them. Their pleasure is chiefly one of association. They are reminded thereby of old sights and scenes; of friends departed; of their youth; of days of joy and hilarity; of old dreams and old aspirations; of old loves and old flirtations; of those vague, indefinite feelings of youth, which are a kind of roseate atmosphere enveloping early life, and which so sadly and so soon fades into a leaden hue as we advance in years—something which, at the time, was very subtle and intangible, but which, now that it is gone, is inexpressibly missed and regretted. Sweet songs, and ballads, seem ever to have had their birth and their home in this atmosphere, hence they strongly remind of it when heard again—nay, they seem even partially to cause it to float once more around the heart with that soft, dreamy haze, which is the morning mist of early life.

A tenth class comprises the few who enjoy music to the very fullest possible extent, and to the very bottom of their hearts, because they know most about it. They have not only the delicate musical organization which secures to them all the merely sensuous delight of music, but they combine with this the rare intellectual pleasure of a perfect understanding and appreciation of masterly musical workmanship. They listen not only with the ear, but with the intellect. In fact, they can listen with either, or with both combined; they can shut their eyes and float off upon delicious waves of music, until they attain to a heaven of delight—they can lay a fetter on their nerves, and intellectually (alone) enjoy the rare handiwork of the master: or they can combine these two pleasures into one; the mind being capable of a double action—that of intense enjoyment, and a clear perception, meantime, of the causes of that enjoyment. If listening to a symphony of Beethoven, the ear of such persons not only hears, but penetrates the dense tonemasses of the orchestra; it distinguishes each individual instrument at will, and hears the pleasant, melodic story told by each; where all instruments are talking as in a general musical conversation, it catches the agreeable remark made by the humblest participant in the tuneless debate. It follows, moreover, the course of the argument. When the subject (or theme) is first broached, that subject is recognized: and any allusion to it afterward is instantly understood. When a second subject is broached, that also is clearly perceived; its discussion is followed; and when both subjects are discussed at once (perhaps) and are wrought up in a wonderful manner together, the intelligent listener wonders which is the greater, the intellectual pleasure in the perception of a composer's fine intent, his musical architecture, his treatment of his materials, and his management of instruments—or the merely sensuous delight of the delicious sounds he evokes.

Nor think that because such persons know much, they must suffer much. If the music is bad, there is at least a pleasure in knowing why it is bad. The investigation of this, even, is some alleviation, and turns the mind from dissonance to scientific matters. Moreover, there being a marked difference between music and noise, there is a vast difference in one's feelings, whether one listens as to music, or as to noise. The intelligent musician, therefore, having decided that it is mere noise, and not music, he can the more calmly endure it: while the uninformed, listening to it still as music, is suffering dreadful disappointment and discomfort.

The educated and intelligent musician, moreover, is always far more charitable and considerate than any one else, knowing the reasons of things and the difficulties of musical attainment: wherefore he gives more credit for what really is accomplished, and knows how to value a good thing well-attempted.

The upshot of the whole matter would seem to be, then, that enjoyment of music to the very utmost, implies musical knowledge. Wherefore let us study, and understand music, if we would marvellously enhance music's pleasures—adding to the delights of musical sensuousness musical sense.

Hon. R. C. Winthrop's Remarks at the Public School Festival, (July 27, 1858.)

I hardly know, ladies and gentlemen, what I can find to say in the brief moment which I feel at liberty to occupy this afternoon, and more especially after so much has been so well said already, which will be in any degree worthy of such an occasion as the present; or which will not rather seem like a rude and harsh interruption of the melodious strains which we are here to enjoy. I cannot but feel that a mere unaccompanied solo from almost any human voice—even were it a hundred fold better tuned and better trained than my own—must sound flat and feeble when brought into such immediate contrast with the choral harmonies to which we have just been listening.

But I could not altogether resist the temptation (so kindly presented to me by my valued friend, the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements), to identify myself even so humbly, with this charming festival—the first of its kind in our city—and I cannot refrain from thanking him and his associates, now that I am here, for counting me worthy to be included among those whom they have selected to supply the brief interludes to these delightful performances of the children. I am afraid I have no great faculty at firing a minute gun—not even so much as I once had in playing on that trombone to which my friend has so pleasantly alluded*—but I am sure I shall have fulfilled every reasonable expectation, if I may have aided in breaking the fall for this noble choir, as they pass along so triumphantly from key to key, from choral to choral.

Seriously my friends among all the numerous reforms which have been witnessed in our community of late years, I know of none more signal or more felicitous—none with which any one might well be more justly proud to associate his name—than that of which this occasion is the brilliant and beautiful inauguration. I would not disparage or depreciate the annual school festivals of the olden time. I have not forgotten, I can never forget the delight with which, more years ago than I might care to specify in precisely this presence, I myself obtained a medal boy's ticket to the old Faneuil Hall dinner; nor how proudly I filed off with my cherished compeers behind the chairs of the Fathers of the city—after the cloth was removed—to receive their recognition and benediction, before they proceeded to their speeches and sentiments, and to the discussion of their nuts and wine. I rejoice to remember, in passing, that the Mayor of that day—though to my boyish eye he was even then a venerable person—still lives to adorn the community over which he so worthily presided—still walks erect among us to receive the daily homage of our respect and affection. You have all anticipated me in pronouncing the name of the elder Quincy. But how poor were even the most sumptuous viands of those occasions, shorn, as they were, of the best grace of every modern festive board—deprived altogether of the participation or the presence of the mothers and daughters of our city, and prepared only for the satisfaction of the mere animal appetites! What "funeral baked meats" they were at the best, when contrasted with the exquisite entertainment for eye, ear, mind, heart, soul, which we are this day enjoying. I have only to regret that the amiable and accomplished Minister from Great Britain, whom we had all hoped to welcome on this occasion, should have been prevented by engagements at Washington, from lending to the occasion, as I am sure he most gladly would have done, his genial presence and eloquent words.

And now, let us hope, my friends, that the inspiration of this hour and of this scene will not be lost on the young hearts which are throbbing and swelling around us. We are too much accustomed to speak of the future as quite beyond all human control or foresight. And it is true that no consultation of oracles, no casting of horoscopes, no invocation of spirits, will unveil to us the mysteries which lie beyond this sublunary sphere. But we may not forget that the immediate future of our own community is before us—visibly, audibly, bodily before us—in the persons of these young children of the Schools. These boys I need not say, are the men of the future; and, under God, the masters of the future. The ever moving procession of human life will pass on a few steps, and they will be on the platforms, and we shall be beneath the sod. But to-day we are not merely their examples and models, but their masters and mentors; and these schools are the studios, in which, by God's help, they may be formed and fashioned, and shaped as we will. Yes, my friends, not by any idle rappings on senseless tables, but by simply knocking at our own honest School room doors, and asking how many boys and girls there are within, and what is their mental and physical and moral and spiritual condition and culture,—we may find a revelation of the future, hardly less sure or less exact than if it were written in letters of light by the pen of inspiration.

* See Remarks of Dr. UPHAM in our last.

I have somewhere seen it recorded of England's great hero, the late Duke of Wellington, that, on some visit to Eton School in his old age, while gazing upon those well remembered scenes of his boyhood, and when allusion had been made by some of his companions to the great exploits of his manhood, he exclaimed, "Yes, yes, it was at Eton that Waterloo was won." And not a few of you, my young friends, will one day or other be confessing that the best victories of your mature life have been virtually won or lost at school.

There was, indeed, a deep significance in the arrangement of that old choral trio, which has come down to us in the history of the ancient Lacedæmonians—for even the sternness of Sparta did not disdain the employment of music in their festive celebrations. They are said to have had three choirs, corresponding to the three periods of human life.

The old men began—

"Once in battle bold we shone;"

The middle-aged replied—

"Try us; our vigor is not gone;"

But the boys concluded—

"The palm remains for us alone."

Yes, young children of the schools, the palm remains for you alone. To you, alone, certainly, it remains still to strive for it and to win it. By too many of your elders it has been won or lost already. But for you, the whole course is clear; the whole competition free and open; and you are invited to enter upon it under such auspices, and with such advantages, as were never before enjoyed beneath the sun. May the inspirations of this occasion go forth with you to the trial, encouraging and animating you to higher and higher efforts for success, "Excelsior, Excelsior," the motto of each one of you. Above all, let not the praises of God be the mere lip service of an Anniversary Festival, nor the love of your fellow men and of your country—the true harmonies of the heart—die away with the fading echoes of a Jubilee chorus. And while you strive to fulfil every duty to your neighbors and yourselves, and to advance the best interests of the world in which you live—may you ever look forward with humble faith and trust, to the day, of which you are just about to sing, when other palms than those of mere human triumphs may be seen in your hands, and when, with a multitude which no man can number, you may be permitted to mingle in other and nobler songs than any which can be fully learned on earth.

The Country and Musicians.

[From La France Musicale; translated for the London Musical World.]

The emigration of artists is complete. In a few days more, there will not be one left in Paris, except M. Auber, who alone braves the heat of the Boulevards and theatres in the dog-days. The Conservatory gives its bantlings a holiday; the professors hang their lyre at the head of their bed, and are off. "O, country! meadows, valleys, mountains, streams, hill-sides, and shepherd's pipes, I salute you!" exclaims, with tender emotion, the musician, who during six months of cold, has, in vain, courted his rebellious fancy, or submitted to listen, at all hours of the day and night, to the gamut executed by his pupils. "O country! with thy chirruping grasshoppers, murmuring waters, warbling birds, sighing breezes, and answering echoes—with thy leaves, trees, alleys, shepherds, goats, cows, and everything that lives in the open air, far from cities and their asphaltic pavements—once more I salute you!"

Will any one believe it! In the midst of this general exclamation, one voice is silent; among all the generals and soldiers serving in the same army, a single captain, or, I should rather say, field-marshal, remains insensible to the beauties of the country. It is M. Auber. M. Auber is a child of Paris. Do not speak to him of flowers, save such as blossom in the Passage de l'Opéra; his verdure, his trees, and his palaces, are those which MM. Séchan, Despléchin, Thierry, Cambon, etc., daub on the canvas scenes of the Opéra-Comique. "Why should I travel?" asked M. Auber, one day, "have I not in the theatre everything Nature can offer? From the ocean, with its vessels tossed about by the winds, to the cascades of Switzerland; from the palaces of Goleonda and the Greek and Roman temples, to the simple huts of Brittany and Normandy; from kings and emperors, to the angler with his rod; and from the wildest mountains to the most smiling plains, I find everything at the Opéra. Besides, there is something I do not meet with in your woods, and that is the little frisking feet, the shapes that twist about like spindles—those pretty children of the air, vulgarly called dansesuses. Then, again, if you could show me, far away from here, unknown countries, and incomparable castles, I should always miss an orchestra and voices to lend them animation. I am so accustomed to all the whistling, singing, scraping noises of the opera, that the country without an orchestral accompaniment would, for me, resemble a churchyard. I am shown a mountain lighted up by the rays of the sun, with processions of soldiers and peasants; it is very fine! But when a gigantic finale bursts upon this effect of light, it is sublime! Such is my creed." In fact, M. Auber has never been beyond the Bois de Boulogne all his life, or, if he has, by chance, wandered as far as Fontainebleau or Compiègne, he has thought, on again beholding the Boulevards, that he had returned from a journey of a thousand leagues. Such illusions should be respected. Who knows? It is, perhaps, to this antipathy for travelling, and this doating fondness of the capital, that M. Auber is indebted for the fact of having preserved the freshness of his melodic ideas, and the springtime of his mind.

As for M. Meyerbeer, he cares neither for town nor country; he lives for music alone—his own, of course. He has taken a liking to Spa, and if his sovereign conferred on him the right of hanging or decorating the editors of La France Musicale, it is from Spa that he would date his decrees. It is to Spa that the managers of the Opéra and the Opéra-Comique proceed regularly, at the very least, once a year, on a pilgrimage, to entreat the learned composer for a score.

Like M. Auber, Signor Rossini has a decided predilection for the Boulevards. He does not, however, object to be under the tall-spreading trees; as inspiration comes from God, and God is everywhere, he could, if he pleased, write a chef-d'œuvre with equal facility in a garret, in a gilded saloon, or on a grassy bank. He has a charming little retreat at Passy, where he receives his friends. He is fond of long walks, accompanied by light, joyous conversation. What astonishes me, is the sympathy of the author of Guillaume Tell for street organs; what astonishes me still more, is his particularly liking those with damaged barrels, playing, in all sorts of keys, the overture to La Gazza, the airs from Il Barbiere, or any other of the inspirations of his immortal genius.

Signor Verdi would give all the palaces of the world for a cottage and ten feet of green sward. When he is compelled to inhabit Paris, Milan, Naples, or Venice, to superintend the performance of a new opera, there is no getting at him. But speak to him of Bussato, his dearly beloved village, and he will smile agreeably. It is the place which sheltered his infancy, and consists of ten houses in the open plain, traversed by the high road; a little church, ornamented by an organ to which he confided his first melodies; cultivated fields, without shade, and, in the distance, the Po with its roaring stream; such is the rural residence of the author of Il Trovatore. Once at Bussato, Signor Verdi is the most amiable man in the world; once there, he forgets music. From morning to evening, he follows the little paths leading to the cottages of his peasants. He speaks to one about his corn, and to another about his vines. He is everywhere saluted with profound respect. When the first shades of night descend on the earth, choristers, echoing each other, are heard in the immense plain; they might be taken for orphenists organized in companies; they are the peasants, the vine-dressers, and harvesters, repeating the airs of Nabucco, Ernani, I Lombardi, Macbeth, I due Foscari, Il Trovatore, Rigoletto, Luisa Miller, and I Masnadieri. They are celebrating, in their fashion, their lord and master. Their voices answer each other at distances, and produce a delicious concert. Signor Verdi is only really happy on this vast estate, which he has acquired by the fruits of his genius. He loves the open air, space, and liberty. He would certainly die of ennui if he were deprived of his birds, his trees, and his fields.

M. Halévy works incessantly; he would love the beauties of Nature, but he has not time. He can scarcely go and inhale, for a few hours, the fresh odor of the roses, at his villa at Marly. Amiable in disposition, and always ready for work, he has scarcely finished one production before he wants to commence another, not perceiving that he is using up too quickly his strength, both physical and moral, by such intellectual labor. Mr. Halévy works with the same pleasure in town as in the country. He does not like solitude and, if he smiles on the green trees, it is because he has around him numerous friends, who carry his mind back to Paris, by talking to him of present successes, past failures, and the other common topics of the day. Possessed of an excellent disposition, particularly impressionable, he surrounds himself with flowers. His saloons are a perfect garden, where the violet and jasmine blossom all the year, so that, even at the Institute, he can still fancy himself at the beautiful villa at Marly.

LEON ESCUDIER.

Mozart Judged by M. Lamartine.*

I.

A remarkable fact connected with young Wolfgang Mozart (the most prodigious musical organization that ever existed) is that the individual and the man constitute, so to speak, in his case, only one being; music lies with him in the cradle; when he is three years old he stammers out, on his father or mother's lap, music instead of words; music plays with him on every sonorous instrument as with the playthings of his infancy; music writes with his hand sonatas for the harpsichord, fugues for cathedral organs, or operas for the theatres of Italy, from his earliest youth; she travels with him from Milan to Naples, from Naples to Venice, from Venice to Vienna, and from Vienna to Paris, culling harmony from all these various languages, climates, waves and winds, as the breeze, sweeping over the earth, steals its sweet odor, to perfume itself. Music sobs with him at the death-bed of his mother, and takes part in her funeral obsequies; she participates in his love; she writes with his dying hand his angelic Requiem, thus noting down his first and last sigh; and she passes away with his soul, to join the celestial concert of which his whole life here below was simply the prelude.

The character of Mozart's existence is that he was not a musician, but music incarnate in a mortal organization.

II.

Everything in him was serious, because everything was sublime; his piety, the inheritance left him by his father and mother, caused him incessantly to lift his thoughts to the Christian's heaven, where he still beheld them with the eyes of his faith. A few passages from his letters to his sister, who was happy at Salzburg, having married for love, reveal the pious serenity of his mind, which was translated into sacred music; he thought in sounds which filled vaulted cathedrals with soul. One of Mozart's musical phrases converted as many hearts as a sermon. God is above, and Mozart's genius was constantly ascending. Like the French poet, Gilbert, who, when dying, celebrated in poetry his own death, Mozart sang for himself eternal peace, on his death bed, with his Requiem. He died, aged thirty-five, in 1791. The world had no idea of the extent of its loss; it required thirty years for his name to attain that ripe glory it possesses at the present day. But Rossini was about to be born at the very moment Mozart was dying, as if Providence intended that the voice and its echo should be separated only for a moment in the ear of a century. When we say "its echo," we do not pretend to degrade Rossini's original genius to the level of a mere repercussion of that of Mozart; Rossini is Mozart when happy; and Mozart, Rossini when grave. They are different but equal; Mozart is the pensive melody of the Tyrol and Germany; Rossini is the gaiety and enthusiastic joy of Naples; we carry our country in our own breasts. Rossini was more at home in the musical drama, and Mozart in lyrical melody, apart from the orchestra and the actor. His music was sufficient of itself; he sings simply to sing, while Rossini does so to move and please us.

III.

If we are now asked which of the two kinds of music we prefer, that which sings alone without words, or that which is accompanied by the words of the dialogue on the stage, we do not hesitate in preferring non-dramatic musical to theatrical music. It is only for the vulgar that any art becomes popular by an unequal match. What would you think of a school for sculpture which should borrow the colors of painting to render the divine forms of Phidias more like the colored wax-figures before which the ignorant multitude of our public squares goes into ecstasies? What would you think of a school of painting which should use relief in the drawings of Raffaele or Titian, to impart more illusion or depth to them? You would think the two arts were overstepping the limits assigned them by nature, to produce more effects, perhaps; but what effects? gross, sensual effects, and popular enthusiasm, instead of the ecstasy of a chosen and discriminating few. In the matter of art, we find sensation in the multitude, but judgment in the select few.

Now this is exactly what that speaker without words of the language of the senses, the musician, does, when he enters into partnership with the dramatic poet, to make his music speak, tremble, cry, and bellow, in what is called an opera, on a theme given by the poet. He increases the material effect of his art, but he does so by changing its nature, and abdicating its independence; by mixing up one art with another, and even several others, augmenting its effects produced on the senses, but diminishing its real magic over the heart.

We can very well understand that the musician, the poet, the singer, the dancer, the dramatic declaimer, the painter, and the statuary, conceived the idea of combining with each other in one single group of several arts, mixed together on the stage, in order to produce on the multitude, one sovereign charm: by the aid of all these charms united. We, ourselves, do not escape the all-powerful sensual impression of such a combination; where the poet composes and versifies; where the painter decorates; where the architect builds; where the danseuse intoxicates us by beauty, movement, and attitudes; where the declaimer writes; where the tragic or comic personage laughs or cries, raves, kills or dies with song; and where, lastly, the orchestra, like the chorus of ancient tragedy, accompanies and multiplies a hundred fold all the impressions of the drama by those sighs, or those thunders of skilful instrumentation which caress or snap each fibre of the bundle of nerves within us. But whatever may be the irresistible force of this impression produced on our nature by such a coalition of arts, while submitting to it we judge it, and when judging it from the really intellectual point of view, that is to say, from the elevated and true artistic one, we cannot help regretting for each of the arts separately, the coalition or rather promiscuousness, which alters the very essence of them. We cannot help believing that painting is more beautiful in an isolated picture by Raffaele, in the solitude of some gallery of the Vatican, than on a scene at the Opéra; that poetry is more divine in a page of Homer, Virgil, Dante, or Petrarch, than in the vocalization of a male or female singer; that a tragic actor is more mighty when reciting simply his part upon his platform, between a couple of lamps, without any charm but his feeling, his accents, and his gestures, than when singing it in the midst of the phantasmagoria of scenery, costume, ballet, and orchestra; and that, lastly, the musician is more eloquent and more pathetic in the sublime nudity of his notes, than in the heterogeneous alliance of them with poetry, drama, declamation, scenery, dancing, and tinsel. There is such a thing as adultery between one art and another; the true nature of the arts forbids certain unions, without that nature lowering itself, while thinking it is heightened. The ancients were aware of the fact; the Greeks, who invented everything, did not invent these unnatural combinations. With them, each art was all the more complete for being isolated, and more itself.

We do not accuse the later composers, such as Mozart, Rossini, and their emulators, of lending themselves to these forced alliances; we pity them: declamation is not made to be sung, or music to be declaimed. Each has its proper sphere.

We understand that the crowd can be mistaken, and that music does not touch their dull ears, unless an immense orchestra makes an immense noise for them, unless words interpret the notes, and a tragedy translates both words and notes by its gestures, its accent, and its physiognomy. But the case is different with men endowed with musical feeling, such as these great composers, or those who are worthy of understanding them; what need have they of this? Is not music a complete language, as expressive, as productive of ideas, of passions and of sentiments, of the Finite and the Infinite, as the language of words? Is not this language of sounds, by the very vagueness and illimitability of its accents, more unlimited in its expressions than languages in which the sense is circumscribed by the positive value of words, or by syntax, which obliges each word to assume its fixed place in the phrase? Does not the man who best speaks and writes his own language find, every instant, that there are nice shades, distinctions not to be expressed, sensations, thoughts and sentiments, which die away on his lips or under his pen, for the want of words sufficiently indefinite to render them? Are we not sometimes smothered in love, enthusiasm, and prayer, from the impossibility of producing in words the impression which oppresses us? Is not a sigh, a groan, an inarticulate cry, in such a case, the only ejaculation of our ideas and sentiments? Is music aught else but such a sigh, or groan; a melodious cry which commences on our lips exactly at the point when the incapability of expression by words, also, commences? Is not a symphony by Beethoven a thousand times more dramatic, for the dreamy imagination of the predestined and impassioned lover of music, than all the dramas ever written by a poet to serve as a text or a framework for a musical drama on the stage? Has any one ever experienced in any theatre a musical impression comparable to a religious song, executed by the voice or on the organ, alone, and exhaling all around altars or tombs, under the arched roof of some cathedral, the melodious Hosannah, the sobbing Stabat, or the suppliant or resigned Requiem of Mozart? Has not a popular air, suddenly springing up and striking the traveller's ear from a wave in the Bay of Naples, a gorge of the Tyrol, one of the Isles of Greece, a Scotch lake, or the flute or voice of a shepherd, a fisherman, a young girl before her hut, caused a thousand times more sympathetic cords to vibrate within his soul than all the operatic orchestras that ever existed? And why is this? Because words, although explaining the music for the vulgar, limit it for the imagination and the heart of a man of well-organized mind; words are the Finite, and music is the Infinite. This is its domain. Words are a leaden weight, which the musician is obliged, on account of the crowd, to attach to his notes, to bind them to the earth, and prevent them from soaring too high—too far into space. For our own part, we prefer detaching the lead from the wings of the musician, and allowing ourselves to be carried away with him to the third heaven.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, JULY 27.—My last letter to your interesting Journal contained a few desultory remarks upon the sacred music of the Moravians, a theme which might be constituted the basis of a series of most edifying analytical articles in the hands of some literary gentleman of leisure, with more time and talent at disposal than those accorded to your correspondent "Manrico." Thus, too, must my remarks upon the secular music of that sect prove cursory and brief.

The Moravians cultivate secular music practically and perseveringly; but although many of their prominent musicians, deeply skilled in the theoretical, ideal, and æsthetic phases of the divine art, have produced, (as I remarked in my last,) works, which, under certain circumstances, would command unequalled admiration in any part of the world, I am not aware that any of these men have ever essayed or produced secular effusions of special note. The glad some piety which pervades the ranks of this little band of Christians has prompted these religious worshippers of the Muses to direct their talents exclusively to the praise and glory of that higher power which has blessed them with gifts so precious.

The cultivation of secular music in Bethlehem is fostered by a Philharmonic Society of many years' standing, a brass band, a sextet of saxhorns, and by the judicious efforts of excellent teachers in private families, as well as in its very justly celebrated female seminary.

The Philharmonic Society has, at almost every period of its existence, been regarded as the best organization of the kind, outside of the three great cities of Boston, Philadelphia, and New York. It finds its support in a regular number of subscribers, who, for an annual contribution, receive the enjoyment of four concerts during the winter season. Formerly a grand daylight concert on Whitsuntide was added to the subscribers' quid pro quo. Indeed, this Whitmonday entertainment was the concert, par excellence, of the season, as each successive year rolled onward; for the exercises almost invariably comprised a great oratorio or cantata, well rehearsed, and exceedingly well given. The "Creation," the "Messiah," the "Seven Sleepers," "Alexander's Feast," and other distinguished works, have all been frequently and satisfactorily performed at their Whitsuntide fêtes. I shall not forget the impression made upon my youthful mind by the annual repetition of scenes and exercises so enlightening, so edifying, so refining, and so well calculated to generalize the various social attributes of our human nature. Methinks the leader of that orchestra is even now painted upon the retina of my mind's eye, as he stood on the left side of the platform, vigorously violining his way through, perchance a symphony of Beethoven, or an overture of Boieldieu; or, halting for an instant, to frown at an uncertain viola or a hurried flute. That identical chef d'orchestre was most admirably adapted to his position. Endowed with brilliant talents apart from his musical accomplishments, which were of a very high order, he was universally respected and uniformly appealed to as one whose attainments amply qualified him to guide a band of well-studied and intelligent musicians. The rehearsals of this society were faithfully held twice per week, for many years. These "practisings" also rest vividly in my memory; how, before the appointed hour, as each member dropped in, the older portion were wont to gather around a patriarchal old stove, and pass the news of the village from month to month, while the young sprouts ogled the girls in the main body of the old Concert Hall;—but I must onward.

Some few years since, the Philharmonic Society of Bethlehem, from various causes, disbanded in toto. It has, however, been vigorously revived; and the names of many of its former active and honorary members stand side by side with young men who now make their first attempts in the renewed orchestra. Its present leader, Mr. Charles F. Beckel, is an admirable musician, theoretically and practically, and enjoys to a well-merited degree the confidence of his confères.

The Bethlehem Brass Band, as at present constituted, has attracted much deserved commendation wherever it has been heard. Its repertoire consists of a most admirable assortment of arrangements for various occasions, all of which are executed with a precision and general excellence in detail, which leaves very little to be wished for, and which ensures for it more engagements than the individual members find time or inclination to accept. The very men who now compose this excellent corps, were, some years since, known as the Juvenile Band of Bethlehem, a clarionet band of the old style, sustained by young boys whose leader had numbered scarcely his fifteenth summer.

Another noticeable feature of the secular music of the Bethlehem Moravians, is its Sextet of Saxhorns. It is an offshoot from the Brass Band above mentioned; and the young gentlemen who comprise it really deserve much credit at the hands of a public which has time and again been delighted with its performances. I can scarcely imagine a more delightful serenade than this admirable sextet of musicians are able to furnish. Their repertoire contains an extensive selection of arrangements from German melodies, oratorios, operas, &c., with occasionally an airy Italian cavatina to follow the substantial feast in the capacity of a light dessert.

Finally, Music is taught in all the private families of the individual Moravian congregations, with an assiduity and watchful perseverance which greatly tends to develop the results which we have thus cursorily endeavored to portray. Children are not forced beyond their capacities, into flimsy polkas and flimsier waltzes, but are gently and progressively piloted through the requisite preparatory exercises, even as the careful parent leads a tottering infant watchfully across a rough and uneven patch of ground.

Much enthusiastic stress is likewise laid upon the cultivation of good music in all of the Moravian boarding schools. Those at Nazareth, Bethlehem, Lititz, and Salem, N. C., possess, in their internal economy, the best arrangements for implanting into the minds of their pupils a thorough and systematic foundation in this heavenly art; and their public entertainments and vacation exhibitions are almost invariably graced with compositions of a very high order of merit. The "Messiah" has been several times most admirably given at the Bethlehem Seminary, under the superintendence of its efficient and accomplished Principal, Rev. Sylvester Wölle.

MANRICO.

CINCINNATI, JULY 24.—Our Philharmonic Society lately closed the season by their sixth concert, which had to be postponed to so late a day, the programme embracing Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony." The concert was pleasant and pretty well attended.

In looking back upon the musical performances of the past season, we have reason to be well enough satisfied, considering many unfavorable circumstances. I cannot say that much progress has been made, but neither could this be expected, as our musical Societies had to struggle under very adverse circumstances. During the first season they were benefitted by the sunshine of novelty; this having left them, the past second season was a hard trial. It showed that there is not quite as much interest for good music among the public of this city as had been sanguinely assumed after the first year's experience; in addition, the bad times took away a large number of subscribers, and even the elements seemed to conspire against them. "A Philharmonic evening" came to be looked upon as synonymous with duck's weather. There was also, unfortunately, some grating between our two principal Societies, or, I should say, between a few members of them, and this was also somewhat detrimental to a quiet pursuit of their objects. But, in spite of all this, they have persevered, given all their concerts and rehearsals, and have been well united among themselves to the last. For this they deserve much credit, and, no doubt, the experience they have made is very valuable for the future.

From present appearances the prospects for our next musical season are very fair; it is likely that there will be more life and earnestness, and that the advancement of instrumental and choral music among us will be pursued with renewed vigor. Large works of the great masters, we may hope, will be brought out for the first time in this hemisphere; and the public, when they see some inherent strength and steadiness of purpose, will, no doubt, show an increased interest.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JULY 31.—Our Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. FITZHUGH, has thus far been a decided success; and the advantage gained in the heavy choruses, by its union with the Northampton artists, has, I am told, suggested the further extension of its field of operations, with a view of concentrating the strength of our proud and thrifty trio of valley towns, in some of the grand choruses of the Oratorios, the coming fall and winter, "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

I was shown, a few days since, a copy of a beautiful Salve Regina, by Hauptmann, a composition eminently worthy of its author, who is, probably, second to none of the masters of music now living; and to whom the sacred mantle of Beethoven, Mozart, and Mendelssohn, may be most appropriately transmitted. At the same time my attention was called to another piece of music, entitled, "Turn thy face from my sins," a full anthem for four voices," published in London as the composition of a certain stoical person whose residence is not exactly fixed, and who answers to the name or title of "Doctor." This "Anthem for four voices" proves to be the same thing, almost note for note, as the first-mentioned piece by Hauptmann, copied almost entire, with English words, and a slight change of key! This is a specimen of wholesale plagiarism before which all others must pale, and wilt, and fade away.

In every department of science, and amongst all the professions, there may be found a set of dullards who are not content to stand or fall on their own merits, or to bide their time, till, by industry and perseverance they can honestly reach the desired point of attainment; but having more money than brains, they supply themselves with the best literary or musical works, and select and publish as their own, not only the ideas, but sometimes the phrases, and even whole pages of the valuable compositions of others. This is particularly true of the musical profession—the temptation to pilfer being greater as the chances of detection are less.

Our knight of the rueful countenance, whose music is not his own, (to use a Paddyism,) must take his place in the class above described. He made the tour of Europe. He heard and saw abundance of rich music. His head was turned. He took—he fell! The injury was not great, for he had fallen before!

The copying "Doctor" is said to wear with due meekness the questionable honor of playing some big-gun-and-trumpet-variations of his own invention, to some of Handel's organ themes, at which the uninitiated, all green and pliant,

"Would bend in mute surprise
And think———my eyes!"

Now, my dear sir, I have considered this subject, not "during an hour of rural idleness, under the shade of green trees, and with the melodies of the many-voiced sea to lull us into the mood to tranquil contemplation," but I have considered it in connection with a certain code of laws, one article of which says, "Thou shalt not steal," and I have the honor to recommend to the learned "Doctor" a prayerful consideration of his own selection from the words of the Psalmist, "Turn thy face from my sins."

Yours truly,

Music in the Public Schools.—The Festival.

II.

The Festival of last week, experimental as it was, has made its mark. All present were delighted and convinced that there is great good in a Festival so arranged, and great good in such training of the children of our schools in simple choral music as makes such a Festival possible. In first alluding to the plan two months ago, we expressed a confidence that, should this experiment succeed, it would be found worth repeating, year after year, upon a larger scale, and pass into an institution. We think the general feeling now regards it as an institution; this single trial has been worth a thousand arguments; the annual Musical Festival of the Public Schools now takes its place with Boston Common, Franklin medals, and the other fixed facts in the calendar of Boston boy life.

No one could listen to that beautiful and touching music of twelve hundred fresh, sweet children's voices, blended in sublimely simple choral melodies, and not feel that music can repay far more attention than has yet been given to it in our general scheme of education. No one could doubt, that, even if its only fruit were annually such a festival, the hour or two it claims each week from other studies, would be well-accounted for. Add to the inspiration of the music that of its accompaniments, the feast for eye and heart and soul, as well as ear,—add to the æsthetic the rare moral gain of so much harmony of sense and soul and reason blended—add the experience of one such hour of higher, sweeter, heavenlier life, and who will hesitate to own that such a Festival is in itself, and simply as a festival, worthy to be made an end and as such to receive its share of special training in the school routine? Whatever that occasion as a whole was worth, remember Music was the soul of it. 'Around what other principle, as centre, could such a feast be organized? The bringing of twelve hundred voices within range involved all that kaleidoscopic beauty of arrangement; music built up that wondrous flower-like pyramid of youths and maidens, that living type of social harmony and heaven on earth; music necessitated the selection of so beautiful a place; and music drew to it those floral wreaths and ornaments, by an artistic instinct, for completeness' sake. It was the right sort of a School Festival. For such an hour, when thousands must take part, when all things must be short and nothing wearisome, all things intelligible to all, enjoyable by all, eliciting response from all,—all virtually giving and receiving—where feasting would be scramble and "refreshments" heaviness, and speeches but a weariness, unheeded in the general confusion,—in such an hour Music is the one most fit, refreshing, all-uniting, intellectual, practical and practicable entertainment; the one least liable to fatigue, distraction and disorder; the one most suited to the spirit of the occasion and most expressive of the common feeling; the very language of what every heart would have expressed in such an hour, when all have had enough of mental stimulus and tension, of intellectual statements and distinctions, and seek refreshment in a high religious utterance of joy and unitary feeling. Fewer speeches henceforth, is the chief hint of improvement furnished by the first experiment. The children may not enter into the conscious philosophy of all this, but they are nevertheless made happier by it. And theirs too is the joy and wholesome discipline not only of the great day itself, but equally of all the preparation and rehearsing for it, the marshalling into order, the daily accumulating excitement, the surprised, delighted sense of order as the work grows to completion, the sense of sharing the responsibility of the great whole, the charm of watching to its hour of bursting open in full splendor this fine century plant in which they all shall shine.

The marked success of this experiment makes it self-evident that much more may be made of such a Festival hereafter. Here we had but the simplest elements. The very best thing that could be done, and done well and with edifying effect, was here attempted:—nothing but the singing, all in unison, of a few of the plainest old familiar chorals, which doubtless, most of the children only knew by ear and sang by rote, with no more training than sufficed them to keep in time and tune, to prolong, subdue and swell a note at given signal, and to produce something like a musical quality of tone, so that, in spite of individual imperfections, the entire mass of sound was sweet and musical, was tone and not mere noise. A simpler thing could not have been attempted, unless it were that sillier thing, of which we have had quite enough of late years, and which has brought school music into much discredit, of making multitudes of children sing in listless or in noisy fashion a few hum-drum, jig-like ditties and street songs, that only sound well sung by a single or a few voices, that fall short of the dignity of such an occasion, and sound ridiculously senseless and confused when joined in by a thousand voices. But now, for once, without carrying the children a step beyond the very little culture they already had, a really musical effect has been produced, and one which was found in a very great degree inspiring and sublime. This right combining of the simplest materials into so genuine an effect of music, sets the key for future lessons in the schools. Here was an evidence of sound and sensible beginning, though at the very bottom of the scale. Here was the foundation shown for everything that may be profitably added in the way of musical instruction in the schools.

The old church Choral, Canto fermo, or Plain Chant, was the beginning and foundation of the whole development of the musical art in modern history. The rest has been built up on that. So in the musical culture of each rising generation now, the singing of the plain Choral is the true ground to start from. These Chorals are the world's oldest, simplest, most primitive, popular, religious common stock of melody,—the broadest, firmest rock on which to build. The training of a large mass to sing them well involves the mastery of two important elements in all true singing, which in themselves almost contain the soul and essence of the art. These are: first, the producing and sustaining of a firm, pure, musical tone; secondly, the art of graduating the force of tones, of softening or intensifying tone, of what is figuratively termed light and shade.

When our thousands of children can do these two things, they are on the right road to some musical acquirement. This has already formed in them something like a right musical sense, an ideal in the mind and nerves and ear of music, as distinguished from mere rhythmic noise. All other culture may be built on this. We shall not inquire how much of the theory, of the technical routine and rules of music may well be made a general requirement in our schools. It is plain that we can go but a moderate way in this. All children can be taught to read and sing plain melodies, and even parts in easy harmony, from notes. This, with the choral practice in large bodies, loosens the upper surface of the soil, so that whatever seeds of higher faculty for music may lie latent in this individual or that, will have a chance to germinate and seek the sun. Special aptitudes deserve special training. But all should learn to hear a part in the plain choral unison. So much of music is, unless we neglect it, a common gift, designed for solid good, to the whole human family.

And this leads to a most important practical consideration, urged with convincing force in the remarks of Dr. Upham. Congregational singing—though we do not believe in narrowing our church music down to that alone—is yet a most important part, the most essential part, in fact, of music as an element in public worship. What a poor, feeble, inexpressive, vulgar thing it is, for the most part, when it is attempted now! How few of any congregation can sing even "Old Hundred" decently well! But in this choral practice of the children, generations grow up in the love and practice of the Choral; the entire people are endowed from childhood with a never-failing repertoire of grand old tunes, and with the art, recalled as easily as instinct, of joining in them with great multitudes of voices, so that, whether in the solemn service of the temple, or in great national or other festival occasions, where there is a deep and universal sentiment, that sentiment shall never lack the means of uttering itself sublimely.

We have yet to speak of certain practical hints furnished by this festival, as to the best method of teaching singing in the common schools.

pany with my readers, I gain, by this release from editorial labors, more time to devote to musical conventions and the other professional duties that have of late increased so rapidly upon my hands. In the meantime let me assure my friends that the Northwest is still my field of labor; that Chicago continues to be my head-quarters, and that, though I relinquish to one abler than myself the pleasing duty of furnishing them with stated supplies of musical pabulum, I shall always, as formerly, be happy to hear of their prosperity, and subscribe myself, as of old.

"Yours truly,"

C. M. CADY.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The "Promenade Concerts" are still kept up, tri-weekly, at the Music Hall, and, if increasing crowds be any evidence, now bid fair to become an institution. We are certainly glad to see a disposition to enjoy and to support cheap concerts; but we seriously doubt if the continued hearing of mere brass bands, only relieved by vulgar clap-trap like the "Old Folks" singing, introduced of late, does really tend to cultivate and refine the public taste for music. Indeed, we fear that it does just the contrary; that it creates a love for what is coarse and meaningless in music, just as the "yellow-covered" novels spoil the taste for pure and wholesome reading. If the people are so fond of going to the Music Hall, why cannot better bands, of reeds and finer instruments, tempering the bray of brass, and suited to more delicate, refined effects of music, be supported quite as well? How much better were a band like that which played at the School Festival, last week! Or such reed music as the Brigade Band furnished, with such marked success, at one of their Spring concerts in the same hall! Where is the difficulty? If it costs a few more instruments, will not the attraction be thereby increased enough to make it pay! We ought not to regard the idea of cheap people's concerts as at all truly realized, until we get so far as to have not only a reed band, but a bona fide orchestra within reach, every pleasant summer evening. What we fear is, that such constant din of brass will blunt the popular sense, destroying all demand for better things.

The present number of our paper goes, according to arrangement, to the subscribers of the late Chicago Musical Review. The editor of that paper, whose Card will be found above, has kindly promised to furnish us, from time to time, with a me-long of musical matters in the West. . . . The great musical festival in Jones's Wood, New York, is postponed on account of the bad weather, to the 9th, 10th, and 11th inst. . . . Is not the passion for brass bands, so universal in these days, another symptom of the general sensation fever; all of a piece with the taste for scarlet uniforms, for murder stories, frightful accidents, French novels, Verdi-ism, and all forms of filibusterish uneasiness? . . . A season of French Comic Opera, at Niblo's, is talked of. . . . PARONI has returned to New York, having had great successes in the West Indies. . . . MARETZKE has leased the Tacca Theatre, Havana, for the coming season, at $13,000 per month. He will first commence a two months' season of Italian Opera, at the New York Academy, the 30th inst., with Mme. GASSIER as prima donna. ULLMAN is said to have secured the PICCOLOMINI for his new season in October, and also to have engaged FORMES, who will sing in some operas new in this country. It is high time. GAZZANIGA and BRIGNOLI have been presented by the Directors of the Philadelphia Academy with gold medals, in commemoration of the part they bore in the inauguration of that institution. They will remain in the United States next season, and will, no doubt, join either Maretzek or Ullman. . . . Miss ABBY FAY, with Signors AMONIO and BRIGNOLI, and also accompanied by her teacher, Sig. BENDELARI, has been creating a sensation by her concerts at Saratoga and other fashionable watering places. . . . Mme. ANNA BISHOP, now in South America, will soon return to us. She is said to be accompanied by "Sig. Belletti, who sang with Jeany Lind." This must be a mistake, as Belletti, the singer, is in London. There was also a clarinet player, Belletti, who accompanied Jeany Lind. . . . GOTTSCHALK was recently at Porto Rico. . . . RUBINSTEIN has left London and returned to Moscow.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—During the week ending July 17, Balfe's Zingara, ("Bohemian Girl"), with Albani, Piccolomini, Giuglini and Belletti; Lucresia Borgia; Lucia; La Serva Padrona, and a scene from L'Italiana, for Signors Belart, Belletti and Viaretti. The subscription season closed with Trovatore for a wonder! The new season, of reduced prices, was to open with the Huguenots, followed by Don Giovanni, La Traviata, &c.

MISS KEMBLE'S CONCERT was one of the choice entertainments of the season. Its giver, though still hampered by nervousness in no common degree, and with a voice that will require incessant watching for years to come, has more intelligence, accomplishments, and promise than any contemporary of her standing—her share in the entertainment being a duet with Signor Mario (who was in radiant voice), a couple of German Lieder, and two Shakespeare songs—the first an exceedingly elegant setting of "Orpheus and his Lute," by Miss Gabriel. Then she was assisted by MM. Halle and Joachim (whose Tartini solo, "Le Songe de Diable," was incomparably given), by Signor Piatti, by Madame Viardot in her very best voice and spirits, and by Mr. Santly, who sang the well-known buffo duet, "Senza tanti complimenti," with the lady in good style. This young artist's place may be already defined by the fact that, in his first season, besides going the round of English oratorios with great success, he has been associated with all the best Italian singers, and kept his ground among them steadily, modestly, improvingly. A pleasing Canzone sung by him—a composition of M. Berger to some of Barry Cornwall's words—was the other novelty of this agreeable concert.

The Vocal Association's last concert on Wednesday was given with an orchestra, the great work performed being Mendelssohn's "Lohgesang." The second act had one remarkable feature—M. Halle's execution of a pianoforte Concerto in E flat, by Mozart,—very seldom played, though, to our thinking, a more attractive work than the Concertos in D and C minor,—and one interesting novelty, Herr Joachim's Overture to "Henry the Fourth." The last prelude bearing such a title that we recollect is the old trumpet-and-drum piece of business by Signor Martini. "Was that overture written in the same language as this?"—was a question that would whimsically break across the mind as we listened (laboriously we must admit) to the new composition. Herr Joachim's is not wholly "music of the future," for we desire to hear the overture again—provided it be more carefully performed. It seems to us to contain distinct ideas, ingenious combinations, forms too intricately disguised where a clear development would have been more welcome, good instrumental effects, and a happy close. Without wholly establishing its writer as a composer, it is an advance on most of his essays at composition with which we have as yet made acquaintance. The playing of Herr Joachim is, in every sense of the word, too masterly, too real, too purely and reverentially musical (without the slightest intimation of charlatanism) for it to be possible for him to remain within the circle of fogland if he continue to exercise himself as a writer.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—Much complaint has been called forth by the concert given recently in St. James's Hall in aid of the funds of this institution. We borrow a description of the concert from the Sunday Times of June 27.

The Hall was filled by a most numerous and aristocratic audience. Her Majesty, the Prince Consort, the King of the Belgians, and a distinguished suite, occupied a prominent position in the hall, but it is to be regretted that the prominent position was such as to allow the audience only to see the backs of the illustrious personages. The programme, though hardly of that character that was to be expected from our English Conservatoire, included some good names as executants; but a better illustration of what we were doing, in the way of musical progress, amongst ourselves it would have been hardly too much to have anticipated. Amongst the principal female artists thus grouped together were—Madlle. Titiens, Madame Clara Novello, Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Dolby, Madame Rudersdorf, Madame Weiss, Miss Messent, Miss Palmer, and Madame Viardot Garcia; whilst the male vocalists were Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Giuglini, Mr. Harrison, Herr Reichardt, Mr. Allan Irving, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Allen, Mr. Boddá, and Signor Belletti. Here was a force quite strong enough, if properly employed, to have really done credit to our national position in every respect, but, with infinite pain and humiliation do we record that which must have been patent to every one present, that the programme neither showed our native singers nor our native composers to anything like advantage. The first part was almost wholly occupied with a selection from a mass by the Earl of Westmoreland, which, however creditable to the musical taste of the noble amateur, who has shown much skill in previous compositions, was utterly unfitted to an occasion of this kind. With the powerful assistance of such names, as we have above enumerated, the mass had certainly the fullest vocal justice done to it, but the absence of applause, as much out of deference to her Majesty as tributary to the sacred character of the music, would not, we apprehend, have been superseded by very enthusiastic expressions of rapture had the circumstances been otherwise. The effect was heavy, and left behind it no exalting impression. A concertante by MAURER, for four violins, by Messrs. Blagrove, Isaac H. Hill, and Watson, followed, and ably displayed the talents of these expert violinists, and then Haydn's "Spirit Song," beautifully executed by Miss Dolby, enlivened the rather deadened sympathies of the audience. The first part concluded with the finale from Mr. Lucas's opera of "The Regicide," which is founded

To the Subscribers of the Chicago Musical Review.

The Messrs. Higgins Brothers have recently disposed of the Chicago Musical Review to Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, and its subscribers will hereafter be supplied with DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC in its stead. As by this arrangement all such subscribers are to receive a quarto in place of an octavo musical paper, it is presumed that they cannot be otherwise than satisfied. While I regret to part comon the same subject as Arne selected for his "Artaxerxes," and which was rendered with the fullest effect by Miss Pyne, Madame Weiss, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Allen, and Mr. Weiss. The second portion of the programme was opened by the introduction to Rossini's "William Tell," the soli parts being undertaken by Madame Weiss, Miss Palmer, Herr Reichardt, Signor Giuglini, Signor Belletti, and Mr. Bödda, with the important harp accompaniment being cleverly contributed by Mr. Harold Thomas. This was most admirably sung, and gave great satisfaction. The other leading features of this portion were Macfarren's sparkling recitative and song with burlesque, "The Queen's Greeting" (May-day) charmingly rendered by Miss Pyne, and Mendelssohn's magnificent finale to the opera of "Lorely," in which Mlle. Tiliens gave the soprano solo with exquisite effect. A recitative and romance, composed by His Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, called "Am Blumigen Rain," and sung by Herr Reichardt, was received with considerable favor. We cannot, however, accept the present concert as a decisive illustration of the stage to which musical art has advanced among us, nor of the ample resources at the command of the Academy, but we are glad to believe, from the numerical strength and fashionable character of the attendance, that the funds have been materially benefited by the experiment. Mr. Costa was the conductor, assisted by Mr. Lucas, conductor of the concerts of the Royal Academy.

There is a rumor that Prof. William Sterndale Bennett has formally withdrawn himself from all connection with the Royal Academy; whereupon the Athenæum remarks:

This will surprise no one who reflects that he is the only composer of European reputation whom that luckless establishment has ever turned out; and that, therefore, he had no figure nor place in the "illustrative" concert got up by the noble amateur whose Mass was brought forward. So unanimous, indeed, is the feeling of every one with regard to this creditable exhibition, that it will not surprise us—still less be any cause for regret—if such puny life as lingered in the Academy is shaken out of it by Wednesday's concert. Had artists as a body more moral courage to resist intimidation in the form of cajolery, such things could never happen. While, however, it may be feared that the present is not the last case of the kind by many on which we may have occasion to animadvert, we shall not cease to fight the battle in defence of their independence, ungracious though the task be.

CLASSICAL CHAMBER CONCERTS.—The last concert of CHARLES HALLE, (than whom no one seems to command more respect in England as an interpreter of classical music), took place July 8, and attracted an enormous audience. On this occasion he played Mendelssohn's C minor Trio, with Messrs. Sainton and Piatti; a Sonata by Clementi; Beethoven's Sonata for piano and violin, in G, with Sainton, and Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for two pianos, with Miss Arabella Goddard and orchestra. A violoncello solo, by Piatti, completed the programme. Mme. SZARVADY's third Matinée (June 25) had the following programme:

Sonata in G, pianoforte and violin, Madame Szarvady and Herr Molière—Mozart. Suite de pièces, No. 5—Sterndale Bennett; Ronde, Les Vendangeuses—F. Couperin (le grand); and Lied ohne Worte. Volkstied, pianoforte, Mad. Szarvady—Mendelssohn. Grand trio, in B flat, op. 97, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; Madame Szarvady, Herr Molière, and Signor Piatti—Beethoven. Sonata, in C sharp minor, op. 27, pianoforte, Madame Szarvady—Beethoven. Berceuse—Chopin; Air—Pergolesi; and Capriccio, La Truite, pianoforte, Madame Szarvady—Stephen Heller.

Mr. ELLA, and his "Musical Union," seems to have lost all favor with the critics by taking the task of criticism,—in other words, laudation—into his own hands. The Athenæum gives a reason for abstaining from all report of his concerts, that the Director prefaced his prospectus for the past season by declaring "that no anonymous critics were admitted to his concerts," said declaration on the prospectus being followed up by a string of anonymous laudations which had appeared during the past ten years in the journals.

Mr. LOUIS RAKEMANN, who will be remembered here in Boston and New York, and who, for some years has been living in Italy, gave a concert at Willis's Rooms, July 15. The Musical World says:

It was a strictly classical affair, the selection comprising Mozart's quartet, in G minor, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, executed by Messrs. Rakemann, Joachim, Webb, and Payne; Beethoven's sonata quasi fantasia for pianoforte, in C sharp minor op. 27, by Mr. Rakemann; Bach's prelude and fugue for violin, by Herr Joseph Joachim; Mozart's fantasia for pianoforte "à quatre Mains," in F minor, performed by Messrs. Charles Hallé and Rakemann; Mendelssohn's capriccio for pianoforte, in E, op. 33, No. 2, played by Mr. Rakemann; and Beethoven's sonata for violin and pianoforte, op. 30, No. 1, in A, Messrs. Joachim and Rakemann at the instruments. With such a programme, it would be strange indeed if the audience were not a musical one, and the lover of classic music thoroughly satisfied. Merely to hear Herr Joachim in three pieces so widely separated in point of style, treatment, and feeling, was worth a journey of twenty miles. It is useless to eulogize the great violinist. About his talents there is no difference of opinion. His playing in Mozart's quartet almost surpassed itself for grace, tenderness, and expression. Of course, Bach's prelude and fugue always creates the sensation of the evening when he plays; but to those who listen with the inward ear, such a performance as that of Mozart's quartet steals quietly to the heart, and leaves an almost ineradicable impression. Mr. Rakemann acquitted himself ably at the piano. Mozart's Fantasia for four hands, with such a consummate associate as Mr. Charles Hallé, could not fail to prove a rare treat. In Beethoven's Sonata, too, Mr. Rakemann indicated his classic acquirement no less than his classic predilection.

SWEDISH NATIONAL SINGERS.—From the London Musical Gazette, July 17.—Sweden—who has already laid her claim to a position in the art-world by issuing Thorwaldsen, Ole Bull, and Jenny Lind—has sent us nine of her glee-singers—as odd-looking fish as one would meet with in a good many days' march, but with a nationality and distinctness of character about their songs and singing that has its charm, and that will probably render them popular in England for some time to come. Here's a description of their appearance, taken from the Morning Post:

"The alto, a Laylander, we believe, looks as if he had been living upon train-oil all his life, whilst his attire displayed a curious cross betwixt that of a Chinese tea-gatherer and an English butcher. The principal tenor, with tight leather inexpressibles, and a huge stiff frill standing erect to the top of his head, resembled at once a bold sportsman and a frightened vulture. Another gentleman, with a very high hat running to a peak, and bandages about his legs, looked like a gouty Persian. Another resembled a half-starved Zouave in undress. The rest had the air of doubtful peasants. All were differently attired, and presented an appearance more curious than picturesque."

This description is true as the needle. The oddity is increased by the variety of the costumes, and one is puzzled to conjecture why such difference should be, and particularly why some should wear their hats while they are singing, and others dispense with the capital surmount. Perhaps the singing is thereby influenced. We have heard of tenor singers whose chest notes depended much on the absence or presence of shirt studs. Whether the hatted or unhatted Swedes are the best vocalists, we cannot pretend to decide, for their unanimity is astonishing; their crescendos and diminuendos are managed to perfection, sforzandos and other suddennesses with equal adroitness, and they go as one voice. This being the case, and as one voice, or one singer, cannot both wear a hat and not wear it at the same moment, we have no means of separating these folks according to their respective merits, at which we are somewhat chagrined, for we do not like to be posed in this way. Besides, it is so unusual for attitude to be preserved in the presence of in-door company, that, if it is sanctioned in such an instance as this on the score of nationality, one wonders why, in the name of goodness, they should not all wear their hats. Verily, 'tis a knotty point.

The roundness of tone of these singers, both in loud and soft passages, is very remarkable, and sforzandos are produced with no less care than energy, the preservation of quality of tone in the sudden forcing of the voice being quite surprising. Their united power is extraordinary. It is evidently the result of constant practice together, and in this respect their performance will be a great "caution" to our concert vocalists, too many of whom regard rehearsals as very unnecessary ceremonies. The compositions which they introduce are very peculiar, and no composer's name is appended. They are, in all probability thoroughly national airs harmonized, for we did not, at our visit on Monday morning observe that much constructive skill had been brought to bear on their part-songs. A "Trum-marsch," though there is not much imitation of the drum introduced, is clever, and will, doubtless, become popular. A glee, by Bellman, in the refrain of which words are dispensed with, and the voices imitate horns, with much faithfulness, is also out of the common way. This is the only work to which a composer's name is attached, and possibly it is German.

We fear the encore nuisance has "obtained" considerably in Sweden. Her nine representatives do not evince the remotest intention of quitting the platform after the performance of one of their morceaux, nor are they particular as to the amount of applause awarded. They simply take off their hats—at least, such as have them; it is quite obvious that those who have not cannot join in the ceremony—replace them, and sing something else. This is not right. Madame Goldschmidt must invite them all to a national feed at Rochester, and read them, in their native tongue, all that has been said against encores in Punch and the Musical Gazette. That estimable lady, by the by, was present on Monday with her husband and little girl.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

Little Hans. Song or Duet. Curschmann. 25

A quaint little Duet for Tenor or Soprano. It is more generally performed as a Song, with the second part in the last verse omitted. As a Song it is in Germany often made use of by Concert-Singers. It is one of the most beautiful compositions of Curschmann, and the one that has most tended to make his name familiar with the great musical public.

Farewell (Addio) Trio, for two Sopranos and Tenor. Curschmann. 25

In the style of the well-known sacred Trio by the same composer, "Protect us through the coming night," and quite as fine. The words, which are a short, tender adieu to a beloved person, exclude it from the church, but make it doubly acceptable to the home-circle. The Tenor part may be taken by a Contralto, and in that case must be sung an octave lower than written.

Little Sunbeams. Ballad. Henry Farmer. 25

A light, pretty, little song, lively and gay, with a pretty picture for a title-page.

The Day I first thee saw, (Le jour où je te vis,) for Voice, Piano, and Flute Obligato.

Fürstenau. 25

A Love Song, in slow-measured, pathetic strains, accompanied by the airy warblings of the Flute. The Flute part is easy of performance. Voice and Piano parts are even more so. There are so few compositions of this kind, that it is easy to select the best, of which this Song is one, unquestionably.

Home, Sweet Home. Transcribed by Osborne. 25

Another arrangement of this ever-pleasing Sicilian melody, which will be sure to find its admirers. It is comparatively easy, and yet full of fine effects.

Il balen del suo sorriso, (Like a rainbow.) Romanza in "Il Trovatore." Transcribed by

Osborne. 25

This is the first transcription of merit that has appeared in print, of this exquisite song of the Troubadour in Verdi's Opera. It is beautifully done, of but moderate difficulty, and should grace the portfolio of every Piano player who is fond of transferring the gems of song to the key-board of his instrument.

Scene de Bal. Valse brillante. H. Cramer. 40

A very brilliant and pleasing Waltz, in about the style and difficulty of Bergmüller's and Macdowell's well-known Parlor Waltzes. Like all compositions of this author, it is distinguished by its perfect fitness for the instrument it is intended to be performed on. Every chord, every passage, is laid out in such a manner, that the right fingers will quite naturally take hold of them. This quality makes the Waltz but moderately difficult.

Books.

Schneider's Practical Organ School, containing all necessary instructions in Fingering, Management of Stops, Pedals, &c., with a great variety of Exercises, Interludes, easy and difficult Voluntaries, &c., to which is added a complete Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass. Translated and adapted to the wants of young organists. 2.00

The author of the above work maintains a position in Europe as a teacher of organ music, the same as that held by Bertini, Czerny, and Hungen as teachers of the pianoforte. This method of instruction is not excelled by any similar work in all points necessary to the acquisition of a thorough and practical knowledge of the class of music of which it treats. The author is plain in the elucidation of every particular; and has taken special pains to impart, by examples and exercises, an acquaintance with what is sometimes called "the organ touch," which differs from that of the piano in its prologation.

The Young Folks' Glee Book, consisting of nearly one hundred copyright Songs and Duets never before harmonized; and the choicest gems from the German and Italian. The whole arranged in a familiar style for the use of Singing Classes, Glee Clubs, and the Social Circle. By Chs. Jarvis.

Special attention is solicited to the general features of this work, as possessing universal attractions. The Copyright Songs, Duets, &c., comprise the best pieces of the leading publishers, inserted here by permission, and contained in no other book. Of the gems of German and Italian song, nothing need be said, as their beauties are universally known and admired; and their arrangement and collection in this form cannot fail to be duly appreciated by every lover of a highly-refined and classic style of music. Attention has been directed to the choice of words, and they will, in each case, be found elevated in sentiment, and adapted to the great mass of the people. In a word, the "Young Folks' Glee Book" is intended to be of a superior class in every particular. A glance at its table of contents will convince any one that what it was intended to make it, it really is.

The All Hail Hereafter!

From R. W. EMERSON.

And, henceforth, there shall be no chain,
Save, underneath the sea,
The wires shall murmur thro' the main
Sweet songs of liberty.

The conscious stars accord above,
The waters wild below,
And under, thro' the cable wove,
Her fiery errands go.

From the N. Y. Courier & Enquirer.

Hymn to the Atlantic Cable.

Bow, Science, bow thy head in awe,
With lightning chain in hand,
Be still, as through the ocean's depths,
Thou bindest land to land;

For thou hast wrought a miracle,
Next to the Son of God,
Thou walkest down on sea's dark floor,
High on its waves He trod;

He holds the lightning in the cloud,
And thou within the wave,
And wind and wave, which yield to Him,
Thou hast had power to brave;

Then tremble thou before thyself,
So near to God akin,
That to thy hand His power comes,
And seems to dwell therein;

And hushed and trembling thank the Lord
For favor on thee shed,
That thou, through sea with lightning chain,
Two continents hast wed.

SALUTATORY.

Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war.

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

VI.—SEASON OF 1844 (CONTINUED)—MINOR PIANISTS—MUSICAL MARRIAGES—VIOLINISTS—ERNST—GRAND OPERA—SPONTINI AND MEYERBEER AGAIN—GRISI AND MARIO—VIARDOT GARCIA.

PARIS, April 25, 1844.

The transition from the lion to the rabbit is somewhat abrupt. Yet I must not pass unnoticed those tamer piano-players who have figured here this season. We cannot all be great prophets, and there must be also minor prophets, of whom twelve make a dozen. As the greatest among the little ones we name here THEODOR DOEHLER. His playing is neat, fine, pretty, delicate in feeling, and he has a quite peculiar manner of stretching out his hand in a horizontal level and striking the keys only with the curved tips of the fingers. After Doepler, HALLE deserves special mention among the minor prophets; he is a Habakuk of as modest as true merit. I cannot avoid here also mentioning Her SCHAD, who, among piano-players, takes perhaps the rank which we assign to Jonas among the prophets. May no whale swallow him!

As a conscientious reporter, who has to give account not only of new operas and concerts, but also of all other catastrophes of the musical world, I must speak also of the many marriages that have broken out, or threaten to break out therein. I speak of real, life-long, highly respectable marriages, not of the wild dilettante wedlock which dispenses with the mayor in his tricolored scarf and with the blessing of the church. Chacun seeks now his Chacune. The messieurs artists dance along on suitors' feet, and warble hymeneals. The violin enters into matrimonial alliance with the flute; the horn music will not be left out. One of the three most famous pianists* married recently the daughter of in all respects the greatest bassist† of the Italian Opera. The lady is beautiful, graceful, and intelligent. A few days since we learned that still another distinguished pianist from Warsaw had entered the holy state of wedlock; that he, too, had ventured out upon that deep sea for which no compass ever yet has been invented. Go on, bold sailor; push from shore. May no storm break thy rudder! And now the report goes, that the greatest violinist whom Breslau has sent to Paris, is on the point of marrying here; that this expert of the fiddle also has got tired of his quiet bachelorship, and means to try the fearful, unknown other side. We live in a heroic period. Just now another famous virtuoso has become engaged. Like Theseus, he has found a charming Ariadne, who will lead him through the labyrinth of this life; she will be at no loss for a clew of yarn, since she is a seampstress.

The violinists are in America, and we have had the most edifying accounts of the triumphal processions of OLE BULL, the Lafayette of the puff, the reclame hero of two worlds. The manager of his successes had him arrested in Philadelphia, to compel him to pay the costs of his ovations. The hero paid, and no one can now say that the blond Norman, the genial fiddler, owes anybody for his fame. Here in Paris, meanwhile, we have heard SIVORI. Portia would say: "God made him, and therefore let him pass for a man." Another time, perhaps, I will overcome my disinclination to report upon this fiddling emetic. ALEXANDER BATTÀ, too, has given a fine concert this year; he still weeps out his little child-tears on the great violoncello. On this occasion I might also praise Herr SEMMELMAN; he needs it.

ERNST was here. He is more fond of playing only at friends' houses. This artist is loved and esteemed here. He deserves it. He is the true successor of Paganini; he has inherited the magic violin, wherewith the Genoese knew how to move stones, nay, even blockheads. Paganini, who with a light stroke of his bow now led us to the sunniest heights, now let us look down into awful depths, possessed, to be sure, a far more demoniacal power; but his lights and shadows were at times too glaring, the contrasts too sharp, and his most grandiose sounds of nature often had to be considered as mistakes in Art. Ernst is more harmonious, and the soft tints predominate with him. Yet he has a partiality for the fantastical, and even for the grotesque, if not indeed the scurrilous; and many of his compositions remind me always of the legend-comedies of Gozzi, of the most adventurous masquerades, of the "Venetian Carnival." The piece of music which is known by this name, and which was seized upon in the most shameless way by Sivori, is a most charming Capriccio of Ernst.—This lover of the fantastical can also, if he will, be purely poetical, and I have lately heard a Nocturne by him, which was, as it were, dissolved in beauty. One fancied himself transported to Italian moonlight, with still cypress alleys, shimmering white statues, and the dreamy plashing of fountains. Ernst has, as is well known, taken his dismissal at Hanover, and is no longer royal Hanoverian concert-master. That was no fit place for him. He were far more suited to conduct the chamber music at the court of some fairy queen, as, for example, that of the Lady Morgane. Here he would find an audience that would understand him best, and among them many high and mighty personages, who are as appreciative of Art as they are fabulous: for instance, King Arthur, Dietrich of Bern, Ozier the Dane, &c. And what ladies would applaud him here! The blonde Hannoveriennes may certainly be pretty, but they are mere heath-sheep in comparison with a fairy Melior, with the Lady Abonde, with Queen Genoveva, the fair Melusina, and other famous lady personages, abiding at the court of Queen Morgane in Avaluu. At this court (and no other) we hope some day to meet the admirable artist, for we, too, have the promise of an advantageous situation there.

* Thalberg.

MAY 1.

The Academie-Royale-de-Musique, the so-called Grand Opera, is found in the Rue Lepelletier, about in the middle, and exactly opposite the restaurant of Paolo Broggi. Broggi is the name of an Italian, who was once ROSSINI's cook. When the latter came, last year, to Paris, he visited the trattoria of his former servant, and after he had dined there, he stood a long time before the door, in deep reflection, gazing at the great opera building. A tear came into his eye, and when some one asked him why he seemed affected with such sadness, the great master answered, that "Paolo had served up for him his favorite dish of old times, Ravioli, with Parmesan cheese, but that he was not in a condition to consume one half the portion, and even that oppressed him now. He, who had once possessed the stomach of an ostrich, could scarcely bear as much as a love-sick turtle-dove!"

We do not undertake to say how far the old wag mystified his indiscreet inquirer. Let it suffice to-day, that we advise every friend of music to go and eat a mess of Ravioli at Broggi's, and then, lingering a moment before the door of the restaurant, contemplate the building of the Grand Opera. It is not distinguished by any brilliant luxury; it has rather the exterior of a very respectable stable, and the roof is flat. On this roof stand eight large statues, which represent the Muses. The ninth is wanting, and ah! that ninth is just the Muse of Music. We hear the strangest explanations of the absence of this very estimable Muse. Prosaic people say, a tempestuous wind has hurled it from the roof. Minds more poetic, on the other hand, maintain that the poor Polyhymnia threw herself down, in a fit of desperation at the miserable singing of Monsieur Duprez. That is quite possible; the broken, glassy voice of Duprez has grown so discordant, that no mortal, certainly no Muse, can bear to hear it. If it goes on at this rate, all the other daughters of Mnemosyne will fling themselves down from the roof, and it will soon be dangerous passing in the evening through the Rue Lepelletier. Of the bad music which for some time has prevailed here in the Grand Opera, I will not speak. DONIZETTI still remains the best, the Achilles. You may imagine, therefore, what the smaller heroes are. As I hear, too, this Achilles has retired to his tent; he is out of humor, God knows why! and he has informed the Direction that he will not furnish the five-and-twenty promised operas, since he feels disposed to rest. What twaddle! It a windmill were to say the same, we should not laugh more. Either it has wind and turns, or it has no wind and stands still. But Donizetti has an active backer here, Signor Accursi, who always raises wind for him.

The newest artistic enjoyment which the Academy of Music has given us, is the Lazzarone of HALEVY. This work had a mournful fate; it fell through with drums and cymbals. As to its worth, I refrain from all expression; I merely confirm the report of its terrible end.

Every time that an opera falls through, or a remarkable fiasco is made in the Academy of Music, or at the Buffo Theatre, you will remark there a mysterious, meagre figure, with pale countenance and coal-black hair—a sort of male gypsy granny, whose appearance always indicates a musical disaster. The Italians, as soon as they see him, hastily stretch out the fore and middle finger, and say, That's the Jettatore. But the light-minded Frenchmen, who never have a superstition, merely shrug their shoulders and call that figure Monsieur SPONTINI. It is, in fact, our former general-director of the Berlin Grand Opera, the composer of La Vestale and Fernando Cortez, two splendid works, which will long keep fresh in the memory of men, and will long be admired, while the composer himself atones for all the admiration, and is nothing but a faded ghost that enviously haunts the world and frets itself about the life of the living. He can find nothing to console him for the fact that he is long since dead, and that the sceptre of his power has passed into the hands of MEYERBEER. The latter, the deceased maintains, has crowded him out of his Berlin, the place he always loved so much; and any one who has the patience, out of sympathy for past greatness, to listen to him, may learn, to a hair, what countless documents he has collected to lay bare the intrigues and conspiracies of Meyerbeer.

The fixed idea of the poor man is Meyerbeer, and they tell the most amusing stories of the way in which his animosity proves always harmless by the admixture of excessive vanity. If any writer should complain of Meyerbeer, that he, for instance, has not yet composed the poem which he sent him years ago, Spontini seizes suddenly the wounded poet's hand, exclaiming: "J'ai votre affaire. I take up your cause; I know a means by which you may revenge yourself on Meyerbeer. It is an infallible means, and it is this: do you write a great article about me, and the higher you appreciate my merits the more will Meyerbeer be vexed." Another time, a French minister finds fault with the composer of the Huguenots, who, in spite of the urbanity with which he had been treated here, had still accepted a servile place at Court in Berlin, and our Spontini springs up to the minister in great glee, and exclaims: "J'ai votre affaire, you can punish the ungrateful fellow in the worst way. You can put a dagger into him, and that simply by nominating me grand officer in the Legion of Honor." Lately, Spontini finds poor Leon Pillet, the unfortunate director of the Grand Opera, in a towering passion against Meyerbeer, who has just informed him, through M. Gouin, that he will not give the Prophète yet, on account of the inferiority of the singers. How the eyes of the Italian sparkled then! "J'ai votre affaire," he cried in ecstasy, "I will give you a divine hint, how you may humiliate the ambitious wretch to death; have me chiselled out life-size, set my statue in the foyer of the Opera, and this marble block will weigh like an Alp upon the heart of Meyerbeer." Spontini's state of mind is beginning to be a matter of serious anxiety with his friends, particularly with the family of the rich piano manufacturer, Erard, with whom he is connected through his wife. Recently some one found him in the upper halls of the Louvre, where the Egyptian antiquities are set up. The Ritter Spontini stood like a statue, with folded arms, for nearly an hour before a great mummy, whose sumptuous gold case indicates a king, that could be no less than that Amenophes, under whose government the children of Israel left the land of Egypt. But at last Spontini broke his silence, and spoke as follows: "Unhappy Pharaoh! thou art the cause of my misfortune. If thou hadst not suffered the children of Israel to go out of the land of Egypt, or if thou hadst only drowned them all en masse in the Nile, I should not have been crowded out of Berlin by Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn, and I should still continue to direct there the grand opera and the court concerts. Unhappy Pharaoh, weak crocodile king, by thy half measures has it come to pass that I am now a ruined man; and Moses, and Halevy, and Mendelssohn, and Meyerbeer have conquered!" In this style does the wretched man hold forth, and we cannot refuse him our compassion.

As regards Meyerbeer, as before said, his Prophète is postponed for a long time yet. But he himself will not, as the journals recently announced, take up his abode forever in Berlin. He will, as heretofore, spend alternately one half of the year here in Paris, and the other half in Berlin, to which he has formally pledged himself. His situation reminds one somewhat of Proserpine, only that the poor maestro finds his hell and his hell torments here as well as there. We expect him here again this summer, in this beautiful lower world, where already several scores of musical he and she devils lie in wait for him, to howl his ears full. From morning till evening must he listen to singers of both sexes, who wish to make their debut here, and all his leisure hours are occupied by the albums of travelling English ladies.

There has been no lack of debutantes at the Grand Opera, this winter. A German made his debut as Marcel, in Les Huguenots. In Germany, perhaps, he was only a big clown, with a brumming beer voice, and thought therefore he might appear as basso here in Paris. The fellow screams like a wild ass. Also a lady, whom I suspect to be a German, has produced herself upon the boards of the Rue Lepelletier. She is supposed to be extraordinarily virtuous, and sings very false. They do say that not only her song, but everything about her—her hair, two thirds of her teeth, &c., are all false; that there is nothing genuine but her breath, and that compels the frivolous French to keep at a respectful distance. Our prima donna, Mme. STOLZ, will not be able to sustain herself much longer; the ground is undermined, and although, as a woman, she has all the cunning of her sex at her command, she will be overcome at last by the great Giacomo Machiavelli, who would like to see Viardot-Garcia engaged in her place, to sing the chief rôle in the Prophète. Mme. Stolz foresees her fate; she feels that even the partiality which the director of the Opera devotes to her, cannot help her in the least if the great master of the tone-art plays his cards; and she has resolved, of her own free will, to leave Paris, never to return, and end her life in foreign lands. "Ingrata patria," said she recently, "ne ossa quidem mea habebis." In fact, for some time she has actually consisted of mere skin and bones.

At the Italiens, in the Opera Buffo, there have been quite as brilliant fiascos, the past winter, as in the Grand Opera. There, too, there was much complaint about the singers, with this difference: that the Italians often would not sing, and the poor French song-heroes could not sing. Only that precious pair of nightingales, Signor MARIO and Signora GRISI, were always punctually at their post in the Salle Ventadour, and trilled forth the most blooming Spring, while, outside, all was snow and wind, forte-piano concerts, and Chamber of Deputies debates, and polka madness. Yes, these are charming nightingales, and the Italian Opera is the everlasting singing wood, to which I often flee when wintry gloom beclouds me, as the frosts of life become intolerable. There, in the sweet corner of some covered box, one is again warmed up most agreeably, and does not at least grow bloodless in the cold. There the melodious enchantment turns to poesy what was but now coarse reality; pain loses itself in flowery arabesques, and soon smiles the heart again. What rapture, when Mario sings and in the eyes of Grisi the tones of the beloved songster mirror themselves as if it were a visible echo! What delight, when Grisi sings, and in her voice the tender look and blissful smile of Mario are melodiously echoed! It is a lovely pair, and the Persian poet, who has called the nightingale the rose among birds, and the rose, again, the nightingale among flowers, would here find himself in a quandary, for both of this pair, Mario and Grisi, are distinguished equally for beauty and for song.

Unwillingly, in spite of that charming pair, do we miss here at the Buffos, PAULINE VIARDOT, or as we prefer to call her, the GARCIA. Her place is not supplied; and no one can supply it. This is no nightingale that merely has a genre talent, and sobs and trills so exquisitely of Spring; nor is she a rose, either, for she is ugly, but of a sort of ugliness which is noble, I might almost say beautiful, and which frequently excited the great lion-painter, Lacroix, to enthusiasm! In fact, the Garcia suggests less the civilized beauty and tame grace of our European home, than the terrible splendor of an exotic wilderness; and in many moments of her passionate delivery, especially when she opens her great mouth, with its dazzling white teeth, too wide, and smiles so grimly sweet and gracefully grinning, then one feels as if the most monstrous kinds of vegetation and of animals of Hindostan or Africa must spring into being; one looks to see gigantic palms, all overhung with thousand-flowered lianas, shoot up; and one would not wonder, if suddenly a leopard, or a giraffe, or a herd of young elephants, should run across the scene. We hear, with great satisfaction, that this singer is again on her way to Paris.

The Fatherland.

From the German of GRUEN.

Across the dark green waters
With swelling sail we flew,
A band of joyous spirits,
A merry, motley crew;

Such as, perchance, this morning,
The wind together flings,
And far and wide, to-morrow,
Will scatter on its wings.

One was by birth a Frenchman,
Came from the Rhone's green strand;
Harvests of gold and vine-hills
He called his native land.

For home another boasted Far Northland's rocky wall;
And Scandinavia's glaciers
And ocean's crystal hall.

Where,—a perpetual beacon,
Vesuvius smokes and shines,
A third had left his cradle
O'erhung with blooming vines.

To Germany's oak forests,
The Alpine herdsman's track,
And meadows of the Danube,
My homesick thoughts went back:

"To all our homes a health, now!
Take each his glass in hand!
Not all, I trow, have sweethearts,
But all, a Fatherland!"

And each his brimming beaker
With flaming glance drank dry;
But one stood, sea-ward gazing
With mute and mournful eye.

It was a man from Venice,
Who murmured all alone;
"Alas! my home—my country!
Thou art but water and stone!"

"Once blazed the sun of Freedom—
Then lived and spake the stone;
At dawn, like Memnon's music,
Was heard its thrilling tone!"

"Girdling the world with purple,
The water rolled that day,
And flung its gorgeous rainbows
To heaven in sparkling play.

"Why art thou quenched forever,
O glorious sun? and thou,
Ah, why, my home—my country!
But stone and water thou?"

Far out to sea in silence
Long gazing, did he stand,
And still, untouched, the beaker
Held sparkling in his hand.

Then, as a death-libation,
He gave the sea the wine,
Like sparkling tears in showers
I saw the gold drops shine.

Mlle. Titiens.

The London Morning Post has the following remarks concerning Mlle. Titiens and the present condition of opera generally:

It is a great pity that Mlle. Titiens should be obliged to leave us without having performed some of those great characters belonging to the high classic school of tragic opera, in which she now excels, we believe, every living singer. The only part of the kind Mlle. Titiens has played in England is that of Donna Anna in Il Don Giovanni, and it were superfluous to tell our readers how greatly she succeeded in it, or how much that really grand impersonation has contributed to the fame she now enjoys in this country. As the heroine of Beethoven's Fidelio, Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, or Weber's Oberon, she would have appeared to the utmost advantage, improved the public taste, and—as we think, at least—have drawn crowded houses. But in the present state of affairs managers are not, unhappily, always free to choose their own course of action, even though that be the only right one; and the dire necessity of conciliating a depraved taste, and succumbing to prejudices, violent in proportion to their silliness, will account for many of the strange mistakes and shortcomings which call, nevertheless, for the critic's animadversion. It may be very true that, where large commercial interests are at stake, the public critic should exercise his vocation with circumspection—that if a series of articles in which the truth be very harshly told possess the power of closing up a large theatrical establishment, and throwing some hundreds of deserving persons "out of bread," as the phrase goes, it is better, in one sense at least, that such articles should not be published. It is proper, in short, to let mercy temper justice, and even to lean to mercy's side. But still, there is a point at which even kindness should stop; and whatever respect may be due to the commercial interests of a management struggling with great difficulties, such as every management in this country must necessarily encounter, the critic's first and paramount duty is to the public in relation to the art he professes to criticize, and whose taste is wholly dependent upon the works most frequently set before them. Musical art is far too grand and important a thing to be dealt lightly with. Its influence upon the passions and emotions—its power of ennobling and enervating the mind, of exciting the purest and deepest feelings of the soul, or of becoming a merely sensual, frivolous, and contemptible pastime, according to the manner in which it is used, has been known and recognized by all enlightened and refined minds ever since the time of the ancient Greeks. Music, in short, like every other art which influences man's nature, is potent for good or evil; and although it cannot present an unchaste image to the eye, or inculcate an immoral principle, it may nevertheless produce something akin to both, namely, a state of feeling combining voluptuous languor with vulgar enjoyment, whose tendency is to debase the mind and render it unsusceptible of great thoughts, which, however differently they may be expressed in various arts, have all the same source.—We know of nothing more humiliating to a lover of true music than to observe the silly delight of some people while listening to the rapid strains of modern Italian opera. The blank, idiotic vacuity of their countenances, the meaningless wave of the outstretched hands,—do they not faithfully reflect the imbecility of the music? Nobody in his senses, we believe, would suppose such results could emanate from an intellectual source. We may very possibly be preaching in the Desert; but still, when season after season passes without any sign of improvement—when Italian opera-houses are springing up around us like mushrooms, and works of the lowest order of art form the staple attractions at all of them, it is really time to remind the public that there is such a thing as fine operative music in existence—that there might be much more if they would have it so—and to endeavor at least to uphold the true standard of art, upon which are emblazoned so many immortal names, if we cannot succeed in making it popular, as it ought to be. No man having any voice in public affairs of art should allow such a state of things to exist without entering his protest, if it be but occasionally, against it, for it is something to maintain people's belief in an important truth, even if we cannot make them love it.

Mlle. Titiens, the great tragic queen of the German lyric stage, is about to leave us without having been afforded opportunities for displaying half her genius, which shines most brightly in the works of the greatest masters, and the prevalence of modern Italianism is the cause. Thus have the above general reflections been forced upon us; but it should be at the same time understood that they apply with equal force to all our Italian opera-houses, and must by no means be limited to the establishment immediately under notice. Everywhere is Verdi rampant, and everywhere, as a necessary consequence, is an attempt made to trample the classic standard in the mud. Mlle. Titiens was of course unable to contend with such overwhelming circumstances as those which surrounded the commencement of her career in this country, and therefore appeared in parts like Leonora in Il Trovatore, and Lucrezia in Lucrezia Borgia, reserving others more worthy of her powers for a future season, when the magic of her genius, then better known and appreciated, may possibly make even the habitués of the Italian opera swallow a classic dose or two with something like resignation. Of Mlle. Titiens' efforts in modern Italian opera we prefer her last, viz., the impersonation of Lucrezia Borgia. Making due allowance for a certain constraint imposed upon her by a strange language, the peculiar requirements of unmitigated Italian music, and the knowledge that other singers 'to the manner born' had already played the same part on the London stage with immense success, we cannot but think the gifted German's performance a triumph in its way. Physically, she is perfectly well suited to the character. Her tall, stately, and elegant figure—her large eye, flashing command—the full, magnificent voice, so capable of expressing all the stormy or pathetic accents of lyric tragedy—are most assuredly equal to the requirements of Donizetti's heroine; and it is almost superfluous to add, that an artistic mind which could grasp the whole meaning of a part like Mozart's Donna Anna, and express that meaning so clearly and beautifully, is not wanting in power to realize such a conception as Lucrezia Borgia. Briefly, then, nobody acquainted with the physical and mental abilities of Mlle. Titiens will doubt for a moment that she is more fitted for the due portrayal of the part—her personation of which immediately concerns us—than any other young artist at present upon the Anglo-Italian stage. We remark, indeed, in her conception a grandeur and ideality, and in her execution a temperance and smoothness, which give new value to the composer's notes, materially mitigate the turgid, vainglorious fury of his bombast, and even impart something like dignity to his meretricious frivolity. Once, and once only, throughout the opera, does Mlle. Titiens descend from the heights of lyric tragedy, and address herself to the ears rather than to the minds of her audience; and this is to show what, perhaps, her greatest admirers did not previously suspect—namely, that, in addition to her other unsurpassable and well-known abilities, she is a complete mistress of the art of florid vocalization. We allude to Mlle. Titiens' execution of the cabaletta of the air, 'Com' é bello,' which is remarkable for rapid fluency, as it is for decorative fancy and rich brilliancy of tone. Never before, in our recollection at least, was so much effect given to this particularly insipid tune. For us, however, the softly-intense and exquisitely mellow tones, 'in linked-sweetness long-drawn out,' of her 'Com' é bello' and 'Ama tua madre,' colored as they are by dramatic sentiment of the truest kind, have much greater charms. Although it is not even in these instances that Mlle. Titiens' 'fiery and original virtue' can appear in all its native force and fullness, or rise to the height of poetical rapture, it is enabled to reach it in later scenes of the opera, namely, those which terminate the first and second acts, where the heart-rending accents of a mother's agony, wrung from the depths of a 'divine despair'—the stern, haughty, scornful courage, and blood-thirsty fierceness of the Borgia—are by turns portrayed by the gifted artist with harrowing truthfulness.

Wild Music in London.

From the Athenæum, July 17.

What a Babel of music is this capital!—with Pifferari from the Abruzzi in the streets—an organ as large as a sea-side cottage, including an orchestra and a marionette ballet, drawn by a horse (a cruel instrument of torture this! because heavy to move) Highland pipers with their flings at our own corner—two rival German bands at our neighbor's—not to speak of the mulligatawny-colored individual, in a muslin turban, who sings his song (is it a song?) while he busily pats the parchment of his tam-tam in exact time, as he lounges along. Then the black musicians, genuine and fictitious (principally the latter), seem to have taken their places among the institutions of the metropolis; and not merely in the Strand or "down East," but in the West End also not alone as attractions to the shades, or Saloon, or Cyder Cellar, but in the "halls of dazzling light," which a Mr. Owen Jones bedecked so as to give Pica-dilly a peep into his own Alhambra. Mr. Mitchell has much to answer for, in having first loosed the inky troop of serenaders on London. During the full season the street delights are drowned by the roar of carriages and the rattle of the omnibuses; while Bones and Banjo, as concert-givers, hardly come to the surface—thanks to the superior attractiveness of "white music," directed by Messrs. Costa and Benedict, Dr. Wylde, Prof. Bennett and Mr. Hullah. Now, when stagnation is rapidly approaching, and when silence out-of-doors and in-doors would be sweet, this wild music breaks out with a spiteful violence. It is needless to observe how intrinsically worthless are such exhibitions. They are frequented for the sake of the lamp-black, the woolly wigs, the grimaces, and the rattle of the bones; and this by people who should know better. Yet (as was said when the Hutchinson family were here) out of the cooking-up of opera-airs and caricatures of such faded ballads as load the counter of Messrs. Cramer & Co. by the thousand—out of the odd twists and chords stuffed into them, which these sable folk exhibit, may possibly come in later days a set of national melodies as characteristic as the tunes of Ireland, Scotland or Wales. Such—as we have said a thousand times—do we imagine to have been the growth, by degrees, of much, if not all, wild music—the primal forms of melody being almost as few as primal fairy tales. The nine Sveedish Singers who are now appearing in the smaller St. James's Hall, stand in a different category. How far their costumes are genuine in their difference—whimsically reminding us as they do of Quakers, firemen, Armenians, peasants from the Black Forest—we do not pretend to declare; but their singing is good enough of its kind to carry off any wildness or whimsy of costume. Their voices are very tuneful, and nicely managed—with a tone of the same quality as gives its fascination to Madame Goldschmidt's voice: and which thus we may fairly imagine to be generically national. They sing very well together, and their music, though not as characteristic and startling as the hill-tunes which the Rainers brought us (and with them the pathos and solitude of the Alps, into the midst of our close, crowded English cities), has a charm and a quality of its own; and if it be made up—not altogether in a state of nature—it is well made up. Their performances, which are to us full of interest, are diversified by the violin-playing of Mdlle. Humler. No offence to Madame Parmentier, formerly Mdlle. Milanollo—no scandal to more than one old Italian St. Cecilia—her instrument is one which always looks more or less grotesque in female hands—but, with the exception of Madame Parmentier, we have never seen a woman wield the violin—and coax it and make it talk, in a more masterly fashion than this very young lady, who, we perceive, has been taught her craft by M. Alard, of Paris.

BOSTON MUSIC SCHOOL.—This institution was incorporated in May, 1857, since which time it has been in successful operation.

The plan on which this school is organized furnishes instruction to pupils in vocal and instrumental music, and in musical composition. The study of the piano-forte and harmony is enjoined upon each pupil, and that of singing, or of any orchestral instrument is optional, either as a primary or a secondary study. The pupil, however, can study only in three branches in one term, and in each branch two lessons a week will be given, all of which instruction is included under the same price of tuition.

This is the first institution of the kind organized in this country, and it promises to be to America what the music schools in Germany, Paris and Italy are to Europe. The importance and value of such facilities for instruction as the board of managers of this school present, cannot be overstated. By a judicious arrangement the instruction, which is imparted by practical as well as theoretical teachers, is emphatically thorough in every department, and is given at a very low price.

The want of such an institution has long been felt in our community, and it cannot be doubted that the efforts of those who have established it, and the peculiar advantages it offers, will be properly appreciated and encouraged. Pupils of both sexes are admitted, and, except in choral practice, their instruction will be kept entirely distinct. Pupils can enter the school at any stage of their musical progress, and the course of their studies will be arranged by the Board of Instruction. A new term will commence on the first Monday of October next.—Transcript.

A LARGE ORGAN.—The Roman Catholic (French) Parish Church of Montreal, that large and magnificent edifice, the admiration of strangers in the city, has recently been supplied with a large organ, proportionate in size to the vastness of the building. Although not yet completed, the central section has been up and is now in operation. The builder is Samuel W. Warren, of Montreal. He began the work in November, 1857. The central section was completed and performed upon on the 24th of June last, the anniversary of St. Jean Baptiste, to the delight and satisfaction of a congregation numbering over 10,000 persons. The remaining two sections are in course of construction, and when fully completed the dimensions of this immense organ will be fifty feet in height, forty-five feet wide, and twenty feet in depth; number of pipes, 4698 (some of which weigh 12 cwt.) four sets of manuals; one set of pedals, 2½ octaves, with twelve stops; six large bellows (to be worked by water power) and eighty-nine different stops. The pneumatic lever is to be applied to each of the manuals distinctly, and also distinctly or separately to the manual complete. To the pedal organ there will be a double set of pneumatic levers; but the most elaborate use of this power will be found in its application to the combination of stops. Here we have it exhibited in a compound form to each organ individually, and to the whole collectively; where, by one operation, the player is enabled to produce a combination of stops upon the instrument at once. This movement is effected by a series of knobs, about two inches apart, placed immediately in front and under each set of manuals, occupying a centre position, always within reach of one or other of the performer's thumbs. The registers extend throughout the entire compass of the key-board, without any exception. Mr. Warren has made an important improvement in the construction of the pedal keys of this organ, which are concave at the centre, thereby obviating the necessity of describing a semi-circle in the movement of the foot from side to side, or stretching of the leg, heretofore so embarrassing to the performer. The cost of this organ, when fully completed, will be $20,000.

A Piano with Pedal Obligato.

The following is from a French journal, Le Maître:

If the number of clever organists has always been limited, this fact has resulted from the difficulty of procuring an instrument on which they could practise. Organs are rarely to be found except in churches, where it is difficult to make them serve the purposes of study. The organist is, therefore, in most cases, compelled to practise on a piano, and to this he resigns himself so willingly, that a too prevalent opinion has, in some measure, made pianist the synonyme of organist, although between the two instruments there is but one point of resemblance, viz., the key-board. The touch, the fingering, the style of music, are all different; and the pedals, which constitute at once the main difficulty of the organist, are wanting in the piano. And yet it is only by long practice that the organist can make himself master of his instrument, and obtain full command of the magnificent play of thirty-two feet which they alone put in action, and which produce the deepest grave tones that the ear can perceive. The difficulty of his study consists chiefly in the peculiar and complicated fingering required in order to enable the organist to link together the sounds produced, even in the most rapid passages. An attempt had been made, before the invention of the piano, to adapt a system of pedals to the harpsichord. A similar system has since been applied to the piano by one of our most skillful manufacturers, who, however, merely borrowed from that instrument its hammers and strings, which were acted upon by the feet instead of by the hands. This system, which has the advantage of setting free the left hand, adds little to the possibilities of the instrument. It is the application of the pédale tirasse of the organ to the piano.

A distinguished musician, M. Auguste Wolff, head of the house of Pleyel, Wolff, and Co., has recently invented a Pédalier forming an instrument independent in itself, having its own strings and hammers, as well as its own peculiar mechanism. This instrument is not cumbersome, and may be conveniently introduced into the smallest apartments. It is a kind of armoire placed upright against the wall; the performer seating himself on a bench attached to the front of the instrument, which may be raised or let down at pleasure. The pedals are under his feet; and a piano of any kind, upright, square, or grand, is placed before him. The height of the Pédalier allows its strings to be unusually long and thick; while the dimension of the sounding-board, proportionately large for a key-board of two octaves and a-half, imparts a peculiar richness and power to its tones. In the best grand pianos, the last octave, and especially the last fifth, is composed of notes lacking both tone and clearness. In the Pédalier of M. Auguste Wolff, the last ut is as pure and as full as that of the best flute-stop of 16 feet. As in the organ, in which a play of eight is always added to a play of 16 feet, M. Auguste Wolff, with a view to modify the gravity of the thick strings of his instrument, has united with them finer strings which produce at the same time the octave next above. The prolonged vibration is of remarkable fullness. This beautiful instrument has the advantage of being attainable at a moderate price; therefore it appears to us that it will be found to be widely useful. Henceforth, by its aid, the organist will be enabled to study, in his own room, the most complicated organ-music; the pianist may familiarize himself with the numerous chefs-d'œuvre of the great masters written with pédale obligato; and composers for the piano will find new resources in this instrument, which we believe is destined to become the complement of every grand piano."

We have inspected and tested the Pédalier, which is now on view in London. When the makers have obtained the full benefit of English organic experience, and have acted upon the advice given them, the instrument will doubtless be extremely valuable. At present the pedals are most inconveniently located. Provision should be made for their extending at least a foot further under the piano-forte. By the arrangement of the Pédalier and its 'bench' (for sitting) exhibited to us, the student was effectually debarred from anything approaching a pleasant practice of any pedal fugue. This must be remedied; notice must be served to us that the remedy has taken place; and then we shall be happy to call attention to one of the most simple yet important inventions that has for some time been published.—Lon. Mus. Gaz.

A Uniform Diapason.

The Moniteur of Wednesday contains a decree of the Minister of State instituting a commission to devise means of establishing in France a uniform musical diapason! The preamble of the decree of the French Minister of State is as follows: "Considering that the elevation, constantly increasing of the diapason presents inconveniences by which musical art, musical composers, artists, and musical instrument makers, have equally suffered; considering that the difference which exists between diapasons in different countries, in different musical establishments and manufactories, is a source of embarrassment in general, and of difficulties in commercial relations, a commission is instituted," &c. The commission will consist, amongst others, of two professors of physics, and the following composers—Auber, Berlioz, Halévy, Meyerbeer, Rossini, and Ambroise Thomas.—There are, I dare say, many who will be ready to smile at this decree as a frivolous intervention of the State; but I fancy the present generation in England have overcome the prejudices of their fathers against an art so comprehensive in its study and effects as music, and the feeling must be now general that the English Government might do more than it has done for the encouragement of the higher branches of musical education. "Tonic sol-fa," and other singing establishments on the voluntary system, are excellent after their kind, but they will never, unassisted, create an English school of dramatic composition. I believe it has been long agitated in musical circles to establish a uniform diapason throughout Europe. The present is a good opportunity to revive the idea.—Lon. Mus. Gaz.

The Music Show at Sydenham.

(From Punch.)

To their Flower Shows and Shower Flows (this latter word has birth in the spray of the Great Fountains) the Directors of the Crystal Palace now are wisely adding Music Shows. Unthinking minds fancy that, as music is addressed to the ear, not to the eye, it is somewhat of a Taurism to say there has been a "Show" of it. But a concert like last Friday's, with its acre of performers, and its square mile or more of audience, appealed not less to the ocular than to the aural sense. A blind man or a deaf one might alike have been delighted with it. Besides, whoever cavils at our calling it a Music Show may be silenced by a reference to the official programme. The concert is there termed a Choral Demonstration; and Dr. Johnson's synonym for this big word is Show. Quod erat Demonstrandum. Argal, Punch is right, as usual, in his coinage; and, as the words struck from his mint invariably pass current, the next "Grand Choral Demonstration" will be more simply called a Music Show, and will not upon that account, Punch bets, prove less attractive.

Opera-goers are well used to hear music in a hot-house; and there therefore was small fear that Sir Joseph Paxton's greenhouse would be found too hot to hold them. Indeed, grilled as they've been lately, with thermometers at midnight standing at 100 degrees in the coolest shade procurable—that is, we should say, in the shade of Aristocracy—we think that the habitudes of Covent Garden and Her Majesty's must have felt a new sensation in listening to music in a comfortable temperature, and where they could respire without the exercise of fanning. Moreover, in a floral point of view, the great green-house at Sydenham surpasses both the London hot-houses. The boquets in Covent Garden are growing more and more gigantic every season, but they can't quite yet come up to the Crystal Palace flower-baskets; and there is no green in the eyes of the frequenters of the Haymarket, so freshly verdant as the leaves of the orange-trees at Sydenham. Comparisons are "odorous;" but, even in a nasal point, the C. P. has just now undoubtedly the best of it.

We are sure the dauntless Lumley and the indefatigable Gye do everything they can to keep their houses in good odor. But fresh air in London is not so easily imported as fresh pine-apples and cherries; and, disguise it as we may with pleasant perfumery, there is just now an all-pervading something in the air (an air-dresser might christen it Boquet de la Témise, or Concentrated Sewer Scent) which, follow our noses where we may, we can't, in town at least, get out of them.

But how about the music? cries some unbiassable critic, who has in his wisdom been reserving his opinion until he ascertain what Mr. Punch's may be. We regret to disappoint him, but our hatred of routine will not allow us to indulge in musical criticism. Critics must look elsewhere for the cut-and-dried phrases on which they pin their faith. Mr. Punch went to the Music Show solely to enjoy himself; and he therefore cleared his mind of all idea of being critical. Mr. Punch has a notion (it may be a mistaken one), that the man who, at a concert, listens as a critic, can't have much enjoyment in it. The hearing of the music is a business, not a pleasure to him. With his ears stretched to their utmost to detect the flaws, he has no aural power left him to appreciate the beauties. To write about a concert without mentioning the music will certainly be varying from the regular routine; and, as variety is charming, Mr. Punch by this course will best keep up his character.

Nevertheless, as in these days of Rainpant Puseyism some sort of auricular confession will doubtless be expected of him, Mr. Punch (speaking not as professed critic, but as one who has enjoyed it) is "free to own" that the Music Show at Sydenham was as pleasant as the temperature in which he sat and listened to it. In both respects the green-house had the better of the hot-house. The varied bill of fare which was presented at the Sydenham feast formed an appetizing contrast to the terjourns Verdi diet with which the British opera-goer has of late been sickened. The morceaux of Mozart and Mendelssohn and Roastbeef (this latter is the musical synonym for Handel), which were put before us last Friday afternoon, showed that Mr. Costa, the celebrated chef, was as choice in his selection as in his serving up. Every dainty dish was fit to be "set before a king;" and King Punch is pleased accordingly to intimate his relish of them, and to state that, long before His aural feast was finished, the taste of Traviata was clean gone from His mouth.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, AUG 2.—Of course, during the dog days, little to say about music. There are rumors of future operative movements, but little more than you have already been informed of. They say BRIGNOLI has been offered a flattering engagement at the Italian Opera in Paris, and will probably accept it, first opening our fall season in New York. MANETZER's great open air Musical Festival in Jones's Wood, (of which I hope to speak at further length in my next,) has been postponed for a few days, in consequence of wet weather.

I spent last Sunday with a friend in New Haven, making my first visit to that delightful city. Everybody knows what a lovely place it is; how neat and beautiful are the houses, each isolated in its own little court-yard, and embowered by shrubbery; how beautiful the view from East Rock; how noble the Park, ornamented by the three old churches, and flanked by the buildings of Yale College; and above all, how magnificent the stately elms, with their interlacing foliage, and noble Gothic naves! Beecher, in his "Star Papers," thus discourseth about this noble tree:

"No other tree is at all comparable to the elm. The ash is, when well grown, a fine tree, but clumpy. The maple has the same character. The horse chestnut, the linden, the mulberry, and poplar, are all of them plump, round, fat trees, not to be despised, surely, but representing single dendrological ideas. The oak is venerable by association, and occasionally a specimen is found possessing a kind of grim and ragged glory. But the elm, a lone monarch of trees, combines in itself the elements of variety, size, strength, and grace, such as no other tree known to us can at all approach or remotely rival. It is the ideal of trees—the true Absolute Tree! Its main trunk shoots up, not round and smooth, like an over-fatted lymphatic tree, but channeled and corrugated, as if its athletic muscled showed their proportions through the bark, like Hercules' limbs through his tunic. Then suddenly the whole idea of growth is changed, and multitudes of long, lithe branches radiate from the crotch of the tree, having the effect of straightness and strength, yet really diverging and curving until the outermost portions droop over and give to the whole top the most faultless grace. If one should at first say that the elm suggested ideas of strength and uprightness, on looking again he would correct himself, and say that it was majestic, uplifting beauty that it chiefly represented. But if he first had said that it was graceful and magnificent beauty, on a second look he would correct himself, and say that it was vast and rugged strength that it set forth. But at length he would say neither; he would say both; he would say that it expressed a beauty of majestic strength, and a grandeur of graceful beauty. A village shaded thoroughly by grown elms cannot but be handsome. Its houses may be huts: its streets may be as dirty as New York, and as frigid as Philadelphia; and yet these vast majestic tabernacles of the air would redeem it to beauty. These are temples indeed; living temples, neither waxing old nor shattered by time, that cracks and shatters stone, but rooting wider with every generation, and casting a vaster round of grateful shadow with every summer. We had rather walk beneath an avenue of elms than inspect the noblest cathedral that art ever accomplished. What is it that brings one into such immediate personal and exhilarating sympathy with such venerable trees? One instinctively uncovers as he comes beneath them; he looks up with proud veneration into the receding and twilight recesses; he breathes a thanksgiving to God every time his cool foot falls along their shadows."

One of the most beautiful sights I have ever seen, was the park at New Haven upon the moonlight night we were there. The Capitol building stood out clear and cold, in its Grecian majesty, while behind it a few lights twinkling amid the foliage betrayed the locality of old Yale. The Episcopal church, its grey walls covered with ivy, stood near by, silent and dark, while the two other churches were brilliantly illuminated, and from their interior the sacred music of the choirs swelled out upon the quiet night. Far over the foliage of the elms arose, in majestic and ghostly whiteness, the noble spire of the Central Church, bathed in moonlight, while the lovely walks beneath the elms were enlivened by idle wanderers who quietly listened to the church music, or softly whispered to each other as they strolled along, ever and anon stopping to admire the magical effect of the moonlight as it crept in, here and there, through the interstices of the heavy foliage. I have seen moonlight nights in Florence, in Rome, in Venice, but nowhere is a moonlight night more exquisitely lovely than that Sunday night in the Park of New Haven.

They have some very good church music in New Haven, withal. At the Central Church there is a fair organ, a skilful player, and a large and tolerably well-trained choir; but I was particularly pleased with the music in the adjacent Episcopal church. An admirable quartet (the contralto of which is deserving of great praise,) is ably seconded by a tasteful organist, whose name I did not learn. Of course, one cannot judge of the merits of a performer from hearing him at a single service; but from what I did hear, my only objection to this gentleman's playing is a lack of vim. He must be careful that his tasteful, elegant style does not become cloying from monotony. Another remark: Why does a capable organist omit the customary final voluntary? Such an omission looks as if it proceeds either from laziness or snobbishness. I do not, either, understand why an excellent choir like this should allow the clergyman to read the Te Deum. This noble canticle loses half of its grandeur when divorced from music. Small country choirs may be excused for adding its rendition to the duties of the clergyman, but I do not see why a competent city choir should do so. With this exception, I think the music of this excellent quartet will give a great satisfaction to any of our readers who may visit the city and feel inclined to attend this church. They sang, the morning I was present, the beautiful hymn: "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings," with as much taste and effect as I have ever heard.

So after dating New York a letter about New Haven, I will close before allowing myself an opportunity of indulging in further similar Hibernianisms.

TROVATOR.

PITTSFIELD, MASS., AUG. 5.—Last evening, although it was rainy and unpleasant, a select number of ladies and gentlemen attended a soirée of the "Mendelssohn Musical Institute," given at the close of their summer term. The pieces performed seemed to give general satisfaction. Among them were sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart, Kuhlau, and Diabelli; songs by Mendelssohn, both with and without words, vocal and instrumental. The beautiful song, "Wenn die Schwärben heimwärts ziehn," by Abt, was very correctly and sweetly rendered by a modest young lady pupil; and the closing sonata, for four hands, by Mozart, was greatly admired, both for its intrinsic beauty and for the purity and delicacy of its rendering by the young ladies, the notes seeming to drop pearl-like from the fair hands, which appeared not to tremble at all; though it is doubtless as true now as ever, that we must not "trust to appearances." But in my mind the utmost satisfaction was felt in knowing that these pieces were not studied for display or exhibition; but they have made a portion of those which form the daily study of the pupils, and are selected from many similar ones which they are capable of performing. Those who have formerly been present at these soirées, noticed a marked progress in the style and execution of the performers, as few remain at the M. M. Institute for a less time than a year. Although it has been in existence but little more than two years, it has received eighty-three pupils, who have given fifty-one public soirées, which have no doubt had a beneficial influence upon all who have attended them, in elevating the taste and cultivating a love for the truly pure and beautiful in the divine art. May this Musical Institute continue thus prosperous; and in the ascending path they have chosen. We bid its founders God speed!

CLASSICUS.

MANION, ALA., JULY 20.—Being a constant reader of your Journal, and noticing reports musicale from almost all sections of the world, I venture an intimation of the existence of Music and musical performances in this section of cotton and corn.

Native original plantation music, with fiddle and banjo accompaniment, has so long assumed the ascendancy, that although the old folks will, for the sake of the rising generation, don their best habiliments and endure a performance, still, after going through the torture, they will, with much pleasure solicit some one to "give 'em a tune."

Notwithstanding all this, there has been, and now is, much attention given to the musical education of young ladies, many of whom can give you a lively specimen of showy execution, as the grand test point of climacteric excellence—in a piece by Schullhoff, Voss, or Wallace, to the extent of one or two compositions as a "show off" for reserved occasions—but, as a test of musical attainments, the scales in simple form would suffer. The object does not seem to be so much a musical education as the ability to entertain a few friends with some lively polka, hornpipe, or jig, (among whom that species of music is always predominant, the faster played the greater the credit); or some ballad in simple form, in which the words are the only thing listened to; so that, to attain an enviable popularity, one must either amuse or astonish.

During the past year there has been much done in the cause of Music in Alabama, at the "Judson Female Institute," under the direction of "Professor" Pond, recently from New York. At the concert given during the winter season, and more recently at the two closing concerts of the Institute, the pupils gave some creditable specimens of vocal and instrumental music that would not have been amiss in your city of music. The overture to Tancredi and Fra Diavolo, and fantasia from Norma, Musaniello, La Bayadere, Zampa, Benedict's Galop Brillante, Battle March from the Prophete, &c., were accurately performed; the first three upon nine pianos, (!) with three performers at each, (!!) twenty-seven pianists, (!!!) with a Dehorn Harmonium, two Timpani, and other furniture orchestral—the "Professor" conducting and performing the duties of Violin Primo or a Solo Cornet, which he did most satisfactorily in the Fra Diavolo.

The other pieces, together with a long array of minor compositions, were performed upon nine, eight, seven, six, five, and four pianos, (!!!) with two and three at each instrument; all evincing careful training and a sympathetic response to the baton of the conductor. Schulhoff's Impromptu and "Gold Fever Galop," together with Czerny's brilliant variations on Le Desir, were well given as solos, though rather at a too rapid tempo, as is apt to be the case with novices before an audience. We could not help regretting the absence of a grand piano for the soloists.

Of the vocal performances we need only refer to the programmes and the eulogistic encomiums bestowed upon them, as an evidence of their select character and superior performance. We had to regret the defective acoustic properties of the hall, as also the division of the stage for the chorus, so that instead of the two hundred and thirty performers being together, they were nearly equally divided on either side, with an open space of one third the width between; notwithstanding which they gave the chorus of the Fishermen from Masaniello, the Echo Glee from Preciosa, the sacred chorusses: "Now elevate the sign of Judah," "Lo, He cometh," (with the recitative by the Pr——,) the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, &c., with a fine spirit and precision. The Glee: "Hark, the curfew," "Hark, Apollo," "Cough and Crow," and the three-part songs, "While sunbeams," &c., from Cinderella; the "Phantom Chorus," from Sonnambula: "Down among the lilies," and the favorite Latin trio: "Regna Terræ," and others—the first two as "Chorus Trios" in soprano, the last two as Solo Trios by three well-balanced soprano voices. Several sterling duets and solos served to justify the conclusion that in Alabama there is music that will soon introduce a good taste for a class of performances hitherto overlooked.

"Professor" P., of the Judson, is also training all the available male voices in Marion, so that ere long he may render some chorusses, glees, &c., in a creditable manner.

We must not forget to mention, in connection with the Judson concerts, the pleasure we derived from listening to the brilliant performances of the harp and guitar scholars. The harp and piano duets and trios, for two harps and pianos, as well as the harp solos, deserve especial mention, as the harp scholars were all novices.

PHILADELPHIA, AUG. 10.—I find it totally impossible to pick up a single chip of musical intelligence for you, this week. Never have I known a stagnation so complete. Cobwebs festoon the cornices of the Academy; Concert Hall stands forsaken as an old catacomb; while the Musical Fund Hall has not been opened since SATTER made his graceful obeisance therein.

CARL GAERTNER, formerly of your city, spoke to me, some days since, of arranging a classical Concert; but when I gazed into his eyes, with unfeigned astonishment, to assure myself of his sanity, he whistled the whole affair off as a joke. The man really intended it, however, and that at a time when there are no classes of society left in Philadelphia, but organ grinders, rag pickers, firemen, and music dealers!

When the musical season sets in I will furnish you with reports of all concerts and operas which transpire. MANRICO.

Our Music Pages—An Italian Opera Entire!

In making our musical selections we have many tastes, many wants, many capacities to suit. It is impossible, of course, to suit them all; and there are some, to cater to which would be quite beneath the character, and contrary or foreign to the purpose, of a journal which exists mainly in the hope of helping to give a higher and truer direction to musical pursuits, tastes, and enjoyments, than we find in the great majority of cases where there is some love or talent for sweet sounds. Our four weekly pages must at any rate be well filled; the space is too precious to be left to weeds, to be covered with trashy polkas, negro melodies, flat, sentimental ditties, or the nine-thousand-nine-hundred and ninety-ninth new mechanical variation upon the common type of a Yankee psalm-tune. We wish to keep within the range of what is legitimately music in an artistic sense, and feel that we are ministering to earnest and sincere music-lovers, and not merely making friends with idle, vulgar, and depraved tastes.

Within this range, however, we would be catholic, and recognize a lawful, an inevitable difference of tastes. We do not ask all, all the time, to accept only such music, in such forms and by such masters, as we ourselves most love and think we have good reason to believe decidedly superior to all others. We shall, from time to time, give other music, in which we appreciate a good element, although it may have comparatively lost its interest for us, and although we may regard the phase of musical culture, which its too fashionable prevalence denotes, as not by any means the healthiest or highest. We shall give it in deference and in justice to tastes different from our own, believing that it can do no harm where it is not cultivated too exclusively, and that the pleasure it affords is not unmingled with some edification. But we will give no trash, no hum-drum, vulgar and "illiterate" music.

At the same time, we have to confess to another limit in our selections, besides that of artistic tone and principle;—a limitation quite external, economical. It were a ruinously costly luxury,—at least so long as musical journals are so moderately supported by the public—to have so much music every week put into type to please the readers of our Journal only; we must give pages of what already serves, or may hereafter serve, more general uses; and the immense stock of our publishers contains so much that is excellent and suitable, that we have plenty of material to draw from, although we are excluded from the many fine songs and piano pieces which are always engraved and not printed from type music.

Within these limits we have thus far sought to do at least one really good thing, and to address the largest number that perhaps we could address by any one way, and that one a good one. We have been furnishing a series of choruses, with solos, for mixed voices, for men's voices, for female voices only, of moderate length, suited for musical societies and clubs,—pieces from the best masters, many of them but little known among us, and of the finest quality, while they include a wide variety. We shall continue to do this at intervals, amounting to at least half the time. In this way each subscriber—who more than probably is also a member of some choir or club who love to practice the best kind of music—will get in the course of the year a very rich and rare collection of such choral pieces as he will find nowhere else,—an invaluable repertoire of the very choicest.

Naturally, necessarily, most of these selections have been German. But we are quite aware that half, or more than half, of our readers like Italian music better; that is, they think they comprehend it better; it excites them more; it has more melody, they think; it is less "scientific," learned, intellectual, profound, and more emotional and to the heart (if sometimes the heart, in the spiritual sense, does get confounded with the blood); and it has been interpreted to them in fire tones and breathed into their throbbing veins and nerves by passionate Italian singers, amid all the tragical enchantments of the Opera. Do not we, too, recall those young days of fresh musical enthusiasm, when Bellini opened a new heaven to us? And shall we ungratefully deny that there was a step of musical culture and refinement in that rose-colored experience? It is only when the thing is run into the ground, and becomes hacknied; only when it passes into a listless, lazy, fashionable excitement; only when it becomes a matter of the blood more than of true soul's passion; only when truth becomes too tame, too tranquil, and too homely for our "fast" habits, and all is sacrificed to mere effect; when brass lords it over the less forward, more sincere, sweet-spoken instruments; when genial Rossini, and melting, love-entranced, sincere, and sad Bellini must give way to Verdi,—that we think it plainly the duty of every intelligent friend of music to hold up the enduring masterworks and models of the art, the inspired creations of the Shakspeares, Miltons, Raphaels of the tone-world, the works of Bach and Handel, Beethoven and Mozart, Schubert and Mendelssohn and Chopin and Schumann, Weber and Rossini—at least when he was true to himself—to counteract the feverish and shallow influence of the modern Italian Opera fashion.

So much, for the present, for the Italian predilection. Another class of our subscribers, reasonably enough, beset us, saying: We cannot sing, but we do "play piano" (to use the quaint German phrase, which drops the article); give us sometimes something for our fingers.

We have considered the matter well, and mean to hit these two birds with one stone. We propose to give, by instalments, alternating with our classical chorus pieces, an entire Italian Opera, arranged, or "reduced," for a pair of hands at the piano-forte. We purposely select one of the more popular ones, and not a rare one, which perhaps the class here aimed at would not appreciate—one answering to their demand, and not merely to the same class for whom we are providing otherwise. As one which we think among the best among the Operas most in vogue, we take Lucrezia Borgia, by DONIZETTI, and we give, to-day, the first four pages, which we shall continue from time to time, until the Opera is complete, with title-page and the et ceteras.

With this fair division of the field, we shall feel a freedom all the more perfect, every time the turn comes to bring out treasures new and old from what we have learned to esteem the choicer sources.

Musical Chat-Chat.

A batch of new English Operas are to be served, piping hot from the oven, at Drury Lane, next autumn. Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison (that ever-memorable tenor) have accepted a "strange" opera from the pen of BALFE, the libretto by the poets of "Rose of Castile." Mr. FRANK MORI, too, has founded a lyrical structure on an old English subject of the time of Henry VII., "upon which hopes are founded."—Thirdly, Martha has been done into English by Mr. CHARLES JEFFREYS. These are counted as so many blocks added to the foundations of the National English Opera!

The great library left by the late collector, Herr Fischhof, of Vienna, is offered for sale. It contains more than 100,000 musical works and works on music, besides very rare manuscripts, and numerous autographs of Bach, Haydn, Salieri, Schubert, Chopin, and other musicians of note.

The great operatic Festival in Jones's Woods, New York, commenced in earnest on Monday. The Tribune says ten thousand people were present.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, or soon after, the mammoth orchestra gave a grand concert, which, in spite of the excess of brass, the audience enjoyed amazingly. Then came waltzing and dancing on the green-sward to the music of scattered bands. Astonishing feats in gymnastics diverted attention for a time, and at length the folks settled themselves down on the grass, under the green trees, in pleasant conversation, watched the boats gliding up and down the East River, or roaming about with the little ones. . . . At eight o'clock came the fireworks. Messrs. Edge did themselves credit in this display. After a number of brilliant minor pieces, a large harp with appropriate inscriptions was fired. The crowning piece of the evening was a representation of the great event which is now dazzling the world. Two steamships were represented paying out the cable, and moving slowly toward the telegraph stations at each end of the route. Above was the inscription, in letters of fire,

"Blessed be Providence,
The Cable is laid."

As this piece burst into sight the crowd doffed their hats and hurried enthusiastically.

The Festival was continued on Tuesday and Thursday. "Trovator" has promised us a full account of it.

A German newspaper has the following advertisement: "Musical real estate purchase! A musical married capitalist wants to purchase a farm, on which there is a musical widow, who will engage for a certain rent to stay upon the place, and play six hours a day on the piano, with the purchaser. Ladies of an irreproachable life disposed to reflect upon the proposition, are requested to address C. H., poste restante, Gogolin."

. . . . M. LAMARTINE has made the strange discovery that MOZART was an Italian! In an article in his journal: "Entre-tiens Familiers," from which we gave an extract last week, he says "Germany claims him [Mozart] as her child. We would not snatch this glory from a land which produced Gluck, Beethoven, and Meyerbeer; but properly Mozart is rather a child of the Italian Alps than a son of Germany. He was born in a pretty little German town, which by situation, physiognomy, and language, belongs more to the Tyrol than to Germany." Lamartine seems to be not very well "posted up" in his geography, if he thinks that Salzburg lies in the Italian Tyrol.

The Leipzig Signale mentions a new work, by F. A. KUMMER: "Tabular Comparison of all the Instruments used in Orchestras and Bands, both in relation to their compass and the usual mode of writing for each. It may be used as an introduction to the art of instrumentation. Similar tables may be found, to be sure, in other works, but this by Kummer is by far the most complete and comprehensive."

The melodies which CHOPIN made to songs and poems, brought to him in Paris by his Polish countrymen, have been collected by his pupil, M. Fontana, who will publish them as the second part of Chopin's posthumous works. They will be interesting as being the only vocal music known to have come from the pen of that Raffaele of the piano, as Heine called him.

The Watch-Dog roused again.

Were we a musical composer, and had we a fame which we wished watched over with an unsleeping, jealous vigilance, we should say: So far as respects the vigilance, commend us to just such a friend, so prompt, so watchful and so constant, as the London Musical World has proved itself to MENDELSSOHN; but it is quite a serious question whether a dog that barks too much, barks upon all occasions, and frequently without occasion, on the slightest shadow of a pretext, is not on the whole a greater harm than blessing both to friend and foe.

Our London friend is very jealous for due honor done to Mendelssohn; and that is a music, that a fame, for which we all may well be jealous. But he is morbidly irritable on the subject; one cannot hint the slightest qualification of Mendelssohn's supreme genius, or own to a conviction that there have been ever greater men in music, or in any way approach the idol, although hat in hand, in the free exercise of one's own judgment, without this jealous watcher scenting mischief and invidious disparagement. One cannot even quote or copy for amusement's sake, for the pure curiosity of the thing, or for the sake of letting every side be heard, any opinion or expression not entirely orthodox about the honored master, without its being construed into a malign attack. Now we profess to be sincere lovers of Mendelssohn's music; we have written much in praise of it and copied more; we have given a larger share of him than of any other composer in our musical selections for our readers. But we like to let our readers see what thinking minds, of various character and prepossessions, say about him, especially when they say it brightly, quaintly and bring out strongly, with a genuine flavor of individuality, certain qualifying considerations which have worth at least as shadows to the truth.

We have been translating, by way of light and pleasant summer reading, some of the queer, satirical, partly sincere and partly malignant, things which HEINE (who, we took care to say, was not a musical authority), has written about music and musicians, as they interested him in Paris. Our first selection, in which Heine contrasts Rossini's Stabat Mater with Mendelssohn's St. Paul, rather to the disadvantage of the latter, is copied by the World, under a title of its own invention: "A Stone thrown at Mendelssohn from behind a Wall!" and accompanied with editorial remarks, which doubtless contain some true things about Heine, though they hardly recognize sufficiently the good side of his nature. These remarks we copy here, because they will help the uninitiated to read more intelligently, and not attach too much weight to Heine's ridicule of artists whom he did not like. As to the Stabat Mater, did we need to say that our opinion was by no means that of Henri Heine?

Among those who, at one time, worshipped variously at the shrines of Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer, and afterwards turned against both, was the poet Heine, a man of wonderful gifts and wonderful impudence, witty ("spirituel," is better) and unprincipled in an equal measure. On some particular occasion, Heine was snubbed by one of the Mendelssohns—perhaps by the impetuous Felix himself, who, though, when a young man, generally discreet enough to avoid making enemies, could not, in his heart, have esteemed the character of Heine, however he may have admired his genius. From that moment the Jew poet and satirist never lost an opportunity of sneering at the Jew musician. As a specimen of Heine's mode of attack, we have printed, in another column, the first of a series of papers (translated for Dwight's Journal of Music), under the head of Heinrich Heine on Music and Musicians.

It will be observed that Rossini is the pretext for letting down Mendelssohn, just as Rossini is invariably the shield behind which the most desperate thrusts are made at Meyerbeer. Nothing can be more ingenious, nothing more charmingly written; and to those unacquainted with the Stabat Mater and St. Paul, or unable to appreciate the difference between them, the whole essay will have an air of gospel truth that admits of no denial. One thing, nevertheless, will be missed, and that is the "naïveté," which Heine rightly considers an essential attribute of genius, and of which, by the way, Mendelssohn possessed about as large a share as any composer since Mozart and Haydn. The sly Rossini, after reading (if he ever read) the comparison between his own Stabat and the oratorio of his "North-German" contemporary, would know, as well as Heine himself, to estimate it at its proper worth.

"North-German criticism," indeed! We have too much of it now, and it is a pity that Heine did not live long enough to be snubbed by Dr. Marx. We should then have had something funny about that very ingenious gentleman, who, impelled by the remembrance of a personal pique, with which the world has nothing whatever to do (the world caring nothing about Dr. Marx), is incessantly hammering at the pedestal upon which, years since, he helped to raise Mendelssohn, and from which he vainly strives to displace him. If Heine had known music sufficiently to entertain any genuine opinions on the subject, if he had not been compelled to live from hand to mouth, if the tone of his musical criticisms had not entirely depended upon the pecuniary difficulties which weighed him down and led him to prostitute his brilliant pen, he might have done good service; he might have cleansed the Augean stables of Berlin musical politics, have routed the sophists, and put to flight the "Zukunft." Against such a man the "North German" philosophers, who write so much about music without understanding it, would have had no more chance than the Jesuit "Pères," against the author of Candide. But it so happened that Heine, who promised better things at the outset, degenerated into a man of coteries and circles; and this without the excuse of one-eyed enthusiasm, which makes its victims detract from the merits of all but their own pet-idiols (a malady rather to be compassionated than despised). At first the flatterer, then the vituperator, of Meyerbeer, now the friend, now the enemy of Mendelssohn, Heine, from a firmly-rooted oak, morking the tempest, was metamorphosed into a weathercock, swayed by every breeze. His susceptibility was deeper than his sense of right, his egotism far surpassed his love of truth. Thus ripe for a new and unworthy mission, he abused his splendid talents; and later, when his profligate habits had brought with them the inevitable consequences, he became a parasite and a borrower, repaying those with withering contumely who were tired of constantly obliging him.

The paper we have transferred from the pages of Mr. Dwight, and which we have rechristened A Stone thrown at Mendelssohn from behind a Wall, diverting as it is, and sparkling with the brightest fancies, came from the worst part of Heine's nature. It was the off-spring of an ancient spite at Berlin—not a manly declaration of opinion on the merits of two musical composers and two musical works. It could not be the latter, since Heine was entirely ignorant of music. It was, therefore, a deliberate attempt to lower, in the estimation of the world, a man not less his superior in sincerity of purpose and nobility of mind than in genius. Little harm was done, however, by the squib, although it may have caused some of the Berlin geese to cackle, and the Jesuits in various parts to stroke their chins. Mendelssohn outlived it, just as St. Paul will outlive the Stabat Mater.

When reading Heine's poetry, and admiring, as we read, the wit and imagination of the poet, his fine perception and his trenchant irony, it is impossible not to lament that such a mind should have been perverted. Banished voluntarily from the land of his birth, he only revisits to sneer at it; and insults the Rhine with as much complacency as he ridicules a dish of sourknot and sausages—the same bitterness peeping out from the false bonhomme with which he rails at both. He makes the venerable stream, on whose banks he had passed his childhood, exult in its degradation at the hands of the French, and mocks it with feigned expressions of consolation. Not a touch of patriotism ever escapes his pen. But worse than all, this hardened cynic, recalling, as with a sudden religious impulse, a representation of the Passion, by children, on the shores of the Mediterranean, enlists the impressions he commemorates with such apparent earnestness, as arguments in support of a falsehood. If Heine was no more sincere at Cette, watching with interest the Roman Catholic ceremony, than at Paris, when he wrote the comparison between Mendelssohn and Rossini as church composers, he must be pitied. And yet it is difficult to believe that even Heine would put the memory of such an hour as that, when the heart within him, throbbing for once at least with a pure and holy sympathy, to any such uses as the alternative would imply. We are therefore constrained to believe, that in both instances he was entertaining his readers at his own expense, and at the sacrifice of truth—which, for all we know, may be "naïveté," but so far as our intelligence will allow us to fathom it, is impiety.

Music Abroad.

London.

FESTIVALS.—The Athenæum says: We have now before us programmes of the Hereford and Birmingham Festivals: the former with full details. At Hereford the artists engaged are Mesdames Novello and Viardot, Mrs. Weiss, Mrs. Hepworth, Miss Vining, Miss Lascelles; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Montem Smith, Weiss and Thomas. On the first or "service" morning, the principal features will be Handel's Dettingen "Te Deum," a "Jubilate" by Mr. Townsend Smith, and an Anthem by the Rev. Sir Frederick Ouseley. The oratorio, on the first day, is to be "Elijah"; on the second, a selection from Mendelssohn's "Athalie," Signor Rossini's "Stabat" with English words, and part of "The Creation"; on the third, "The Messiah." Some attempt to improve the evening performances seems to have been made, by making a main part of each concert consist of a selection from an opera; the three chosen being "La Clemenza," "Semiramide," "Lucrezia Borgia." The music laid out for the Birmingham Festival has already been mentioned;—we may add, however, to former notices, that at the Tuesday's concert will be given "Acis and Galatea," with additional accompaniments by Signor Costa; on the Wednesday, Mendelssohn's cantata "The Sons of Art"; on the Thursday, Signor Costa's serenata, written for the late royal wedding. The list of engagements is liberal, though we are not reconciled to the total abnegation of instrumental solo music—believing, for instance, that a violin concerto, played by Herr Joachim, would be as popular in 1858 as used to be M. De Bériot's Concerto, with its Rondo à la Russe, without which no provincial festival was held complete thirty years ago. The singers are to be Mesdames Novello, Viardot, Albani, and Castellani. We understand that the last lady will take part in Mr. H. Leslie's "Judith," together with Madame Viardot, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti. Rarely has any English work enjoyed the advantage of so strong a cast as this. In completion of the list of singers, we must name Miss Balfe and Miss Dolby, Signori Tamberlik and Ronconi, Messrs. Montem Smith and Weiss. The principal works to be executed at Leeds are, "Elijah," "The Seasons," "The Messiah," a selection from the "Passions-Musik" of Bach, Signor Rossini's "Stabat," and Prof. Bennett's new May Cantata. We perceive, too, that the visit of Her Majesty to open the new Hall there has been "worked," by way of swelling the subscription to the Musical Festival,—as those who take tickets for the oratorios will be admitted to see Royalty with all her train. This is not well—hardly respectful to Her Majesty.—and it implies a confusion of things with some of which music has nothing to do.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—A grand musical festival took place July 16, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The band included forty first violins, forty second violins, twenty-six altos, twenty-eight violoncellos, and twenty-eight double basses (with an equal proportion of wind instruments), and numbered upwards of 200 performers, comprised of the élite of the profession. The choirs, including the Vocal Association, numbered 800 vocalists, being a total of 1,000 performers. Messrs. Benedict and Manns conducted.

The following was the programme:—

PART I.

Overture (Mosaniello). Auber. March and chorus, "Crown ye the altars" (The Ruins of Athens). Beethoven. Motet, "Sanctus." Bortniansky. Scene, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," (Oberon). Miss Stabhaeb, Weber. Triple concerto, for three pianofortes (with additional orchestral accompaniments by Moscheles), Miss Arabella Goddard, Mr. Benedict, and Mr. Lindsay Sloper, J. S. Bach. Air and chorus, "Come if you dare," Mr. Sims Reeves. Purcell. Trio, "Cradle Song," for female voices (unaccompanied). Miss Louisa Pyne, Madame Lemmens Sherrington, and Miss Dolhy, Benedict. Song, "The Village Blacksmith," Mr. Weiss; W. H. Weiss. Ballad, "My pretty Jane" (by desire), Mr. Sims Reeves; Sir H. Bishop. Hebrew morning hymn, "Let us adore," (Joseph). Mchul. Le Carnaval de Venise, with variations, arranged for the voice, Madame Gassier; Benedict. Air, "The Skylark," Miss Louisa Pyne; Benedict. Cantata, "O sons of art," Messrs. Sims Reeves, Wilbye Cooper, Weiss and Deck, and Chorus; Mendelssohn.

Between the parts, Mr. Best performed the "First Movement of Handel's Second Concerto," on the Festival Organ.

PART II.

Concertante for four violins, with orchestral accompaniments, Messrs. Molière, Blagrove, Deichmann, and Sainton; Mairer. Song, "The green trees," Miss Dolhy; Balle. Variations, "Il dolce canto," Miss Louisa Pyne; Rode. Fantasia, "Home, sweet home" (by desire), pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard; Thalberg. Cavatina, "Deh vieni non tardar," (Le Nozze di Figaro), Madame Weiss; Mozart. Air, with chorus, "Possenti Nani," (Magic Flute), Herr Deck; Mozart. Chorus, "O, Thou whose power," (Prayer, Mosé in Egitto); Rossini. Part-song, "The blue bells of Scotland." Grand triumphal march; Best.

Paris.

July 10.—It seems evident, from silence on the subject, that M. Meyerbeer is not at the Opéra Comique of Paris rehearsing his strange work which has no chorus, as was undertaken he should be long ere this. Thus no new production is to be expected from him during the current year. This places that declining theatre in a "predicament." The last revival there has been "Le Valet de Chambre," with music by Signor Carafa, whose "Aure felice" was, some thirty-five years ago, the delight of amateurs, and who was, at the head of a military music-school in Paris, till that establishment was suppressed by Government.—The Gazette Musicale announces that M. Membre—hitherto mainly known by his pleasant romances, "Page, Ecuyer, et Capitaine" being one—has received a commission demanding powers of a different quality—this being to write choruses to the "King Œdipus," of Sophocles—a translation of which, by M. Jules Lacroix, is about to be represented at the Théâtre Français.—Athenæum.

July 17.—There is no end to rumors about the three opera-houses in Paris. We see talked of, for the Grand Opéra, absolutely, an arrangement of one of the two Greek tragedies with Mendelssohn's music (or is this merely an incorrect edition of the promise made for the Théâtre Français?). "Athalie" would be a better choice; not merely because it is written with female voices, whereas the others are for a male chorus exclusively, not merely from the interest of its solo parts, but because (unless we are mistaken) it was composed on French text, and thus the difficulties of translation (which at best implies perversion) would be avoided. Then "they say" that M. Félicien David has set "The Last Judgment," and that M. Méry has succeeded in so modifying the libretto as to make the work presentable at the Académie Impériale. One might regard such a rumor as a piece of stupid irony, did one not recollect the lengths to which French irreverence has gone in former dramas. Recollecting these things, the tale is sufficiently curious as belonging to a land where Academies give prizes for moral plays,—where Authority professes a desire to amuse the people for its good by aid of the stage, and at the same time to stand well with the powers ecclesiastic,—and where the censorship is somewhat irritable. To return to matters less serious, the Grand Opéra is in a plight anything but grand as regards its artists. We hear, however, from a source on which reliance can be placed, that Mlle. Artot is making way with her public, and will, probably, appear in M. Gounod's "Sapho,"—perhaps, too, in "Les Vêpres Siciliennes," her voice having developed itself in the upper register. Her action too is commended as graceful, modest, and intelligent. The cry is still for a tenor. Why do they not try M. Nandin? Signor Rota (who, we find, invents ballets and not composes the music, as we stated, and who is engaged for next season at Her Majesty's Theatre) is about to concoct a ballet at the Grand Opéra for Madame Rosati. Other journals assert that the heroine of M. Meyerbeer's work promised to the Opéra Comique (and on a Breton story) is to be Madame Cabel. As for the tales which concern the Théâtre Lyrique (one announcing the migration thence of Madame Miolan-Carvalho to the Grand Opéra) their name is Legion—of new operas by M. Maillart and Godefroid,—M. Gounod's "Faust" to open the season (with Madame Ugalde for Marguerite) among the number; also of a new fairy opera, composed by M. Massé, with the taking title of "La Fée Carabosse." There seems to be no end of music proceeding from the house of M. Duprez, who has already made a name and founded a family which will live in the history of Drama by the side of the names of Kemble, Devrient, Garcia. Now we hear that his son, M. Léon Duprez, is about to come forward as a composer of operas.—Athenæum.

Sophie Cravelli has been a considerable gainer by the will of Ahmed, son and heir of the Egyptian Viceroys; his death by drowning in the Nile has been in all the journals, and it was casually mentioned in those papers that a large legacy devolved on the person who taught French to the young prince when at Paris. A stronger sentiment than gratitude of a grammar pupil is now known to have dictated the very magnificent bequest of the Moor, and the lyric queen of song has had, in fact, the option of enacting the part of Cleopatra on a real Nile, with real pyramids in the background.

It is contemplated to bring out Mendelssohn's Œdipus at the Grand Opera, Paris. An opera by Félicien David is also spoken of.

VIENNA. The Thalia Theater, at Vienna (one of the minor establishments of that capital), has been producing an opera, "The Orphan," by Herr Stolz. The principal musical work to be performed at the great concert at Baden, on the 27th of August, is to be the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of M. Berlioz. We observe with pleasure that the local societies of the smaller towns in Germany are beginning to bestir themselves towards the completion of the Handel monument, by giving concerts. "Samson" is going to be forthwith produced with this intention in the picturesque old town of Halberstadt, where (by way of further invitation to any autumn tourist in want of a halting-place) are churches well worth seeing, and in one of these is an organ well worth hearing,—a town, moreover, on the hem of the Hartz country.

The Italian opera closed with an olla podrida, made of fragments from the Barbieri, the Italiana in Algeri and the Trovatore. The most conspicuous among the artists were Madame Charton-Demeur and Signor Debassini. The lady especially distinguished herself by her brilliant singing in Rossini's opera.

FLORENCE.—A new oratorio by Pacini was produced on the 20th ult.; which is spoken of in enthusiastic terms, called The Destruction of Jerusalem. The work is in three parts—the Prophecy—the Delay—the Fall. The concourse of artists from all parts of Italy was immense, and the applause at many passages quite overwhelming. The Grand Duke was present at the first performance, and was amongst the first to congratulate the veteran composer on his work.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The other foreign news of the week is (with one exception) neither rich nor rare. Among its items are a recent performance at Basle of an Oratorio composed by M. Reiter, "The New Paradise," a performance of Sebastian Bach's mass in A (should not this be B?) minor, entire at Stuttgart, where the soli parts were taken by Madame Leisinger, Mlle. Marschalk, Herren Rauscher and Schultky. (of the last-named gentleman we heard, when at Cologne, as one of the best bassi now in Germany), the execution lately at the Palazza Vecchio of Florence of an Oratorio, "The Destruction of Jerusalem," by Il Maestro Pacini, the approaching publication of a new "Torch Dance" (the third) composed by M. Meyerbeer, for the reception of Princess Frederick William of Prussia—lastly, the programme of the coming German opera season at the Kärntner Thor Theater at Vienna, which is queer enough in its aimless, polyglott fashion. The operas announced are Herr Wagner's "Lohengrin," Mozart's "Schauspiel Director," Mendelssohn's operetta, known in England as "Son and Stranger," Adam's "Chalet" and, by way of fireworks, bonne-bouche, desert, what not? "La Reine Topaze." The last, however, will prove a lame Queen, unless she be presented by Madame Miolan-Carvalho.

A new tragedy on the subject of Cleopatra has just been produced at Naples. The author is Signor Bolognese; "the serpent of old Nile," is personated successfully by Madame Sadowski. Here is another proof, were it wanted, of the life existing in Italian drama.—London Athenæum, July 17.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano.

A Mother's Last Farewell. Song. Wrighton. 25
A beautiful song, of touching simplicity.

Der Deutschman's Philosophy. John Schmidt. 25
The words of this Song are a very witty and extremely ludicrous parody on Mackay's well known "John Brown." The Music is original. Lovers of the comic Muse will find this a first-rate funny Song.

Mrs. Lofly and I. Song. Judson Hutchinson. 25
Will be remembered by all visitors of the Hutchinson Concerts, during the past season. The poem strikingly contrasts the relative merits of external and internal wealth. The Music is easy, and well shaped to the words.

The Flower Greeting. Trio for three Sopranos. Curschmann. 30

A charming Trio, strictly for three female voices of equal compass, covering the middle register of the voice. It is a highly pleasing composition, and bears the stamp of artistic finish. Rather easy.

Kittie Lee. Ballad. W. Williams. 25
A very pretty simple ballad.

Mary, oft I think of thee. Song. J. H. Heritt. 25
A fine Melody, which gives to the singer much scope for the display of feeling and passion.

Forget Me Not. Song. Sterndale Bennett. 25
A beautiful song, to English and German words, whose peculiarity is the close affinity of its style to Mendelssohn's, without, however, being anything like an imitation. Those who prefer the German way of song-writing, where the accompaniment claims almost the same share of attention with the melody, adding to the development of little traits in the text, will find this Song very much to their liking. Nor is it at all difficult. It is rather playful in character.

Vocal, with Guitar Accompaniment.

I'll pray for thee. Arranged by Weiland. 25
Mary of the Wild Moor. Arranged by Bemis. 25
Two well-known Songs in a new arrangement.

Instrumental.

Muscatine Schottische. Henry Atkins. 25
Mississippi Valley Waltz. E. Menzer. 25
Agnes Galop. G. Boettger. 25
Prancing Schottische. H. A. Pond. 25
Chatterbox Waltz. " 25
Novelty Waltz. " 25
Crag Effie Waltz. " 25

New and good Dance Music for the parlor, easy and melodious. The compositions of the last named author will recommend themselves by the taking delicacy of their well-invented melodies.

Home, Sweet Home—College Hornpipe—Garry Owen—Life let us cherish—St. Patrick's Day, and Rustic Reel. All arranged for the Melodeon, by T. Bissell. 25

A very useful collection of familiar old tunes, arranged in an easy style, particularly well suited for Reed Instruments, or for young players on the Piano.

Airs from La Sonnambula, for four hands. Arranged by Beyer. 50

This is a new number of that favorite set of Operatic Potpourris, as Duets, called "Revue Mélodique." They are of very moderate difficulty, and can be applied usefully in the course of instruction. The above new number contains the choicest bits from Bellini's immortal work, La Sonnambula.

Balfé's New Singing Method, without the use of Solfeggi. 2.00

The idea from which this work emanated is a very happy one, and will earn for the author many thanks from persons who, although fond of music, and tolerably well qualified to make pretty good singers, still object to go through that long and tedious course of Vocalises and Solfeggios, which so far has been thought indispensable. Whoever studies according to Balfé's directions, will find study sweet and practice agreeable. Balfé gives a Song for the Practice of each Interval, a Song for the Practice of Semitones, a Song for the Practice of Syncopation, in short, a nice little Ballad for everything. It is impossible to make the path of Learning more smooth and more pleasant than this popular composer has done. The pupil is supposed to be familiar with the rudiments of Music. As an addition to the course of instruction in Songs, which terminates in a highly-ornamented and very brilliant Bravura Song, a series of exercises are given, all with Piano Accompaniment, and not extending over more than four pages, which are intended to serve as a key to all difficulties. In a short Preface Mr. Balfé gives a great deal of valuable information, concerning the training of the voice and kindred subjects, presenting, upon the whole, a very rational view of the subject, which must commend itself to everybody. This work can be used without a teacher. The author, however, recommends the assistance of a master, as long as the pupil is but a beginner.

Morning Prayer.

From the German of J. F. EICHENDORF.

O Silence deep and strange!

The earth doth yet in quiet slumber lie,
No stir of life, save on yon woodland range
The tall trees bow as if their Lord passed by.

Like to one new-create,
I have no memory of grief and care;
Of all the things which vexed my soul of late
I am ashamed in this calm morning air.

This world, with all its band
Of clamorous joys and griefs, shall be to me
A bridge whereon, my pilgrim-staff in hand,
I cross the stream of time, O Lord, to Thee.

But if, with venal choice,
My soul should seek earth's hireling to be,
Break Thou my harp-strings, be my tuneless voice Silent before Thee through Eternity.

Henri Heine about Music and Musicians.

VII.—SEASON of 1844 (CONTINUED)—OPERA COMIQUE—SCRIBE AND AUBER—MONSIGNY—JENNY LIND—ROSSINI'S STATUE—DONIZETTI.

PARIS, MAY 1, 1844.

While the Academy of Music has so sadly languished, and the Italians have dragged through their season quite as mournfully, the third lyric theatre, the Opera Comique, has risen to its most joyous height. Here one success has gone beyond another, and the money box has had always a good ring. Yes, there has even been more gold than laurels reaped, which certainly was no misfortune for the Direction. The texts of the new operas, that have been given, were all of them by SCRIBE, the man who uttered once the great saying: "Gold is a chimera!" and who yet continually runs after this chimera. He is the man of money, of the ringing realism, who never mounts into a romantic, barren cloud-world, and who clings fast to the terrestrial reality of the marriage of reason, of industrial citizenship, and of the tantième. An immense success crowns Scribe's new opera, La Sirene, to which AUBER has written the music. Author and composer are entirely suited to each other: they have the finest sense for what is interesting; they know how to entertain us agreeably; they dazzle and ecstasify us, indeed, by the brilliant facettes of their wit; they possess a certain filagree talent for putting together the most charming trifles, and one forgets in them that there is such a thing as poetry. They are a sort of Art-lorettes, who laugh away all the ghost stories of the past from our memory, and with their coquettish toyings, as with peacock's fans, brush the buzzing thoughts of the future, the invisible flies, away from us. To this harmless amorous tribe belongs also ADAM, who, with his Cagliostro, has reaped likewise very easy laurels in the Opera Comique. Adam is an amiable, agreeable phenomenon, and his is a talent yet capable of great development. THOMAS, too, deserves an honorable mention; his operetta Mina has had much success.

But all these triumphs have been surpassed by the popularity of "The Deserter," an old opera by MONSIGNY, which the Opera Comique has drawn forth from the portfolio of oblivion. Here is genuine French music, the liveliest grace, a harmless sweetness, a freshness as of the smell of wood-flowers, the truth of nature, in short, poetry. Yes, the latter is not wanting, but it is a poetry without the shudder of infinity, without mysterious enchantment, without sadness, without irony, without morbidessa—I might almost say, an elegant rustic poetry of health. The opera of Monsigny reminded me at once of his contemporary, GREUZE, the painter. I saw here bodily, as it were, the rural scenes which he had just painted, and I seemed to hear the music that belonged to them. In listening to that opera it became quite clear to me how the plastic and the reciting arts of the same period always breathe one and the same spirit, and their master-works reveal the most intimate affinity.

I cannot conclude this report without remarking that the musical season is not yet ended, and, this year, contrary to all custom, sounds on even into May. The most important balls and concerts are given at this moment, and the polka even rivals the piano. Feet and ears are weary, yet they cannot rest. The Spring, which this time sets in so early, makes a fiasco; green leaves and sunshine go unnoticed. The physicians, perhaps especially the madhouse doctors, will soon gain plenty of business. In this motley tumult, in this fever of amusement, in this singing, springing whirlpool, lurk death and insanity. The hammers of the piano-forte work frightfully upon our nerves, and this great vertigo malady, the polka, gives us the coup de grâce.

LATER NOTICE.

To the preceding communications I append, from melancholy humor, the following leaves, which belong to the summer of 1847, and which form the last act of my musical reportership. For me, all music has from that time ceased, and I little dreamed, when I sketched the sufferings of Donizetti, that a similar and far more painful visitation was approaching me. The short Art notice reads as follows:

Since Gustavus Adolphus, of glorious memory, no Swedish reputation has made so much noise in the world, as JENNY LIND. The accounts of her which came to us from England, border on the incredible. The journals are all ringing with trumpet blasts and fanfares of triumph; we hear nothing but Pindaric hymns of praise. A friend told me of an English city where all the bells were rung upon the entrance of the Swedish nightingale; the bishop who resided there celebrated this event by a remarkable discourse. In his Anglican episcopal costume, he ascended the pulpit of the cathedral, and greeted the new comer as a savior in woman's clothes, as a lady redeemer, who had come down from heaven to deliver our souls from sin and evil by her song; whereas the other cantatrici were so many female devils who would trill us into the jaws of Satan. The Italians, GRISI and PERSIANI, must turn as yellow as canary birds with envy and chagrin, the while our Jenny, the Swedish nightingale, flutters from one triumph to another. I say our Jenny, for in reality the Swedish nightingale does not represent exclusively the little land of Sweden, but she represents the whole Germanic stock, that of the Cimbri as well as that of the Teutons; she is also a German just as much as her dull and vegetating sisters on the Elbe and on the Neckar; she belongs to Germany, as Shakspeare, too, according to Franz Horn, belongs to us, and as Spinoza likewise, in his inmost nature, can only be a German—and we with pride call Jenny Lind our own! Shout, Uckermark, for thou also hast a part in this glory! Dance, Massmann, thy fatherland's most joyous dances, for our Jenny speaks no Roman gibberish, but real, Gothic, Scandinavian, most German German, and thou mayest greet her as a country-woman—only thou must wash thyself before thou offerest her thy German hand.

Yes, Jenny Lind is a German; the very name Lind makes one think of lindens, those green cousins of our German oaks. She has no black hair like the Italian prima donnas; in her blue eyes swim northern sentiment and moonlight, and in her throat sounds purest maidenhood! That is it. "Maidenhood is in her voice,"—so said all the "old spinsters" in London; all prudish ladies and pious gentlemen with upturned eyes repeated it; the still surviving mauvaise queue of Richardson chimed in, and all Great Britain celebrated in Jenny Lind the song of maidenhood, the maidenhood of song. We must own, this is the key to the incomprehensible riddle of the immense enthusiasm which Jenny Lind has found in England, and, between us, has known well how to profit by. She only sings, they say, in order that she may be able soon to give up worldly singing, and, provided with the necessary outfit, marry a young protestant clergyman, the pastor Swenske, who in the meantime waits for her at home in his idyllic parsonage behind Upsala, around the corner to the left. It has since been hinted that the young pastor Swenske is a myth, and that the actual betrothed of the high maiden is an old hacknied actor of the Stockholm theatre—but this is surely slander.

The chastity of feeling of this prima donna immaculata reveals itself most beautifully in her shyness of Paris, the modern Sodom; this she expresses upon all occasions, to the highest edification of all the dames patronesses of morality beyond the channel. Jenny has most distinctly vowed never to offer her song-virginity for sale to the French public on the profane boards of the Rue Lepelletier; she has sternly refused all M. Leon Pillet's propositions. "This raw virtue startles me," the old Paulet would say. Is there any foundation in the story that the nightingale of to-day was once in Paris in her earlier years, and received musical instruction in the sinful Conservatoire here, like other singing birds, which since then have become loose green-finches? Or does Jenny fear that frivolous Parisian criticism, which criticizes in a singer not the morals, but the voice, and holds the want of school to be the greatest sin? Be that as it may, our Jenny comes not here, and will not sing the French out of their pool of iniquity. They are fallen irredeemably into eternal condemnation.

Here in the musical world of Paris all goes on in the old way. In the Académie Royale de Musique it is all the while gray, damp-cold winter, while there is May sunshine and the smell of violets without. In the vestibule stands, sad and sorrowful, the statue of the divine ROSSINI; he is silent. It is to the honor of M. Leon Pillet that he erected a statue to this true genius during his life-time. Nothing is funnier than to see the grimaces with which jealousy and envy look upon it. When Signor Spontini passes by, he always stumbles against this stone. Our great maestro Meyerbeer is much more prudent, and when he goes to the opera, of an evening, he always carefully contrives to steer clear of this stone of stumbling; he even avoids the sight of it. In the same way the Jews at Rome, even in their most hurried business walks, go always a great way round, in order not to pass that fatal triumphal arch of Titus, which was erected in commemoration of the downfall of Jerusalem. The accounts of DONIZETTI's condition are every day more melancholy. While his melodies are enlivening the world, while he is trilled and warbled every where, he sits himself, a fearful image of imbecility, in a hospital at Paris. Only on the subject of his toilet he for some time showed a childish consciousness, and every day they had to dress him carefully, in full gala style, his frock adorned with all his orders; so he sat motionless, his hat in hand, from earliest morn till late in the evening. But that, too, has ceased; he recognizes no one any more; such is the fate of man!

Truth about Music and Musicians.

Translated from the German by SABILLA NOVELLO.

I.

WHAT MUSIC SHOULD AND MAY EFFECT.

"That which music should declare to us, is declared by our emotions." Oehlenschläger.

It may sound almost ridiculous for me to ask: "What should and what may music effect?" But this investigation seems occasionally to fall into oblivion; so much is attributed to the art, and such wonders are expected from it, that the time has apparently arrived when these questions should be asked and answered.

In our days, fanatics exist, who pretend that the noble art should be ancillary to Politics,—that it should become democratic, after having been until now aristocratic. Quixotic critics have already discovered democratic music in Beethoven's works. There is now only wanting a party, who should equally condemn aristocratic and democratic music, and desire it to be constitutional. Indeed, why should not some individual arise and say: "I can comprehend aristocratic and democratic music, but constitutional music is a monster; and only by means of absolutistic music can we be saved!"

You may shake your head, but positively, in listening to some of our assembled critical judges, I feel as though I were in a madhouse. Wherefore do persons attend concerts or the theatre? Wherefore do they listen to playing and singing, or play and sing themselves? Do they look upon music as labor?—as the reading of a scientific work, or a lecture from which they may gain information? This has never been asserted by any sensible man. Music is sought, as we may daily learn, as a "refreshment" after the day's care and toil,—as a pure enjoyment; and if this object be attained, such phrases as "I was pleased," or "I was enchanted," are used—and not "I have again learnt something," or "Now I have been convinced."

Hegel once remarked: "I cannot think during music." And thus it ought to be; during music we should not think, but feel and enjoy. The object of music, like every Art, is thus perfectly consummated; for its effect should, in reality, be beneficent and agreeable,—it should produce pleasure and delight. It does not therefore follow that music must be always cheerful, sweet, and flowing: the Wolf's Glen in the Freischütz—the musical accompaniment to Il Commendatore's entrance, in Don Giovanni—Caspar, and many other villains—also cause delight in us. Know you not that pleasurable sensation of allowing horror to creep over the soul, whilst reading or hearing ghost-stories, &c., during twilight or the late hours of night? Know you not the pleasurable sensation of watching a wild conflict of storm and rain from your window? Know you not the pleasurable sensation of ruminating on past dangers, hours of terror, and stirring events? All these are enjoyments. It is also a pleasure to allow certain sentiments, in themselves disagreeable, to be awakened, while we possess the certainty that the feeling alone affects us, and not the real peril, the sorrow, or suffering connected with such sentiments: the certainty of safety deprives them of all disagreeable, and we comfortably imagine ourselves in the situation of a sufferer, without feeling real pain. This inclination of human nature manifests itself repeatedly in eager attendance at executions,—in the greediness and excitement with which descriptions of horrible accidents and events are read; in a word, it is that yearning desire for contrast, that necessity of dark shadow, which is as essential to moral as to physical life. Without sin, there is no virtue; without sorrow, no joy; without shade, no light. But an opera, for instance, which should only contain Wolf's glens, infernal regions peopled by Furies, Caspars and similar gentry, no man could endure,—no man could wish to hear, because it must affect him disagreeably, and afford no delight.

Accordingly, the musical work which aims at being a masterpiece, must afford pleasure and enjoyment; this is, and ever will be, the sole object of all Arts, including that of Music. Allow me to quote to you the opinion of old Montesquieu—a deep thinker, well able to judge acutely of a subject; he says: "Our existence is entirely arbitrary; we might have been created as we are, or otherwise. But, had we been created differently, we should have felt differently; an organ more or less in our frame would have caused other eloquence, other poetry; a diversified texture, of the same organs, again, would have caused another poetry: for example, if the constitution of our organs had rendered us capable of longer attention, all those rules which proportion the treatment of a subject to our attention would no longer exist; if we had been rendered capable of greater penetration, all those rules which are founded according to the limits of our penetration would equally fall away; in short, all those laws established with consideration of our frame being formed in a particular manner, would be different if our frame were not thus constituted. Had our eyesight been weaker and more confused, architecture would have required less ornament and more uniformity in its components; had our eyesight been more distinct, and our souls capable of compassing more objects simultaneously, architecture would have required more decoration; had our ears been formed like those of certain animals, many of our musical instruments would have required modification. I well know that the relation borne towards each other by all things, would still exist; but the relation they bear towards us being changed, those things which in our present state produce a particular effect upon us, would then no longer do so; and as the perfection of Art is to present to us all things in such manner as to afford the most pleasure possible, it would be necessary that Art should be modified to suit our altered capability of best receiving pleasure." As Art should create pleasure and enjoyment, intellect is not preëminently exercised by it: if mental exertion be called into activity in order to obtain artistic pleasure, it is no longer pure enjoyment. Art must attract and absorb its votaries, and cannot therefore demand that they should laboriously examine and account for that which delights them. The talented Madame de Staël says: "We demand sustained attention when discussing abstract ideas, but emotions are involuntary. The enjoyment of Art is not a matter of complaisance, of effort, or reflection; it is a matter of enjoyment, and not of reasoning: intellectual philosophy may claim examination, but poetic talent should command enthusiasm."

Music affects Man in three ways: by sound, on the ear; by expression, on the feelings; and by form and thematic elaboration of phrases in instrumental music, on the understanding. A musical piece that fulfils all these conditions, is perfect, it must and will please all hearers, lay and initiated. Mozart's greatness consists herein, that most of his works unite these requisites. Laymen in Art, who are merely lovers of music, recognize but two effects of Art—that on the ear, by sound, and that on the feelings, by expression; their enjoyment, therefore, of certain master-pieces, is less than that of an artiste, who also revels in the beauty of form and thematic development; that is, in the manifold transformations, inversions, and combinations of a musical phrase. This fact accounts for the different degrees of pleasure experienced by amateurs and connoisseurs, as also for the various judgments pronounced on a work. The ear-caressing tones of Italian and French productions, for instance, with their agreeable form, always find favor, even though wanting in true expression, with mere lovers of music; and as those who have love, but not knowledge of music, form a majority in the world, it is no wonder that such Italian and modern-French musical works should make their way throughout the whole world, notwithstanding the objections and censures cast upon them by scientific men. A great fault, however, one perhaps even greater than that of Italian and French musicians, who write only for the numerous crowd of ignorance, is committed by some of our composers, who consider agreeable sounds and lovely melodies as worthless, or even contemptible. These writers, at most, satisfy the scientific judgment of musical professors, a small minority of the public; whose hearts, however, remain as unmoved, and whose emotions are as ungratified, as those of the general public, who find these compositions entirely wanting in that which alone affords universal pleasure—tonal charm and sentimental excitement; thus it naturally follows that the public remain cold towards such works, which to them are as a book with seven seals. Such composers deceive themselves and others, when they assert that their works are written for the approbation of a few only, the scientific. Every man who writes, will, if possible, please all, or as many as possible. This can only be the case, and our present music can only improve, when composers overcome their unnatural and pretended indifference to the great public mass, which, after all, must decide the fortune of every production; and when they will imagine, like the Italians and French, that their writings will have for audience the whole world!

Goethe once said to Eckermann, speaking of authors (which fully applies to composers): "The French are consistent with their general character, even in their style. They are of a social nature, and never forget the public, whom they address; they endeavor to be clear, in order to persuade their readers, and to be delightful, in order to please them."

The nature of Man, and his organization, are always the same in all ages; the sources from whence he draws pleasure are eternally the same, and the only task of Art is to cause them to gush forth. He is an artiste, therefore, who uncloses such sources with a Moses-staff, or, to speak simply, who knows what affords pleasure or displeasure to Man's nature, and how this may be effected. The how is revealed to him by innate talent and diligent study; the what is verily not difficult to recognize, if he will attentively and honestly observe what produces on himself and many others an agreeable impression, and what causes pleasure or the contrary.

This is the only necromancy which has elevated great masters to the high rank they hold. Music is the painting of the soul; its object is to call forth imagination, awaken the feelings of the heart, and represent the emotions of the soul. If a composer succeed in creating in his hearers that state of mind or feeling which he intends to produce, or succeed in distinctly and intelligibly depicting such feelings in his tonal-painting, then his work is faithful. This faithfulness will be recognized by the soul, and acknowledged by the understanding of listeners. But a great artiste will endeavor, beyond this, to invest his composition with charm and an agreeable form; if he succeed in this also, then his work will be both faithful and beautiful. From this we learn that a perfect work of art must be both true and beautiful; such as are the admired masterpieces, which eternally live and eternally please. They are, however, rare, because most musical works fail to reach this perfection, being either untrue or but partly true; or because their form is anything but beautiful; or because they are partly unfaithful and partly faulty in form; or because, as unfortunately often occurs in our day, they are untrue or half true, and at the same time, very ugly. Use this very simple analysis on any piece which pretends to be a work of art, and you will never err in the opinion you form respecting it, whatever art-fanatics, art-pretenders, art-liars may chatter to confuse your judgment.

And now, one word more.

Sincere art-enthusiasts, who fall into ecstasies at everything which pleases them, and weaklings, who are astounded at the effects which a composer may produce, because they are unable themselves to create anything of worth; prate with much unction of the dignity, the elevation, even the holiness of Art. Let us, with all our joy in Music, remain strictly candid. Where lies the dignity of a Haydn's symphony? What is elevating in Mozart's Figaro? Where lies the holiness of Caspar's "earthly vale of tears?" I am attached with fervent gratitude to our great Masters, who so often have afforded, and ever newly afford me such great, such pure delight; nevertheless, I can never, without a smile, hear them described as miraculous beings, inspired seers, imbued with god-like frenzy, like Pythia on her tripod, or as soaring through immeasurable space, plucking ideas from amongst the stars. Alas! they were and are men like ourselves; loved good eating and drinking, were joyous or angry like other folk, smoked or took snuff, and during lifetime fell into manifold weaknesses and follies, &c., &c. With all this, they desired, as musicians, to compose charming music, which should please general listeners; therefore, they learnt diligently, exercised themselves unweariably, studied their predecessors, sought to ascertain why this or that work pleased or pleased not, observed mankind, made plans and sketches, altered and improved them and what they had already completed; they explained to themselves what they really intended, and never rested until they could execute what they intended.

Thus must you proceed, to rise like them.

Effect of Tamberlik's Debut in Paris.

We have more candidates for lyrical honors, this year, than have been seen in a long while. Tamberlik's ut dièze keeps them all from sleeping. The houses in which singing masters give their lessons—the neighborhood of the Conservatory—are resonant with these abortive cries. Every tenor thinks he has but to scream loud enough to be assured of obtaining a place at the Grand Opera, or Italian Opera, and five thousand dollars a month pay. M. Fiorentino gives these ambitious "geniuses" good advice: "Be quiet, and keep cool. Braying is not good singing. The nightingale gives no ut dièze, nor any other note de poitrine that I ever heard of; and yet everybody agrees that it sings pretty well. The peacock goes as far as ré naturel, but good Lord deliver us from his music."

During Mademoiselle Rachel's life, Paris teemed with tragic actresses whose genius was not understood, and who were kept back from the beneficent foot-lights, which were to ripen their talents into genius far loftier than Rachel's. The place is vacant, but they cannot be found. The French Comedy would be glad to get even a third-rate tragic actress. None of these self-called rivals of Rachel are found worthy of this humble place. When M^{lle}. Stoltz was the star of the Grand Opera, above sixty women applied for her place, and cursed her and her liaison with the manager, for preventing them from becoming famous. She, too, has sunk—not into the grave, but into that hell of the lyric and dramatic performer—into a decayed actress, and her place has been vacant ever since her retirement. Tony Johannot for years had the monopoly of illustrating books in his hands, and heaven only knows the bitterness with which he was attacked, "for stealing the bread out of his poor brethren's mouths." He died, and until M. Gustave Doré reached manhood, not an illustrated book was published! At present, it is M. Tamberlik that oppresses young genius. The managers of theatres have no greater annoyances than these shrivelled fruit of the conservatories and singing-masters. There is no getting rid of them, except by kicking them out of doors, at the risk of being sued for assault and battery. When Severini was manager of the Italian Opera, a fellow who stood six feet in his stockings, called upon him, one morning, and the following dialogue ensued: "Monsieur, I want an engagement at your theatre." "What sort of an engagement?" "First tenor." "Did you ever sing anywhere?" "Never. But I have a splendid voice. You can hear me say 'good day' half a mile." "Do you speak Italian?" "Why, no, I do not; but, you see, I come from Auvergne, and there is a good deal of similarity between the two languages." "What business were you engaged in before you were stage-struck?" "I sold cotton goods in a shop of the Rue Saint Denis. Are you ready to sign my engagement?" "Why, my dear sir, that post happens to be engaged just now, by a fellow named Rubini, and I am pretty well satisfied with him." "That certainly is annoying. Well, to do you a favor, I will temporarily accept the place of second tenor." "Why, a fellow named Mario has that." "Say third tenor, then." "My dear sir, that place also is taken by a fellow named Mirate." "Then give me a place in the chorus." "The chorus is full." The next day, the counter-jumper was bellowing in every café against the government, for paying "d—d foreigners for keeping native talents down."

The method adopted by M. Offenbach, the manager of the little opera house known as the Bouffes Parisiens, is a great deal more satisfactory, and by it he has collected an excellent company. When an applicant comes to him for a place, a dialogue of somewhat the following substance takes place between them: "What is your name?" "N. or M." "Change that name—it is ridiculous or indecent—and assume one that will tell well on the play bill.—Where did you study?" "At the Conservatory" (or with Mr. Such-a-one.) "Show me the prizes you took at the Conservatory," (or I will see your professor.) "On what stage have you appeared?" "At Brussels," (or at Madrid, or Geneva.) "Very well. I will make enquiries about you, and if they are such as I hope to receive, we shall soon come to terms. But if you have never played anywhere, the best thing you can do is to get an engagement at Marseilles, Strasbourg, or Lyons, and apply for a place in Paris when you have become accustomed to the stage. What are your favorite parts?" "This and that." "Can you play them in three days from now?" "Yes." "How many rehearsals do you want?" "Two." "Very well, you shall have them. See the stage manager, and arrange with him, and get ready for your first appearance." This custom is more agreeable to all the parties concerned, and when the candidate fails before the public there is no appellate court from which he may crave a reversal of the unfavorable verdict; and the manager is released from that time forward forever from the place beggar.—Cor. N. Orleans Picayune.

A New Improvisatrice in Italy.

(Correspondence of the Newark Daily Advertiser.)

Florence, July 3.—National songs, that rouse and reinforce a free people, are unknown in Italy; though singing is one of its pastimes, not to say its most serious employment; and rhymes are indigenous, like macaroni—or quibbling in Philadelphia. An English officer put a question to a Tuscan drummer the other day, and was answered in ottava rima. Every tinker is quite as cute. It is the popular humor, and nothing could be more spontaneous. Sentiment commonly expresses itself in verse, so that one is not surprised to find soft sonneters "ever blooming" and "nightly nodding" in the moonlight walks of Italy. In truth no scene or subject is safe from poetry, not even "Cutting a schirrous tumor from a woman's breast," its latest operation. It might, perhaps, be called an epidemic, since hospitals have been endowed for those who labor under the distemper, distinguished by such names as common-place madness never conceived—gl'improcati, ed intronati, &c. Hence too the numerous pastors in partibus, and the herds who bleat or bray in the imaginary pastures of Arcadia. This allegoric Arcadia, by the way, is almost the only one of the famous literary Academies of the "revival" which the national taste conserves.

The della Crusca was long ago virtually stifled in its own chaff, whilst a thousand Arcadian "shepherds" are still abroad, feeding their flocks; their solemn meetings are still held at Rome; the Giornale Arcadico continues to publish their stately proceedings in prose or verse, and Academic "farms" are still awarded for the best pasturage, like prizes at your cattle shows. These title-deeds have enriched many a melodious youth—"perchance some mute inglorious Milton—whose noble rage chill penury had repressed," and—it must be confessed—even the princely Goethe rejoiced in his grant of the "Melpomenian Fields, sacred to the Tragic muse!" It is remarkable, seeing that its constitution is republican, that no Western squatter has ever obtained a footing on its domains; but, wiser than Plato, or even the "model Republic," this free and enlightened community fully recognizes the "rights of woman." There is no sex in mind in Arcady, the blest.

The popular favorite just now is the improvisatrice Giannini Milli, a blooming maid of some twenty summers, and the Sappho of the Academy. A niece of the late Francesco Gianni, who improvised entire tragedies with marvellous fluency, and was pensioned by Napoleon, she is, besides being learned in the ancient and modern tongues, confessedly the most successful of the living declaimers in extemporary verse; and this dance of the poets yields only in popular attraction to the poetry of the dance. The selectest circles crowd her "Academies," and jealous cities contend for her favor. That Florence may gain nothing by the hospitality which has made her its ornament, Vienna holds out to her the golden crown. During a recent visit, she even divided the suffrages of Vienna with the queen of the ballet. But her habitual presence here, in the midst of these rivalries, betrays a preference for the city of Dante—where her public appearances are veritable ovations.

On these occasions subjects are proposed in writing by the audience, and lodged in an urn, when the number agreed upon, usually half a dozen or more, are drawn by lot, before her appearance. When she enters, the music, which fills the intervals of recitation, ceases; the theme is presented in the midst of the general salutations, and then, after a moment's pause, her charming voice runs into an easy flow, like an endless river, without obstruction—never weary, rarely hurried.

One of our countrymen recently proposed Columbus as a theme of common interest. I recall the first quatrain of the response, not so much as a taste of her quality, for it is below her average, as a remembered example of the tendency of the language to slide into this languid melody—which even seduced the susceptible nature of poor Tasso, but which the earlier masters disdained—

Eccola in preda al liquido elemento,
Un angiol siede sovra il suo naviglio
Ei contempla le vie del firmamento,
E sol dal genio suo prende consiglio.

It is only fair to add that this monotony is occasionally interrupted by a brisk succession of percussions and intermissions that quite counterfeit passion, and throw the auditors into convulsions. But the chef d'œuvre of improvising is the sonnet a verso obbligato, in which a particular rhyme is prescribed with the theme to puzzle the poet, and this somerset in fetters Signorina Milli performs with notable dexterity. As a tour de force the thing is certainly marvellous—like one of Taglioni's pironettes.

The dilettanti tell us that la Signorina is only surpassed in their Pantheon by her immediate predecessor, "the most accomplished Teresa Bandettini"—the Amarilla Etrusca of the Academy—who was heard and crowned in the Capitol during the sovereignty of Napoleon—unless it be by the famous Leo's court-jester, Querno, who was a great favorite in his day. On being presented to the Emperor at Modena, soon after her apotheosis, the lady's name was unfortunately prefaced with the word "celebrated." "And pray, Madam for what are you celebrated?" was the characteristic demand. "For the goodness of my friends, Sire," she aptly replied. "But what have you done?" pursued the impatient soldier. "I have translated some tragedies, Sire." "Corneille, Racine, I suppose?" "May it please your Majesty, I have translated Shakspeare!" "Pshaw!" sneered out the contemptuous monarch, as he turned on his heel—reminded, as the Italians were consoled to believe, of the hated nation of shop-keepers.

A true Anecdote from the Life of Louis Van Beethoven.

[Translated from the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung.]

In the year 1825, a well-known artist, who was also a dilettante in musical composition, published a small volume of waltzes. Each was expressly composed for the occasion by one of the most popular and celebrated composers of the day, since nobody refused his contribution to the editor, who wished to pay a curative trip to Carlsbad with the proceeds. The book met with an extraordinary success and rapid sale. Suddenly the editor hit upon the notion of soliciting a contribution from the great Louis van Beethoven, with whom he had formerly been acquainted, through his grandfather and father. With the noblest and most affectionate readiness, the great composer promised compliance with his petitioner's wish, and gave him not only a waltz, but (he, the incomparable) a trio into the bargain. He told the gentlemen to come for the work, which would be finished in about four weeks. As, however, the gentleman fell ill, he was unable to go, and obliged to renounce so interesting a visit. He begged, therefore, his mother to fetch the work, and express his thanks.

But the housekeeper, to whom the lady gave her name, would not admit her, saying that her master was again very cracked that day. As, at this moment, Beethoven put his head out of the door, she pushed the lady into a dark room, with the words: "Hide yourself, for there is no speaking to him today." The lady consequently left without executing her commission.

A day or two afterwards, Beethoven sent the waltz to the gentleman's house, with the following note, the authenticity of which is beyond a doubt, as the original is now lying before us:

"DEAR SIR,—Through the stupidity of my housekeeper, your mother was sent away, without my being told a word of her visit.

"I have severely censured her unbecoming conduct, in not introducing your mother into my room; the boorishness and coarseness of these people whom I am unfortunate enough to have around me, are known to every one. I beg your pardon.

"Your most obedient servant,
"LOUIS VAN BEETHOVEN."

Poor, feeling man, who, in addition to the colossal misfortune (doubly terrible to such a composer) of being deprived of the sense of hearing, was compelled to suffer the torture, which eat into his very soul, of passing among such persons his existence, saddened, moreover, by other heart-depressing family matters, which were communicated by Beethoven himself—who desired and asked for sympathy—to the writer.

Psalm-tunes for the Market.

The following is a chapter, one of the most sensible, from that quaint little book, full of truths and full of prejudices: "Hints concerning Church Music, the Liturgy and kindred subjects." Prepared by JAMES M. HEWINS. Second Edition. Boston: A Williams & Co. 1857."

The obtrusion of unharmonious and secular poetry into the church, is a great hindrance to divine song. It is seized upon by ignorant or avaricious men, as a pretext for the introduction of all sorts of secular music. As a counterpart to the hymn-books before alluded to, we have tune-books without number, made up of the most ridiculous adaptations and selections from oratorios, operas, sonatas, symphonies, songs, &c., all suited to the general ignorance and secularity of the times, and to that intemperate rage for novelty which everywhere prevails. Musical conventions are called in various parts of the country, under the pretence of improving the public taste, when in fact they are only intended to promote the sale of silly and mischievous music. Now the money-changers were driven from the temple long ago, and I submit that the music and psalmody of the church is not a legitimate article of speculation, and that our country friends are most egregiously imposed upon. Good music never wears out; whereas the silly and ephemeral trash so much in vogue, perishes with the use of it, and a new tune-book is wanted every year, just as the makers of them intend. Those who indulge in such base practices, flatter themselves that it is a harmless pursuit, and are wont to say that the people want to be "humbugged;" but I have heard some sound musicians say that it will take half a century to eradicate the evil consequences. It is a national calamity.

There are banded together in the cities of New York and Boston, a set of speculators who trade in the songs of Zion. With these fellows all styles are good, and that is best to-day which sells best. They know well enough in their hearts how limited the sphere of devotional song is, but if they acknowledge the truth, why, then their occupation is gone. The public ought to be cautioned against such musical pickpockets. In some of their books the most solemn words are often coupled with the melody of some familiar or vulgar comic song, with harmony to match. Again, we have glees outright; literal selections from operas, &c., all bound up together, and covered with the high-sounding and queer names of "Hallelujah," "Cithara," "Dulcimer," "Shawn," "Lute of Zion," "The Handel," &c. To give a kind of solemnity to such music, tunes of a light character are often closed with a strong ecclesiastical cadence, which seems like putting heavy armor upon an infant. What deformity, what incongruity is all this; and yet it is done (ostensibly) for the church of Christ! So numerous are these catch-penny works, that the powers of invention are severely taxed in finding names for them.

"If in a picture, Piso, you should see
A handsome woman with a fish's tail,
Or a man's head upon a horse's neck,
Would you not laugh, and think the painter mad!
Trust me that book is as ridiculous,
Whose incoherent style, like sick men's dreams,
Varies all shapes, and mixes all extremes."

A like state of things existed for a time in England, probably among the Puritans. Sir John Hawkins relates that in country parishes, about the year 1675,

"Some poor ignorant man, whom the poring over Ravenscroft and Playford has made to believe that he is as able a proficient in psalmody as either of those authors; such men as these assume the title of singing-masters and lovers of divine music, and are the authors of those collections which are extant in the world, and are distinguished by the titles of 'David's Harp New Strung and Tuned,' 'The Harmony of Sion,' 'The Psalm-Singer's Companion,' and others of a like kind, to an incredible number."

Mr. Zeuner, in the preface to one of his books, makes the following very just remarks:

"From the abuses and absurdities that exist in well-known publications, it is not a very difficult matter to demonstrate that the church is inundated with music of a frivolous, trifling, and, may we not add, profane character!"

He then goes on to notice a great number of profane airs, such as "The Brave Swiss Boy," "The Harmonious Blacksmith," &c., as well as many others, which, he says, are now being performed on the boards of the American and English theatres!

"Ignorance and inexperience have no right to meddle with church music, which ought to be the most perfect in character and style. It ought always to be free from unhallowed associations, and its character, dignity, and solemnity ought to be constantly guarded. Has the time arrived when sacred words are to be associated with secular music, for common use in our churches? 'My house is a house of prayer,' &c."

"If one happen to hear again in the church what he has before heard in a profane place, he must indeed doubt whether he is in an insane hospital or a place of worship."

A musician can accomplish what the mere amateur, from the shop or counting-room, fails in; and amongst all who have written for the church, in this country, the above named gentleman has alone displayed a true knowledge of the requirements and propriety of Sacred Harmony. Not that this music is altogether what it should be, for of this he was well aware; but that he has best adapted himself to the flimsy poetry he had to deal with. Although slightly tinged with modern German chromatics, yet he has displayed good judgment in altering the rhythmical forms of church compositions, without destroying their grave harmony. By this means he has adapted them to the light hymns in use, without falling into the lullaby style, as his contemporaries have done.—Some of Mr. Zeuner's "chanting tunes" will serve as an illustration. The fact is, that a good strong, devotional tune, like "Dundee" or "London," is too much for many of the little nursery hymns in use; while, on the other hand, the most sublime and instructive poetry is often wholly enervated by being coupled with an operatic melody.

What further progress can be made in secularizing the songs of the church it is not easy to see, unless the British poets and the Italian opera are swallowed at a gulp; and of this there are some symptoms, as recent publications intended for the Christian church give evidence. Some of these musical pretenders try to justify themselves by saying that their books contain a great deal of good music. But what of that? The multitude, ever ready to sacrifice the understanding to the gratification of the senses, are sure to seize upon the had.

Plato complained of the injury done to music by the poets, who "confounded all things with all;" and surely no man can be justified in meddling with the psalmody or ritual of the church, unless he has a suitable knowledge of music. A tinker might as well undertake to build a telescope.

What a blessing would it be, if all the poetic and musical trash of our time could be heaped together on some large plain, and then touched with a torch,—

"Heavens! what a pile! whole ages perish there,
And one bright blaze turns learing into air."

But setting aside the quality of the music in question, it is a great sin to multiply it to such an indefinite extent. It creates much confusion. One hundred and fifty good metrical tunes are enough for this world, and perhaps there is not a much larger number of good ones extant.

The music and poetry of the church, to be of any real value, must become familiar to the mind.* Now in most of the Congregational churches in Boston, may be found at least two thousand psalm-tunes, and about one thousand hymns. Suppose then, that one-half are fit to be used at all, (and this is a most magnanimous allowance,) and that four of each are used every Sunday; it would require four and a half years to sing the former, and two years and a half to dispatch the latter.

"In 1567, Archbishop Parker published the first translation, by one and the same person, of the entire Psalter into English metre. It was printed at London by John Daye, with the royal privilege, and appended to it are eight psalm-tunes, sufficing in metre and in character, as was supposed, for every psalm."

Adaptations are generally bad, unless done by a master. There is a disagreement between the accentuation of the words and the music. The melody of the music must suit the melody of the language.

Now in the face of this perverted state of things, who does not see the necessity of music schools in our colleges. We have no standard. The Puritans demolished organs,† committed music to the flames, and annihilated all musical education; and, while we bow with reverence to the huge virtues of those old sons of thunder, we can not fail to see their errors, the consequences of which are too obvious. For want of collegiate instruction, we have no suitable men to manage our public schools, and the children are now taught from certain silly school song-books, which only tend to dissipate all true musical feeling and taste from the mind, and which they are ashamed to reflect upon as they grow older. This is a great evil. It is not owing to our climate that we have not as good singers as any nation upon earth, but it is for the want of proper youthful training. The first impressions which are made on the mind are always the strongest; hence, instead of pernicious sing-song ditties, children should always be exercised in strong classical examples, and especially in the church style, which they learn with the greatest facility, and to their lasting benefit.

* "One generation shall praise thy works to another."

† During the Great Rebellion, very few organs escaped the fury of the Puritans, excepting the sweet-toned instrument at Magdalen College, Oxford; which, it is said, "Cromwell contrived to steal, and had it removed to Hampton Court for his own entertainment. The rest were for the most part broken in pieces."

The eye, by the optic nerves, carries impressions to the brain. Sounds, also, through the auditory nerves, glide up to the brain and lay their messages before the mind, the effects of which vary according to the character of the objects or harmonies presented,—some exalting the mind and loftier sentiments, while others tend to levity and dissipations of the mind.

Luther says:

"The youth ought to be brought up and accustomed to this art, for it maketh fine and expert people. A school-master ought to have skill in music, otherwise I would not regard him; neither would we ordain young fellows to the office of preaching, except they have been well exercised in the school of music."

Here is a sample of that effeminate, whining style of metrical psalmody which (to our shame be it spoken,) prevails in a great number of American churches. The women praise it, and young girls call it "beautiful." It is a soothing lullaby style that suits their particular mood,—something akin to anise and paregoric for the babies.

Now, all this may be very well for little girls to sing at the piano on a Sunday evening, but what kind of praise is it to offer to Him who sendeth his lightnings to the ends of the earth, and rides upon the storm? Is this the way to praise God in his sanctuary? and "in the firmament of his power?" Is this praising Him "according to his excellent greatness?" Is this "singing forth the honor of his name," and "making his praise glorious?"

Signor Ricco Rocco.

Miss Isora Beal was a young lady of sixteen, unaffected, good-hearted, and pretty. It must be confessed that she was also somewhat empty-headed and vain; but as these qualities are peculiar to a very large proportion of her sisterhood, they were not particularly noticeable. She possessed besides, another trait, which used to be tolerated in the young, but which has of late gone quite out of date, along with the old-fashioned virtues—she was romantic.

I know not how to account for this circumstance, except by connecting it with the apparently incongruous fact of her having been educated in a nunnery.

From these "cloistered walls" the poor child, who was an orphan, had just emerged, to begin her little career in the world, and to take the head of her old bachelor uncle's establishment.

That worthy gentleman, though shrewd enough in his way, had about as much idea of the internal structure of a girl's heart, as I have of the process by which flowers are introduced, or made to grow, in the middle of those curious glass balls one sees every where. (Tormenting little problems that they are—they always perplex me as the apples in the pudding did poor King George—I must still be wondering how they were got in.)

Of course, Isora had never entered a theatre. She was now sixteen years of age, when exposed to histrionic infection, she took the theatric fever with uncommon virulence.

When Signor Ricco Rocco, the famous tenor, first broke on Isora's sight in a bandit's costume, (which is well known to consist of loose leather boots, a red sash garnished with pistols and dagger, and a velvet cap with a bobbing black plume,) she felt that for the first time in her life she was in the presence of a hero. Her eager eyes were bent upon him, and her heart almost stopped beating.

Signor Ricco Rocco took two steps forward, and stopped with a jerk, and by repeating this manoeuvre several times, advanced to the front of the stage.

Isora's heart beat quickly again, and a flush of excitement rose to her cheek. "He realizes my ideal!" she murmured.

After rather an awkward pause on the part of the bandit, during which the orchestra got through with the prelude, he executed a sentimental aria, in a melancholy way, with first one hand and then the other alternately pressed to his heart and sawing the air.

Isora heard the mournful strain with deep emotion. "To think he should be unhappy!" she sighed, and the brimming tears were in her eyes. All was reality to her, silly child!
